There are many signs of awakening interest in this department of school work, ranging from the recommendation in the last catalogue of Harvard University, that "a considerable amount of English poetry should be committed to memory," down to certain improved methods in the very youngest classes of our schools. No one realizes until he has tried it how easy it is to lead a child to the enjoyment of the best things in literature. This was an inevitable conclusion last week after visiting a class in a well known coeducational school in Boston, which shows well what can be done with children averaging perhaps from ten years of age. The children select their own pieces, with no limit set to their choice except that they must have poetry, since prose is sufficiently considered in other lessons through the week. Their intelligent reading and the wide-awake comments were not more noteworthy than the standards of taste indicated by their selections. This kind of work has been done there for so many years that perhaps it is only natural to find one of the indications of awakening interest, of which we have just spoken, in the action of a graduate of this school, who has offered prizes to the scholars for memorizing lines from Shakspeare. The unknown donor announces that, if this experiment is successful for a year, he will probably extend it to other schools.

This is in the line with work done in another school recently visited, where even the tiniest mites look forward to their lessons in poetry and literature. One little boy, not yet five and a half years old, has learned this winter to repeat Allingham's charming verses, "Fairy Folk." And no one who has heard him murmur them to himself or watched his pleasure in the pictures they have called up can doubt his appreciation of a wide difference between them and the baby jingles that he laughs at for a minute, and then forgets.

Parents think themselves too busy to do much for their children in relation to their school work; and yet, without an intelligent, appreciative interest at home, it is uphill work for the teachers. One of the pleasantest experiments of this kind which the writer has tried came as the result of confinement for four weeks or more with a little scarlet fever patient. During the greater part of the time the eight-year-old was well enough to do almost anything he chose inside the limits of the two rooms.

Reading aloud was the favorite occupation. We agreed to read mainly in a single line, doing one thing as thoroughly as possible. Our choice of a subject was at first limited by the few books in the boy's own library, and we were practically obliged to choose Greek mythology as our field. Some of the books had been read before, but not as we read them then. Beginning with "Three Greek Children," we made our way through Kingsley's "Greek Heroes," and the Hawthorne "Tales" which assumed new meanings by comparison with more direct forms of the myths. Then came Baldwin, with his "Stories of the Golden Age." The interest increased, and we begged for aid from friends who had access to larger libraries; and we found, to our delight, that in Church's Stories from Homer and Virgil we were getting almost literal translations from the original. The reading of those weeks has always remained a permanent possession in the boy's mind.

There are plenty of chances for us all to do such work if we choose. Children are most appreciative while young. It is just as easy to encourage a taste for poetry, for instance, as to teach children to love birds. They are responsive by their very nature. Matthew Arnold was right when he said that "the best poetry will be found to have a power of forming, sustaining, and delighting us, as nothing else can"; and it is something which by right belongs to every one.

THE DIVORCE COURT.

It seems a churlish thing to take a long face and a sad heart under the striped awning and into the flower-decked church, where shaded lamps and music make a mellow delight, and the coming of the bridal party to some soft strain of Wagner or Mendelssohn is waited with fluttering and rustling anticipation. But, while the diamonds sparkle, the flowers breathe fragrance, the music pulses like a beating heart to organ throbs, one who is old and experienced and a little sad is apt to muse on the uncertainty of human hopes, the complexity of human relations, the many diverse paths leading from the church door, —some to luxury and splendor, some to happiness and lowly love, some to endurance and sacrifice and long martyrdom, others to bitter disappointment, disillusion, and the divorce court.

These reflections are all awry with the spring sunshine, the exquisite new toilets, the bright eyes of girls who follow the ceremony with heart-throb and anticipatory interest, the pleased looks of young men whose thoughts turn lightly to love. If you have these ideas, you seek to stifle them. The sexton might show you out of the door if he suspected that you came without a bridal thought-garment and cast too distinct and alien a shadow on all the beauty, the fluttering hopes, the good wishes, and delighted excitement of the wedding guests.

There the handsome young couple stand on the hither edge of the honeymoon, perfectly assured that they have found the exact location of the Garden of Eden, over which scholars have so long puzzled their dusty brains. Their experience is to be quite different from that of all the brides and grooms gone before down the moonlighted and sunlit vistas, and who have too often sadly involved themselves in thorny thickets or stumbled over unguarded precipices. You cannot make them believe they are not exceptional, not clearer-sighted and better governed than the thousands of bewildered young pairs who have gone astray and come to nameless grief and despair.

It is the nearness, beheld with the mind's eye, of a dark and gloomy portal hard by the sculptured church door, with its gay awning and curious crowds, that makes the pathos and tragedy of so many lives, and attunes our ears to the tolling of bells that indicate the death of happiness heard through the merry church chimes. God keep those young creatures, so absorbed in each other and in the bright side of existence, from straying into the divorce court!

But what is to hinder, if our young men and maidens are nourished on a false idea of life and a flimsy theory of happiness, — the amusement theory, perpetual pleasure and indulgence? These will not bear the strain of the first badly cooked dinner. The discrepancy between things as they are and as they ought to be in the minds of inexperienced young people make all these wedding smiles and gifts, the flattery and the finery, seem like a mockery of fate or a sad precursor.

It has been deemed proper that the outset of the united life should be marked by a great absorption in externals. Clothes form a large part of the pretty business, but we may believe that the wedding garment of which Jesus spoke cannot be found in the best shops. All possible illusions are thrown round a crude young pair to render them careless of the real meaning of the step they are taking. If life's padding can make life beautiful, they will have more than enough. The over-indulged, undisciplined girl, the selfish, pleasure-loving man, would be sure of bliss if tea-sets and diamonds were the only requisites. Of money there may be an abundance. It is a wonderful discovery to find that money will not do all that is expected of it. Though the bank-book may balance, there is still a deficit in the treasury of the heart. Only love, experience, patience, forbearance, can make nice adaptations of means to ends. Beautiful indeed seem the laws of life when we discover that these qualities can create beauty with little, and it is more by head and heart we live than by pocket.

It is a wide-spread error that the gay young girl need not be taught anything practical before marriage; that by a kind of magic she will develop into the good manager, the skilled housewife. Here is an ally of the divorce court. The art of true home-making is not much thought of when all those pretty and useless presents are spread out for inspection. The theory is that the bride is to live in a bower, and know no more of baking and brewing than the birds of the air. But nature's common sense pierces through all our silly fictions, our shallow pretences and make-believes. If we could present a little capacity for making home homelike, we might block at least one of the side paths that lead from the church to the divorce court. The plan of the beautiful young bride in her lovely clothes, of living by agreeable sensations and sequences of delightful, vaguely considered things, has an unspeakable sadness when held up beside nature's stern and implacable law that all shall be earned, and nothing given. The husband who would save his darling from all knowledge of real life and stern necessity finds himself a dismal failure. To love, to suffer, to enjoy together, sharing all things, — this is the only rule of true happiness. The world is full of shirkers, who would find something better than this strenuous and tonic way of earning peace and gaining happiness, something better than growth and development along the homely, ethical lines of growth. These young people who from the church porch look upon house-keeping as a kind of bird-nest life have no capacity for living on uncooked worms and grubs.

When annoyances come, — nettle-stinging, miserable annoyances, that demand patience and self-sacrifice and good humor and giving up, — then they lose their beautiful optimism, appearing in the guise of Hymen with yellow robe and flaming torch. Instead of feeling themselves the favored of Heaven, exceptional beings, set apart from the common order of experience, they begin to look upon themselves as persecuted by some malignant, inhuman power. The being who was once so near has moved to a remote distance. There is no longer confidence, mutual trust: there is no longer one heart beating in two breasts. Individualism in its most repulsive guise has appeared. It is no longer ours, but mine and thine. Affection, once so all-pervading, fails to mend the crack. Thoughts, once so unified, have worn distinct channels. The pulling together that once was not a thought, but a law of being, now seems to have resolved itself into pulling apart.

Easy are then the steps that lead to the divorce court. The path smokes with the hasty feet of those who would be sundered.

How radiantly they began with the belief that this shall be no common marriage, — quite different indeed from those of their humdrum friends! What specifics they seem to hold for keeping it fresh and ardent and vivid, full of spontaneous delight, never to degenerate into the dreary level of dull duty! As they tread upon flowers and listen to the crisp rustle of lace and satin, do they ever remember that this is the entrance upon the great discipline, the supreme test of life? When the lover takes the happiness of the beloved into his care, is there no shudder of apprehension lest devotion shall weary, and the gossamer wings of these lovely dreams get drabbled in mud? Does it occur that marriage must grow more and more sacred, more and more religious, to save it from these wretched endings, where all the beauty and bright expectation seem ground into a bitter mockery of disillusion and disgust?

The united life, not an easy thing to attain, must be won by merit, by such as are willing to earn it, — continually growing together, coming nearer in heart and will; not enduring each other simply, but, like systole and diastole of the heart, finding each other indispensable. Vanity and self-indulgence and wilfulness do not enter upon this life. Only the higher integrities can find it at last, as an inevitable conclusion to the harmonious growth of the affections, that draw nourishment not from partial ranges of feeling and impulse, but are fed by the unfailing springs of goodness and virtue, patience, humility, the preferring of another's happiness to one's own. This spirit goes ever deeper and deeper into life, and draws power not only for large generalizations, but for every smallest human relation.

BEQUEST TO THE A. U. A.

By the will of the late Esther Clarke Mack of Salem, Mass., proved Jan. 26, 1885, a legacy of thirty-five thousand dollars ($35,000) was left to the American Unitarian Association, subject, however, to the life interest of her brother, Dr. William Mack, who died in Salem on the 9th inst.

The terms of the bequest are as follows:

"I order my executors, in case of my decease before my brother William, to set apart . . . thirty-five thousand dollars ($35,000), the income of which shall be for the use of my brother William during his natural life.

"After the decease of my brother William I direct my remaining executor to pay . . . thirty-five thousand dollars ($35,000) to the American Unitarian Association in order to carry out the wishes of my late sister, Harriet O. Mack, who, dying intestate, requested that at the decease of my brother and myself seventy thousand dollars ($70,000) of her property should be given to said Association for the purpose of promoting the diffusion of liberal Christianity, it being the intention of my brother William to make over to said Association for the same purpose the remaining thirty-five thousand dollars ($35,000) necessary to make up the seventy thousand dollars ($70,000) aforesaid. . . .

"I desire that this bequest to the American Unitarian Association may be made in the name of my sister, Harriet O. Mack."

By the terms of the will of Miss Esther C. Mack the Association will before long receive the above-named legacy; and the additional thirty-five thousand dollars ($35,000) which has been bequeathed by the late Dr. William Mack will be paid, in accordance with his will, at a period not exceeding three (3) years from the probate of the will, which has been presented at Salem for probate.

REV. EDMUND B. WILLSON, A.M.

On Sunday morning, the 2d inst., Mr. Willson preached at the North Church in Salem, Mass., his thirty-sixth anniversary sermon. Almost literally he died in the harness. For, taking the whole long service on a very hot day, he carried it through to the end, declining all assistance from his colleague; and then, sinking back into his seat, he lost consciousness. Almost his closing words were an explanation of this long service on the ground that he might never address them again. He lingered a few days, and then peacefully died.

Mr. Willson was a man so fresh in his thought and so youthful in spirit that it was difficult to believe that he was seventy-five years of age, and that only six of our ministers have longer settlements. He was one of the old-fashioned gentlemen, kindly, courteous, and unassuming in his demeanor, but resolute in his purpose and unflinching in his loyalty to what he considered to be the call of duty.

While not conspicuous either as a scholar or a profound thinker, he kept himself always abreast of the new thought and the new literature of his time. The honorary degree of Master of Arts conferred upon him by Harvard College fairly indicated his standing. While he was conservative in his temper, never rash in action, never an iconoclast, he was still alert, free, and vigorous in his relation to all the fresh problems of theology, ethics, social progress, and political reform.

His modesty was a marked characteristic, and yet it was combined with a singular sincerity and candor which made his opinion both known and respected. Whatever position seemed to him to be right, whether in his relations to the work of his denomination or to civic affairs, he assumed without self-consciousness, but with resolution, and, whenever necessary, with open advocacy of that which seemed to him right or disapproval of that which he thought was wrong. No one suspected him of ulterior purposes, of self-seeking, or of any intent excepting that of loyal service.

During the many years of his ministry in Salem he had grown to be an important part of the life of the city as well as that of his parish. Men, women, and children honored him, loved him, and trusted him, regarding him as one of the stable elements of the social and religious life of the city. Naturally, it happened in the changes which passed over this old community that many members of the older families drew together under his administration; and he came to represent in a peculiar degree and manner the old-fashioned, cultivated, self-respecting, dignified life of one of the oldest cities of New England.

In a singular way, without conscious purpose or ostentation, Mr. Willson carried on the traditions of the older clergy in Salem. They were men conspicuous for their knowledge of practical affairs, their interest in all questions affecting civilization, whether at home or abroad, and for progress in every direction. He will take his place in the traditions of the city with such men as Dr. Bentley of the East Church, who in his day was the literary purveyor for such men as Madison, Jefferson, and the leaders of thought North and South; with Dr. Prince, who represented the scientific knowledge of the day, introducing philosophic apparatus into the country among the first; with Barnard, his predecessor, who encountered Col. Lesley at the North Bridge on a Sunday morning, and prevented bloodshed by his interference, inducing Col. Lesley to return; with Brazer and Upham and Coleman and Flint and Thompson and others, a noble array of men who left their mark not only upon the institutions of the city, but upon the character of thousands of men and women who now are doing good work in every city of the Union.

THE BREATH OF JUNE.

It is one of the brief delights of summer to wander through country by-ways, where village improvement societies have not tidied up the roadsides, and suddenly catch a whiff of delicious fragrance that comes only in June. The sensation of intoxicating delight is more evanescent and spiritual than the intoxication the same vine may furnish at a later season, for it is the time of the bloom of the grape. One need not go to the wild woods for it. It floats in at the window this moment from the garden wall below; but it is a perfume of which the dweller in the crowded city knows as little as he does of the scents of Cathay. It is unique among odors; for it is neither sweet nor pungent nor spicy, but all combined in perfection. Nothing else approaches it in delicacy and penetration. It fills the atmosphere of the neighborhood, and is wafted by the wind to great distances. Yet, if one seeks the flower that yields this delicious odor, it is tiny, green, insignificant. The lover of beauty would not give it a second thought. In many places in New England, however, it has a near neighbor whose charm of form and color, though devoid of fragrance, will well reward the wanderer in the woods and fields. Year in and year out they blossom together. It is never far from the 17th of June,—a few days before, as this year, rarely a day or two later; but good New Englanders are glad to believe that the laurel and the wild grape always celebrate Bunker Hill Day together.

An ardent disciple of the New Church was once driving with a prosaic Presbyterian, when they passed a sturdy apple-tree. "Ah," said the Swedenborgian, "in that tree I see you." And then she went on to show the resemblances and the significance attached to each, saying that in the vegetable world she could find a parallel to every friend she had. So it is easy to think of a good man's life as we perceive the fragrance that diffuses itself from the modest blossoms hidden away beneath the outspreading grapevine leaves. June brings us roses with beauty and fragrance, but their claim to recognition appeals to the eye so clearly that they often win praise for their looks alone when they are destitute of all smell.

There is no power greater than that of a pure spirit, an influence of sweetness, that diffuses itself through the simple force of its own goodness. Dr. Irving Fisher has told how he shrank from letting trained nurses, refined and gentle women, go into the men's hospital ward when he was superintendent at Tewksbury. He knew the vulgarity, blasphemy, obscenity, of which many of the men were guilty,—men whom poverty, intemperance, and dissolute ways had robbed of all manhood. But at the earnest entreaty of these nurses they were allowed to try the experiment; and in their presence not an oath was heard, not an unclean allusion was made. By the influence of their own pure personality, without a change of rules or any show of authority, they cleansed and purified that ward.

A hundred similar instances might be given of the pervasive power of a spiritual life. Did we all appreciate it, we should make closer endeavors to realize in our own souls the sweetness, serenity, and purity of a life hid with God.

Brevities.

For the first time since the Reformation Sweden has now a Roman Catholic bishop.

The Richmond (Va.) Christian Advocate is not opposed to humanitarianism, but gives an odd description of it: "Humanitarianism is religion with its head cut off."

Dr. Joseph Henry Allen, at the request of the Christian Register, has sent some personal recollections of his friend and classmate, Mr. Willson, which appear on another page.

Hardly an exchange comes to our office now without an editorial on the Armenian question. Could the Porte feel the pressure of this tremendous moral power, the day of Armenian freedom would soon dawn.

City and State, the stirring paper of which Herbert Welsh is editor, in Philadelphia, is making an heroic and praiseworthy effort to secure a rational celebration of the Fourth of July, which shall include the doing away with fire crackers and pistol practice. Success to this beneficent plan!

A great many will be ready to agree with the New York Witness when it says, "The less one knows about the five points of Calvinism, or, in fact, about any other precise definitions of spiritual truth, the fewer cobwebs he will have in his mind when he goes to the Fountain Head for knowledge concerning the things of God."

In the presence of real grief what mockery it is to take up a paper, and read, "A gentleman wears deep mourning for wife or mother not less than one year. . . . Etiquette lightens his loneliness by permitting him to visit his men friends two months after he has assumed mourning"! And, as real grief is omnipresent, such things are always mockery.

The Salem Gazette indicates a tendency toward the reversion of man to primitive types in the physical degeneracy caused by "the monkey stoop." It adds a word of advice. "The woman cyclist sits upright, and uses the wheel rationally in all respects. Let her masculine consort but imitate her example, and the very best hygienic fruits of the invention will be gathered."

The world is poorer this week than last by the loss of three noble personalities, Rev. E. B. Willson, Dr. A. A. Miner, and gentle and beautiful Mrs. May, the wife of Rev. Samuel May of Leicester. We may use the word "lost" for want of a better, but the influence of such lives is deathless; and, though their bodily presence is missed from the earth, the world will be always richer that they lived.

One is always glad to hear the tribute of one noble man to another. We therefore venture to quote from a private letter just received from the greatly beloved Dr. Briggs: "There never was a truer or more lovable man in our pulpits or out of them than Edmund Willson. I last heard him preach from the text 'The pure in heart shall see God.' He had a right to use a text so sacred. How well I knew and loved him!"

At the close of a long review of Mr. Chadwick's "Religion without Dogma" by Haus Schmidkunz, published in Nord und Süd, the German monthly established by Paul Lindau, the writer, after a detailed study of various aspects of the Unitarian controversy, especially in relation to Ethical Culture, says, "On the whole, this work furnishes us a proof more frequent now than formerly that we have in the Americans not only worthy champions in things material, but in those which are spiritual, and that in the fundamental questions of religion, a special heritage of the German intellect, we may learn something from them, especially since our churchly movements are far behind those of the Americans in strength."

A Wisconsin minister distributes through the community where he lives the following startling and, to a reverent mind, irreverent and ghastly announcement:—

THEATRE!

By command of the King of kings and at the desire of all who love his appearing, at the Theatre of the Universe, on the Eve of Time, will be performed the GREAT ASSIZE, OR DAY OF JUDGMENT.

The scenery, which is now actually being prepared, will not only surpass anything that has yet been seen, but will infinitely exceed the utmost stretch of human conception. There will be a just representation of all the inhabitants of the world in their various and proper colors; and their customs and manners will be so exactly and so minutely delineated that the most secret thoughts will be discovered.

This theatre will be laid out after a new plan, and will consist of pit and gallery only; and, contrary to all others, the gallery is fitted up for the reception of people of high (or heavenly) birth, and the pit for those of low (or earthly) rank.

N.B.—The gallery is very spacious, and the pit without bottom.

PRINCIPAL PERFORMERS.

Judge.....The Son of God
Jurymen.....The Saints of the most High
Prisoners.....{ Drunkards, Swearers, Sabbath-breakers, Extortioners, Lovers of Sinful Pleasure, Fornicators, the Fearful and Unbelieving, and Who-soever loveth and maketh a Lie.
Witnesses.....{ Angels, Ministers, Conscience, and the Word of God.

Gaoler.....Abaddon
Ministers of Vengeance.....Angels of Bottomless Pit

Tickets for the pit are sold at every place of Temptation, where the lust of the flesh and the lust of the eyes and the pride of life are displayed. Tickets for the gallery may be had gratis at the "fountain open for sin and uncleanness," but will only be given to those who are willing to deny all ungodliness, and take up the cross daily, forsake all unrighteousness, and follow Christ. Tickets not transferable. No money will be taken at the door, and all who are admitted into the galleries must be sprinkled with the blood of Christ and sealed with Immanuel's signet.

Pro and Con.

OLD MAGAZINES.

To the Editor of the Christian Register:—

A few years ago I saw in your paper a letter from a lady desiring books and magazines to send to the life-saving stations for the men to read. I was glad to respond with a box of books, and now have another collection of magazines,—Harper's, Cosmopolitan, etc.,—which I would willingly give where they would be of benefit. Address
MISS GRACE LAURENCE, Forge Village, Mass.

THE INCREASE OF CRIME.

To the Editor of the Christian Register:—

I have just returned from a four weeks' trip in the West, mostly in Oklahoma, so that I did not see Mr. Wines's reply to my question in regard to the increase in crime, nor his own question in regard to my authority. The Chicago Tribune vouches for the truth of the statistics. They are collected daily, and at the end of the year are printed, care also being taken not to duplicate. A noted lawyer in Chicago made the following statement in open court lately: "There were more murders in Chicago last year than in New England,—yes," he added, "than in England and Wales." The fact that the figures are equivalent to two and three murders last year in every county in all the States and Territories of the Union is neither here nor there. There were four persons shot dead in one county in one week this month, and the next week three more were murdered because it was thought they had informed on their pals. Here were seven in two weeks. Now, no one would rejoice more than I to feel assured that the figures given by the Chicago Tribune were exaggerated. Why such a paper should take pains to employ a man to collect the facts and print them I don't know, but I do know that life is cheap on our frontiers and in our great cities. In a small village where I was staying last week a woman shot her step-daughter. The father of the girl, who was the woman's fifth husband, was seen sweeping the blood from the sidewalk into the road. He stayed with his wife in jail. A fiddler was sent down to solace the defiant and proud woman, who gloried in her deed. Many men with the guilt of many murders on them are at large to-day; and many a poor man dies from violence in the unchurched part of our land, the record of which never gets into print. Until Mr. Wines can give more than negative evidence, I do not feel that he has disproved those I sent, merely because of awfulness of the statistics. W. G. PUDDEFOOT.

WHAT DOES BOSTON NEED?

To the Editor of the Christian Register:—

Boston needs a large, convenient, well-appointed church for the people. It will not be such a church as one single congregation can carry on. To maintain it fitly will require the full energy of the Suffolk Conference, the Benevolent Fraternity, the Religious Education Society, the American Unitarian Association, the Unitarian Club, and the Channing Club, all and each.

Such a church, fitly to accommodate people of Boston and strangers, should be and do what a cathedral ought to be and do where there is an established church. This is much more than the parish work of any one congregation.

To be and do this, the church itself should be large, convenient, light, and democratic. By democratic I mean that the worst seat in it shall be about as good as the best. It ought to be so large that fifteen hundred or two thousand people can be seated in it. But pulpit and platform must be so placed that these people, if not deaf, can hear the speaker.

The church must be near the central point of the electric railway delivery. That is to say, it would be well to place it near the crossing of Massachusetts Avenue and Boylston Street.

1. Into this church any one of the Unitarian congregations now existing might enter for the conduct of its Sunday morning service, of its Sunday-school, and for the offices of the management of its charities and hospitalities. Thus the Second Church or the Church of the Unity or the Church of the Disciples, the New South Church or the South Congregational Church, might remove there. If I do not name King's Chapel, the First Church, Bulfinch Place, or the Arlington Street Church, it is because they are so conveniently and elegantly housed now.

2. But, besides the duty of a single church organization to its own people, there is a larger duty to Boston which this new "church of Boston" should fulfil.

Thus it should maintain an evening service for all comers every Sunday evening from October 1 to July 1. A good illustration of what such a service is and can do is the evening service maintained with such spirit at the Tremont Temple, before it was burned down.

Harvard College maintains for the same period a Sunday evening service, which nearly one thousand students attend. What summons them? The college calls forty or more preachers from all parts of the country to preach on successive Sundays, and the students know that the service is so interesting that it demands their presence. Now in Cambridge there are only twenty-five hundred students. But in Boston, in the different colleges, there are six or seven thousand. This service might be called the students' service.

Now, it is not the duty or business of the South Congregational Church or of the Church of the Disciples or of King's Chapel to carry on such a general or national service. But is it not the duty of the Unitarian churches of Boston? Ought not all the twenty-eight of them to unite in this affair?

3. The "church of Boston" could be so arranged that one of the twenty-eight Unitarian clergymen should be in attendance two or three hours every day to meet any persons who seek the advice of a clergyman. I am led to make this suggestion, also, from my experience of many years as a chaplain at Harvard College. At Cambridge, in the midst of the company of two thousand five hundred men, there is the "minister's room." In this room, from nine to eleven o'clock every day, there sits or stands one of the college chaplains. His term of duty is for three weeks. In the course of these three weeks this gentleman meets as many as one hundred young men, who come to him for social conversation or for advice in their studies or for counsel in the serious matters which relate to the communion between God and man. If there are so many persons in the university at Cambridge who find advantage in such conversation, there must be a larger number in the company of seven thousand students who assemble every winter for the work of the different schools, conservatories, and other institutions of instruction in Boston.

4. The "church of Boston" ought, also, to be able to arrange that its large auditorium should be of use every Sunday afternoon for some religious service. Vesper services have proved very important in all our large communities. There are also many, many subjects, bearing directly on the religious life of communities like ours, which need the discussion, perhaps in courses of lectures, of the persons most able,—not only clergymen, but experts in the different lines of social economy. Almost all of us who are interested in the advance of our social order, in one way or another, try to point out the utilizing of Sunday afternoon for such purposes. The success in England of what are fairly to be called great educational movements, conducted on Sunday afternoons, shows that such plans for the use of a large church are not Utopian.

To build such a church as I speak of would require one hundred and fifty thousand dollars. It has been suggested, after a good deal of consultation with a large number of persons who hold similar views to those expressed here, that, if some one of the existing churches would be willing to use the building for its morning service and Sunday-school, as I have suggested, that church might contribute one-half the amount. Among all our Unitarian organizations in Boston, ecclesiastical, educational, philanthropic, and missionary, and among the rich men and women and the poor men and women who believe that "God has more light yet to come out of his holy word," are there not means for raising, begging, or borrowing the other seventy-five thousand dollars?

EDWARD E. HALE,
Minister of the South Congregational Church.

A WET JUNE DAY.

Scents, sounds as of November fill the air:
Of myriad blossoms down wet pathways strewn;
Of ragged leaves off steaming branches blown,
And dropped into dank hollows here and there.
Keen little gusts go whirling through the hush,
Driving the mist before them up the lane.
And, lo! the lovely world grows ours again.
The orchard fences, the one elder bush,
Prone with its white face in the drenched, thick grass;
The rows of apple-trees, gnarled, dropping sweet;
The highway with its pools a gleam like glass;
Then, as still speeds the mist on shining feet,
Meadow and wood, peaked roofs,—beyond them shows
A windy west, the color of a rose.

—Lizette Woodworth Reese.

FIRESIDE SCHOOLS.

SOUTHERN NOTES.

BY ELLA A. GILES.

Did I care to spend a day in visiting Negro cabins? Would I take any special interest in studying an unwritten-about feature of the many educational processes which are developing the colored race in the South?

Hat and parasol and stout walking-shoes as well as alert mental faculties responded. What were fireside schools?

"De Lawd bless Missy Moore! 'Tain't in de chu'ch on'y we brungs up de chillun. It's in de cabin, it's in de home; an' she dun comes, like John de Baptist's second wife, a-wanderin' in de wilderness, to show us mudders de way."

Not being aware that John had been blest with a first helpmeet, and glancing at my saintly companion's face to see how she relished being likened to his second, I somewhat amusedly took a proffered seat, from which the speaker brushed the red clay soil of Atlanta suburbs with her dress skirt.

"How can we teach de chillun what we had nebber been teached?" asked the colored mother of a brood of seven or eight noisily howling infants who had become involved in a quarrel. Before the question was fairly stated, she was engaged in slapping some of them vigorously.

"It is such scenes as this that shape my daily work," said my escort to the cabin. She spoke softly, but thereupon told me a story.

"I attended an association one time," she said, "where the subject under discussion was the education of the young. One man was enthusiastic about the youth, but thought nothing could be done for old people. He said that crawfish always swim backward. In order to make them swim like other fish, the young should be taken into another pond, where they could never see the old ones: they should not be allowed to go back until they could swim straight. He thought he had made a convincing argument, but I asked him where there was a pond large enough to hold all the young fish. We cannot take children from their mothers as soon as they are born. And yet the first seven years of a child's education are most important. To reach the parents is to control the children." Before we left the cabin, my guide had shown the colored mother the beauty of tact and patience in managing such a pugilistic little circle of ebony youngsters. Even while we were present, there was another chance for a telling object-lesson. We left the children docile and affectionate, and the mother beaming upon us and saying,—

"De Lawd bless Missy Moore! Las' time she teached me how to dun sweep de flo' wid a broom. See it dah?" pointing proudly to it in the corner.

"And what did you use before?" I naturally asked.

"Bundle of sticks, shuah," she replied. And I learned that in the most benighted places a bundle of sticks tied together, or one stick, was the only weapon used to "cl'ar up wid."

The amount of ignorance concerning the simplest features of ordinary domestic science is almost inconceivable. In civilized America there are spots as black, so far as any rules of hygiene or home-making are known, as in darkest Africa itself. Negro cabin life is nearly as devoid of decency in some quarters to-day as that in the distant jungles. We went to one cabin where a young woman was washing. She was full of apologies for her appearance. In a very pleasant voice, and with a manner unmisstakably cordial and sincere, my friend said:—

"Ah! but wash-day doesn't excuse white women for slipshod feet, dirty dresses, and uncombed hair. The best home-keeper fixes herself up nice and neat, rolls up her sleeves, puts on a big apron, and then washes away with all her might. Meanwhile she has one room always in order, so that, if any one calls, she can pull down her sleeves, remove the apron, and be all ready to see a lady or gentleman. Ever and ever so many white women who do all their own work can manage this way on washing day."

"But I can't wash in my kauset."

"Then it's too tight. That's a proof of it." And she preached a pretty little sermon on the evils of lacing.

One of the most interesting talks I heard her give was on the subject of dress in a little cabin where we found a mother displaying a lot of gewgaws just purchased, although her girls were shoeless and her home devoid of comfort. But I found my companion's reminiscences quite as interesting as the personal experiences shared with her. So, as we ambled along in the sunshine, I encouraged her to discourse freely upon her methods in the peculiar missionary work for which she is so aptly fitted.

"I must tell you about the dish-washing lessons," she said. "It seems a very simple thing; but, when one attempts to put it all in words, it looks like quite a complicated performance. I was very hungry one day, but of course did not accept an invitation to sit down at a table. The food seemed to be well cooked; but the dishes—ah me! I said nothing, but after a few days returned to teach the mother and girls how to get the dishes clean. We went into the kitchen. All the tumblers had clouds on them, the cups and saucers felt rough, the plates were sticky. I examined the dish-cloths, while the colored girls grinned unblushingly. But it was a very solemn hour with me. I, of course, had them get two pans, and nearly fill one with clean, warm water with soap in it. I told them they should have it as clean as if they were going to drink it or cook with it, and their big eyeballs rolled in astonishment. Before I knew it one had spoiled it by putting in the dirty dish-cloth. I had her throw it out and fill the pan again, getting a fresh, clean cloth. Oh, how we made the glasses shine, and how brightly we scoured the old knives and forks! I really enjoyed the whole operation myself. I taught them the minutest details from beginning to end. It would have been amusing, had it not been so pathetic, to witness their eagerness and enthusiasm. The white girls in the cooking classes up North are not more in earnest than those Negro girls were in wanting to know the best way of washing dishes, when they once began to think about it. The dish-washing reform spread in that vicinity until it became a fad. All the ignorant mothers had to be told of my visit and the value of my instructions." Out of the efforts of my morning companion has grown finally an organization of which she is the leader, or, as she calls it, the "headquarters." It is known as Fireside Schools, and she has hundreds of names enrolled. There are pledges for work and study. Lessons are not only learned every day, but taught to others. There are books and pamphlets furnished the members. The pupils are mothers and their daughters, who are not required to attend any meetings anywhere, but are expected to get good, be good, and do good at home. Those who can write are expected to report to headquarters: those who cannot are told where they can get some one to write for them. The Fireside School is the servant of the church. Its object is to reduce to every-day practice the vows taken by the mothers when they unite with a church. The Fireside School cannot be fenced by denominational interests. Home is universal. What a boundless field it offers for a missionary as consecrated, as zealous, and as wise as my friend Miss Moore!

From the cabins of the poor and ignorant Negroes in the suburbs of the city we came to the large school for colored girls and women known as Spelman Seminary, which has the finest site and some of the finest buildings in Atlanta. It has been most generously helped by Mr. Rockefeller, who has given it over $90,000. It has come to be called the colored girls' Vassar in the South. Looking back to my first visit, eleven years ago, I fully realize the wonderful progress which beneficent years have wrought in the condition of the average Negro girl. The abnormal religious excitement which prevailed eleven years ago, the comical costumes, the grotesque attitudes, the amusing African dialect, undiluted by any pronunciations which Webster would authorize or Grant White approve, are all entirely lacking now. Among several hundred colored girls marching to music from building to building this bright autumn afternoon, their uncovered heads well poised on not unshapely shoulders (even though the predominant dress-sleeve was amply puffed, and stood up according to the dictates of fashion magazines), there was but one who seemed to have stepped out from the old régime of pitiable ignorance and poverty and tawdry display.

A swift vision of the past arose in vivid outlines before me, as I marked her ungraceful bearing; her green dress and gay red apron; her hair, with its broad parting down the back of her head, and the tight little braids tied with twine. A new scholar, of course, and from the backwoods (where still remain thousands yet to be reached by some beneficent influence and brought to this Vassar of the colored girls or to some other educational centre). So great was the contrast between this girl and her companions that she looked like the spirit of caricature itself profanely introduced into a picture of typified womanly refinement, womanly grace, and womanly aspiration. Now, this may seem like a decided exaggeration. It may appear to the casual reader like an idealization of the characteristic colored girl of this large school to say that she is really a Delsartian in her carriage; that she dresses in as good taste as any Boston school-girl of the period; that in her features are radiated intelligence, true culture, and real beauty. Even the most prejudiced Southern critic, who may want to evade the question, must admit, on seeing the majority of the graduates of the school, that in their physique, their characters, their spirit, their lives, they have as much beauty as the white girls of the present century. It is surprising, perhaps; but it is nevertheless true. They have studied everything that is necessary in the successful make-up of a cultured white woman. And they have been taught under even better advantages than the average white young woman of the North or South. The faculty of Spelman is represented by thirty-five of the sweetest, truest, noblest, and most consecrated women of New England. These Spelman girls have studied, apart from the world, as if a convent itself environed them, not only the common English branches, but, many of them, foreign languages, science, music, literature, poetry, the classics, a manual of politeness, and fundamentally, every day, under wise guidance, the Scriptures.

It must be that, under favorable circumstances and conditions, the average African advances and develops more rapidly than the other races; that is, the average African female. All the profound arguments of the most learned scientists to the contrary. I should, noting the changes and the swift strides in education and real culture made by the educated colored women of the South during the last eleven years, be unconvinced if told there was a limit to the capacity of the average colored girl to assimilate all the elements which form the ideal American woman.

After graduating, the girls are quite apt to return for a continuance of their studies. So to-day the immense opportunities for judging fairly what can be done in the case of a persevering colored girl, eager to be the equal, even if never the companion, of her white sisters, are in no way to be deprecated.

The recent action of committees in a conference at Old Point Comfort, Va., of Northern and Southern orthodox religious leaders, aiming to effect co-operation and unity in efforts to enlighten and educate the Southern Negroes, is one of the most encouraging features since the war.

The work of Northern missionaries has slowly dawned upon the Southern people as not only beneficent and effective, but necessary,—indeed, imperatively so. But it will take some time yet for prejudice to entirely disappear and co-operation become general in the South. The trend of public sentiment is not yet in favor of these extensive educational institutions. But in the course of another eleven years what facts now doubtful to the average questioner may not be firmly established?

JAUNTING IN SPAIN.

BY LYDIA J. SANDERSON.

I.

Up and down the land of Spain one is continually finding novel sights. The railway trains travel so slowly, the stops are so long and frequent, that one gets glimpses of foreign scenes and life from the car windows,—snow-capped mountains and the bluest of skies; stretches of desert and miles of fertile land; cacti, century plants, and tall palms; mountains of olives, and pink and white oleander stretching away in the distance; gayly decorated muleteers, driving mules heavily laden with panniers; windmills, calling to mind Spain's famous knight, Don Quixote; while vineyards, orange groves, and pomegranates delight both the outer and inner man.

The houses are built in the Oriental style, with a court-yard, called a patio, in the centre, open to the sky, with an awning drawn over the top by day to keep out the sun.

Each province has a peculiar dress. In the north, in the Spanish Pyrenees, the men wear corduroy knee-breeches, ornamented with filigree braid and buttons. The waistcoat is of black velvet, decorated, and so short as to show a broad, bright-colored sash, which serves as a catch-all for cigars, money, handkerchief, knives, and knick-knacks. Blue stockings and sandals cover the feet, while a bright-colored kerchief adorns the head.

The women wear a tight bodice, short dress, and a red handkerchief tied jauntily over the head.

In Central Spain an entirely different garb is worn. The Castilians have a grave, sedate look, which corresponds with their garment; for the men wear gray alpaca coats, long gray trousers, low shoes, and a broad-brimmed gray felt hat called a sombrero. At the capital however the people have a European character in dress; and the lady's mantilla, seen in many other cities, is fast disappearing before the invading French bonnet. In fact, there is little that is Spanish about Madrid. It is a great city after the style of any European capital, and full of modern equipments. Its great charm is its wonderful art gallery of two thousand paintings.

Not far from Madrid is what the Spaniards call "the eighth wonder of the world,"—the Escorial. This stupendous edifice was built of granite, shaped into a palace, a church, a monastery, and a pantheon, by Philip II., to have a burial-house for himself and the royal families, and as an act of gratitude to Saint Lawrence, to whose protection he ascribed certain victories in battle. It is built in the shape of a gridiron, because upon this instrument Saint Lawrence suffered martyrdom. It is a grand and gloomy pile. Here lived Philip II.,—a sad, stern, and silent life. His simple room is pointed out: it is like a cell for plainness. It is so placed that he might be close to the high altar, and hear and see the mass from his bed when ill. It is said that he was never known to smile; but how could he, when he commanded the tortures and horrors of the Spanish Inquisition?

The Pantheon is an octagonal chamber, with shelves of precious marbles around it, upon which are the marble coffins, arranged according to Spanish royal etiquette. Only kings and mothers of kings have the honor of being placed here. Other members of the royal family are buried in corridors leading from this royal vault.

Leaving this modern world of Madrid and its suburbs, we come to ancient Toledo, with its one broad street and its one public conveyance, the omnibus. We have come from the outer world into a strange old town of the past, built high upon a rock, with the river Tagus winding about its base. There is no hum of business, no rumble of wheels. The streets are like twisted, tangled threads. Most of the city is traversable only for donkeys. Toledo is a shrine of mediæval art; for the old town has been the stronghold of Romans, Goths, Moors, and Jews. Here the famous Toledo blades were manufactured for the Romans and Moors, and here to-day they are still forged and tempered for the Spanish army.

The cathedral is of world-wide fame; for it stands upon the spot which was visited by the Virgin Mary when she came from heaven, and presented a holy cape to Archbishop Ildefonso. The wardrobe of the Virgin is well worth seeing, for its wealth is almost unrivalled by the toilettes of the most extravagant queens in the world. Her mantle for gala-days, when she is carried in procession, is silver and gold, with seventy-eight thousand pearls embroidered on it, besides diamonds, rubies, and countless emeralds. Her ordinary robes are equally splendid, and are gifts of kings, queens, popes, and other dignitaries. So lavish is the Church of Rome to the sacred image of the Virgin, to see which we thread our way up steps thronged with beggars!

Our hotel is a curiosity in itself. We dine in the patio, whose floor is of cobblestones. About us are cages with larks and orange-trees in boxes. At one side is a long, low table, where our guide serves as scullion, and talks as glibly, between the puffs of a cigarette, to the onions and potatoes he peels as to the tourists he leads. In the adjoining patio is kept the town omnibus; and here the mules bray and stray, while the keepers smoke and swear in the most musical of tongues.

But the Southern Andalusian province offers most that is picturesque, interesting, and novel. It is the home of the guitar, the fan, the song, and the fandango, the land of pleasure, romance, love, and beauty, the land of the Moor, and the Orient of Spain. The street scenes are repetitions of what we are familiar with from the operas of "Carmen" and "The Barber of Seville." The water-carriers, bearing quaint jars, are everywhere crying, "Agua, agua! Quien quiere agua!" for Spain is a water-drinking country,—a legacy from the Moors, whose religion forbade them drinking the pressed juice of the grape.

A market day seems much the same as in the stories of the "Arabian Nights." It begins at six in the morning, to avoid the heat. Old and young gather about the market-place. Gayly dressed peasants, looking like the pictures we see on the raisin and cigar boxes, congregate here and there, thrumming the strings of their guitars, accompanied by bewitching, black-eyed beauties, skilfully handling the tambourine and castanets. Here and there old women under Bedouin tents have set up their frying-pans, and are cooking long coils of dough in hot olive oil, which serve for a breakfast, with the cup of chocolate which is being brewed close by.

The crockery sellers predominate; and frequently a random donkey strays into the midst of the pots and jars, and a disreputable scene follows, in which the braying and kicking of the donkey, the shouting and haranguing of the owner of the beast, and the growling and muttering of the owner of the crockery, the smashing and crashing of the pots and jars, make one feel as if on the edge of a small earthquake.

All is picturesque and Oriental; and over all fly the red and yellow, the Spanish colors, which in their brilliancy always give a holiday look.

In Southern Spain there are many caves excavated in the mountain sides, the homes of the gypsies, the rooms cut out of the solid rock. Here the gypsies bask all day in the sun and shade. The women earn money by making baskets and telling fortunes. The principal feature of their entertainment is the dance; and the dancing of the little gypsy girl (the little gitana, she is called) in her holiday dress, with bare legs and feet, was very pretty and graceful as we saw her that sunny day in the cave in the mountain side, after which with irresistible tricks she begged us to buy charms, flowers, and baskets.

IMPROVEMENTS AT TUSKEGEE.

BY ESTELLE M. JACKSON.

Few schools, in fact, it might be safe to say that no school in the South has made such rapid progress as the Tuskegee Normal and Industrial Institute. Perhaps the most praiseworthy step during the year is the addition of a dairying department. Though it is only the growth of nine months, still it is already stocked with most of the modern appliances; and it is not exaggeration to say that the butter made is as good as any produced in the South. A sample was sent to the governor of the State, who said in a letter of acknowledgment that both he and his wife considered it "the finest we have used in a long time." This department is one which will be exceedingly useful to the students and to the entire South. Alabama has great resources for such work, and a well-stocked dairy farm would be a Godsend to the Black Belt. During this term instruction in dairying was given to the young men only, but it is the aim of the institution to give the young women also the privilege of learning the art of managing a dairy.

Since agriculture is to be the chief pursuit of the Negroes of the South for some time to come, the Tuskegee Institute is making an earnest effort to give the best instruction available along this particular line; and, with an eye to this advancement, agricultural chemistry has been added to the course. Little work has been done in the branch during this term, but during the subsequent terms it is hoped that much knowledge will be gained and real work accomplished in this useful study.

The real and necessary work of Tuskegee has always gone forward at such a rapid rate, and with so much intensity, that little or no time has been spent in beautifying the grounds till lately. A young man of the class of 1894, who seemed to have some real tact, and, what is better, real love for this kind of work, went immediately after being graduated from Tuskegee to the University of Wisconsin, Madison, and took a short course in horticulture. He is now regularly employed by his Alma Mater, and is making a creditable showing in his work. He has charge of all the fruit-trees, flowers, shrubbery, vineyards, etc., as well as the levelling of the campuses.

"How shall we keep things from actually going to pieces when the carpenter-shop is full of work and all the carpenters busy?" is a question which has, since the founding of the institute, vexed the minds of the authorities. This question was solved at the beginning of the term by adding a department of repairs, which has greatly facilitated matters along this line. It may be an interesting point to note that the young man in charge is a graduate of the school, and partly learned his trade in Tuskegee.

Foundrying has been put in as a regular industry. All the grates used in the stoves during the past winter were cast in the institution foundry; and grates for both stoves and fireplaces, parts of stoves, and andirons are now being made in quantities. A new machine-shop is nearing completion, and some work has been done along this line. All the water-piping in connection with the school has been taken up during the winter and spring, and new pipes put down, which has made affairs much more comfortable and systematic.

One addition, which will perhaps be of more interest to the reader than any other, is the building of a new cottage, which, when completed, is to be by far the handsomest on the grounds. This cottage is to be known as the "Parker Model Home," in honor of the gentleman who gave the money for the building of the cottage, and also gave an idea as to the use to which it is to be put. This cottage is to be used exclusively for the Senior girls, and they are to be taught all that pertains to a model home. One other ten-room cottage has been built this spring; and this, with the Seniors' Home, will aid much in the rooming of a larger number of girls for the next term. A large, commodious building for the boys is now Tuskegee's most pressing need.

The teachers, students, and all visitors who attended the commencement exercises were made glad with the glorious news that some lady, who withheld her name, had just decided to give $12,000 for the erection of a chapel. No one can describe the feeling of joy and thankfulness that pervaded every one's heart who heard the joyful news.

Thursday, May 30, the graduating exercises took place. Exercises of various kinds had been going successfully forward, however, since the 24th. This was the first annual exhibit of the industrial department. Thirty-nine who had served the requisite three years' apprenticeship at their trades were given certificates from eleven different industrial departments. These young people read essays on the theory of their work; but, what is far better, material was provided, and practical demonstrations of the training they had received were given to the audience. A blacksmith had a buggy on the rostrum, and showed just how he irons a buggy; a carpenter had a house frame, and showed just how he constructs a house and covers it; a painter showed how he paints the same house; and a tinner showed how he would cover it with tin. A dressmaker had a dress, and explained the art of fitting. The house-keeper cleaned and put in good order a lamp. And thus through the whole programme.

The commencement sermon was preached on the 26th by Dr. E. Winchester Donald of Trinity Church, Boston. During the first part of his sermon a storm arose, which interrupted for a time the discourse, as the congregation was assembled in a temporary pavilion which is constructed every year for this purpose. The rain, however, did not last long; and, after every one was resettled and quiet was again restored, Dr. Donald proceeded to give in his deep, impressive manner some practical truths which it is very necessary for the Southern Negro to know.

The exercises of the commencement day were, beyond doubt, the best, most helpful, and practical ever known in the history of the school. There were six orations from as many members of the class, the annual address, a short, spicy, interesting speech from the new State Superintendent of Education of Alabama, with music, of course. The subject-matter was good in all the orations; and the earnest effort on the part of each one to make what he had to say interesting, and practical as well, was plainly evident. Such subjects as "The Way out of Poverty," "What the Home should be," "Lessons learned from the Life of Douglass," "The Mission of Educated Negro Women," "Reforms for Southern Farmers," and the valedictory, "Applied Education," will give the reader the idea that the graduates of Tuskegee, at least, preach sound, practical doctrine. The most interesting and information centred around the "Reforms for Southern Farmers"; and, while much of the advice given seemed strange, coming, as it did, from a boy of fifteen, not yet out of short trousers, yet no farm of the South would look or be the worse by following out every bit of it.

The annual address, "The Larger and Newer Idea of Education," was a fine, polished production. The address was given by S. Laing Williams, a noted successful colored lawyer of Chicago. He struck the key-note, and said much that cannot fail to prove helpful to the masses that were present.

It would be doing an injustice to fail to make mention of the graduating exercises of the Bible Training School, which took place on Monday evening at 7.30, May 27. Five young men received diplomas from this department, and their deportment what time they have been connected with this school has been such as proves that they were in every way worthy of the honor. Counting all who received diplomas or certificates from the various departments, there were fifty-five; and Tuskegee Institute closed her fourteenth anniversary with the knowledge that this commencement exercise was what it should naturally be,—the best in the history of the school.

THE NATIONAL MUNIOIPAL LEAGUE AT CLEVELAND.

This society has recently held a highly successful meeting in this city, famed for conventions and for the hospitality with which it receives successive relays of guests of the most diverse and various sorts. The league is a company of gentlemen, many of whom have become distinguished in various causes of civic and humanitarian reform; and it may be regarded as a kind of national clearing-house for the local societies, civic federations, committees of seventy, good government clubs, and the rest, that have been called into being within the last few years by the new and rapidly growing interest in municipal reform.

This was the third annual meeting of the national organization, and it had the record of a good year's work to celebrate. Several smaller cities, as Portland, Ore., Omaha, Neb., and Louisville, Ky., brought cheering reports of good work accomplished or wholesome revolutions brought about. But, of course, the thirty-five thousand majority in Chicago for municipal civil service reform, and the results brought about in New York under the lead of Dr. Parkhurst and his coadjutors, furnished the most brilliant instances of progress. It was evident, however, that veterans in the service of municipal reform, while rejoicing in these achievements, hold the work to be but just begun, and the results that seem so considerable to be by no means permanently secured. The political boss and the machine jobber, though staggered, are by no means daunted, and are preparing, when the wave of virtuous excitement has subsided, to revamp their schemes and reap their quiet harvest as aforetime. This has happened more than once; and there are not wanting signs, in New York and elsewhere, that it is to occur again.

But hardly again without more emphatic protest and exposure, and a louder chorus of denunciation. For the Municipal League has come to stay, and is multiplying its agencies and its activity all over the country. This meeting at Cleveland has shown a wide-spread interest, an earnest determination, a careful study of methods, a growing weight of character, in the cause of municipal reform, that must result in progress and the cure of many crying evils. Crying evils there evidently are in many cities that have hardly moved as yet toward their correction; for, apart from the places named above, the reports of delegates were saved from monotony, at least, by the variety of shams and inefficiency that marked the record of municipal misrule. Indeed, some one suggested that the cities seemed to be striving for precedence in furnishing the "awful example." The story of favoritism, jobbery, partisan and bi-partisan plunder, was a depressing one; and the main comfort was that this league represented a large number of eminent and patriotic citizens awake to these abuses and determined to wake up the country to them and keep it awake.

Of remedies, two, at least, were wholly concurred in by all,—the complete separation of municipal from national politics, and the extension of civil service reform or intelligent business methods to the management of towns and cities. Eminent leaders of both political parties are yet to be convinced of the necessity of these measures, and the partisan press still depreciates and ridicules them; but no permanent gains in municipal government can be assured without them, and without that growth and lifting of the civic spirit that will secure them. On this increase and uplift, through the persistent and devoted effort of intelligent and patriotic citizens, the right solution of this pressing problem of honest and efficient municipal government rests.

The papers and discussions of the three days' sessions of the league were of a high order. Mr. James C. Carter of New York, who presided with urbanity and grace; Mr. Charles J. Bonaparte of Baltimore, whose pithy sentences were condensed demonstrations,—as when he said that bi-partisan investigating commissions exemplified the "law of mechanics that the result of two equal opposing forces is rest"; and Mr. Herbert Welsh of Philadelphia, who has been specially distinguished by his connection with the Indians' Rights Association,—were among the eminent speakers. But the most effective address was that of Rev. Washington Gladden, who is a veteran writer and worker in this cause, and whose ringing demand for a "Civic Religion" summoned us to a more responsible and sacred conception of citizenship and a generous devotion and enthusiasm for "civic ideals."

It was good to find delegates and active workers in this cause from several of our Unitarian churches,—from Philadelphia, Pittsburg, Rochester,—and to meet friends from Unity Church among the welcoming committee. Perhaps it was a little remarkable that the only ministers of Cleveland who spoke at the banquet given to the league by the citizens of Cleveland should have been the eloquent and liberal young Rabbi Gries and one of the pastors of our Unitarian church, Rev. Marion Murdock, who certainly showed that women can take an effective part in the discussions, as they are coming to share in the administration of municipal affairs.

The mention of Unity Church recalls the sad loss it has just experienced in the sudden and lamented death of Mr. S. M. Strong, chairman of the board of trustees, and a trusted friend and helper of the pastors of the church in all their various work. Mr. Strong was a leading member of the Chamber of Commerce, a business man of integrity and eminent worth, and in his private life singularly kindly, considerate, and devoted to his family and friends.

MEADVILLE LETTER.

The anniversary of the Theological School has come and gone, with lovely June weather and a small sprinkling of welcome visitors from abroad. The large inflow to the semi-centennial celebration of last year has been followed by a sharp contraction this year. While Buffalo, Pittsburg, and Chicago were present in large, or, rather, great, clerical force, Boston and all the East was, for the first time in the experience of the present writer, without a single official representative. But, though the occasion was thus left to orient itself from neighboring luminaries and stars further West, it had no lack of interest and inspiration. The breezy cheer of Jenkin Lloyd Jones's always welcome presence, the hearty ring in the words of our stalwart evangelist at the head of the Ohio, were only auxiliary to Mr. Fenn's fresh and strong sermon on ministering to men's needs instead of to their wishes, and Mr. Slicer's indescribable address of all-around philosophy and fun, with hard, practical knobs jutting out here and there, and an earnest spiritual purpose unifying all his straying and preternaturally lively thoughts.

The graduating class—the largest that has ever left the school—gave a good account of itself in the themes presented, which were justly praised as being exceptionally well written and well spoken,—merits which were largely the outcome of the work of our untiring instructors in senior homiletics and in vocal culture. The programme was as follows:—

Invocation, by Rev. Charles E. St. John, of Pittsburg. Essay, "The Reconciliation of Optimism and Retribution," Harriet Belle Barton, Northampton, Mass. Essay, "A Prayer-book and Free Prayer," Richard Wilson Boynton, Boston, Mass. Essay, "Monastic and Secular Piety," Louis Henry Buckshorn, Cincinnati, Ohio. Essay, "The Pessimism of Schopenhauer," Samuel Louis Elberfeld, Cincinnati, Ohio. Essay, "The Fratres Poloni," Samuel Garborg, Fargo, No. Dak. Essay, "The Unity of Protestantism contrasted with that of the Catholic Church," Emeline Harrington, Hayward, Wis. Hymn, Rev. Edward A. Horton. Essay, "Is there Need that the Church be farther secularized?" James Eads How, St. Louis, Mo. Essay, "Does the Stricter Standard of Conduct expected of the Minister wrong him or honor him?" Josiah Coleman Kent, Marblehead, Mass. Essay, "The Order of Moral Progress," Clarence Adrian Langston, San Francisco, Cal. Essay, "The Communication of Religious Ideas as a Function of the Church," Robert Sprague Loring, Newton Centre, Mass. Essay, "Evolution as a Philosophy of Redemption," Hendrik Vossema, Nuis, Holland. Essay, "The Problem of the Book of Job," John Noyes Woodman, Haverhill, Mass. Hymn, Louis H. Buckshorn. Address to the Graduating Class by Rev. Thomas R. Slicer, Buffalo, N.Y. The conferring of diplomas. Benediction.

The meeting of the trustees marked some important gains for the future of the school, though the absence of many members usually present and much relied on, and especially that of the beloved president of the board, Miss Elizabeth G. Huidekoper, —whose long illness is only slowly yielding, —gave the discussions somewhat less varied interest and importance than the June meeting has usually had of late. Rev. N. P. Gilman was confirmed as professor of sociology on the new Hackley foundation; and gifts to the library were reported of four hundred and fifty volumes from the heirs of Miss Anna C. Lowell, of Boston, and a very valuable collection of more than three thousand volumes—consisting mainly of recent works on the history and philosophy of religion and Biblical criticism—from the children of Mr. William Berrian of Brooklyn, in accordance with the wishes of their father lately deceased. The finances of the school were reported as being in good condition, and a scheme was brought forward for the increase of salaries and the enlargement of facilities for the use of the library and its care.

It was an interesting occurrence this anniversary week to have a student of some twenty-five years ago return at this time to replace the funds granted him by the school to aid him in his preparation for the ministry,—an example worthy of all commendation.

It is a serious drawback to this record of progress that the trustees have failed to retain on the teaching force of the school Rev. A. W. Jackson, whose lectures on philosophy and ethics have won the increasing respect and admiration of the students, and whose work in homiletics and sermon criticism have made something like an era the past year in careful and thorough sermon-writing. Mr. Jackson's literary judgment and genius for taking pains have made his help greatly valued and widely sought in this department; and the precision and finish of his philosophical work, as well as the hearty good fellowship of his intercourse with the students, has added much to the value and pleasantness of this year's work. All his fellow-instructors were urgent for his retention; and it seems a pity that needed plans of improvement should have been timed so as to exclude one of the prime conditions of a good school,—a tried, capable, and successful teacher. Mr. Jackson will carry from us the sincere regrets and the cordial respect and esteem of his fellow-instructors and the great body of his pupils.

Of the twelve graduates, about one-half propose to enter the ministry at once, and the rest to carry their studies further, either at Harvard or abroad. The prospect of the held, and all the visiting clergymen joined to set forth to the people of St. John the thoughts and principles of Unitarian Christianity. During the services of dedication Rev. Dr. MacDougall announced that, in accordance with a purpose long since made public, his connection with the Church of the Messiah as its pastor would cease. The work he had undertaken was accomplished, and he now felt justified in withdrawing from the field.

WHITTIER'S FAITH IN HUMAN NATURE.

Since Whittier's death much has been truly said of his un-Calvinistic convictions. Plainly, he did not hold the faith expressed in the Prayer Book of the Episcopal Church or in the creeds of the evangelical sects.

In dwelling upon the love of God rather than on his supposed justice or glory and upon the life as more than belief, and in rejecting doctrines which, in his own words, "attribute to the heavenly Father schemes and designs utterly at variance with the moral sense of his creatures," Whittier was in perfect sympathy with Unitarians. But on other points, and especially on one essential point, he was opposed to their faith and spirit.

The attitude of the human soul toward our Father is a vital part of religious faith; and in regard to it Whittier was fully orthodox, in opposition to every class of lib-and, turning inward, he finds not sympathy with them, but their shaming condemnation of his prayerless heart.

There is no morbid excitement in the flowing verses. It is the calm, firm utterance of his profound conviction. This is his view of humanity, which many of the wise and pure (many more than Unitarians imagine) share with the true and noble poet. Surely, truth requires that his clear witness should not be shaded to gratify our liberal feelings, or denied because it is so repugnant to our thought. F. C. W.

A FOREIGN INVADER.

An assisted immigrant is making a lot of trouble in Louisiana. It is a plant, a water hyacinth, which a man from New Orleans saw and admired about three years ago while on a visit to Colombia. He brought some bulbs of it home with him, and grew them in tubs in his front yard. In about two years patches of the flower appeared in the Bayou St. John, which connects New Orleans with Lake Pontchartrain. In another year the bayou was full of it, so that navigation was impeded. Now all the canals near New Orleans are overrun and covered up with this invading flower. Great masses of it are floating in the lake: rivers running into the lake are choked with it, and it has travelled a hundred miles to the westward of New Orleans. It grows enormously, spreads like rabbits in Australia, chokes all the bayous and streams it gets into, and is a tremendous nuisance, the limitations of which are not in sight. In Colombia it is a harmless, flowering plant that grows in tubs; but in Louisiana the conditions suit it, and have developed it into the most flourishing and obstinate pest the State has known since she lost the Louisiana Lottery.—Harper's Weekly.

The Sunday School.

The New York Unitarian Sunday School Union is a vigorous body, doing most excellent work. It has published two tracts the past year. Their titles are: "What shall we do with the Church Days in Unitarian Sunday Schools?" by Edward J. Luce of Rutherford, N.J.; "Religious Education: How shall the Child be taught Religion, and who shall teach him?" by Thomas W. Butts of Brooklyn. These were originally read at meetings of the Union, and are now printed for free distribution. Copies can be had on application in person or by mail at the rooms of the Unitarian Sunday School Society, 25 Beacon Street, Boston.

"Children's Sunday" is observed now quite widely in our churches. Interesting exercises occurred at Quincy First Parish on June 2. The morning service was given to this object. Flowers adorned the pulpit. The members of the school were seated in the centre of the church, surrounded by a large attendance of adults. Rev. E. C. Butler, the pastor, christened four children; and remarks were made by the president of the Unitarian Sunday School Society, Mr. Horton. Mr. Charles H. Porter, Jr., superintendent of the Sunday-school, conducted the exercises admirably. We commend the singing, which was mostly by the school, who used the New Song and Service Book. In addition was an effective choir.

We call attention again to the sessions of the Summer School to be held under the auspices of the Clark University, Worcester, Mass. These meetings extend from July 15 to July 27, both inclusive. This is a rare opportunity for Sunday-school teachers to obtain new light and inspiration. President G. Stanley Hall has a special course on "The Sunday School and Methods of Religious Training for the Young." In addition to this direct line of subjects are many other lectures, all tending to equip the Sunday-school workers with new ideas and methods. The fee is $12 for one week or $20 for the entire course of two weeks, payable in advance. This covers everything in any or all departments. Board can be obtained at reasonable rates near by.

Religious Intelligence.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be sent in by Saturday Morning: announcements of meetings which are to take place must be sent in before Tuesday Noon.]

HARVARD DIVINITY SCHOOL.—The alumni of Harvard Divinity School will meet at the chapel of Divinity Hall on Tuesday, June 25, at 2 P.M. At 4 P.M., at the same place, an address by Rev. W. R. Alger of the class of 1847. Subject, next year's class is good, and, together with the adoption of a four years' course for all not college graduates, gives good promise for the future usefulness of the school.

THE ST. JOHN CHURCH.

Rev. Mr. Lawrance, who has unfortunately been ill nearly ever since he became pastor of our church here, is seeking—and happily finding—health among the Franconia hills; and his pulpit has been very acceptably filled for several months by the members of the Senior Class of the Theological School.

H. H. B.

THE ST. JOHN CHURCH.

For twenty years or more Unitarian services have been held in the city of St. John, New Brunswick, but not until now has a Unitarian church been built. This has been accomplished under the pastorate of Rev. Dr. A. MacDougall, who a few years ago gave up his position as minister of the Calvin Church, Presbyterian, of St. John, and started an independent society. This he changed to a Unitarian society when he became better acquainted with our thought and aims. The American Unitarian Association and the Women's Alliance have assisted with large sums; but the Church of the Messiah is now virtually completed, and was dedicated the evening of Tuesday, June 4. It is a small brick structure, plain, but attractive, and costing, exclusive of furnishings, about $4,000.

The dedication services were conducted by Rev. Dr. MacDougall, assisted by Rev. H. D. Catlin of Eastport, who offered the invocation; by Rev. D. M. Wilson, who offered the prayer of dedication; and by Rev. O. K. Crosby of Houlton. The sermon was preached by Rev. F. B. Hornbroke of Newton, who made a strong and inspiring presentation of the larger gospel and surer trust which are displacing the old theologies.

The next evening a platform meeting was eral thinkers. Many of his writings show his clear, sweet, truly Christian faith on other lines of belief; but on this he sings an opposite strain, in another key.

Take his beautiful hymn beginning

"The harp at Nature's advent strung
Has never ceased to play;
The song the stars of morning sung
Has never died away."

The second, third, and fourth verses carry the thought of Nature's worship grandly onward in solemn melody. Then comes the climax toward which all the images of leaf and flower and sea and star have been collecting,—the awful contrast between these lovely, sacred works of God and the profane spirit of man. Nature in all her forms is full of prayer and praise.

"So Nature keeps the reverent frame
With which her years began,
And all her signs and voices shame
The prayerless heart of man."

Nothing can be sadder or more complete. Not the erring hand, not the careless mind, but the prayerless heart of man. In a late edition of our hymn-book the last line is changed to read "a prayerless heart in man"; that is, whenever the heart is undevout. But that reverses the aim of the hymn, and was never authorized by Whittier. He wrote no careless rhymes. His poetic finish equals his spiritual earnestness. In this flawless hymn he sang what he profoundly felt. All Nature near and far is worshipful: "the heart of man is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked."

And this is the more striking because Whittier's mind was so introspective, after the manner of the Friends. This is not the theory of a student: it is not the result of observation of men in worldly affairs so much as the secret searching of his own soul. It is his testimony as to human nature. He looks upon all these beautiful forms, he listens to these solemn voices;

"The Culture of Religious Faith." Collation at No. 3 Divinity Library at 5 p.m.

MEADVILLE THEOLOGICAL SCHOOL.—
Rev. Nicholas Paine Gilman has been appointed Hackley Professor of Sociology, and will assume the duties of the position in September next. Mr. Gilman will continue to be managing editor of the New World; and he should be addressed at Meadville, Pa., after October 1.

CLERGYMEN IN BOSTON DURING THE SUMMER.—As in former years, as a convenience to the public, a list is now being prepared giving the addresses of those ministers of all religious denominations who expect to be in Boston, or near by, during the summer months of July and August and to September 15, or any portion of that time. Clergymen of all denominations are invited to mail a postal card, giving their address for any portion of the above time, if to be in Boston or vicinity, to William H. Baldwin, president, 48 Boylston Street, Boston. The list above named may be consulted at the rooms of the Union, 48 Boylston Street, every day, Sundays included, from 8 A.M. to 10 P.M.

BOSTON, MASS.—Ministers' Monday
Club: June 24, 10.30 A.M. Rev. J. T.
Lusk will preside. Rev. J. H. Allen will give the address on "Balfour's 'Foundation of Belief.'"

HARVARD, MASS.—The following were the order of exercises at the installation of Rev. Joseph P. Sheafe as pastor of the First Congregational Parish (Unitarian),
Harvard, Mass., at two o'clock, Thursday afternoon, June 13: Anthem; reading of the Scriptures, Rev. W. H. Evans, Baptist, Harvard; prayer, Rev. C. C. Torrey, orthodox Congregational, Harvard; hymn; sermon, Rev. E. A. Horton, Boston; installing prayer, Rev. G. M. Bartol, D.D., Lancaster; response; right hand of fellowship, Rev. J. C. Duncan, Clinton; address to the people, Rev. B. A. Goodridge, former minister, Boston; anthem; charge to the pastor, Rev. G. M. Bodge, Leominster; doxology; benediction by the pastor.

PEPPERELL, MASS.—Rev. Albert C.
White of Pepperell has declined a call to the First Unitarian Church in Ware, Mass.

SALEM, MASS.—The funeral of Rev.
E. B. Willson was held at the North Church, Salem, Mass., Saturday last, at 3.15 P.M. In accordance with an agreement between Mr. Willson and his friend and neighbor, Rev. John W. Hudson of Peabody, that the survivor should perform this office for the other, Mr. Hudson took charge of the service. Before the arrival of the funeral procession familiar psalm tunes were played on the organ. Rev.
George D. Latimer and Mr. Hudson received the procession, standing on the platform before the pulpit, which was filled with palms and flowers. Selections from Scriptures were read, a prayer was offered, the choir sang a hymn, Mr. Latimer pronounced the benediction; and the simple but tender and impressive service was over.
The body remained in the church on Sunday, to be taken on Monday to Forest Hills for cremation.

ST. CLOUD, MINN.—A correspondent says, "The attendants at Unity Church last Sunday morning enjoyed an unusual treat in listening to a discourse on 'Judaism and Unitarianism' by Rabbi A. Fried-mann of the Jewish Temple, Minneapolis.
The speaker emphasized in a most graceful manner the growing sympathy which existed between liberal Judaism and liberal Christianity, and the tendency toward the universal religion of humanity. Unity Church is itself a good illustration of this cordial feeling, as it numbers several Jewish families among its most loyal supporters."

THE NORTH MIDDLESEX CONFERENCE.
This conference met at Nashua, N.H., Thursday, June 13. Notwithstanding the lowering weather, some two hundred people, exclusive of the Nashua society, met in the pleasant old church, and enjoyed a good conference. The devotional meeting was well attended; and Rev. W. F. Place of Franconstown, N.H., conducted it in an inspiring manner. After Vice-President
A. W. Sawyer took the chair, resolutions were passed expressive of the deep sorrow and sense of the great loss the conference felt in the absence of the late president, Col. Daniel Needham. Excellent papers were read by Rev. George Batchelor, whom the conference had the honor to give to the American Unitarian Association; by Rev.
W. F. Greenman of Fitchburg; by Mr.
F. W. Smith of Peterboro, N.H.; by Rev.
George Herbert Hosmer of Neponset; and by Miss Kate Gannett Wells. The Nashua society rendered most cordial hospitality, giving a fine collation and most excellent music. Rev. Messrs. Enoch Powell, G. E.
Littlefield, A. J. Rich, I. F. Porter, J. W.
Roberts, George S. Shaw, Granville Pierce,
Joseph Osgood, A. C. White, Messrs.
Dana Bancroft, Jacob P. Hazen, and Miss

Green took part in the discussion. With a hearty vote of gratitude to all who had contributed to the success of the conference, the meeting adjourned. George E.
Littlefield, Secretary.

SOUTH MIDDLESEX CONFERENCE.—The eighty-eighth regular session of the South
Middlesex Conference was held at Bedford Wednesday, June 12. At 10.45 A.M. the devotional service was conducted by Rev.
M. O. Simons of Billerica, at the close of which the president took the chair. The report of the secretary of the South Middlesex Alliance Branches was read, which showed that substantial aid had been given to many Unitarian movements in different parts of the country, and many barrels of clothing sent to the sufferers in Nebraska.
The treasurer's report showed a balance in the treasury of $26.30. It was voted that the conference hold three sessions a year, one each in March, June, and October.

Rev. S. M. Crothers of Cambridge then spoke on "The Utilization of Spiritual Power." He said the first question is,
What power have we to use? Answer, The power of the divine life in humanity. It is thought that our religion may be one thing in its thought, its philosophy, its inspiring ideas and sentiments, and quite another thing in its practical forms of organization and work. In the latter there is often manifest a disposition to imitate and copy the methods of others; but in nature everything that has life in itself creates its own form, develops an organization in harmony with its life. The life is itself the organizing power. We should not be imitators, but creators of forms and methods consonant with a more rational, spiritual, and progressive religious life. Beneath all surface agreements there is an essential difference between Unitarianism and the orthodoxy of other bodies. It is the common contention of the dominant sects that they have the "faith once delivered to the saints," that there was an "original deposit" of spiritual truth, and it is the business of the Church to preserve this tradition and give this gospel to the world.
This makes the Church, the "historic episcopate," bishops, and all the machinery necessary for carrying on the work of giving supernatural grace to humanity of supreme importance. They are the sacred vessels of the Holy Spirit. The Unitarian idea is fundamentally different from this.
We believe that the divine life is not exclusively in a book or a church, but truth and piety spring up naturally in human hearts. We see all men engaged in an agelong struggle in the search for God and truth; and their desires and aspirations are, in essence, spiritual, divine. Believing this, we cannot go on as if nothing had happened. Our problem is very different from that of other churches. It is that of the inventor who sees around him mighty powers, which are not of his creating, but which he can touch and shape to higher uses. It is for us to so organize our religion that it will be inclusive of all good, and our church be expressive of the divine life in man. When a liberal preacher goes to a new town in the West, he does not say, What can I bring to this community?
He recognizes the fact that God is already there, at work before him. His inquiry is, What tides of the spirit are already moving; what are the promises of better life here; what are the higher possibilities of this community; what hopes, ideas, natural virtues and pieties, are here,—what elements that can be made to serve the ends of religious life? In every community there is the raw material of religious enthusiasm, a germ of something better.
There is civic pride, brotherly kindness, regard for whatsoever things are honest and of good report; and it is the business of the liberal preacher to help those whom he can reach to see that these virtues make them, in less degrees, the same as the great leaders and teachers of spiritual religion,— that they are already on the way to God and the truth. He is there to help them attain unto still higher heights than they have yet achieved. It is his problem to find the divine life of the community and interpret it in the language of the soul.
So the problem of reaching the young is not a mechanical one. The church must not be merely an expression of the maturer wisdom of the older people, but it must recognize the divine life in the heart of youth. If it shows itself alive and eager for new truth and the new life, it will attract the young as well as the old. Our church is not yet fully organized: it is being organized. It is not a rival body, but an organ in human society,—the organ of spiritual communion and worship. It cannot do all things, but it can do its superior work of inspiration. It can lift up the ideal, and touch to finer issues the common life. When we see that our work is to express the actual spiritual life of man and interpret it in the language of the soul, we shall see the folly of attempting to borrow or copy the methods of those who have a very different work to do, and shall see how much there is in every community that is back of us and helping us along.

At the close of the address a collection was taken, amounting to $26, after which the conference adjourned for luncheon.

At 2 P.M. the conference was called to order. After the roll-call of the churches the Committee on Nominations presented the following list of officers for the ensuing year, who were duly elected: president,
W. S. Blanchard of Concord; vice-president, C. A. Drew of Newton; secretary,
Rev. H. C. Parker, Woburn; treasurer,
Charles W. Stone, Watertown. Directors,
Rev. W. H. Johnson, Cambridge; Rev.
A. W. Littlefield, Winchester; Rev. H. C.
De Long, Medford; Mrs. R. H. Hodgdon,
Arlington; Mrs. Emma E. Marean, Cambridge. The president and secretary were made delegates to the National Conference.

Rev. Hilary Bygrave then opened the discussion of the morning subject. He said that spiritual power is the power that comes from contact with the Divine Spirit, from our relations with the Over-soul. It is difficult to define it, to grasp it; but it is manifest in all true religious experience.
We can use this power in organization in the church, where it is very important, but still more in personal influence. In personality we must find its main use. The chief value of the Unitarian Church is in the inspiration which its great leaders and thinkers have given the world. It should be used in the training of character. The more others emphasize other things, the more we should emphasize the importance of character. Then this power must be expressed in the service of our fellow-men, turned into the work of bringing in the kingdom of God in every community. We need it for the elevation of individual life and for the upbuilding of our national life.

The discussion was continued by Rev.
Messrs. Green and McDaniel. Rev. G. W.
Cooke and Mr. W. H. Baldwin spoke for the Unitarian Temperance Society, after which the conference closed with the benediction by Rev. A. B. Vorse of Wellesley Hills. Henry C. Parker, Secretary.

NEW ENGLAND ASSOCIATE ALLIANCE.
The New England Associate Alliance held its last meeting for the season on Tuesday, June 11, in Concord, N.H., by invitation from the Branch connected with the church in that place, of which Rev. F. L. Phalen is pastor. Mrs. Streeter, president of the Branch, welcomed the ladies, and introduced Mrs. Kate Gannett Wells, president of the New England Associate Alliance, who then conducted the meeting. The first paper was by Mrs. Mary B. Davis of New York, secretary of the National Alliance; the subject, "The Organized Work of our Women." She gave a brief review of the history of the Alliance, and a fuller account of its aims and its present work. A great deal of work was done by the women of our churches before 1880, but not until then were they associated together. Under the leadership of Miss May the Auxiliary was formed. This grew beyond the expectations, if not the hopes, of its founders, but chiefly in New England. In 1890 women all over the country joined in the work, which broadened into the present National Alliance. Some small Branches have feared to join, feeling too poor to spare even the one-third membership fees for the national society; but, when their hesitation has been overcome, they have found that in union is strength, and that what they gave has been returned to them in time of need many hundred-fold. Time fails to give all the interesting details of the Pittsburg Branch, of Pierre, of the work in North Carolina, or Miss Putnam's work in Dakota. She travels over a circuit of eight hundred miles, including thirty townships. She has no regular salary, but is supported by donations from the Alliance Branches and other contributions. Different forms of work appeal to the variety of people of whom our Branches are composed.
Study class work is especially helpful to young people, and to those who ask, "What is Unitarian belief?" Many people ask,
What is the object of the Alliance? It is "to quicken the religious life of the churches, and to bring the women into closer association and fellowship." This was Mrs. Davis's first visit to New Hampshire; and all that she said, and her ready answers to questions, were most acceptable to the members of some of the remote Branches, who seldom come in contact with the national officers. At the noon recess the remarks were heard in many directions,
"I wish — or — had been here to-day to hear Mrs. Davis"; and "I wish Mrs.
Davis could come to our place, so that all our ladies could hear her." Mrs. Davis was to go the next day to Brattleboro to speak to the newly formed and flourishing Alliance there.

The next speaker was Miss Eva Channing, whose subject was "Our Work in the South"; but this included many forms of work besides that of the Alliance. She had travelled with a party of ladies belonging to the Association for the Advancement of Women. Her account of Maryville College was new to most persons present. This is situated about twenty miles from Knoxville, and is not only coeducational, but admits blacks as well as whites.

Then came a recess of an hour for lunch and conversation in the cool parlors of the church, where it was difficult to realize the warmth of the June day outside. The afternoon session began with singing, followed by Mrs. Phalen's paper on "Religious Reading." She divided her subject into three heads, as the mind, the heart, or the conduct is affected; but it is difficult for Unitarians to draw any hard and fast lines between religious and secular reading. Few would be edified to-day by the sermons of the last generation. A brief account was given after this of the work of the Ladies' Commission. Mrs.

Ellis Petersen explained the methods of the "Fraternal Council of the Churches" in Jamaica Plain. The plan of this work seems so far unique, but the example might well be followed in other places. Mrs.
Wells and Mrs. Davis had an animated discussion over the advantages and the dangers of organization, in which some other ladies joined; but the general opinion seemed to be on the side of Mrs. Whiting of Lexington, that there was little to be feared and much to be gained. Mrs. Blanchard wished we might all take more pains to uphold our denominational name. Miss Downing, director for New Hampshire and Vermont, made a brief speech. Much of the success of this meeting is due to her efforts in its behalf.

The work of the King's Daughters was next presented in two short papers,—the first by Miss Cressy of the "Senior Ten";
the second, by Miss Jessie Prescott of the St. Theresa Circle. A warm tribute was paid to Mrs. Gilman, wife of the former pastor, who started this work. A profitable discussion followed about the various methods employed by different Branches in carrying on their work, one point considered being how far it is desirable for the older forms of work to continue independently or as committees of the Alliance. A vote of thanks moved by Mrs. Waters was passed, thanking the Concord Branch for their hospitable entertainment. Twenty Branches were represented from New Hampshire, Vermont, and Massachusetts. Ellen
S. Hale, Secretary.

Business Notices.

In an Apartment House.—Every year shows the introduction of new pieces of combination furniture for use in flats and apartment houses, where space is valuable. The best of all these combinations, because the most popular, has just been brought out at the Paine warehouses on Canal Street. It is a combined bureau-washstand, and it includes every convenience possessed by either one of these two pieces of furniture. It is really surprising what ingenuity has accomplished in the way of space-saving furniture for small apartments.

Dr. Lyon's Perfect Tooth Powder

Gives the most perfect satisfaction. It has a worldwide reputation. Recommended by dentists.

Marriages.

At Templeton, 12th inst., by Rev. J. M. W. Pratt, Henry H. Seaver and Minnie A. Aldrich, both of Templeton.
At South Royalston, 12th inst., by Rev. J. M. W. Pratt, Charles H. Brooks, of Templeton, and Mary A. Baldwin, of South Royalston.
At Charlestown, N.H., 12th inst., by Rev. T. D. Howard, William S. Manning, of Bedford, N.H., and Georgina F., daughter of Gardner Way, of North Charlestown.
At Charlestown, N.H., 17th inst., by Rev. T. D. Howard, Guy H. Learned and Carrie A. Smith, both of Chester, Vt.

Deaths.

At Pittsfield, 13th inst., Mrs. Caroline B. Reid, member of Unity Church, aged 72 years.
At Prout's Neck, Me., 13th inst., Sarah Russell May, wife of Rev. Samuel May of Leicester, in her 83d year.

Religious Notices.

THE semi-annual meeting of the New Hampshire Unitarian Association will be held in the Church of the Unity at Rochester, N.H., on Tuesday and Wednesday, June 25 and 26. Rev. Charles G. Ames will preach the sermon. Rev. Charles J. Staples will give an essay on "The Revival of Religion"; and Rev.
Alfred Gooding, Rev. Charles B. Elder, Rev. Enoch Powell, and others are expected to take part in the meeting.

Rev. F. L. PHALEN, Sec'y.

THE address of Rev. Carl G. Horst is Athol, Mass.

Newton Rest-Cure.

The Befriending Committee of the Women's Educational and Industrial Union wish to call the attention of ladies temporarily disabled through nervous diseases to the favorable terms they have made at the Newton Rest-Cure.
For further particulars address the BEFRIENDING COMMITTEE, 264 Boylston Street, Boston.

Winthrop.—To Let.

FURNISHED APARTMENT

Of 6 rooms and bath in new house for $125 for the season. Address

Rev. E. C. HEADLE, Winthrop, Mass.

WANTED.

THE UNITARIAN for APRIL, 1886.

One copy to complete file by a Post-office Mission on Pacific Coast. Any person willing to donate a copy for this purpose will please send it to P.O. M., care Geo. H.
Ellis, 141 Franklin Street, Boston.

For the Christian Register.

MY SHAME.

BY HARRIET BRAINERD.

I am ashamed that I should ever be Lost in the mazes of perplexity;
When paths are straightened for me every hour,
And mountains vanish 'neath His mighty power.
And yet I stumble, falter, and grow sad,
When I should be so sure and brave and glad.

Thou tender, loving Master of my heart,
Breathe on my doubts and bid them all depart.
Remind me how thy truth can always keep,
How sure thy pilotage o'er waters deep.
I am ashamed! but bid my shame to die;
Let it be lost in ceaseless victory.

The Pulpit.

THE SON OF GOD.

BY REV. L. J. DUNCAN.

"Philip saith unto him, Lord, shew us the Father, and it sufficeth us. Jesus saith unto him, Have I been so long time with you, and dost thou not know me, Philip? He that hath seen me hath seen the Father: how sayest thou, Shew us the Father?"—JOHN xiv. 8, 9.

I know not whether this account of a conversation between Philip and Jesus is historical or not. If Jesus did not say what is reported, I am glad to believe that he might have said it. It is in keeping with his thought and method of instruction. In his teaching, the record of which has come down to us, the reflections of a supremely God-conscious soul may be traced. He had no need to rely upon external authorities, for he spoke from the truth which he found dwelling in his own nature. His precepts and doctrines were the reflection of himself and the laws and facts of life which his own soul revealed to him. Whatever he found there of worth, whatever his deep, pure nature revealed to him as true and vital, he was accustomed to hold before his audiences,—not to dogmatize upon, not to go into elaborate arguments and proofs to substantiate, but simply to let clear light and life-giving power shine upon their vision until it penetrated their being and caused their souls to vibrate in unison with his own.

So it was in this instance. "Shew us the Father," said Philip, "and it sufficeth us." What did Philip expect? Did he think Jesus, by some occult power, would rend the curtain of the heavens, and reveal the awful majesty of Israel's Jahveh? Did he expect to see the God of the universe materialized before his astounded eyes? Very likely he had no clear idea himself what Jesus would do, but his very question shows how materialistic and individualized was his God concept. And Jesus' answer betrays his own chagrin and sadness that so wide a gulf yawned between the thought of his disciple and his own pure, spiritualized conception. Vain would it have been to have tried to bring Philip into that same consciousness by metaphysical argument; vain, by theological dissertation or proofs by analogies from nature, to bring home to that dull mind the truth to himself so luminous. Jesus did not attempt it. It was not his method. He just put his truth into the form of concrete expression most likely to do the work of religious culture that he desired,—culture which some day, perhaps, would enable Philip to discover in himself what Jesus had already found in his own soul.

"Have I been so long time with you, and dost thou not know me, Philip? He that hath seen me hath seen the Father: how sayest thou, Shew us the Father?" No doubt his disciples stumbled over the words, even while the truth of the saying flashed dimly into their minds,—just as the Church ever since has been stumbling over the words, and only faintly and partially grasping the profound significance of the saying.

What did Jesus mean? Suppose some great-souled man, whom you have learned to love and revere for those spiritual qualities of excellent manhood which always do compel our love and reverence; some man whose daily life is like a benediction of peace and good will in our midst, yet who in the face of wrong shrank not from the task of reproof; some man who, in the face of popular clamor and prejudice, flinched not from what he perceived as true, nor held his peace, but manfully, tenderly, yet strongly uttered his true word as best befitted the lover of his fellows, and above all the lover of what is true and just,—suppose, I say, that some such man as this, in response to your eager question about God, had to-day replied, "He that hath seen me hath seen the Father." What impression would that reply make upon your mind and heart?

Would you say that he was crazy, an egotist, an impostor? Would you turn from him with contempt or with pitying sadness? Or would his reply set you to thinking, as never before perhaps, upon the nature and being of God? Above all, would it stir in your inmost soul any awakened sense of your own infinite depth of being,—the consciousness of unsounded deeps, from which might yet spring the forces which would make of you also an expression of the divine in human life? What does your own soul say to you about it? Only when Jesus' truth becomes your truth can it begin to be valuable or even comprehensible to you. It was true to him. Is it true to you?

We are apt to let ourselves be stunned by mere magnitude. It is the vastness of the ocean that awes us. Yet what is the ocean? An aggregation of little drops of water, any one of which you can hold on your fingertip. The true wonder, the true revelation of what the vast ocean is, lies in that tiny drop. The vast expanse of rolling billows has only more wonder because there are infinitely more drops of the same sort. All the beauty of earth and sky that one little drop will reflect, all the wondrous, chemical combination of oxygen and hydrogen, is there manifest. All the marvellous law of great ocean's being,—the evaporation, the condensation of vapor in the cloud and its precipitation in the rain; the sweet ministry of refreshment to earth and its creatures; the mighty power to wear away even the granite hills, to carve deep valleys in the face of the earth, to turn the myriad wheels of commerce, to expand under heat and drive our vast trains laden with merchandise and precious human lives, to float our ships, to cleanse us of filth, to refresh our thirst, to soothe our tired brains and restore our weary bodies,—all this and much more is potential in that tiny drop of water. And even as we hold it to study it, to admire its beauty, to learn its worth and meaning, it is gone, obedient to the law of its being, to fulfil its appointed part in nature's wondrous order. The tiny grain of sand that we crush beneath our feet, what a history it has to tell to the eyes that are trained to see and the ears that are quick to hear its silent speech! What memories it might recount of past glories, when as a granite cliff it bore through long and silent ages the angry buffeting of the sea; of the great glacial tragedy, when it was rudely torn from its quiet home and parent cliff, and through much crushing and grinding was borne along by forces against which all its native strength was powerless, and deposited a mere pebble in a pile of drift on our Illinois prairie; of the long, weary years through which it lay exposed to the rain and snow, and was alternately baked and expanded by summer's heat and frozen and contracted by winter's frost, until its stout heart broke again and again, and was carried hither and thither by streams of water as relentless as fate, until at last it was reduced to the mere speck of matter we see it, and then was dug up, carted off, and shovelled out upon our streets, to be trodden under foot of men. Yet, when all is told, what have we less than the history of our earth? All the wondrous strength and majesty of the granite cliff, the sweet nourishing and life-yielding properties of the soil, all the beneficence and beauty that can be predicated of dear old Mother Earth lie, potentially, in that tiny grain of sand. One of our best-loved liberal poets of this day has caught this same thought, and he sings:—

"Eternities past and future
Seem clinging to all I see,
And things immortal cluster
Around my bended knee.

"That pebble is older than Adam!
Secrets it hath to tell.
These rocks,—they cry out history,
Could I but listen well.

"That pool knows the ocean feeling
Of storm and moon-led tide.
The sun finds its East and West therein,
And the stars find room to glide."
—W. C. Gannett.

It will be said, "But this is poetry." Let us not sneer at poetry. It is the vision of life from the high standpoint of what ought to be. It is the ideal. And the ideal is the soul's sense of what is the reality of things,—the ultimate fact, which can in no wise be escaped or set aside.

Let us, then, apply the poetic method to man. Can we find in him, or, to make it personal, can we find in ourselves the revelation of aught that is comparable with the revelations in the drop of water of the ocean or in the grain of sand of our planet, the earth?

I know well what is the answer popular theology makes to such a question. I know, too, how deeply rooted in all our ordinary religious and ethical thinking is the idea that man is a "miserable sinner," and that the only revelation he can give is one of human depravity. I know, too, that we have grown very much into the habit of expecting the worst of people instead of the best; and that, when some noble act of unselfishness is practised, some deed of daring heroism done, we applaud it as extraordinary. But I appeal from all such superficiality and pessimism to your deeper, soberer thought and feeling. Is there not mirrored in the nature of man a potentiality as much grander and worthier of reverence than those of the drop of water and the grain of sand as man is a grander and more august fact than either the granite mountain that towers above the common levels we tread or the fathomless and un-resting sea that dashes its mighty waves against our rock-bound coasts?

I believe there is, and that nothing is so important in these modern days as that we should all recognize that fact, and feel deeply its profound significance,—not only in ourselves, but also in the vast multitude of other selves with whom we are in daily contact, and whose interests are inextricably interwoven with our own.

The tendency of our modern life, with its complex and harassing conflict of interests, is to lead us to disregard these human potentialities. Men are so cheap! We have come to look upon them simply as a commodity,—just as we do our real estate and water supply. Indeed, if the plain truth were told, we place the greater value upon our land and water. We do feel the necessity of cultivating the land, so that it will yield us larger returns in values. We do have serious concern that our water supplies be ample for protection against fire, and pure, so that no death-dealing disease germs be carried into our physical bodies to sweep the community with pestilence. But where, pray, do we find any such painstaking efforts to cultivate men and women, at personal cost of money and effort; to develop the character and intelligence which will not only render them more serviceable to the commonwealth, but insure at the same time soberer and saner fathers and mothers for future generations? Where shall we look for any honest and vital concern that society be amply protected against wantonness and injustice which some day may break over us in a raging conflagration of revolution, or that human thought and political methods become so pure and wholesome that we need not fear lest our public system, our much prized and lauded principles of self-government, become tainted with venality and injustice, which some day may sweep our institutions away in an epidemic of corruption?

Nothing so imperils social life to-day, nothing is fraught with so much menace to our civil institutions, nothing tends so surely, so insidiously to the degradation of the human units upon which we must depend for the stability of our social and civil order, as this cheapening of mankind, this indifference to the ideal in man, this disregard of those things which tend to the unfolding of those powers of manhood and womanhood which link us to the Infinite.

If we would have mankind respectable and honorable, we must teach man to respect and honor himself. "Shew us the Father" is the importunate demand of the world of man to-day, as it was in Jesus' time. "Shew us the Father, and it sufficeth us," is the cry that rises daily, hourly, from the slums and tenements of our great cities, where miserable men and women are huddled together, looking out upon life with hopeless eyes, and striving to drown their despair in drunkenness and debauchery which only renders them more miserable and the prospect more hopeless; where hungry children cling in piteous helplessness to those who should love and cherish them, but out of whom the power to love has been well-nigh crushed, and from whom the ability to cherish is all but taken away.

"Shew us the Father, and it sufficeth us." It is the same cry that rises from the avenues where men and women are living selfish lives of greed and struggle for social position, looking out upon life with no vision of its nobility or meaning, and striving to dull the sickening sense of the utter dreariness of their monotonous and loveless lives in social dissipations made attractive by a superficial gilding; where children who were not wanted are born to be reared in an atmosphere of selfishness, and with materialistic ideals which all but smother every noble and humane sentiment. It rises from the marts of trade, where human beings wage deadly competition for the means of subsistence; from social gatherings, where they strive to deaden the sense of their unsatisfied longings in a round of merry-making and the distractions of some novel way to pass the weary hours without the exertion of serious thought; from the saloon and the social club,—at all times and on every hand goes up this passionate cry to see some meaning, some worth, some divineness in life, that shall illuminate it and bring satisfaction and peace to the soul,—"Shew us the Father, and it sufficeth us."

That heavenly vision, if once our dull and listless souls could catch it, would suffice; for who, having once known it, could find satisfaction or peace in aught less heavenly, less perfect? But, like Philip, we scarcely realize what it is we crave, and know not where to look for the vision. Vainly does science strive to pierce for us the mysteries of the heavens and the earth. The stupendousness of the revelation stuns us, but it answers not our need. Art succeeds better. It does sober us, and make us feel that the Father may be; but even then we have not seen him, and our longing is still unsatisfied. We hear that religion can reveal him, and we go to the churches. They give us definitions and tell us about God, but they do not reveal him. On the contrary, their definitions, hymns, prayers, and sermons only confuse us, and make him seem farther off. So by and by we sink back into the blackness of despair, and grope around in that dark night in practical atheism.

Last fall some one sent me a copy of the Truth-seeker, an atheistical journal that is an example of the spiritual blindness that afflicts the age. It was ridiculing the idea of God. It told of the forest fires in Wisconsin and Michigan, the fearful destruction of life and property there, the prayers that were offered for the stay of the devouring flames. It told of the heroism of men and women, of the engineer who stood by his engine until his hair was burned off and face and hands were blistered by the flames, and of sundry other instances of heroism, love, and self-sacrifice; and it said everybody did everything that could be done, even to the sacrifice of life itself,—everybody but God. He did nothing. As I read its venomous taunts, the reply of Jesus to Philip flashed through my mind, "Have I been so long time with you, and dost thou not know me, Philip?" The Truth-seeker did not know God when it saw him. That is what ails a vast deal of our truth-seeking these days. We are vigorous enough in our seeking; but we are blind, or at best near-sighted. Like Bunyan's man with the muck-rake, we grope around with eyes bent upon our miserable little pile of earth diligently enough; but we are looking in the wrong direction for the heavenly treasures.

"Everybody but God," says the Truth-seeker. But what was the heroism that kept that engineer at his post, faithful to duty, though fearful pain tormented his body and death stared him in the face? What was it that made him endure the suffering, and snap his scorched fingers in the face of death? What was it that nerved that sweet little girl thrice to risk death by suffocation, that she might bring her loved ones to a place of security and save them from torture and death? What was it that moved all hearts to pity, so that prompt relief sprang to the supply of those sufferers with the necessities of life? and what was the divine pity that moved the hearts of men and women to do all in their power to bring comfort to those stricken hearts and suffering bodies? "Shew us the Father," says the Truth-seeker; "Shew us the Father," jeers the scoffer; "Shew us the Father," moans a despairing world. And I point you to that heroism of soul; that self-sacrifice; that stern, unwavering loyalty alty to duty; that love of family and friends; that tender sympathy with the suffering stranger; that heart-prompted relief and comfort. Do they not cry back to your hearts, to all hearts that can feel and recognize the heroic, the true, the faithful, the tender and compassionate in humanity,—“Have I been so long time with you, and dost thou not know me, Philip?”

He that hath seen these things—the poor, commonplace, every-day virtues, which even the lowly and the degraded can feel and recognize,—yes, which even, at times, with all their ignorance and degradation, with all that is base and vicious in their characters, they can and do practise—hath seen the Father. Such are the things that reveal the potentialities of God latent in every human being. They are the things that link us indissolubly with the Infinite, and in the development of which we shall find the divine power.

In times of peril and great distress these potentialities flash out here and there in deeds of daring heroism and magnificent self-denial, so that all the world can see them and know that they are. But these are only striking and conspicuous examples of what are really common properties of our human nature. Humanity is indeed the true revelation of God, and one that all can understand. Even the street gamin, who never in all his life, perhaps, heard the sacred name, except in profanity, and who certainly would not understand the definitions the churches would give him, nor catch even a glimmering idea of Mr. Spencer's “Infinite and Eternal Energy” or Mr. Arnold's “Power that makes for righteousness,” knows the God fact when he sees it incarnate in human action.

The patience that can bear with the untoward circumstance or grievous disappointment without complaint; the contentment that can find comfort and good cheer in the midst of want; the pride that scorns to stoop to meanness and duplicity, even to gain a coveted end; the forbearance that checks the sharp retort in the face of provocation; the bravery that nerves the soul to face disaster with unflinching fortitude; the courage that dares rebuke a popular wrong; the patriotism that will not buy votes nor debase the voter, though defeat lies in the balance on the other side,—these and a thousand other virtues that spring out of the sense of truth and right, that come obedient to the voice of love and duty, that are the “I ought” of the soul incarnate in human deeds,—these, these are manifestations of the almighty, eternal, and immanent God that all can see and understand. These are the things that illumine life, even in its darkest places; that reveal all its worth and meaning, even when most it seems chaotic and worthless; that bring us satisfactions when all else palls; that redeem all the disorder and confusion of our worldly careers, and fill us with the sense of power to master all hidden things in destiny. Whoso holds fast by such ideals as these, whoso feels their illimitable potency, whoso makes them the measure by which he will live, the goals toward which he will strive,—him I call the son of God. He that hath seen him hath seen the Father.

Such a one I believe Jesus to have been, and in this he was a son of God; but only as he was pre-eminent in these respects can he rank pre-eminent among the sons of God. Jesus reveals what man may and should be, and the moral and spiritual excellence to which, by culture, we may all attain. With the adoption of such ideals life is lifted out of the dreary and profitless marshes of materialistic values which so often we put upon it, out of the suffocating atmosphere of selfishness, and is set upon the heights of spiritual excellence, where we can breathe the purer air of unselfish love of whatever is most beautiful, true, and good, and so becomes filled with ennobling and inspiring worth. With the coming and the culture of these sons of God are also the coming and the establishment of the kingdom of heaven on earth.

Continual sunshine and gentle zephyrs in the outward world would not produce a healthy atmosphere for animal or vegetable life. It is just so in a spiritual sense. Continued abounding in heavenly enjoyment would tend to make us relax our efforts to abide in our only safe state,—that of watchfulness and prayer under a humiliating sense of our own insufficiency for any good word or work.—Rachel Hicks.

REMINISCENCES OF MR. WILLSON.

BY JOSEPH HENRY ALLEN, D.D.

I first met Mr. Willson when we entered the Divinity School together in the summer of 1840; and, while these fifty-five years (almost) have done much to color, warm, and deepen the first impression, they have done nothing, I think, to alter it. Candor, modesty, and clear intelligence were traits as plainly written then on that winning face of his as we have read them there in all the years since. Some circumstances brought us especially near together,—though not, perhaps, in the very confidential intimacy that generally comes to one as a sort of surprise. In age we were only six days apart: he was by so much the elder. And our fathers were country ministers, somewhat widely separated, in the same county, each having a share, not very unlike, in the liberal religious movement of that day. In some degree he had the advantage of a certain grave maturity of character; and this was perhaps favored by training in a rural academy, which, in some points, may compare to advantage with the hothouse culture some immature natures undergo in college life. Again, while he was of seemingly vigorous health and of very companionable temper, he lacked something of the physical hardihood and robustness common at that period of life. At least, I do not remember that either in long walks, rough fun, or athletic sports he showed the energy of some of his companions. If it were so, it may possibly have been due to some delicacy of organization, such as we easily associate with moral purity like his, though we might not suspect it in a young man of his ordinarily excellent health. An incident of this time may serve as an indication of what I mean. One morning he came into my room suffering from a swollen eyelid, caused by a blow or a sting,—I forget which; and, touching it lightly to describe the swelling, he fainted instantly away. This did not appear to be due to any sudden or acute shock of pain; and it seemed to reveal a vein of nervous susceptibility that, perhaps, made a part of his physical or even moral temperament.

On the other hand, when I think of him in the little group of eight, which included two men of such very marked and diverse quality of genius as Charles Brigham and John Weiss, it is most interesting to remember how, with his rare modesty, candor, and constitutional self-distrust, he always held his own steadily at all points, so that there was probably not one in the class who so uniformly kept the moral confidence and intellectual respect of us all. As a student, he was patient, faithful, and diligent,—especially faithful, I should say, in what might seem the dryer and more formal tasks of study, rather than enthusiastic or brilliant in any one line. On his feet in actual debate—a severe test to most men of that age—he was what we have always known him who have heard him, too infrequently in later years,—cool, easy, self-possessed, never in the least confused in argument, clear in statement, with a quiet decision of speech that counts as a far greater force than emotional rhetoric or boisterous declamation. In literary taste I doubt whether refined fancy, splendor of imagination, or intellectual depth, ever weighed as much with him as what came nearest home to his grave but genial and sunny temper. One might envy him the hours of innocent fun he found in “Pickwick,”—a new book then; while some of us were victims rather to the sentimentalisms of “The Old Curiosity Shop.” And I do not think that he was ever drawn (as most of us were, sooner or later) into the transcendental vortices of “Sartor Resartus.”

One would not do justice to the rare intellectual quality which has been recognized in Mr. Willson through his more than fifty years of uninterrupted public service—eight in Grafton, seven in West Roxbury, and thirty-six in Salem, including a brief episode as chaplain in the war—without knowing something of his still rarer humility of spirit, and the deep self-distrust that saddened some of his more confidential communications. His mental temperament was sound rather than robust, and he was not easily persuaded of the real strength which was his to put forth if he would. Devout by habit and conviction, he felt more keenly than most men some of the changing phases of belief that we have witnessed during those fifty years, as they touched moments and moods of his personal experience. That his own faith remained what it was,—calm, strong, even radiant,—through all the changes here implied, lay not so much in any positive or aggressive quality of his thought, but rather in an unusually clear, firm, serene, and steadfast reliance on moral principle, chastened (as I think) by an unusually humble as well as sincere and living piety. This candid grace of soul, which all men saw in him, was the root of his great and real strength.

Willingly as he gave forth that strength in the accepted lines of duty, and readily as he assumed any responsibility which this might enjoin, it was hard to persuade him, sometimes, to stretch out his hand for a success or an influence outside that well-defined range which yet might seem easily within his reach. To say that he lacked courage or ambition might not be quite correct; but there was, what many might fail to suspect, a hidden root of self-distrust. The courage he showed at an emergency was sheer moral courage, though carrying with it a fine intellectual capacity, which he was too slow to admit. I never knew, for example, what he was capable of in the way of forceful literary expression till I read a sermon of his on “Bad Friday,” preached after the surrender of Burns in 1854, when I wrote to him at once to urge him (as I hoped) to more effort in that direction,—purely in regard of the fine, clear, manly eloquence of style in which he had shown himself a master. Another instance was on one of the very few occasions when he stood in a post of special interest or dignity in his own profession, addressing the “Berry Street Conference” in a discourse of “reminiscences” of rare beauty and instruction,—a discourse which, I think, was never given to the wider public. Again, the one literary opportunity of his life seemed to come to him when our classmate, Charles Brigham, left him, with Dr. A. A. Livermore, in charge of a copious mass of papers, the labor of a busy lifetime, with an understanding that some sort of a memorial volume would be published. He consulted me—naturally, since I had just been following up Mr. Brigham's lines of work in Ann Arbor—as to his own share in the joint task, which was the biographical, sending me, among other papers, a very unique, curious, and detailed diary, in which our friend had written out in private hours the story of his early life,—especially his Divinity School years, with incidents, confessions, and resolutions, such as to throw a very interesting light on his real experience. This rich and too abundant material seemed to overpower Mr. Willson's modest estimate of his own ability to cope with it. I vainly urged the lines on which I thought what was valuable in it might be preserved; and, to my great regret, a form and scale of memorial were determined on—as I suppose, by judgment of the publishers—which shrank the proposed biography to a scanty and pallid outline, greatly disappointing to those who knew something already of its subject, and wholly inadequate to portray that vigorous, versatile, energetic, restless, busy, and somewhat wayward intellectual manhood. To do that well required not a less delicate and discriminating but something of a bolder hand.

Further, with his great moral sincerity and courage, and his singularly clear, common-sense conviction on points of practical judgment, Mr. Willson was diffident of urging his own opinion against the opposing view of his associates. He preferred to accept their decision, but himself to retire from the field. Such, at least, was the account he gave to me of his partial inaction, in later years, in matters of denominational policy as to which he might be supposed to carry weight. Where, on the other hand, the question turned on points of principle rather than practice, there was no man whose word—clear, placid, firm, generous, serene—was more readily given, or was listened to with more uniform, affectionate, and venerated delight by his younger brethren, of whom I was always glad to count as one. No one who knew him but esteemed him worthy of the highest conventional honors of his profession, and probably anticipated them for him. If there is one thing we could regret in such a life, it is that its entire strength was not put forth in some more widely conspicuous field. But this is also its best praise and truest victory,—that that entire strength was given, with perfect fidelity and without any stint, to the particular work he had chosen; while its highest reward was found in the loving appreciation and perfect confidence of those whom he served in it.

Spiritual Life.

It is not true that love makes all things easy: it makes us choose what is difficult. George Eliot.

To be too near any one thing,—that is fanaticism. It is the eclipse of God's great heavens in favor of our tallow candle.—David Swing.

Better the sweet kinship of pain than selfish enjoyment, better the sorrow born from sympathy than the ease of indifference.—Selected.

The heart of consecration is not devotion to this or that kind of service for Christ, but devotion to the divine will. It may not be any form of activity: sometimes it is quiet waiting. . . . It is readiness to do, not what we want to do in his service, but what he gives us to do.—J. R. Miller.

If you have been in the wrong from impetuosity or heat of temper, and for the moment have been betrayed into sharp words or rude manners, follow without false shame the guidance of your heart: say that you are sorry, not with the haughtiness which contradicts your words, but with the courtesy of love.—S. A. Brooke.

God exists; and truth and duty as well as faith and love are found in all religions, and are not dependent upon any one. The soul itself makes revelations, hears voices, recognizes authority, finds obligations, and sees with a light older than Christianity, and which will shine clear, though Christianity were discredited or forgotten.—John Learned.

The Spirit is one, in the Occident and in the sunrise land: the flowering-out is all from the same stalk. The Spirit is fatherly; and the Spirit is filial, prayerful, and joyful, and responsive to its own yearnings. The Spirit is all things to all men. If a man lack wisdom, let him ask of God, who is a Spirit, and who must be worshipped in spirit.—W. M. Bicknell.

If the fact of our spiritual nature—our kinship with the Eternal—does not mean that we are in the universe to stay, no amount of worry or pretence can change the order. If we belong here and are wanted, there is no danger that we shall fall out of the strong, safe Hand. If we cannot trust the Father of all worlds and souls out of sight and without a word, what would his word be worth to us?—C. G. Ames.

To feel a conviction of immortality, we must live for it. Let any one firmly believe that the soul is permanent, and live from that belief, and soon existence will seem permanent, too; the world becomes the veil of a brighter glory that lies behind it; the condemnation of unbelief is lifted off, since the mind, conscious of its own rooted being, does not wait for immortality, “but is passed from death unto life.”—Thomas Starr King.

GENTLEMEN'S UNDERWEAR.

GENUINE FRENCH BALBRIGGAN SHIRTS AND DRAWERS, very fine and soft, 50c each.

MORLEY'S ENGLISH GAUZE BALBRIGGAN SHIRTS, short sleeves, choice quality, 50c each.

THE “COMMON SENSE” NIGHT SHIRT. The old-fashioned, roomy, comfortable kind, $1.00 to $1.37 each.

GOLD MEDAL HOSE. The best hose made, 25c and 33c.

FINE MADRAS WASH TIES, 12 1-2c each.

WHITE SILK CREPE (Reversible 4-in-hand), 37 1-2c each.

WHITE CHINA SILK, (Reversible 4-in-hand), 25c each.

Agency for

THE DR. JAEGER SANITARY WOOLLEN UNDERWEAR. Summer weights now ready. Catalogue free.

CHANDLER & CO.,
Winter St., Boston.

Literature.

"MATTER, FORCE, AND SPIRIT."*

This is a very weighty little book, containing in its 144 pages the results of the most earnest thought on the profoundest subjects. Its author is evidently a man of thorough scientific training, accustomed to weigh every hypothesis in the balances of inductive reasoning and require it to authenticate itself by vigorous verification.

It is, therefore, a very encouraging sign of the times to find him emerging from his investigations, not merely with a belief that religion has nothing to fear from science, but with a positive conviction that the advance of natural knowledge has brought to the light fundamental truths which decidedly strengthen the cause of faith.

The scientific assumption, it is pointed out, that hitherto has especially fostered materialism, was that matter has such a multiplicity of inherent physical powers, coexistent, yet distinct, that they were quite sufficient to account for the life of plants, animals, and men; that life is potential in the sun, and might be manufactured by the chemist in his laboratory if he could only discover the secret of rightly combining the atoms.

Our author holds, on the contrary, that, as science strips matter of this mask of mystery, it will be seen that, although the natural energy of matter suffices for its aggregation into inorganic forms and for preparing the conditions favorable to life, yet it is utterly impotent to confer life itself; and it will be recognized that matter is only a domino, veiling universal life. In the view of the author the primary units of matter are the same in all the different chemie elements; and much learning and ingenuity are shown in resolving the various elementary properties of matter into variations in magnitude and size and composition in the molecules or compound particles, and in deriving the diverse energies of nature—whether repulsive, thermal, electric, or magnetic—into the one primal attractive force, which in its simplest and most universal aspect appears as gravitation.

But, when we come to the problem of life, we come to something whose origin is not to be explained from material substance or physical forces. If matter has been subject to no other law or higher power than the laws of attraction and conservation of energy, it must be this (if it be supposed to have existed from all eternity) have arrived at a stage of absolute equilibrium of motion and stagnation of activity,—a state from which, inert by essence as it is, it could not have resuscitated itself.

Again, in the phenomena of thought, cognition, and self-consciousness we find powers higher than any of the physical properties of matter. No aggregation of material and unconscious parts can create a spiritual and conscious whole. The recognition of a sense-impression as being the same as a former sense-impression involves, necessarily, a recognition of something by something. There is no mind nor will-power in mere material substance or its physical forces. Therefore, mind and consciousness are not an outcome from such forces. They are growths from the shadow of the universal Spirit which exists in matter under the self-imposed conditions of law. "And, if spirit force be originally necessary to produce life, more spirit force is equally necessary to produce a higher life."

The essence of mind and will is therefore a spiritual quality of the inhering force of all final units which impels them to organization; and with the organization there comes a resultant spiritual power, a flowing together from all the unit-compounds. "The life or spirit quality of the inhering force of matter is a diffusion of the universal Spirit, which, like the light of the sun, is thrown everywhere. Matter is guided in its tendencies by this spirit tendency to organic structure, and to the manifestation of life, sensation, self-consciousness, and intelligence. As matter assumes higher and higher organic life forms, spirit force is more manifest. Spirit tendencies and powers acquire more strength, and the animal propensities and passion are more subordinated to that spirit strength."

From the laws of force and matter, from its division into elements and the great cycle of its changes, we receive (it is further argued) evidence of a supreme controlling Spirit; and from the phenomena of organic life and consciousness we are led to the idea that our own being has to some degree the spiritual essence of the divine Life imparted through the processes of organic life. Natural science, therefore, points to God, and should make the student of nature feel that this supreme Will directs the minute as well as the grandest operations of the universe, and is in close sympathy with all things. The goal to which both scientific research and the great religions of the world are steadily approaching is not only "a common belief in a Father of love, but in that of the brotherhood and kinship of man, as derived in common from universal Spirit, in one hope of universal advancement, one belief in a spiritual life hereafter, and in one acceptance of law as applied to our material world and life as well as to the hope of continued existence." (p. 139.)

This brief summary will serve to give an idea of the leading thoughts and spirit of the book. Its reasoning in support of a spiritual Theism is forcible and interesting. It contains not a few notable criticisms of modern materialism, and exhibits a broad, reasonable, judicious, and reverent temper. A writer like Dr. Paul Carus, however, would declare that our author yields too much to the Monistic theory, not to come entirely over to him, if he followed out the logic of his premises; and he would ask why the vital and intelligent properties of the final units of matter may not quite as well be supposed to belong to them independently and from the beginning as to be regarded as a diffusion of the universal Spirit, or as imparted to them from the divine Life and Mind in which the living organism is bathed. If finite lives and spirits are but a diffusion of the universal Spirit, and force is but an expression of the divine Self, how, in our author's system, is the personality of the individual soul preserved?

The argument and exposition might well be both enlarged and strengthened on many such points; and the difference of the author's view from current pantheism, on the one side, and, on the other, from the scientific monism that Clifford, Wundt, and Lewes have presented to the philosophic world, might be very profitably more clearly defined.

The diction of the book is generally simple, straightforward, and befitting the theme. There are, however, a score of passages where the sense is most unfortunately obscure; and it is evident that either author or proof-reader was in a careless mood. As a whole, nevertheless, the book is a helpful and welcome manifestation of the broader and more positive religious faith which modern science is now tending to build up.

J. T. B.

AFTER-DINNER AND OTHER SPEECHES.*

No definite principle seems to be adopted with reference to the order in which these speeches are arranged. Later ones precede those that are earlier, and then we have later ones again. But, late or early, delivered by Mr. Long as governor of Massachusetts, or on the floor of Congress, or as the orator of this or that memorable occasion, they have a quality which places them high among speeches and addresses of a similar character, and high above some that might easily be named which are more widely known and have a reputation which their merits have not fairly earned. Their geniality is, perhaps, their most conspicuous trait, and it is one that must have made them extremely grateful to the various assemblages to which they were addressed; but, if they have a fault, it is nearly related to this geniality. Several of them are eulogies pronounced on distinguished citizens immediately after their death. In these it was not, of course, to be expected that the orator would "hint a fault or hesitate dislike."

But he has done better than obey the ancient rule, "Nil nisi mortuis bonum." He has said nothing but what is true of the dead, if not all the truth. In other cases this might have been dealt in fuller measure without injury to the occasion. Take, for example, the first upon the list,—that delivered in Boston on the one hundredth anniversary of Webster's birth. All that is said is true, and it is finely put. It is lofty praise, and still entirely just, where it is written, "It was the overwhelming logic of his discussion, the household familiarity of his simple but irresistible statement, that gave us munition with which to fight the war for the preservation of the Union and the abolition of slavery." But, when such a splendid tribute was deserved, it would seem as if the speaker might have dared to say, however silent as to glaring personal faults, that, had Webster risen to the height of the great argument for liberty as he did to that for union, he would have enhanced incalculably the splendor of his fame. If "Massachusetts smote and broke the heart of her idol," it was because her idol had preferred the offerings of slavery to those with which freedom longed to heap his shrine. But it was less such incidents as this that we had in mind in saying that the geniality of these addresses was almost a fault than their apparent failure to encourage the opportunities for the advancement of some grand political idea, some immediately pressing business of reform. This is the note which, ringing in the speech nominating Senator Edmunds for the Presidency in the convention of 1884, makes that the noblest in the book. If it recurs less frequently, than we could wish, the exigencies of the civic banquet may be pleaded in extenuation; and, at least, there is no disposition to call evil good, to excuse political baseness, or to invest dubious practices with the glamour of the partisan rhetorician. The tone is always high and pure. We are only wishing that it might, when the opportunity was most inviting, have been more strenuous and direct in its assault on obvious offences and its demand for better things.

*AFTER-DINNER AND OTHER SPEECHES. By John D. Long. Boston and New York: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.

The book contains only 220 pages, and of the speeches and addresses there are 38. This means an average of six pages to a speech; and, as one is a Fourth of July oration, and has the expansiveness proper to the occasion, it will be seen that the orator is remarkable for his self-restraint and his disposition to give other men a chance, obedient to George Herbert's rule of conduct for a "master-gunner." Every speech bespeaks the man who would not come before his audience with one unconsidered word, while at the same time the literary form is always that which is proper to the thing intended primarily to be heard, not read. That, nevertheless, it reads excellently well is true at every page. The rhetoric is warm and rich, but never to excess. Of happy metaphors and similes there is a notable succession. There are many passages of stirring force and striking beauty. An admirable Latinist, and one who has translated Virgil in a highly creditable manner, the absence of Latin quotations is in striking contrast with that of statesmen whose classical resources are limited to a phrase-book's "scanty plot of ground." If we look for the classical scholar in these speeches, we shall find him in the happy choice of words and in the resonances of a style that has fed itself on classic sources with the happiest results.

Passing to more interior things, we note the breadth of historical allusion in the longer speeches, which is of a nature less suggestive of careful special preparation than of a mind well stored. Here is a man who can dwell lovingly upon the past without depreciating the present or fearing to draw aside the future's veil. He is essentially an optimist, and his optimism is co-ordinated with a broad and sweet humanity which finds expression in a hundred beautiful and pleasant ways. "He was so human," Lowell sang of Agassiz; and the phrase describes the maker of these speeches, as herein he declares himself as well as any phrase that could be framed.

Of particular speeches and addresses we may not speak without prolonging our testimony to an undue extent. But the plea for the poetic idealism of the Pilgrim Fathers at a New England dinner in New York is too felicitous to be left in absolute silence, and the praise of books in the dedication addresses for the libraries of Fitchburg and Malden is such as will awaken many a sympathetic thrill. The personal and occasional range is wide. We are kept in touch with lofty characters and great events. It was the Christian Register which first sent abroad the speech upon our "Unitarian Missionary Work"; and this imperfect salutation cannot find a better ending than in the ideal, there exalted, of a Christian civilization that will be "not the husk of a euphuism, but the full corn in the ear of Christian living." God speed the day!

THE LIFE AND LETTERS OF MARIA EDGEWORTH. Edited by Augustus J. Hare. 2 vols. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. —These volumes of Miss Edgeworth's letters are all the more interesting because they come to us coincidentally with the autobiography of Frances Power Cobbe. The two books admit us to successive stages of life in Ireland, and mutually illustrate and complement each other. It is a pity that Miss Edgeworth did not write the story of her life as frankly as Miss Cobbe has written that of hers. But letters are essentially autobiographical. Her editor has been very sparing of the material that he has furnished for their connection and elucidation. The reader would do well to read in connection with these volumes the interesting life of Miss Edgeworth by Helen Zimmern, which came out a few years ago. Miss Edgeworth's letters might have been much abridged without injury; and, if the space thus gained had been devoted to collateral matter gleaned from various sources, the book would have been much better and more readable. The estate of marriage has never had a more devout believer in its desirability than Mr. Edgeworth, the father of Maria. She was a daughter of his first marriage, an escapade to Gretna Green, when he was a student at Oxford. It was of short continuance, and proved so unhappy that he made haste to make another trial. The new wife was Honora Sneyd, who had distinguished her maidenhood by rejecting Major André and Thomas Day, the author of "Sanford and Merton." Edgeworth was a great friend of Day, and inspired his book, if it really was inspired. Evidently, his contemporaries thought it was; for, when his portrait was painted, it had a flash of lightning, intended for a symbol of genius, playing through his hair. The second marriage, also, was of brief duration, but was so happy that Mr. Edgeworth lost no time in marrying Honora's sister, not the one he cared for most, but the one Honora recommended. This marriage proved longer, happier, and much more prolific than the second and a fourth, the longest and happiest of all, and added six children to the family. The children, all told, were twenty-one, and what with their aunts and cousins and other relatives the home at Edgeworthstown was a busy hive, and gave Maria abundant opportunity to study domestic character. The father instigated Maria to literary activity, and sometimes his hand was heavy on her work. Whether we are indebted to him for more good than harm is not an easy matter to decide.

These letters give the impression of a much more varied life than is reported in Miss Edgeworth's novels. She read and travelled much; and the contemporary Napoleonic flavor of her experience is particularly interesting in these days, when Napoleon is being so much written about. She had distinguished friends, the most interesting of whom to us are the Darwins, father and grandfather of the great naturalist, and the Wedgwoods of ceramic fame, one of whom Erasmus Darwin married, Charles another, the Herschels, Sir Humphry Davy, Joanna Baillie, Mrs. Barbauld, Malthus, Ricardo, Mrs. Somerville, and par excellence Sir Walter Scott. Her visit to Scott and his to her were the two great events of her life. Scott was a warm admirer of her books, and she of his, writing him at once on the appearance of "Waverley" that he or the devil had written it.

Living until 1849, some surprise and disappointment await us in the paucity of the references to authors who were then already famous. Tennyson, Thackeray, and Browning do not get a word; but Dickens gets a rap for his "American Notes," and Macaulay one for his "Warren Hastings." Throughout one gets the impression of a singularly healthy, happy, busy, peaceful life, without an item that would be serviceable to Max Nordau's fixed idea of the decadence of the period if she were living in our time.

OCCULT JAPAN; OR, THE WAY OF THE GODS. An Esoteric Study of Japanese Personality and Possessions. By Percival Lowell. Boston and New York: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.—Mr. Lowell in his work has taken us into the interior life of the old native faith, with its strange trances and possessions. Among many other topics treated are Shinto, miracles, incarnations, possessions, dreams, hypnotic trances, will, and ideas of mode of motion and force. In explaining the psychic developments, Mr. Lowell notes the signs of the impersonality of the Japanese mind, and a general incapacity for abstract ideas.

*MATTER, FORCE, AND SPIRIT; or, Scientific Evidence of a Supreme Intelligence. G. P. Putnam's Sons.

Indirect evidence of the lack of ideal activity is shown, he says, by the uncommon imitativeness of the race; and the decorous demeanor of the whole nation betrays the lack of mental activity beneath. A friend is quoted by our author as saying, "A Japanese does not think"; and the latter confirms the truth of the epigram with the remark that "specific evidence of the fact confronts one at every turn." But, after following Mr. Lowell in his generalizations, we confess to the feeling of hesitation to accept his conclusions as a whole, because of the difficulty of a Western mind, with the limited means of knowledge at hand and the radical mental differences between the East and West, to judge accurately of the Japanese character.

THE LIFE OF THE SPIRIT IN MODERN ENGLISH POETS. By Vida D. Scudder. Boston and New York: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $1.75.—Miss Scudder's most interesting and suggestive book concerns itself almost wholly with the spiritual significance of the different phases through which English poetry has passed from the ideals of the Revolution, through development enriched by science, democracy, and a new appreciation of the past, and through the restless search for truth up to the faith which means action. Tennyson's "In Memoriam" is the climax of the poems of search, and it gives at the same time Tennyson's answer to the questionings of the heart and intellect. Browning stands as the best exponent of the highest spiritual levels, and his "Saul" marks the utmost height of spiritual passion which the century has reached. We fail to accept Miss Scudder's final conclusions entirely; that is, we see the ideal of redemption which is to quicken the world not in the Christ of supernatural revelation, but in the prophecy; not in the adoration of Jesus, but in following his religion of love to God and love to man. The book is stimulating in many ways. Its rare discernment, its beauty of style, and the nobility of its thought make it as helpful as it is delightful.

WIMPLES AND CRISPING-PINS. Being Studies in the Coiffure and Ornaments of Women. By Theodore Child. Illustrated. New York: Harper & Brothers.—Coiffure has been called an art. Mr. Childs goes even further, and maintains that it is the chiefest of decorative arts, inasmuch as its function is to adorn nature's most perfect work. For this reason he has written this work "of reveries and reflections." In doing this, he has given in his illustrations some of the best paintings and sculpture of the past. These for the most part are copies of the great artists from the earliest times of art to the eighteenth century. As a result, we have a rich collection; and, in addition to the curious information on the special topics treated, we have works of rare beauty reproduced in these pages. As the personal adornment of woman has always been a matter of universal interest in spite of the homilies on human vanity, this volume will find its way into very many households, and have a prominent place in the ladies' boudoir.

IN SUNSHINE LAND. By Edith M. Thomas. With Illustrations by Katharine Pyle. Boston and New York: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.—Miss Thomas's bright and vivacious books are well known and widely read. She has lived among birds and flowers so long as to love them as personal companions. She wanders about with them in "Sunshine Land," and notes their many winning ways. In this volume we have them dramatized as real persons living and moving in verse; and they are full of charm and life. "Sylvia and the Birds," "Flower Folk and Others," "In Fancy Fields," "Where Fancy leads." On the hills, bathed with the sunlight, we hear the humming-bird and the oriole, and with the tender finger of Spring touch the million of blossoms all aglow, and learn the secrets of bird and flower, with their wealth of song and beauty.

HOW TO KNOW THE WILD FLOWERS: A GUIDE TO THE NAMES, HAUNTS, AND HABITS OF OUR WILD FLOWERS.—By Mrs. William Starr Dana. Illustrated by Marion Satterlee. Revised and enlarged edition. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.—The demand for this useful book has been such as to induce the author to issue another edition, which contains fifty-two new plates, with the addition of sixty or more new flower descriptions. As a whole, this volume, thus enriched, is a useful and valuable companion to those who desire to know the wealth and beauty of our wild flowers. The descriptions are clear and precise, and the illustrations definite. With this guide in hand, as one lingers by the wayside or saunters in the woods, he will find nature teeming with fresh suggestions, and a new world brought into vivid light.

TEN NEW ENGLAND BLOSSOMS, AND THEIR INSECT VISITORS. By Clarence Moores Weed. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.—It is a delight to find a scientific book written for children that deals with flowers that grow within their reach. Here are the "pussy willows," the spring beauty, the arbutus, Jack-in-the-pulpit, and half a dozen others, close neighbors of nearly all New England children, about whose friends, the insects, a thousand interesting things are told. It is an excellent book to secure at once, against the vacation near at hand; for several of the flowers are summer bloomers.

HARVARD COLLEGE BY AN OXONIAN. By George Birkbeck Hill, D.C.L. Dedicated to Justin Winsor, LL.D. Macmillan & Co. $2.25.—It is to see ourselves as others see us when we are viewed by so kindly a critic. The Oxonian makes his fellows love Harvard, and his apt comparisons make us love Oxford all the more. The tone of the book is genial, and the style is fascinating. The crimson covers win the heart of the Harvard alumnus, and he may rejoice that so able a writer has chosen to treat the history, the customs, and the legends of his Alma Mater.

THE PEOPLE'S BIBLE. By Joseph Parker, D.D. New York: Funk & Wagnalls.—The twenty-sixth volume of these "Discourses upon Holy Scripture" takes up the books of Romans, Corinthians, and Galatians, continuing the minute, careful exposition for which Dr. Parker is known. It is all direct, personal, and suggestive, dwelling less on theology than on spiritual truths, but revealing naturally the preacher's own position in these matters.

Recent Poetry.

POEMS. By Lionel Johnson. London: Elkin Mathews; Boston: Copeland & Day. A SEAMARK: A Threnody for Robert Louis Stevenson. By Bliss Carman. Boston: Copeland & Day. THE BLACK RIDERS, AND OTHER LINES. By Stephen Crane. Boston: Copeland & Day. CHOCORUA'S TENANTS. By Frank Bolles. Boston and New York: Houghton & Mifflin.

It is certainly a pleasure to take in hand or look upon a book so perfect in its outward make as this. It is all the more beautiful because it does not try to be unique, as do some of the books issued by its publishers. Our first impressions, as we run it over, is: "Happy thought! Write a hundred poems, and dedicate each one to a separate friend. Then publish a limited edition, and you are sure of selling it." But we repent of this when we find how much nobility there is in the verse, how much of quiet beauty, how much felicity of phrase. And yet, somehow, it falls short. The substance is not equal to the form, the classical simplicity of which is in refreshing contrast with Francis Thompson's "rubiginous" eccentricities. Here is the shadow of a shade, not manly poetry for manly men. Mr. Johnson is one of the Roman Catholic group of poets lately developing so rapidly. Our American Father Tabb is far and away the best of them to date.

Mr. Bliss Carman's "Seamark" is a threnody on Robert Louis Stevenson that is much too long for its average quality. If every stanza were as good as the best, there would not, perhaps, be too much. As it stands, the execution is very unequal. There are stanzas of much beauty and impressiveness, with many meagre and obscure. One of the best would answer for an epigraph if a better were not forthcoming:—

"His fathers lit the dangerous coast
To steer the daring merchant home,
His courage lights the darkling port
Where every sea-worn sail must come."

Mr. Stephen Crane's "Black Riders" is nothing, if not unique in outward appearance and inward significance. Each poem is printed high up on the page, which often is mainly white paper; and, as if to give the poet's sense of the value of his poems, they are printed throughout in capital letters. It is said that Mr. Crane wrote them all in two days, and then spent nearly a fortnight in polishing them. And still polish is not their marked characteristic. They are unrhymed, and such rhythm as they have is incidental to their being clropped off in lines of pretty nearly equal length. Of beauty there is very little; but there are ideas here, and some of them very bright and good. It is as if Mr. Crane had said, "I will start out from Whitman, and go as much further as I can." The desire to startle is evident, and with some it may succeed. Coarseness, vulgarity, and brutality are not wanting. Some would add blasphemy, but the god at whom Mr. Crane hurls his scorn and laughs his impertinence is not the true God. Some of his poems have a manly ring. Some put an old idea in a new form that is so quaint that, for a moment, we imagine we have got a new idea. For example:—

I stood upon a high place,
And saw below many devils,
Running, leaping,
And carousing in sin.
One looked up, grinning,
And said, "Comrade, brother!"

Here is another, to which many bosoms will respond:—

"Think as I think," said a man,
"Or you are abominably wicked:
You are a toad."

And after I had thought of it
I said, "I will, then, be a toad."

Anything written in the metre of "Hiawatha" is bound to seem a parody to us. It is much the same with anything written in the measure of "In Memoriam." It would be the same with rhymed pentameters, if Pope's "Essay on Man" were as unique as "Hiawatha" or "In Memoriam." But Mr. Bolles evidently chose the Hiawatha trochaic as the vehicle of his message for reasons satisfactory to himself; and it is not easy to conceive of any form that would have better served his need. In the substance of his poems we have the same careful observation and felicitous expression as in his delightful prose. His subjects, among others, are, "The Crow," "The Log Cock," "The Ruffled Grouse," "The Eaves Swallow," "The Blue-jay," "The Oven Bird," "The Great Crested Fly-catcher," "The Whip-poor-will," "The Kingfisher." There must be trees and birds where Mr. Bolles has gone, or, assuredly, he will not care to stay.

Miscellaneous.

"Webster's First Bunker Hill Oration" is published in Heath's "English Classics," with preface, introduction, and notes by A. J. George.

That industrious translator, Mary J. Safford, has put "In the Fire of the Forge," a recent novel by Georg Ebers, into English; and the book is published by D. Appleton & Co. It is a romance of old Nuremberg, and contains vivid pictures of the old chivalric days at the beginning of the Hapsburg dynasty. Readers will consider it among the more interesting of Ebers's novels.

Books Received.

TO PUBLISHERS.—All books sent to the CHRISTIAN REGISTER will be promptly acknowledged under the head of "Books Received," with statement of publisher's address and price, if known. But we can guarantee no other return, as the rapid multiplication of new works compels us to limit the number selected for critical notice and review.

From Lee & Shepard, Boston. Across India; or, Live Boys in the Far East. By Oliver Optic. Price $1.25.

From Ginn & Co., Boston. Selections from the Poetry of Robert Herrick. Edited by Edward Everett Hale, Jr., Ph.D.

From Press of David Clapp & Son, Boston. Historical Sketch of Chauncy-Hall School. With Catalogue of Teachers and Pupils, and Appendix, 1828-1894. By Thomas Cushing.

From D. Appleton & Co., New York. European and American Cuisine. By Gesine Lemcke. Price $2.00.

From Thomas Y. Crowell & Co., New York. Abraham Lincoln. Tributes from his Associates. With Introduction by Rev. William Hayes Ward, D.D.

From Macmillan & Co., New York. Annals of the Parish and the Ayrshire Legatees. By John Galt. Maureen's Fairing. By Jane Barlow. Price 75 cents. The Naulahka. A Story of West and East. By Rudyard Kipling and Wolcott Balestier. Price 50 cents.

Music Received.

From Oliver Ditson Company, Boston. Night Hymn at Sea. By A. Goring Thomas. Grand American Fantasia. By Theo. Bendix. Two Mandolins and Guitar. Arranged by Walter Vreeland. The Hub Waltz. Dover Galop. For Pianoforte. By C. C. Roeske. Oh for the Pearly Gates of Heaven! Arranged from John Francis Barnett. By Victor Vane. The Assembly Two-step. Composed by Herbert Hassler. Flower Queen Reverie. Fairy Dream. Priscilla's Spinning-wheel. Let me Forget. Song. Words by V. Hubbard. Music by Geo. B. Nevlin.

The House Beautiful.

By WILLIAM C. GANNETT,

Author of "A Year of Miracle," "Blessed be Drudgery," etc. Paper, ornamental, choice edition, price 15 cents. (In "Life-Studies" form, 6 cents; 10 copies for 30 cents.)

CONTENTS: The Building of the House; House-Furnishing; The Ideal of Beauty; Flower Furniture; Book Furniture; Our Guests; The "Dear Togetherness."

In the cheaper form the edition is neat and serviceable. The special edition, on rich, tinted paper, silk-stitched, with neat, illuminated cover, serves admirably as a dainty remembrance for a friend, and especially to "tuck in with wedding-gifts."

[From The New Unity, May 2, 1895]

The selection we give in another column from "The House Beautiful"—one of Mr. Gannett's uplifting studies which James H. West has just published—was not made because it was the most inspiring word the pamphlet contains. Where all is so good perhaps there is no best, though to our mind the section on "The dear Togetherness" is fullest of strength, sweetness, and light. But this extract was selected simply because it was the shortest that could be made to stand by itself. By sending its publisher fifteen cents our readers can procure the little book for themselves; and if they want to be strengthened and lifted up, they will do so.

Sent postpaid on receipt of price by

JAMES H. WEST, Publisher,
174 High Street, - - - Boston.

The Free Church Record

is a periodical of 44 pages published at Tacoma every other month from February to December. It is devoted to the advancement of the New IDEAL IN RELIGION; namely, the promotion of Free Spiritual and Universal Religion, frankly independent of Brahmanism, Buddhism, Parsism, Judaism, Christianity, and all other special historical religions which are by nature dogmatic, based on personal leadership and limited in fellowship. No other religious journal in the world is dedicated to this ideal. The FREE CHURCH RECORD is the organ of real Universal Religion; i.e., religion reconstructed on the basis of universal human nature, wholly unsectarian in principle and purely scientific in method, seeking truth in the spirit of love by obedience to the universal laws of thought and the universal facts of the Cosmos.

Editorial Committee.

ALFRED W. MARTIN. WALTER J. THOMPSON.
E. N. FULLER.

Publication Committee.

SAMUEL COLLYER. R. P. BRADLEY.
FREDERICK WATSON.

Occasional Contributors.

Rev. Octavius B. Frothingham, Paul Carus, Ph.D., Edmund Montgomery, Ph.D., Prof. Thomas Davidson, Ph.D., Babu B. Nagarkar (of the Brahmo-Somaj), Fred. May Holland, W. L. Sheldon, B. F. Underwood, Rev. P. R. Frothingham, Rev. R. B. Marsh, Francis E. Abbot, Ph.D., Prof. Elliott Cones, M.D., Ph.D., Mrs. Ednah D. Cheney, D. J. H. Ward, Ph.D., William M. Salter, Edwin D. Mead, Rev. T. G. Milsted, Rev. H. L. Wheeler, James H. West, Rev. Leslie W. Sprague, Rev. Charles F. Dole, Wm. Lloyd Garrison, Prof. A. E. Dolbear, Rabbi Schindler, Rabbi Fleischer.

Subscription, $1.00 per Year.

Address FREE CHURCH RECORD, Tacoma, Wash.

OLD AND NEW UNITARIAN BELIEF.

BY

JOHN WHITE CHADWICK.

Price, $1.50.

CONTENTS.—Historical Introduction, The Doctrine of Man, Concerning God, The Bible, Christianity, Concerning Jesus, The Future Life, The Great Salvation, Loss and Gain.

"A valuable as well as very readable treatise. . . The best popular history of Unitarian doctrine that has come to our notice. . . Mr. Chadwick has most interestingly set forth the rapid transformations of Unitarian belief."—The Nation.

"The best summary of Unitarian history and doctrinal development, and the most radical and optimistic outlook on the future which has yet been produced among us."—Pacific Unitarian.

"A weighty testimony to a notable religious movement from the religion of the letter to the religion of the spirit. . . His attitude not always that of the contemplative philosopher; . . . his pulse throbs strongly, and quickens that of the reader. There are some passages that belong to the anthology of prophetic literature."—CHAS. G. AMES, in the New World.

"We can here trace the growth of the New Unitarian gospel, see something of the great moulding influences that have shaped and changed it, note the dangers it has encountered, thrill with the warm light of its newly discovered hope, feel ourselves taken into comradeship with its noble army of workers and saints. . . Decidedly marking a clearer point of vision in the development of Unitarian thought."—The Unitarian.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Mozoomdar's
BOOKS.

The Spirit of God. By PROTAP CHUNDER MOZOOMDAR. 323 pages. Cloth, $1.50.

An idea of the work may be gained from the titles of the chapters: The Spirit, The Hindu Doctrine of the Spirit, Doctrine of the Spirit in Christianity, Sense of the Unseen, The Spirit in Nature, The Kinship in Nature, The Spiritual Power of the Senses, The Spirit in Life, The Spirit in the Spirit, The Spirit in Immortal Life, The Spirit in Reason, The Spirit in Love, The Spirit in Conscience, The Spirit in Christ, The Spirit in History, The Spirit in all Religions, Live in the Spirit.

Heart-Beats. A Book of Meditations. By PROTAP CHUNDER MOZOOMDAR. With Portrait and Biographical Sketch of the Author. Cloth, red edges, $1.50; white, full gilt, $2.00.

Its poetic title is suggestive of its contents. It is a collection of brief paragraphs, which are not so much the acntillations of the intellect as poems of the imagination and pulsations of the heart. It is an illustration of the lofty heights to which devotional sentiment may rise, free from all tinge of superstition.—Christian Register.

The Oriental Christ. By PROTAP CHUNDER MOZOOMDAR. New Edition. 193 pages. Cloth, $1.25.

The existence of this book is a phenomenon;—more than a curiosity; and rich as a new, fresh, and very suggestive study of the character and person of Christ.—Christian Union.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

The Home.

For the Christian Register.

THE LITTLE BOY AND THE MOON.*

BY HENRIETTA R. ELIOT.

Why does the white moon, floating far
In distant realms of blue,
And shedding thence its radiance mild,
Seem so much nearer to your child
Than e'er it seems to you?

It is not that he sees amiss,
Or that your eyes are dim:
Herein a higher truth is taught.
Oh! make it part of your own thought,
Then give it back to him!

He stretches now a baby hand
To grasp the heavenly light.
Oh! may no barrier ever rise
To make him, with the years, less wise
Or dim his longing sight!

Then hasten not to break the spell
Which holds him in sweet thrall:
Translate it rather, that it seem,
In years to come, no childish dream,
To be at One with All!

For the Christian Register.

A BEDTIME STORY FOR LITTLE FOLK.

BY ANNA M. PRATT.

"Oh, dear, I wish I wasn't a little boy," said Rob. And what do you think made him say it? It was because his mamma had just told him to put away his blocks and to take Prince to the stable and give him some oats. Prince is his rocking-horse, and the stable is the corner between the rocking-chair and the south window. Every night Rob ties Prince to the chair, and holds a saucer of bird-seed under his nose till he has eaten as much supper as a rocking-horse ought to eat. It doesn't take long, and he likes to feed his pony; but he knows his bread and milk are ready by that time, and his bedtime has come. That is why he said, "Oh, dear!"

"Why, what should I do if I hadn't any little boy?" said mamma; "and what would you do if you hadn't any little bed?"

Rob thought a minute, and then said: "If I was a little bird, I shouldn't want one. O mamma, may I play I am a bird?"

His mamma said, "Yes: you may be a robin." So he began to hop about on the floor, flapping his arms for wings. When he was tired of doing that, she told him to stand on one foot and put his head down on one side and go to sleep.

"Why, mamma," he said, "I can't sleep in that way. Besides, I am hungry."

"Are you?" said his mamma. "Well, here are some crumbs left from a cookie my little boy had. You may eat them; but, if you are a robin, you must sleep as robins do."

Rob stood on one foot for two minutes. He thought it was an hour, he was so tired; and then he said he would rather be a cat because he could lie down. His mamma poured some milk into a saucer, and put it on the floor, and said, "Come, Kitty, Kitty!" but he couldn't drink it as pussy did, and he tipped it over before he had tasted a drop. Then he lay down on the rug before the fire. He tried to curl himself up in a little ball; but he bumped his head, and he couldn't lie still and purr, though he tried very hard.

In a few minutes he jumped up, and said: "Mamma, I don't want to be a little boy yet. What else can I be?" Mamma smiled, and said, "Do you want to be a flower?"

"Oh, yes," said Rob: "I will be a morning-glory." He had heard his mamma call his baby sister her little morning-glory, as she lay cooing to herself in her crib; and he thought it was a very sweet name.

"Well," said mamma, "the morning-glories have all gone to sleep by this time, so you must come and stand by me, and go to sleep, too."

Rob went to her, and stood very still to show he was on a stem. Mamma put his arm through hers, because that flower always puts out little runners to hold on by. Then she told him how it twists itself up when its early bedtime comes, and Rob shut his eyes so tight and puckered his lips so close that his little face was as red as a rose.

Just then nurse came into the room with a bowl of bread and milk; and mamma said, "Shall I sprinkle my flower with water, or shall I give my little boy his supper?"

"Oh! I'll eat my supper," said Rob. "I'd rather you'd be my mamma than anything else."

So he sat in his mamma's lap while he ate his bread and milk; and she told him he was her little robin.

And then she washed his face and hands, and called him her little kitten, because the mother cat always washes her kittens.

And, when she put on his night-gown, she said he was her little flower, and wore a white dress like the other flowers.

And then she kissed him, and said, "My darling little boy"; and that was the best of all.

When he had said, "Now I lay me" and the prayer mamma made for him, he asked if he might say one more. Mamma smiled, "Yes"; and he said,—

"Dear heavenly Father, I thank you for making me a little boy."

Then he shut his eyes, and in two minutes he didn't know whether he was a bird or a boy or a kitten or a morning-glory.

JOE'S VICTORY.

"Mamma, I wish I could get to school without passing that Charlie Haddington's house, or else I wish I could make him behave."

Mrs. Gordon looked down into the troubled little face Joe raised to hers, and answered with a smile:—

"Well, I think perhaps you could make him do that. I'd try to, anyway, if I were you."

"Why, how could I, mamma?" asked Joe, wonderingly. "You always said you didn't want me to fight, and he is bigger than I am, too; but maybe I could whip him. Do you mean that I may try to, mamma?"

"No, dear," said his mother. "I mean that I think the reason Charlie teases you so is that he likes to see you lose your temper; and, if you would learn to control that, he wouldn't find any more fun in plaguing you, and so would stop it."

"I wish I wasn't so fiery," Joe said, thoughtfully; "and I mean to try hard to keep my temper to-day."

In a few minutes Joe was trudging along the road, his thoughts full of a plan he had formed the night before to get up a baseball club among the boys of his own age, like those the older boys and young men of the village had. It was a little hard to decide just which boys to ask; and he wanted to see Harry Crane and Jack Lewis, and talk it over with them before school.

He was so busy thinking, that he did not notice how near he came to the house where Charlie Haddington lived; nor did he notice a stone which lay on the walk right before him, but stumbled over it and fell. As he scrambled to his feet and tried to brush the dust from his clothes, he heard a mocking laugh, and then the words:—

"Poor old Joe
Stubbed his toe
On the way to Jericho.
Oh, oh, oh,
Poor Joe's toe!"

and he saw Charlie sitting on the gate-post just across the way.

A rush of angry feelings came over Joe; but he remembered his conversation with his mother just in time, and pressed his lips tightly together, determined not to say a word until he could speak pleasantly.

He brushed away vigorously for a minute or two, then, straightening up, he called out, "Say, Charlie, do you want to be in our nine?"

Charlie was surprised at Joe's friendly tone, and expected some trick; but the question excited his curiosity, so he answered:—

"Tain't likely. What nine?"

"Some of us fellows are going to have a base-ball nine," said Joe. "Would you like to belong to it? If you would, I'll put your name down for it."

Charlie swung himself down from his seat; and the two boys walked on together toward the school-house, talking of the new project in a very friendly way.

They had not been intimate, and never played together except at the school recess in some game in which all the boys joined;

for, when the Haddingtons had moved into town about a year before, and Charlie appeared at school with ragged clothes and a somewhat rough manner, he had not seemed a very desirable companion to Joe Gordon and the well-dressed, carefully taught boys he associated with.

Charlie had noticed this; but he was a bright boy, and not a bad one, and he was fully determined not to be ragged always, and to make himself, as he expressed it, "as good as anybody." He was pleased, therefore, with Joe's proposal; but he knew that he had not deserved it from him, and so, just before they reached the school-house, he said:—

"Joe, what made you choose me? You are the one that's getting this thing up, and you could have found enough other boys. You needn't have asked me at all, when I've plagued you so much."

And Joe answered,—

"Well, I s'pose you did it for the fun of seeing me flare up; but I mean to break myself of that, and I wanted to show you that I didn't bear any grudge."

"Well, I'm not going to do it any more, see if I do," said Charlie; and he kept his word.

So Joe gained a double victory that morning,—a victory over his teasing schoolmate, and a still greater one over his own quick temper.—Selected.

OLD GRAY.

"Stand still, old fellow!" said Mr. Jones, as he held what little Dick called the horse's "back foot" in his hands, and skilfully set the shoe. Little Dick was half scared over the process; and he held his own dear pony, Brownie, by the bridle. "I tell you what it is," said Mr. Jones, "this horse knows a great deal. I've always had a respect for him ever since I took a journey in his company."

"When was that?" asked Miss Hannab, little Dick's nurse and governess.

"Why, it was a year ago last summer. Mr. Perkins owned this horse then,—Old Gray he called him,—and he took him down the river with him to Cincinnati. I happened to be there when the men were trying to take Old Gray on the boat. It was a dark, rainy night, and there was lots of noise of one kind or another, and a narrow plank to walk to get on the boat; and Gray didn't like the looks of things. He was scared,—that was the whole of it; and he made up his mind that he wasn't going on that boat. The men shouted and pushed with all their might; but it was of no use. They couldn't stir him. Just when they were at their wits' end, Mr. Perkins came along with his wife and little boy. In a twinkling he saw how things were going. He hurried his wife and boy on the boat. Then he went back to where the men were struggling with his horse.

"Let me get to that horse a minute, won't you?" he said; and they stood back, scolding, and declaring that there wasn't any use in fussing with him. Mr. Perkins slipped by them, and laid his hand on the horse's side, and patted it, and said: "It is all right, Old Gray. The plank won't break. You follow me, like a good fellow!" Then he walked ahead of him; and, if you'll believe it, the horse looked at him a minute, then lifted up his feet, and marched after that man on to the boat! The men just set up a cheer; and one of them said: "Well, I never saw anything like that. He has proved who he belongs to." Scared the horse was,—oh, my! so scared that he trembled every step he took; but says he, "Danger or no danger, I'm going to do as he tells me, every time." Everybody respected Old Gray after that. All through the journey the men petted him as if he had been a little child. One day, when we had stopped at a dock, and were loading on some lumber, it made a tremendous noise when the great boards were thrown down on deck; and Old Gray would jump every time a board fell.

"The men noticed this, and at last one of them said: 'Bill, you just go and explain to that horse what we are doing. Tell him it's all right, and he needn't be afraid. He'll understand you. He's human, that horse is.' Well, it did almost seem so. Anyhow, he did better than some humans do, didn't he? There, sir, you have as nice a pair of shoes as you deserve, and that is saying a good deal. Now what can I do for Brownie?" added Mr. Jones.

Two hours afterward little Dick was at home, and his mother came to him with a glass in her hand. "Now, little Dick," she said, "it is time for the medicine: I wonder if I am going to have a brave boy to-day?"

"No, ma'am," said little Dick, "I don't feel brave a bit, and I hate it; but I'm going to take it." And he opened his mouth and swallowed the bitter stuff without a word.

"Well, well, well," said his mother, "if I'm not delighted! How came my little boy to be so brave?"

"I'm going to try to be as good as a horse," said little Dick, gravely. "Old Gray went where he didn't want to go, and was afraid,—because his owner was good, and wanted him to; and I made up my mind that it was queer if I couldn't be as good as a horse."

"I think that is pretty well for a little boy," said his mother, when little Dick had left the room. "The story of Gray made a deep impression on him. He hates this medicine, and has not succeeded in taking it once without crying until this time. He whispered to me that he loved me more than Old Gray could possibly love Mr. Perkins, and was going to do what I wanted done, if it was bad." She was talking to a young man who lay stretched on a sofa, with his eyes shaded by his hand. The young man was her grown-up son. All day, and for many days indeed, he had been gloomy and miserable, because he was not well, and the doctor had said that he must not go back to college, but must rest his eyes for an entire term. He had called the doctor an idiot, and declared that he would do no such thing, and had made his mother miserable. Now he kept very still for some time. At last he took his hand from his eyes, and looked at her, and smiled.

"You think there is a lesson in that for big John as well as for little Dick, don't you?" he said; "and there is, mother. I'll try to behave myself, and not be outdone by a horse."—Pansy.

HOW "GUMMA" DRESSED JACK.

Jack came trotting into papa's room one morning with two little black stockings in one hand, two little black boots in the other, and several small articles of clothing over his shoulder.

"Papa," he said, "does you know how to dress yittle boys? Gumma's gone."

"Yes, indeed, my little man," said papa; and he lifted Jack to his knee, and began to pull on one small stocking.

"Stop, papa! Stop!" cried Jack. "Dat ain't a-way! Gumma don't do it dat-a-way!"

"Well, how does 'Gumma' do it?" asked papa, pausing for instruction.

"Dis-a-way," said Jack, taking up one foot, and then carefully grasping a fat toe in his chubby hand.

"Here, Mishter Toe, you an' your bruzers mus' go into your yittle black house. Now don' begin to w'iggle. One, two, free,—dere you go!" And Jack pulled his stocking over his five toes and up to his knee. Then, looking up into his papa's face, he said, "See?"

"Yes," said papa, smiling. "Here goes the other foot. Now, Mr. Toe, you and all your brothers!"

"No, no, papa!" cried Jack. "Dat one is Mishis Toe, an' you mus' say 'all your yittle sissers.'"

"Oh, ho!" said papa. "Well, then, Mrs. Toe, and all your little sisters! One, two, three,—there you go!" And the second stocking was on.

"Now," said Jack, "you mus' put on the woof."

"The what?" asked papa.

"The woof to the house." And Jack pointed to his boot.

"Oh, the roof! Very well." And papa put on the boot, and began buttoning it with his fingers.

"Dat ain't a-way!" cried Jack again. "You mus' get a hooker, and lock all 'e' doors, so all the yittle bruzers and sissers won' get out 'e' house for all day."

"Now, see here, young man," said papa.

"Does grandma go through with all this rigmarole every morning?"

*Free translation of the motto to "The Little Boy and the Moon," in Froebel's "Mother Play."

"Of courth," said Jack, looking at papa with surprised eyes.

"Well, papa hasn't the time. So let me get you into your clothes quick, before the breakfast bell rings."

So Jack had to submit to being dressed in a hurry, without his grandmother's pleasant romancing.

The minute he got downstairs he went to his mamma, and asked:—

"Fen's my gunma comin' home?"

"She is coming to-morrow," said mamma.

"Dat's nice," said Jack; "for," he whispered into mamma's ear, "my papa don' know how to dwess yittle boys." Babylond.

For the Christian Register.
THE TIME FOR FLOWERS.

BY WILLIAM BRUNTON.

The flowers are tardy oft in May;
As elves they leave the ground;
And, peeping all about, they say:
"Why is not summer round?
We do not love dark clouds or cold,
But smiles of sunshine bright!"
Then June flings back her gates of gold,
And everything is right.

THE FIELD-MICE.

One summer Jack went into the country with his mother and his sister Mabel to spend the long summer months. He was very busy from morning till night helping feed the chickens or chasing the calves or hunting for hens' eggs. Sometimes he would be allowed to go with the hired man to drive home with the cows, or, when the haymakers had filled the rack with hay, they would put Jack and Mabel on top of the load, and they would ride in glee to the barn.

The days seemed all too short for their merry-making; and every night the last thing they said was, "Please waken me very early; for I have so many, many things to do to-morrow." But I wish to tell you of some strange pets that Mabel and Jack had that summer.

One morning they received permission to go into the field behind the house and pick strawberries. They worked hard, and had almost filled their small tin cups, when "Peep, peep!" sounded right under Jack's feet. It was such a faint little cry that he first thought it was a bird with a broken wing. He pushed aside the grass, and saw four pairs of bright black eyes peering at him.

There, huddled close together, lay four little mice.

"Mabel, Mabel! Here are some mice!" called Jack. "They are the cunningest little things, and are so young they can hardly move. Come here, and tell me if you ever saw brighter eyes; and they are crying as if they are hungry."

"Oh, the dear little things!" exclaimed Mabel, when she saw them. "How did they come here? I thought mice always lived on pantry shelves and places where no one wants them."

"These must be field-mice," replied Jack. "I heard the farmer say the other day that he had found a nest of field-mice. Let us wait until the father and the mother mouse come home." So they sat down and waited for the old ones to come, but they failed to appear.

"Perhaps they are afraid of us, and will not return while we are here. Let us go to dinner, and then we will come back and see them," said Jack.

When they returned after dinner, the little ones were still alone and crying piteously. So the children went back to the house, and begged corn for the little mice.

After feeding them, they brought water, and tried to teach them to drink. After supper they went again to see the field-mice, and still the old mice had not returned.

"I'll tell you what we must do," said Jack. "I am afraid the mother and father mouse have been killed. Perhaps a cat has caught them. So we must adopt these little mice, or they will die."

The first thing every morning the children would go to the field, and carry the mice their breakfast. Very soon the little creatures would eat from their hands, and became as playful and tame as kittens. After a time, as they grew larger, the children carried them nuts, which the mice would crack with their sharp, white teeth.

When the time drew near for leaving the country, Jack and Mabel felt very sorry to part with their little friends, the field-mice. They begged their mamma to allow them to take the mice to the city with them. But she would not consent.

"But they have no house to live in! What will they do?" said Mabel.

Then their mamma told them that field-mice sleep through the entire winter. As soon as the cold weather begins, they curl up like little balls, and, crawling close to one another, dream the whole winter long.

Sometimes, when a very warm, sunshiny day melts the snow, the little mice waken, and nibble some corn or nuts which they have stored away for the winter. Then they sleep on until another warm day.

"I will tell you a very kind thing to do," said their mamma. "These field-mice will soon begin to lay in a supply of corn and nuts for the winter. It means a great deal of work for them to carry so much food to their homes. So you children can help them by placing some food they like near their nests."

The day before Jack and Mabel left the country they carried a large quantity of grain and nuts (enough for a hundred mice, the farmer said), and laid it beside the field-mice's nest. During the winter, whenever an unusually bright day occurred, the children would say,—

"I suppose the field-mice wakened to-day, and ate some nuts and corn."—M. C. S., in Sunday School Times.

DOGS IN CHURCH.

In old times it was a common thing in all parts of Great Britain to see dogs and other animals in church; and some one said many years ago that "there was not a man nor a woman nor a child nor a dog nor a rabbit in all Scotland but belonged to the kirk." A gentleman asked a shepherd if a certain building was a church, adding that it was almost too small for that; but the man replied that it was not so very small, as there were above thirty collies there every Sunday.

There is a story that, when Queen Victoria first went to Crathie church, a fine dog followed the clergyman up the pulpit steps, and reclined against the door during the sermon. The next Sunday, however, the dog was not to be seen, the chaplain at Balmoral having remonstrated with his master on the subject. A day or two after, when the clergyman was dining with the queen, he was asked by her Majesty why the dog was not at church on Sunday; and, when he explained the reason, the queen replied: "Pray let him come as usual. I wish every one behaved as well at church as your noble dog does."

Another dog belonging to a minister was bent on hearing his master preach, and his master was equally bent on having him stay at home. When the minister left the house, the dog would follow on the opposite side of the street until they were near the church, when he always crossed over in perfect security. He managed to get into a corner by the reading-desk, where he conducted himself in the most praiseworthy manner, until the parishioners finally declared, "He's a good dog that goes to church," and prevailed on his master not to interfere with so commendable a habit.

Another dog still went regularly to the Methodist church, although the family to whom he belonged were Presbyterians; and Sunday after Sunday he contrived to elude the ushers, and make his way to his favorite corner in the gallery. This remarkable dog will indulge in no frivolities on Sunday, and it was even his custom to decline all companionship then. A dog of more playful tendencies was seen by the clergyman frisking along the middle aisle, and evidently on the lookout for mischief. Presently he pounced on a hat outside one of the pews, and shook it fiercely, although the owner poked him vigorously with his cane to make him drop it. But the sexton had his eye on this four-footed disturber of the peace; and, seeing him approach, evidently with hostile intentions, the dog made off with his prize into a side aisle. Some of the congregation now came to the rescue, and a spirited skirmish ensued; but the intruder cleverly dodged them all, and vanished triumphantly with what was left of the hat.—The Interior.

INTERESTING WORDS.

The unpleasant word "blackguard" shows us another glimpse of the old times. When great families moved about from one residence to another, the lowest and dirtiest servants took care of the pots and pans and coal, and were well covered with soot and smut. They were laughed at when they passed by as "the black guard." It is safe to say that they never failed to answer back in very bad language, and in the course of time all who used scurrilous talk were called "blackguards."

"Miser," in Latin, as every one knows who has begun the study of that language, means "wretched" or "miser-able." But our noun "miser" tells the plain story that in the experience of mankind the miserable man, above all others, is the one who is a slave to money.

A "mountebank" was one of the quack doctors who were always to be found at fairs, and who were wont to mount a bank or bench, and boast of the merits of their wares. They sought to draw a crowd, just as do the sellers of patent medicines who drive about nowadays, and whom we see in the evening standing in their carriages amid flaring lights, making loud boasts of their amazing cures, telling funny stories, and performing clownish tricks.

A curious word is "sycophant," made up of two Greek words, the noun meaning "fig" and the verb "to make known." It is thought that the name was first applied, at Athens, to men who sought reward by informing of those who exported figs contrary to law, and later to any telltale. No boy or girl needs to be told how it has come to mean a flatterer and hypocrite, for those who delight in meddlesome gossip behind our backs are the very ones to be full of flattery before our faces.—Zion's Herald.

AT THE MILLINER'S.

Superstitions in a work-room are many and varied. To drop an unfinished hat on the floor is a sure guarantee of its success; and, as many are sold that have taken a tumble, and would be naturally, the sign is considered infallible. To drop your scissors means extremely bad luck, if you stoop to pick them up yourself. You must step on them, and then have some one else return them to you. When you are so fortunate as to get an order for a bride's hat, you must pluck a hair from your own head and sew it in your work, then every girl demands the privilege of trying it on, and she is sure to get a husband on her own account.—Mary P. Whiteman, in the Cosmopolitan.

THE TSAR'S HORSES.

The Tsar of Russia has a set of fifty horses, all pure white, with blue eyes. They are beautiful creatures, but deaf. These white horses are used in showy processions on state occasions, and, like Queen Victoria's famous cream-colored horses, are never sold from the imperial stables. When past use, they are shot and buried with due ceremony.—Sacred Heart Review.

NONE SUCH

MINCE MEAT

is particularly valuable in the summer because it is always fresh and sweet.

It is unexcelled for the home, the camp, seaside or mountains. Sold everywhere.

Merrell-Soule Co.,
Syracuse, N. Y.

Cholera

* Infantum

This dreadful disease cannot fasten upon childhood when the system is fortified with that great raw food extract known as

Bovinine

The medical profession in general have depended upon it for years. BOVININE is a food, not a medicine. Add a few drops to baby's milk. Nothing will build up health and strength so quickly.

A. P. BUSH, 149 Pearl St.

The merits of the Palmer Patent Hammocks have never been equalled. Their superiority of material, construction, and design has made them the standard since first introduced. While there is a continual effort by imitators and infringers to produce something similar, it has all been without success, and the "Palmer Patent Hammocks" still stand pre-eminently superior to any of the imitations. They are produced in larger quantities and infinitely more varieties than the combined production of all others.

Before purchasing, insist upon seeing the "Palmer Patent Hammocks." Remember, the name "Palmer" is a synonym for all that is best in Hammocks. If your dealer does not have them in stock, he can get them for you, but be sure that he does. I. E. Palmer, Middletown, Conn.

Education.

The oldest high-class educational magazine in the country ($3 per year) is read by thoughtful people of all classes, as well as educators. It ought to be in every library and reading-room in the land. Is it in yours? From a new subscriber we will accept $2 for the first year. Send 12 cents (in stamps) for a sample copy.

Nova Scotia Tours. The associate editor of Education offers again this year several delightful personally conducted tours to Evangeline's land. Select companies of cultured people. No heat, romantic scenery. An ideal vacation. First party, June 25. Shad, salmon, and strawberries in their prime. Expenses low. Write for particulars.

KASSON & PALMER,
50 Bromfield Street, Boston, Mass.

MAGNOLIA TERRACE Springfield, Mass.
Home and Day School for Girls. JOHN McDUFFIE, PR.D.

NEWTON CENTRE, MASS.
SCHOOL FOR THE CORRECTION OF ALL SPEECH DEFECTS. For circular address E. J. E. THORPE, Principal.

MISS KIMBALL'S SCHOOL FOR GIRLS, Worcester, Mass.
Thorough preparation for College. Intermediate, Academic, and Special Courses. Send for Illustrated Circular.

Miss Gibbons' School for Girls.
Preparation for all colleges. 55 West 47th St., N.Y. MRS. SARAH H. EMERSON, Principal. October 2. A few boarding pupils taken.

Mr. Knapp's Home School for Boys, PLYMOUTH, MASS.
Powder Point School (DUXBURY, MASS.).
These schools have always had the same interests, and will now be united at Duxbury, the Plymouth school closing with the present term.

HOME SCHOOL FOR BOYS
in the family of Rev. Eugene De Normandie, Danvers, Mass. Address HENRY N. DE NORMANDIE.

PROCTOR ACADEMY, Andover, N.H.
For both sexes. Healthful location. Liberal management. Expenses low. Prepares for college or for teaching, etc. For catalogue, address JAMES F. MORTON, A.M., Principal.

PROSPECT HILL SCHOOL
FOR YOUNG LADIES, GREENFIELD, MASS.
Twenty-fifth Year. Reference, Rev. E. E. Hale, D.D. REV. JAMES C. PARSONS, Principal.

THE HIGHLAND MILITARY ACADEMY, WORCESTER, MASS., begins 40th year September 11. Classical, Scientific, Business, Preparatory Departments. Gymnasium. Athletics encouraged. Careful training. Home influences. JOSEPH ALDEN SHAW, A.M., Head Master.

Boston, 10 Ashburton Place.
BOSTON UNIVERSITY Law School.
Fall term opens Wednesday, October 2. For circulars address EDMUND H. BENNETT, Dean.

A TRAINED NURSE will care for, at her own home in the country, a chronic invalid of either sex. For references, etc., address BOX 736, PORTLAND, ME.

VACATION FOR BOYS.—Mr. and Mrs. John McDuffie receive at seashore home four boys between twelve and fifteen, July and August. Lessons in school studies, also in rowing, sailing, etc., if desired. JOHN McDUFFIE (Harv.), MAGNOLIA TERRACE SCHOOL, SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

CONTINENTAL.
Atlantic City, N.J.
Desirable location, best service, and moderate rates. H. C. DURAR.

"BREVITY IS THE SOUL OF WIT."

GOOD WIFE! YOU NEED

SAPOLIO

WILLIAM MACK, M.D.

To any one resident in Salem or to one who has resided there at any time within the past fifty years the name of Dr. Mack is a familiar and household word.

Descended from old New England stock, he was the personification of its best fruits and a fitting representative of the cultivated life of one of the most noted centres of culture and of the best forms of social life.

On his paternal side the first ancestor came from Gedboro, Scotland, and settled in Lyme, Conn., in 1693, and on the maternal side from England, and settled in Essex County, Massachusetts, embracing in both lines the families of Mack, Ellis, Talcott, Sewall, Pyncheon, Orne, and others.

His grandfather, David Mack, was one of the original settlers of Middlefield, Mass., and was probably the most important factor in the town in securing a church, in obtaining an act of incorporation, in founding the Hampshire Missionary Society and numerous benevolent societies, giving liberally from his limited means both of money and time, and leaving a legacy "for the support of the gospel in all coming times."

His religious belief was of the strictest, but it was of the kind which has moulded the New England character; and he imposed upon himself a high sense of obligation toward his fellow-man, which kept him to a life of self-abnegation and devotion to duty which was simply sublime.

Dr. Mack was like his grandfather in his devotion to duty, and in the same spirit of self-forgetfulness he lived for others, with a religious belief softened and humanized by the gentler influences which came to him in his youth and from the home circle.

Born Aug. 11, 1814, his mother died when he was but four years old, so that his own mother was to him but a faint remembrance of the exquisite beauty of person for which she was noted.

His father, the late Judge Elisha Mack, after the lapse of a few years married Harriet Orne Clarke, a daughter of Rev. John Clarke, a minister of the First Congregational Church in the city of Boston, and was a living example, of which there are so many, of the devotion and kindly offices of the "step-mother."

She was to him a mother indeed, and he lived to love and adore her as if he were flesh of her flesh and blood of her blood.

Educated in the common schools of Cummington and Salem, he entered Harvard College in 1829, graduated in 1833 with Prof. Francis Bowen, Prof. Joseph Lovering, Drs. Jeffries and Morrill Wyman, Rev. Dr. Geo. E. Ellis, Hon. Samuel P. Andrews, Rev. Robert S. Lowell, and others; and after graduation he went to New Bedford, where he taught school and read medicine, later entering the Harvard Medical School, when Drs. J. C. Warren, James Jackson, and Walter Channing were the professors in charge, and took his degree in 1838.

After taking his degree, he studied two years in Paris, and came back to his native city of Salem in 1841, and continued in the active practice of his profession with distinguished success until the latter part of May, 1894, a few months before his eightieth birthday.

This is the brief outline of the outward life of the "good physician" whose earthly career has just closed; but how incomplete it is without an insight into the spirit and the real life of the man!

Endowed with a delicate and refined nature, and a keen intellect, possessed with untiring devotion to whatever he undertook, the soul of honor and with a conscience void of offence, his whole life was devoted to service, not alone in the lines of his chosen profession, which, perhaps, gives larger opportunity for service than any other calling, but in constant acts of kindness and ministration, which were so modestly and so graciously rendered as to lend to them a charm which lingered in the memory long after the performance. This was touchingly illustrated by the tributes of love and respect which were paid to his memory by those who came early and late to the house to speak of the unpaid service rendered through months of illness, the voluntary contributions which kept the larder supplied which would otherwise have been empty, the skilful care which had saved life, and the scientific knowledge and careful attention which had saved an injured member when all others declared it impossible.

Fond of the best literature, he was a good reader; and, had he not devoted so much of his time to keep abreast of his profession and to be in touch with the progress of medical and surgical science, he would have been a ripe scholar in belles-lettres, history, and poetry.

In the days of the anti-slavery struggle he was on what was then the unpopular, but now universally conceded to be the right, side; and, though unable often to attend church, he was of a religious nature, free from cant, and open to the reception of those views which addressed themselves to his reason, and consequently was a liberal of the liberals, and was a firm friend of the three ministers under whose preaching he sat when opportunity permitted,—Thomas T. Stone, Octavius B. Frothingham, and Edmund B. Willson.

The latter was his pastor for thirty-six years, and the friendship which existed between them and the esteem which each entertained for the other is the strongest testimony of the rare quality of each.

Dr. Mack was confined to his room and much of the time to his bed for more than a year, and Mr. Willson was a frequent visitor at his bedside; and, when on the day that Mr. Willson was stricken down at the close of his anniversary address Dr. Mack heard of it, he was as eager in his inquiries and as anxious as to his condition as if he were his attending physician.

But a few days after Dr. Mack began to fail, and fell asleep on Sunday evening, June 9, followed by Mr. Willson in the early morning of Thursday, the 13th, a few hours after the purifying flame had consumed all that was mortal of the beloved physician.

A. S.

Personals.

The seventy-fifth birthday of Florence Nightingale was remembered by an autograph letter from Queen Victoria, and by congratulations from the emperor of Germany and the czar of Russia.

John Huron, by whose will the Indianapolis Art Association receives $200,000, was born in Carlton, near Skipton, in Craven, Eng. He was a frugal, industrious man, prompt and correct in business methods.

The University of Aberdeen has conferred the degree of LL.D. on Miss Jane Harrison. Twenty years ago she entered Newnham College, then in its infancy; and she has since distinguished herself by her researches into the origin of Greek vases.

The death is announced in England of Miss Elizabeth Stirling at the age of more than eighty, a woman of brilliant musical gifts. In 1856 she sent in an exercise for the degree of Mus. Doc. at Oxford, which was accepted; but, when "E. Sterling" turned out to be a woman, it was returned with ample apologies.

Every year the bravest deed done in saving life in the British dominions is marked by the award of the Stanhope gold medal by the Royal Humane Society. It was given this year to William Mugford of Torquay, who was caught in a sewer where he was at work with three companions, when the sewer was flooded by a sudden thunderstorm, and he saved two of the men by holding them up by main strength for seven hours until relief came.

An Englishwoman, Miss Grace Chisholm, has just taken the degree of doctor of philosophy at the University of Göttingen, the first degree given to a woman since that institution became a state university. This is interpreted to mean a change of attitude by the Prussian minister of education, and be the omen of further concessions to woman's higher education. Hence it is causing a stir in German academic circles.

Exchange.

The death of Emily Faithfull, which occurred in London recently, closed the eventful and useful career of one who devoted her life to the elevation and improvement of the condition of her sex. That through her efforts the trade of type-setting was thrown open to women, and now furnishes employment to thousands both here and abroad, is but one of the noteworthy results of her active, energetic life. Emily Faithfull was an advocate of woman's rights, but pre-eminently she was a fighter for woman's equality with man in occupations and trades for which a woman is physically fitted.—Christian Work.

Spirit of the Press.

The Central Christian Advocate, referring to the new free circulating library for the blind in New York, says:—

This library will prove an inestimable blessing, as it will open up to them a new world of beauty and light. Its incorporation is one of the many hopeful signs of the times. After all, the world is not nearly as selfish as some people would have us believe. There can be no doubt that the number of those who recognize the claims of humanity upon their means and time, and who enter with enthusiasm upon the execution of plans which have been formed with the view of making life happier and better for others, is steadily increasing.

The Minneapolis Times thus speaks of the curfew ordinance which has been adopted in twenty Minneapolis towns:—

The measure both restrains and protects the young people of a community. It prevents the mischief and midnight marauding in which boys left to their own devices are prone to engage. It not only keeps them from doing, but from suffering harm. The streets are the schools of vice. It is here that young people meet dangerous associates, and receive their first lessons in the ways of Vanity Fair. The frequent accounts in the papers of the victimizing of innocence and the crimes committed by youthful culprits is commentary enough on the need of such an ordinance. Properly enforced, it will save many a mere child, not only from accidents and a hardening familiarity with evil, but often from crime itself. Such a measure is, moreover, an aid to home discipline in enforcing early hours. The warning bell at ten o'clock sends youthful stragglers where all young people should be at that hour. There can be no legitimate excuse for children being without the guarded walls of home when traitorous night threatens danger.

The Boston Sunday Herald has an editorial on Archbishop Ireland's address at the Notre Dame jubilee, in which it says:—

The archbishop does not underestimate the importance of the religious element in education. He regards the Christian school, by which, of course, he means the Catholic school, as the ideal institution. But he is also profoundly impressed with the folly of crying down the public school system of America, because it does not, and in the nature of things cannot, include religious instruction in its scope. Denunciation of the public schools as "godless," because they do not permit the inculcation of religious doctrine, finds no encouragement with him. Still less is he in sympathy with those rash ecclesiastics who would make open war upon the public school system by withdrawing the privileges of the Church from parents who send their children to them. He declared that he did not blame the State for failing to include religion in the programmes of its schools and colleges.

City and State recalls one halcyon day:—

We remember one Fourth of July which was indeed "glorious." It was a veritable oasis in a wide desert of noisy and distressing Fourths. Explosions of fire-crackers, firing of cannon and pistols, were not permitted in the streets. Everybody seemed to accept this innovation with a good grace, if not with thankfulness; and thousands of families spent the day rationally and happily in the park and surrounding country. On July 5th every one saw, with thankfulness, a greatly diminished list of accidents and fires, with awakening hope that the new order of things might continue. . . . But, if this reform is to be made, the mayor and his assistants must lead the way, and evidence of approval and support must be given by leaders of public opinion in the community. None can render better service in this matter than our leading physicians, many of whom, we well know, have been led by professional experience to hold the view which City and State now advocates.

Silver Eaters.

All ordinary soaps are "silver eaters," so to speak. It's said we make the best soap for washing silverware.

SILVER ELECTRO-SILICON SOAP

is an article of real merit. If you prefer a soap for cleaning silver it will please you. 15 cts.

By mail, post-paid, 20 cts.

It's absolutely harmless.

THE ELECTRO SILICON CO., 72 John St., New York.

WALTER BAKER & CO.
The Largest Manufacturers of
PURE, HIGH GRADE COCOAS and CHOCOLATES
On this Continent, have received
HIGHEST AWARDS
from the great
Industrial and Food EXPOSITIONS IN EUROPE AND AMERICA.

Caution: In view of the many imitations of the labels and wrappers on our goods, consumers should make sure that our place of manufacture, namely, Dorchester, Mass., is printed on each package.

SOLD BY GROCERS EVERYWHERE.
WALTER BAKER & CO., DORCHESTER, MASS.

Monthly Magazine. Tenth Year.

THE UNITARIAN.

No religious periodical in America has abler writers. Its matter is fresh, living, varied, abreast of the best thinking and scholarship of the age.
Contains Sermons from the ablest Liberal Preachers; Articles on religious topics of living interest; Editorials; Literary Notes; Notices of the best Liberal Books; News from the Churches; Woman's Word and Work, etc.

UNSOLICITED COMMENTS:

I take great pleasure in the Unitarian and recommend it right and left. There are few other magazines I read so much.—Massachusetts.
I take a good many papers and magazines, but no other periodical so full of spiritual nutrition as the Unitarian. It is splendid.—Nebraska.
I thought the first number of the publication, years ago, a good thing, and I may say that my first estimate rather increases than otherwise, right up to the current number.—Wisconsin.

CONTENTS FOR JUNE.

"The Flowers appear on the Earth." Rev. Charles G. Ames.
Just to lie Still! Maud L. Cotton.
A Philosopher's Mother: Johanna Schopenhauer. II. Ursula Tannenforst.
Italy of To-day. Marie C. Remick.
A Sermon in Rhyme.
Dr. Martineau's Ninetieth Birthday.
The American Unitarian Association. Martha Perry Lowe.
Western Unitarian Conference. Leon A. Harvey.
Religious Study by Clubs and Guilds. W. H. Fish.
Correspondence. E. L. Reynolds.
One Upward Look Each Day.
Editorial.

DEPARTMENTS:
American Unitarian Association, George Batchelor;
Sunday-schools, Edward A. Horton; National Alliance of Unitarian Women, Alice R. Jackson; Guilds; Temperance Work, C. R. Eliot; Literary Notes.

NEWS FROM THE FIELD.

* * Terms, $1.00 a year. Sample copies free. Will be sent three months on trial for 10 cents.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher, 141 Franklin St., Boston.

Register Tract Series.

No. 1. MY NEW NEIGHBOR. By Rev. W. H. Lyon. $1.00 per hundred.
No. 2. THE CONGREGATIONAL METHOD: How it is worked and how it ought to be worked. By Rev. Charles F. Dole. $1.50 per hundred.
No. 3. BEHOLD THE MAN. By Rev. W. P. Tilden. $1.00 per hundred.
No. 4. PRACTICAL CHRISTIANITY. By Rev. Charles A. Allen. $1.00 per hundred.
No. 5. AMERICAN UNITARIANISM: Its History and Development. By Rev. Edward Everett Hale. $1.50 per hundred.
No. 6. CHURCH ORGANIZATION. By Rev. William L. Lawrence. $1.00 per hundred.
No. 7. OF MAKING ONE'S SELF BEAUTIFUL. By Rev. William C. Gannett. $1.00 per hundred.
No. 8. THE JUDGMENT: The True Doctrine of the Judgment Individual and Universal. By Rev. William R. Alger. $1.50 per hundred.
No. 9. THE BREATH OF LIFE. By Rev. H. M. Simmons. $1.50 per hundred.
No. 10. WHAT DOES THE UNITARIANISM OF TO-DAY STAND FOR? By Rev. W. P. Tilden. $1.50 per hundred.
No. 11. LIBERAL CHRISTIANITY AS MOTIVE-POWER. By Rev. E. A. Horton. $1.00 per hundred.
No. 12. MORALITY IN THE SCHOOLS. By William T. Harris, LL.D. $1.00 per hundred.
No. 13. JOSEPH PRIESTLEY: The Old Unitarianism and the New. By Rev. C. C. Everett, D.D. $1.50 per hundred.
No. 14. WHAT O'CLOCK IS IT IN RELIGION? By Rev. M. J. Savage. $2.00 per hundred.
No. 15. A SOUL WITH FOUR WINDOWS OPEN. By Rev. James Leonard Corning. $1.00 per hundred.
No. 16. SCIENTIFIC THEOLOGY THE GROUND OF ALL RELIGION. By Francis E. Abbot, Ph.D. $1.00 per hundred.
No. 17. REFORMS ABOUT WHICH GOOD MEN MIGHT AGREE. By William M. Salter. $1.50 per hundred.
No. 18. HOW WE HELPED OUR MINISTER TO WRITE GOOD SERMONS. By Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D. 50 cents per hundred.
No. 19. FOUR SERMONS ON REVIVALS. By Rev. S. M. Crothers. $3.00 per hundred. Single copies, 6 cents.
No. 20. THEODORE PARKER'S LETTER TO A YOUNG MAN. 50 cents per hundred.
No. 21. THE THEOLOGY OF THE FUTURE. By Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D. 50 cents per hundred.
No. 22. THE RESTRICTION OF VIVISECTION. By Albert Leffingwell, M.D. 50 cents per hundred.
No. 23. A WORKING THEORY IN ETHICS. By Rev. J. H. Crooker. $1.50 per hundred.
No. 24. THE CHRISTIAN UNITARIAN POSITION, DOCTRINAL. By John Hamilton Thom. 60 cents per hundred.
No. 25. THE NEW BIRTH AND THE NEW TYPE OF MAN. By Rev. Charles F. Dole. $1.00 per hundred.
No. 26. THE RESURRECTION OF JESUS. By Rev. W. H. Furness. $1.00 per hundred.
No. 27. SHORT AND LONG VIEWS. By Rev. Charles F. Dole. $1.00 per hundred.

Sent post paid on receipt of price by
CHRISTIAN REGISTER ASSOCIATION.
141 Franklin Street, Boston.

SUMMER REST.

The "OLD MANSE," Amherst, N.H. Large, elegant rooms, luxurious bed and board. Pianos, library. Near post-office. Register and Transcript at hand. Circulars.

E. A. SAWTLE, Proprietor.

SERVICE.

Fret not that the day is gone,
And thy task is still undone,
'Twas not thine, it seems, at all:
Near to thee it chanced to fall,
Close enough to stir thy brain,
And to vex thy heart in vain.
Somewhere, in a nook forlorn,
Yesterday a babe was born:
He shall do thy waiting task;
All thy questions he shall ask,
And the answers will be given,
Whispered lightly out of heaven.
His shall be no stumbling feet,
Falling where they should be fleet;
He shall hold no broken clew;
Friends shall unto him be true;
Men shall love him; falsehood's aim
Shall not shatter his good name.
Day shall nerve his arm with light,
Slumber soothe him all the night;
Summer's peace and winter's storm
Help him all his will perform.
'Tis enough of joy for thee
His high service to foresee.

- E. R. Sill.

A REMINISCENCE.

The president's address at the late Western Unitarian Conference, as reported in your issue of May 23, referred to the first session of that conference held at Cincinnati, May 7, 1852. It recalled to one of your constant readers the meeting in that same "dear, old, smoky church" alluded to by the first historian of the conference, and also a few other items that may interest those who remember that meeting. The sermon was preached by Dr. Lothrop, from the text, "And, as we have borne the image of the earthy, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly." It was truly a spiritual sermon; and it would please Mr. Savage and many others, could they hear it even now.

I attended the conference with the Louisville delegation, which included, besides Rev. John H. Heywood and Mr. Conant, Mr. Charles Harlow, the first recording secretary of the Association. He had been for about eleven years an earnest worker in the church at Louisville, coming there from Portland, Me. I remember what pleasure good Mr. Heywood and he felt at the cordial spirit which pervaded that first meeting, and with what delight they both looked forward to a continuance of the good work the next year at St. Louis. But Mr. Harlow was not permitted to take part in that next meeting. Both he and Rev. Mr. Boyer of Indiana, another delegate, died in February of the following year. Mr. Harlow was a brother of Mr. William Harlow, whose death was lately noticed in your columns. Mr. Heywood said of his friend, Mr. Charles Harlow, "He was a man of strong and well-cultivated mind, of large and generous heart, of sunshine spirit, full of faith and hope, who not only professed to believe, but believed that all things would work together for good to those who love God,—one of the few men of whom the bosom companion may say, 'He never spoke a petulant or unkind word to me.'" E. G. H.

PRESENTS FOR BISMARCK.

Not the least interesting of the various facts connected with the recent celebration of Prince Bismarck's birthday were the birthday gifts. A correspondent of the London Saturday Review gives an enumeration, which will strike people alternately as absurd and as indicative of the affectionate regard of the people. Among them were cheeses varying in weight from a half-dozen ounces to two hundred pounds, a hundred and forty dozen of them of different sizes and sorts; sausages of all dimensions, one twenty-three yards long and proportionately thick that required a crate to itself, and one that came in a letter. There were over a dozen immense salmon, piles of paté-de-foie-gras, cases of apples, barrels of oysters, pots of honey, a tank of live carp, tarts, eggs, barrels of wine, cider, beer, liquor, and cognac, more than five thousand cigars, pipes of every shape and quality, and five thousand matches, not to speak of confectionery, and a medal of the Niederwald monument in macaroon biscuit. There were mantles, clocks, and rugs, hot-water bottles, helmets, slippers, and swords. Thirty authors sent copies of their complete works, while others sent selections. There were penholders and inkstands by the dozen, a supply of Bibles, and one old lady sent a funeral wreath she had intended for her own grave; photographs, too, by the score, and letters and telegrams by the thousands. It was calculated that, if the prince spent three minutes on a letter and worked at them ten hours a day, it would take about three years to read the correspondence.—Independent.

Temperance.

The fifth international congress against the abuse of alcoholic drink meets in Basle, Switzerland, August 20-22. Americans who are going abroad this summer and are interested in temperance, and desire to hear the best European opinion on the medical, industrial, and ethical aspects of the problem, would do well to plan to attend this congress.

This year's California legislature seems to have been devoted to reform. It has enacted an anti-cigarette law; raised the age of protection to eighteen years; prohibited saloons within two and one-half miles of any soldiers' home; defeated the uniform license bill; created sanitary districts, putting into the hands of residents therein the power to exclude saloons in San Francisco; prohibited the adulteration of drugs, foods, and drinks, including the watering of whiskey and other liquors, which gives an important leverage against the saloon; and voted to submit a woman suffrage amendment to the popular vote.

Though we cannot agree with our Roman Catholic contemporary, the Sacred Heart Review, in its theology, we can agree with it in its earnest advocacy of total abstinence: "Of all forms of evil, intemperance, if taken in time, is the easiest of prevention, but, having once secured a footing, the most difficult of cure. Total abstinence is the best rule of action. We urge the practice as an effectual safeguard to fathers, husbands, brothers, and sons, who are living in the midst of the temptations to which the conflict of life exposes them, and to mothers, wives, sisters, and daughters in their social circles and in their homes. It is a sad truth that possibly more than one-half of our army of drunkards begin to feel the mastery of the dreadful appetite through the drinking customs they have brought into their own homes. Above all else, keep the home pure."

Science.

Dr. J. West Roosevelt, a very high medical authority, demonstrates in the June Scribner that bicycle riding develops not only the muscles of the legs, but most of the important muscles of the body.

The perfume of flowers disappears as soon as the starch in the petals is exhausted; and it may be restored by placing the flower in a solution of sugar, when the formation of starch and the emission of fragrance will be at once resumed.

The use of aluminum is becoming common. In Austria-Hungary a short time ago the metal was introduced into the army. The band of the Third Regiment of Infantry (the Archduke Charles's regiment) have used it in the manufacture of drums, discarding the old-fashioned brass metal. The instruments have a neat appearance and are much lighter; and, according to experts, their timbre is more melodious. Perhaps in the near future the trombone and all other instruments now wholly made of brass will give way to aluminum.

Education.

There are two free kindergarten associations in Salt Lake City, under the direction of Miss Alice Chapin.

Two measures to enforce compulsory attendance of the public schools have been before the Pennsylvania legislature, and have aroused great interest and considerable opposition. One of these bills provides that children between eight and thirteen years of age shall receive at least sixteen weeks' schooling annually. But children who live two miles from a school, or are prevented from attending by "physical, mental, or other urgent reasons," are exempted from the law's requirements. Compulsory education is now recognized by the statutes of more than half of the States of the Union, but opinion in this State is at present divided.

The Ladies' Commission on Sunday-school Books, which has done such quiet, effective work for years, sends out its annual list of books recommended. Two hundred volumes, written for children, have been examined, and seventy-five of that number stamped with official approval. Looking over the list critically, one would like to suggest that, out of these seventy-five books which any child may read, might be compiled a much shorter list which every child ought to read. Thus would the commission do as good home service as it now does Sunday-school service, and there are certainly a few here which ought to be especially recommended. As an evidence of the care taken in this compilation, we notice the choice of the single one of Henty's last books which is really valuable.

Here and There.

Cicero was said to be the greatest book collector of antiquity. One of his letters is extant in which he urges Atticus, a learned friend who was compelled from poverty to sell his library at auction, not to dispose of the books at public sale, but to keep them until the writer is able to purchase them, Cicero adding that he is saving all his rents for that purpose.

They are building at Salem, Mass., a model of the "Arbella" in which Gov. Winthrop came over,—a finer boat, in the estimation of many persons, than the "Mayflower." Gov. Winthrop landed near where Manchester-by-the-Sea now stands, and the vessel will take part in the celebration of that event by the town. An old

Cape Ann sloop known as a "hooker" is to be remodelled for the purpose.

The shark, much as the sailors may hate it, furnishes several valuable products. An oil obtained from its liver vies in medicinal qualities with that obtained from the liver of the cod. Its skin, when dried, takes the hardness and polish of mother of pearl, and is used by jewellers for fancy objects, by binders for making shagreen, and by cabinet-makers for polishing wood; while the Chinese pickle its fins, and think them one of the greatest delicacies beneath the sun.

The ornithologist of the agricultural department at Washington has come to the defence of the crow, who is not so black as he is painted by the farmer. The charge against the crow that he eats nothing but corn is disproved by an examination of his stomach, which shows that he eats noxious insects and other animals; and, though 25 per cent. of his food is corn, it is mostly waste corn, picked up in the fall and winter. His chief sustenance consists of ants, beetles, caterpillars, bugs, flies, grubs, etc., which do damage to the farmer.—Boston Herald.

Bureau Washstand.

The wide demand for combination pieces of furniture suited to the needs of apartment houses, flats, suites, etc., has stimulated designers to produce some new models, which are marvels of convenience.

Here is one of the most popular of all combinations. It is intended for use in a bedroom not provided with running water, and it combines all the advantages of a bureau and washstand in one piece.

The entire top of the stand under the lid is of pink Tennessee marble, laid so as to be self-draining. Water from a large interior reservoir is drawn by the faucet, and there is the latest form of outlet and waste. The arrangements for ventilation are perfect.

The cabinet work of the washstand provides for a large closet, 3 shelves, 2 drawers, and a mirror, the latter supported on curved brackets.

The whole piece is vrgy inexpensive.

PAINE FURNITURE CO.,
48 CANAL STREET.

Spiritual Life.

Afterglow. By FREDERIC A. HINCKLEY. 81 pages. Cloth, 50 cents.

There are few who, reading it, will not be strongly attracted to this little book. It is written out of life,—out of the struggling, perplexing, troublous, hopeful, aspiring life we all know and dread and delight in. And grow in. And this is how the book is to help us.

CONTENTS: I. Voices out of the Silence; II. They had all Things Common; III. Spiritual Awakening; IV. "The Star! The Star!"

"Afterglow," like Gannett's "Wrestling and Blessing," is a book which one would like to keep in stock, to be given to the stricken, the troubled, the perplexed, the struggling, and the discouraged.—Christian Register.

A Year of Miracle: A Poem in Four Sermons. By Rev. WM. C. GANNETT. 106 pages. Cloth, limp, red edges, 50 cents. Fine edition, bevelled edges, full gilt, heavy paper, $1.00.

"A dainty little book, full of delicate fragrance. Love of nature is in it, and a longing to interpret that secret of nature's power over the soul which no man has yet understood. There is devotion in it, too, and neither clashes with the other."—Critic.

In Spirit and in Truth. Essays by Younger Ministers of the Unitarian Church. 163 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

CONTENTS: Introduction, by Rev. JAMES DE NORMANDIE; The Philosophy of Religion, by Rev. GEORGE CROSWELL CRESSEY; The Revelation of God in Nature, by Rev. L. D. COCHRANE; The Bible as Literature and as Revelation, by Rev. W. W. FENN; The Thought of God in the Bible, by Rev. FRANCIS B. HORN BROOKE; The Revelation of God in Man, by Rev. S. M. CROTHERS; The Christ, by Rev. ALBERT WALKLEY; The Use of a Liturgy in Worship, by Rev. JOHN TUNIS.

The Insight of Faith. Brief Selected Paragraphs from the Writings of Rev. HENRY W. FOOTE. 115 pages. Flexible cloth, 50 cents. Morocco, full gilt, $1.50.

"Rarely does one find a little volume so full of helpful and precious words. Devotional in spirit and uplifting in aim."—Christian Inquirer.

Ecce Spiritus. A Statement of the Spiritual Principle of Jesus as the Law of Life. 238 pages. Cloth, $1.25.

"Nothing more remarkable has appeared since 'Ecce Homo.' It is as ingenious and original as that famous book, and far more subtle, inward, and spiritual."—St. Louis Spectator.

Light on the Cloud; or, Hints of Comfort for Hours of Sorrow. By M. J. SAVAGE. 176 pages. Cloth, gilt edges, $1.25.

Wrestling and Waiting. Sermons by Rev. JOHN F. W. WARE. 340 pages. With portrait. Cloth, $1.50.

The Minister's Hand-book. For Christenings, Weddings, and Funerals. Arranged by M. J. SAVAGE. Cloth, 75 cents.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Topics of To-day.

Essays and Lectures on Important Themes.

1. HERBERT SPENCER: His life and personal characteristics; his views on education; his religious opinions. By DANIEL GREENLEAF THOMPSON.
2. CHARLES ROBERT DARWIN: His ancestry, life, and personal characteristics. By REV. JOHN W. CHADWICK.
3. SOLAR AND PLANETARY EVOLUTION: How suns and worlds come into being. By GARRETT P. SERVIS.
4. EVOLUTION OF THE EARTH: The story of geology; how the world grew. By DR. LEWIS G. JONES.
5. EVOLUTION OF VEGETAL LIFE: How does life begin? By WILLIAM POTTS.
6. EVOLUTION OF ANIMAL LIFE: The evidences from geology, geographical distribution, and comparative zoölogy. By ROSSITER W. RAYMOND, Ph.D.
7. THE DESCENT OF MAN: Man and the brute creation; his ancestral line; duration of human life on the planet. By E. D. COPE, Ph.D.
8. EVOLUTION OF MIND: The mind and the nervous system; the nature of mind. By ROBERT G. ECOLES, M.D.
9. EVOLUTION OF SOCIETY: Primitive man; growth of the family, city, and State; development of the domestic relations; is society an organism? By JAMES A. SKILTON, Esq.
10. EVOLUTION OF THEOLOGY: Origin of religious beliefs; ancestor-worship; nature-worship; the Absolute. By Z. SIDNEY SAMPSON.
11. EVOLUTION OF MORALS: How altruism grows out of egoism; the proper balance. By DR. LEWIS G. JONES.
12. PROOFS OF EVOLUTION: From geology, morphology, embryology, metamorphosis, rudimentary organs, geographical distribution, etc. By NELSON C. PARSHALL.
13. EVOLUTION AS RELATED TO RELIGIOUS THOUGHT: The Unknowable; design; miracle. By Rev. JOHN W. CHADWICK.
14. THE PHILOSOPHY OF EVOLUTION: Relation of the doctrine to prevailing philosophical systems. By STARR HOYT NICHOLS.
15. THE EFFECTS OF EVOLUTION ON THE COMING CIVILIZATION: Plans for social regeneration as tested by evolution. By REV. MINOT J. SAVAGE.
16. THE SCOPE AND PRINCIPLES OF THE EVOLUTION PHILOSOPHY: Agnosticism, materialism, idealism, practical problems. By DR. LEWIS G. JONES.
17. THE MORAL AND RELIGIOUS ASPECTS OF HERBERT SPENCER'S PHILOSOPHY: The relation of religion to morality. By SYLVAN DREY.

"Replete with facts and suggestions; not only interesting, but a substantial contribution to sociological literature."—Christian Register.

"The mode of presentation seems to me admirably adapted for popularizing Evolution views."—Herbert Spencer.

Pamphlets, 34 numbers, 16 to 32 pages each, some of them illustrated.

Ten Cents Each.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Pleasantries.

He: "Do you really think kissing is wicked?" The New Woman: "It is worse than wicked. It is insanitary."—Indianapolis Journal.

"Mr. Tompkins," said Willie Smith to his teacher the other day, "when the whale spouts, does he do it to bale himself out?"—Harper's Young People.

Chicagoan: "What is the most pleasing discovery you've made since your stay here?" New Yorker: "The fact that there are two hundred trains leaving daily."—Life.

"When are you coming out with me, Mummy?" "Not this morning, darling. I've too much to do!" "Oh, but you must, Mummy. I've already put it in my new diary that you did!"—Exchange.

"You see, my dear," said little Emma's governess, "the Antipodes live on the other side of the earth, and they only go to bed when we are getting up." "Then, Fräulein," answered little Emma, "I suppose my brother Fritz is an Antipode, eh?"—Youth's Companion.

A little Parisian, Gontran by name, was taken out to see a regiment marching past, with a band of music at its head. "Oh, it's fine!" he said, clapping his hands; "but what's the good of all those fellows who aren't playing any instrument?"—Youth's Companion.

Orthodox.—"I suppose," said the man from the effete East, "that you do not allow the preachers out your way to make any reference to the golden streets?" "You are just about as near right as the average gold-bug is," retorted the Denver man. "That is all we think the stuff is fit for,—to walk on."—Indianapolis Journal.

Recently the Egyptologist, Brugsch Bey, was transporting a mummy, believed to be a Pharaoh, to Cairo. As he took the royal relic in a passenger car, he was naturally obliged to take a first-class ticket. At Cairo a duty was demanded. He referred the officials to the register; but neither mummies nor Pharaohs were found on the dutiable list. "Well," said the official, "we will enter this as 'dried fish' duty, three piastres."

A doctor ordered "an egg, daintily cooked, offered at intervals during the day to tempt the appetite." On calling in next evening, however, he found his patient weak and languid, and asked what she had been eating. "Can't get her to eat a thing," declared the husband, "though I've done my best. I cooked that egg for Sadie this morning, and I've brought it to her every half-hour since, but she won't even touch it."—Boston Home Journal.

A certain Mine. Cresswell died in Bridewell, and bequeathed ten pounds to have a sermon preached in which nothing but what was well of her should be said. The sermon is said to have been written by the Duke of Buckingham, and was as follows: "All I shall say of her is this: She was born well, married well, lived well, and died well. For she was born at Shadwell, married to Cresswell, she lived at Clerkenwell, and died at Bridewell."—Til-Bits.

Many are the good stories told of Mr. Corney Grain. He was a man of courtly dignity, and no one knew better than he how to resent an impertinence, whether directed against himself personally or against the profession to which he belonged. He was engaged on one occasion to entertain a large party of guests at a country house. He travelled down from town in the afternoon, as directed, by a train which landed him at his destination just as the guests were assembling for dinner. Instead of being received in the drawing-room, however, Mr. Grain was conducted to the butler's private room; and there, while the house party were dining upstairs, his dinner was served. Mr. Grain said nothing; but, as soon as he had fortified himself against his return journey, he called all the servants who happened to be at liberty into the butler's room, apologized to them for the absence of a piano, and, doing the best he could without one, proceeded to entertain the amazed but delighted domestics with quips and jests and songs selected at random. He never, perhaps, had a more appreciative audience. Then he called for his fly. As he was preparing to get into it, a pompous flunkey came down to the butler's room with the message that "dinner was hover, and would Mr. Grain now come up to the drawing-room and give his entertainment?" To which Mr. Grain replied: "Give your master my compliments, and tell him that, as I was sent to the servants' hall, I naturally concluded that it was the servants I was engaged to entertain. I have given my entertainment, and am going back to town by the next train." He did it, too. And the story was told all over the country. Exchange.

Highest of all in Leavening Power.—Latest U. S. Gov't Report

Royal Baking Powder

ABSOLUTELY PURE

THE JACKSON SANATORIUM

DANVILLE, New York
Established in 1858.
A delightful home for health and rest seekers. Personal care of experienced physicians. Main building fire-proof. For illustrated pamphlet address J. ARTHUR JACKSON, Sec., P.O. Box 1873.

Ladies Travelling Alone to Boston

HOTEL BELLEVUE

A quiet hotel, with a café of rare excellence. Located on Beacon Hill, near the State House, and convenient to all the large stores and places of amusement. Adjoining American Unitarian Association Building, BEACON STREET, BOSTON, EUROPEAN PLAN, J. W. SMITH, Proprietor.

FULL OF SNAP

Sparkle and vim.
Full of good health.
Full of everything good.

HIRES' Rootbeer

Every bottle of this great effervescent temperance beverage is a sparkling, bubbling fountain of health—a source of pleasure, the means of making you feel better and do better. You make it yourself right at home. Get the genuine.

5 gallons cost but 25 cents.
THE CHAS. E. HIRES CO., Philadelphia.

This Elegant 'New Rochester' Nickel or Gilt Sewing Lamp

without glassware will be sent express paid to any address for $120

Chimney and Shade sold everywhere, or we can supply you.

We make 70 other styles of the famous 'New Rochester,' now greatly improved.)

The desideratum for a Summer Lamp; sufficient light with one-quarter the heat of larger sizes.

Bridgeport Brass Co. Bridgeport, Conn. 19 Murray St., N.Y.

MILLER'S REFORM BOOTS AND SHOES.

For Women and Men.

Will annihilate corns, bunions, and all troubles of the feet.

Warranted Hand-made. Need no breaking in, and recommended by our best physicians. Send for pamphlet for ordering by mail. Edmund W. Miller, 8 R Beacon St., Boston.

Sold from stock or made to order.

BELLS and CHIMES

Foundry established in 1790 by PAUL REVERE.
of Copper and Tin.
BLAKE BELL CO., Boston, Mass.

In connection with our wholesale business, we are accustomed to sell

CHURCH CARPETS

at manufacturers' prices.

John H. Pray, Sons & Co., Wholesale and Retail CARPETS and UPHOLSTERY, 658 Washington St. (opp. Boylston), Boston. Correspondence Solicited.

The EDDY REFRIGERATOR

Has been before the public for nearly fifty years, and is still acknowledged everywhere to be

ABSOLUTELY THE BEST.

Slate Shelves, cold dry air, and built to last a lifetime. ASK YOUR DEALER FOR THEM.

MANUFACTURED BY D. Eddy & Sons, 336 Adams St., Dorchester District, Boston, Mass.

NEW ENGLAND MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY.

POST-OFFICE SQUARE, BOSTON, MASS.

ASSETS, Dec. 31, 1894.....	$24,252,828.71
LIABILITIES.....	22,217,399.94
	$2,035,428.77

BENJ. F. STEVENS, President.
ALFRED D. FOSTER, Vice-Pres.
S. F. TRULL, Secretary.
WM. E. TURNER, Asst. Sec'y.

LIFE RATE ENDOWMENT policies are issued at the old life rate premium.—Annual Cash distributions are paid upon all policies.—Every policy has insured thereon the cash surrender and paid-up insurance values to which the insured is entitled by the Massachusetts Statute.—Pamphlets, rates, and values for any age sent on application to the Company's Office.

WESTERN MORTGAGES

DEFAULTED AND OTHERWISE, Bought for Cash.

CHAS. E. GIBSON, 45 Milk St. Boston, Mass.

BROWN BROTHERS & CO.

50 State Street, Boston.

Travellers' Letters of Credit.

Sterling, French and German Exchange.

JOSEPH GILLOTT'S STEEL PENS.

GOLD MEDAL, PARIS EXPOSITION, 1889, AND THE CHICAGO EXPOSITION AWARD.

THE MOST PERFECT OF PENS.

EUROPEAN PARTY

now being formed to visit Europe during summer months. Address HENRY N. DE NORMANDIE, 211 Chamber of Commerce, Boston, Mass., or JOHN H. ROTH, Peoria, Ill.

Situation Wanted

By a young man 18 years old (graduate of Bryant & Stratton's) in some business where faithfulness and application will count for future advancement. Address H. A. E., Office Christian Register.

TO LET.

The desirable house, 118 Highland Street, Roxbury; 11,000 feet of land; beautiful location; Norfolk House cars now run near. Two furnished cottages, West Falmouth. S. G. DAVIS, 113 Devonshire Street.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Printer,

141 FRANKLIN ST. BOSTON.

CHANNING BUILDING.

WITH extensive, light, and commodious rooms, large and fast Presses, embracing all the latest improvements, Type-setting Machines, new and modern material throughout, the Establishment ranks with the best in the City for the execution of Letterpress or Plate Printing.

- BOOKS
 - PAMPHLETS
 - NEWSPAPERS
 - MAGAZINES
 - SERMONS
 - CATALOGUES
 - REPORTS
 - LAW WORK
- AND EVERY VARIETY OF

Mercantile and Job Printing.

Excellence in Workmanship. Promptness in Delivery.

The Pamphlet Bindery, included in the office, is furnished with every facility for rapid and good work.

The Christian Register

Liberty, Holiness, Love.

VOLUME LXXIV.

BOSTON, THURSDAY, JUNE 27, 1895.

NUMBER 26.

The Christian Register.

TERMS: $3.00 per year. Single copies, 6 cents.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY THE
CHRISTIAN REGISTER ASSOCIATION,
141 Franklin Street, Boston, Mass.

Entered as second-class mail matter.

Contents.

EDITORIAL.	PAGE
Notes; New Faces on Old Truths,	401
Love and Work; Such as I have give I thee; The Plymouth Summer School,	402
MUSINGS,	403
BREVITIES,	403
PRO AND CON.
A Suggestion; Municipal Beauty; Others, as we see them,	403
ORIGINAL AND SELECTED.
Jaunting in Spain, IL, by Lydia J. Sanderson; In English Lakeland, IL,	404
Will it come True? by Juniata Stafford; London Letter,	405
Mt Meigs School, by Georgia Washington,	406
The Resurrection of Jesus, by Dr. Heber New- ton; On the Death of Jesus,	409
The Disappearance of Birds, by Isabel C. Bar- rows,	414
RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE,	406
THE PULPIT.
Edmund B. Willson, by Rev. Geo. T. Latimer,	408
SPIRITUAL LIFE,	409
LITERATURE.
History of the United States; Other Book No- tices,	410
Magazines; Miscellaneous; Literary Notes; Books Received,	411
THE HOME.
Nannie's Little Minute, by Mabel Gifford; Rosie's Noses,	412
A Lincoln Story; Grandpa's Pigs; Occupations of a Hindu Woman; Willie's Scheme,	413
POETRY.
Known and Unknown, by F. L. Pugsley,	404
Sonnet, by Rev. James C. Hodgins,	408
Browne's Appeal,	412
In the Mill, by Anna J. Grannis,	413
Dr. Martineau at Ninety,	415
PERSONALS,	414
THE SUNDAY-SCHOOL,	415
SPIRIT OF THE PRESS,	415
CHARITIES AND REFORMS,	415
HERE AND THERE,	415
PLEASANTRIES,	416

Editorial.

AN evidence of the growth of liberality, even if slow, will be found in the fact that the Notre Dame University in Indiana has conferred the degree of LL.D. upon Rev. Washington Gladden. The recipient is well deserving of the honor, and it is said it was the first degree of the kind ever given by this university to a non-Catholic. Dr. Gladden is well known for his learning and ability, and he carries into his discussions great fairness and breadth of view.

THE reports of the great naval pageant at the formal opening of the canal which connects the Baltic and the North Seas have filled the press during the past week. This event will form an epoch in the commercial history of Europe. Though evidently designed, in part, as a military measure, and to be used to strengthen the German power, it is also a great pacificator. Everything which increases the trade between nations helps bind them together by the ties of interest, and the German emperor declared the truth when he said that the canal was a great work of peace. "There are," he added, "seas that divide and seas that unite. This canal unites two great seas for commercial and defensive purposes. If, as is anticipated, this canal proves to be a great international highway, it will tend to make war more destructive of industrial interests, and therefore more to be dreaded."

THE Springfield Republican, from which we learned of the refusal, as stated last week, to ordain Mr. Solley at Hampden, now informs us that there was a scent of heresy in the candidate, after all. He was not regarded as sound in theology, and was rejected on that account, although the council thought it best to announce that he was rejected for a lack of preparation. "Some of the delegates protested vigorously against assigning one reason for rejecting the candidate when it was done for another cause, and attacked the position taken by the majority in sustaining creeds no longer held by the Church." Is it not time that members of religious bodies learned to be frank and straightforward in their dealings both with each other and the truth?

HAS the Church lost its hold upon the people of New York? To answer this question, the Times had prepared a full table of statistics showing the annual amount spent for the maintenance of church services and for theatrical and other amusements. The result is that the Church of New York City expends annually five million and a half dollars, while six million and a half are paid for amusements. But in the estimate of the latter we must keep in mind that a considerable sum comes from strangers who visit the city. In addition to the above the churches expend a large sum for charitable and missionary objects. On the principle that the heart follows the treasure, it would seem that the power of the Church over the pocket is as great as concert and theatre, and hence is not losing its hold on the people.

THE results of the Salvation Army's agricultural colonies are of interest to all who are studying economics. In a recent report by Mr. Bramwell Booth before the committee of the House of Commons we learn that the English Agricultural Colony for the first year did not pay its expenses, but that the loss was less in the two succeeding years. On the last year there was a profit made of about one thousand dollars, in addition to about two thousand dollars on market gardening. The industrial section, however, was worked at a loss, especially the brick-making. The total loss on the English Colony for four years was about fifty thousand dollars. Though this experiment may have marked moral results, as a pure business enterprise it is not an encouraging financial success.

IF the president of the Police Board carries out his intention to have men arrested for "disorderly conduct," and treated with the same severity that has heretofore been shown to women for the same offence, we are on the eve of a new epoch in morality. The discrimination in applying the laws only to women, though acknowledged, has none the less been an outrage and a cruel injustice. Commissioner Roosevelt, we are told, asserts that he intends to make a strict and impartial application of the law, so that no longer shall it be a merely theoretical ornament. The New York Times, in mentioning the above fact, adds, "It is more than a little humiliating that a declaration which no man in his place should have failed to make is, in sober truth, the most remarkable and the most likely to be remarked combination of words he could possibly have put together." We are specially interested in this case, because it brings distinctly before the community the principle that we are to have both for men and women the same law and morality.

THE Manitoba government has refused to obey the order of the governor-general of Canada to restore the Roman Catholic parochial schools. This action creates a sharp issue between the parties. The New York Evening Post, in a recent despatch from Montreal, says the idea prevails that the head of the Roman Catholic Church encourages the ecclesiastical party to maintain the claim for separate schools. Its members are urged, without loss of time, to maintain their position and principles. The Canadian bishops are praised by the authorities at Rome for their constancy and zeal in favor of the religious education of the Catholics in Manitoba. If the legislature holds to its refusal, it will not be easy for the Dominion government to force it to submit. Attempts will be made to bring about a compromise, but, in the present temper of both parties, with little promise of success. It is said that measures will be proposed by the politicians by which the issue may be postponed. But this is only a makeshift; and the friends of free schools, who wish a separation of Church and State in Manitoba, are firm in their present position, and hope in the end for a decisive victory.

DR. DAVIDSON, who is well known to the readers of the Register through his valuable contributions to our columns, has proved himself to be a prophet as well as a critic. Many years ago he was driven out of his professorship for what was then regarded dangerous and false teaching about the Bible, yet many of the leading members of the same denomination now believe and teach even more advanced views. When he was cast out, his friends wrote him letters of sympathy, to which he replied, as quoted in the Christian World, "At some future day, perhaps, when the chapter of ecclesiastical intolerance comes to be written, men will wonder at the fume and fury directed against one whose sentiments were wanting in nothing except a more liberal, a more just criticism." He has lived to see his prophecy become a fact. We have in this an evidence of his foresight and the rapid advance which has been made in Biblical studies. Many American friends of Dr. Davidson will be glad to know that a volume of his letters will soon be printed if it has not already appeared. As his correspondence covers a long period and deals with various important questions, this book will have both interest and value.

MRS. BESANT'S reply to Mr. Gladstone in the Nineteenth Century for June makes a favorable impression on the candid reader, whether he agrees or not with her opinions. It is dignified in tone; and in the discussion she gets the better of the "Grand Old Man," both in her spirit and ability. But the chief point of interest is the statement of what she regards as the true idea of the atonement. She starts with the universal fact that in life all growth and progress depend on continual sacrifice and the endurance of pain. In individuals this is truly a vicarious act; and, when it becomes voluntary and self-chosen, and the man gives himself for men, his own suffering purchases for others some lofty good. This vicarious sacrifice is the fount whence flows the spiritual energy which in manifold forms and ways redeems the world from evil and draws it home to God. This vicarious atonement is not merely an historical event, but a universal law. It is not a propitiatory offering, but a uniting man to God. The soul's life in its evolution, coming into contact with the animal side of man, gives rise to a constant conflict. "Its continuous memory is the voice of conscience striving to rule the lower nature. The reflection of its agony is the remorse that rends us when we have fallen. Its hope is the lofty ideal which in silent moments shines out before our eyes. This is the Christ that is being formed in every man, for the forming of which the Christ-souls travail." It is this root idea of self-sacrifice which forms the real basis of the atonement. Beneath all false accretions of theology it has given a wide-spread power to the cross as a symbol, inspired an intense devotion, and stimulated the noblest deeds of moral heroism.

WE have an instance of the prejudice against color in a recent case in Rhode Island. Ida A. Morgan, a colored girl reported as highly accomplished, a graduate of the public school of East Providence, of the State Normal School, and of the Emerson College in Boston, was recommended to the committee for the position of instructor in one of the town schools. She was strongly indorsed by the Wide-awake Republican Club of East Providence, and it was admitted by the members of the committee that she was fully competent in every way for the position. After wrestling with the case, they decided they could not appoint her, because it would be against the prevailing sentiment of the community. This was a clear case of colorphobia. We ought to throw the calcium light of our criticism on Rhode Island before we deal with the South. There is much less excuse for an act of this kind in the land of Roger Williams than in the old slave States. At any rate, before we condemn the latter, the North should heed the injunction: "And why beholdest thou the mote in thy brother's eye, but considerest not the beam that is in thine own eye? Or how wilt thou say to thy brother, Let me pull out the mote out of thine eye; and, behold, a beam is in thine own eye? Thou hypocrite, first cast out the beam out of thine own eye, and then shalt thou see clearly to cast out the mote out of thy brother's eye."

NEW FACES ON OLD TRUTHS.

Absence and separation have more than one kind of significance. More than mere change of place, the gratification of curiosity, movement, and adventure, is the new view we get of our old accustomed life, our duties, our relations, the place we fill in the world, the needs and demands of the soul. Thus travel puts a new face on familiar things. We may find everything in the home surroundings, on our return, meaner and smaller and more commonplace than we had supposed; but even this perception is stimulating. It shows us how to improve familiar places, how to apply the new suggestions and ideas we have gathered, how to use advantages that have long lain fallow, and to bring in beauty and order and method.

It is sometimes well for us to vacate our mental home for a while,—to try to get out of our prejudices and prepossessions, that a new face may be put on the familiar abode by excursions in the realm of new ideas and fresh conceptions. These side-lights and larger views are especially a token of our age. The world moves now on the principle that anything thought to be settled and established on immutable foundations is just ripe for investigation. We have been born into a time so prone to inquire, and dig about, and test, that even the command not to lay the hand on the ark of God is regarded as man-made, and not proceeding from the infinite power.

The spirit of inquiry, pursued sometimes in a destructive, unsanctified spirit, but oftener in the spirit of reverence and an intense desire to know the truth, is putting a new face on many an old dogma and received fact, and bringing out unexpected depths of meaning. The discoveries made by investigators in the old accepted things of faith and belief is the typical sign and seal of our age. To get at reality, to know the ultimate fact about the past, to unearth origins, to see how far they agree with accepted standards, to go in quest of satisfying knowledge even in the very holy of holies, taking nothing on hearsay, caring little for tradition, believing in no lie because it is an old and revered lie,—this is the spirit of our time. Here we find a hungering and thirsting after reality such as was never before known in the world. The people yearn for fresh spiritual truth. Even those for whom the old foundations have become clogged and brackish yearn for the living water.

Boldly as assaults have been made on old creeds and established beliefs, still we see the buttresses of a living faith emerge from the din and smoke. The great verities remain of a living God, the imperishable spiritual nature of man, ever more and more imperious in its demands to be fed with the bread of life. The critical, inquiring spirit of the time probes and works and worms its way into all received opinions, all established dogmas, all so-called historic truths. Its search is for great, immutable laws, for sequences underlying apparent confusion, for continuity where there appear to be impassable gaps and intervals and unrelated parts. This searching spirit cannot be stifled. It draws its force from the divine stream of inspiration that flows down from God upon his universe. It is spiritual light and fresh air. Its work is regeneration. By rubbing old tokens and medals of faith struck ages ago, it reveals new and unexpected beauties and astonishing secrets of progress in the growth of the human spirit.

We thus perceive that there is nothing to fear in the most crucial and searching inquiry. The great discussion going on about the Bible is revealing the Bible in a new and unexpected light. The Bible is again becoming an interesting book to thousands who had ceased to read it save in the sense of fetish worship or from a barren idea of duty. We see now a heart beating under its most dusty and unintelligible pages. Oriental scholars, archaeologists, philologists, explorers, have been at work now for more than a quarter of a century to put a new face on its ancient pages, to show us the religious, social, political conditions under which it was composed. The heart of the prophets is revealed. They were men after all, and not wizards and fanatics,—men of intense convictions and profound insight. The age of Israel lives and breathes for us again. We see the struggles, the backslidings, the sinning, suffering, and rejoicing of a little people, surrounded by the great black world of Paganism, and striving to hold up their spiritual light in the midst of unspeakable difficulties and dangers. Their tragic story thrills, lives, palpitates, again for us. This rehabilitation of Israel is one of the most precious gifts of our age. The world at large has not yet entered into the noble heritage. But gradually the people will perceive the new face put upon the grand old book, and its wondrous meanings and lessons will gain a living power. It will not then be read in detached texts and torn fragments, but as a whole, an orderly history of the growth of the spirit of righteousness in a whole people.

So it is with Jesus, who under the reverent hands of authentic thinkers and investigators comes out ever more and more beautiful and sufficing in the nobility and purity of his spiritual teaching, the incisive, searching power of his analysis of human motive. His influence is broadening every day. The men who have naught to show that he had a past created by ideals existing before he came, rooted in the genius of his people, have not diminished his power and influence, have only revealed him as the culmination, the divine one toward whom the tides of humanity had long set. As the crown of man, the realization of hopes and longings alive for ages in the race, he looks nobler and larger than any miraculous virgin birth, any fact outside the gentle progress of growth and development, could make him look. That he, the crowning one, comes under God's order and law, is a possibility of man's nature, and not a portent, is the most glorious fact possessed by the race, the most helpful, the most encouraging, the greatest result of time.

The very discussion of the validity of belief in his bodily resurrection is clearing away misconception and bewilderment. The world is stepping on toward the fact that his spiritual power is based on the truths he taught, the life he lived, and not on miracle of the lesser or greater order; for what would the bodily resurrection be to us, had he not given us a new law of love and self-sacrifice, a new code of morals, of human duty and obedience?

LOVE AND WORK.

The dearest possession of man in this eager, busy world is love. That is the best thing in life,—the compensation for unrewarded toil, the solace of unsatisfied longings and baffled desires. With love in the heart, spiritual verities assert themselves; for the heart must beat in true time to the harmony of its heavenly visitor. Given the certainty of an inner companionship that transcends the limitations of this restricted world, life becomes splendidly worth the living, sacrifice is no longer sacrifice, values change, and the thing that would once have appeared most difficult becomes the inspiration for nobler action. Given that boundless sympathy with all who suffer or aspire, which seems to animate the saintliest natures, our common days would take on a wonderful new significance, and appear to us all as opportunities, not as finalities.

But, next to love, work is the divinest gift of God to man. It seems sometimes as if no life could be a permanently happy, healthy one into which there had not at some time entered the necessity for hard, taxing work of one kind or another. There is a stern joy in throwing one's self into something difficult, in forcing the reluctant will to face the drudgery of uneventful days with their round of petty duties, not one of which seems important in itself, but the sum of which yields us discipline, that secret of reserve force in character. As we grow older, most of us accept the truth that the thing in life we really care most about, so far as our single individual selves are concerned, is growth,—an increasing range of experience and sympathy. We are never satisfied with ourselves until we have ceased to grow; but, when we cease to grow, it means stagnation. Confessed or not, we still keep, through successive disappointments, the persistent craving for more life and more knowledge and wider service. We may long for something, happiness perhaps; and yet we will not buy even that at the cost of that growth, the impulse toward which has come to be second nature, a thing not to be reasoned about, but to be accepted. So we come to know that stronger than the desire to have what we long for is the desire to be and to do that which most truly justifies our lifelong quest; and all experience, either of joy or of sorrow or of work, is of value to us personally only as it helps to shape us into something finer and nobler than we have been.

If this is what a man really cares most for,—and in his inner heart it surely is,—then he must stand in close, first-hand relations with the work of the world. There is no other way. He must do the hard thing himself, not let others do it for him. He must be willing to have his nerves tortured, his heart pierced, his days spent, and his love wasted. He must forget himself, and he must live for his work's sake. He may sweeten it, and he ought, with the thought of others whose very name is fresh inspiration; but he must remember what George Eliot said, "It is not true that love makes all things easy: it makes us choose what is difficult."

The men and women who work are not the ones whose vanes are always pointing east. They do not have to be comfortable before they can be joyous. To exult in the consciousness of kinship with the active, on-reaching forces of nature, to fling one's self into work with an enthusiasm that yet foresees all the inevitable jar and fret of detail, all the weariness of body and spirit that must be endured before the work is finished, all the friction and misunderstanding that may seem to mar it—to be able to say to one's self, "I am brother to the mechanic at his forge and to the farmer at his plough, to the girl who spins all day at her loom in the hot, dusty factory and to her who bends over her sewing, dragging her needle in and out, I know as they do the strain and the ache and the weariness, and, God helping me, I will do something to put into their lives, too, a glimpse of the reward,"—to have felt all this goes deeper and means more than all enjoyment, and makes personal happiness seem a poor, cheap thing in comparison.

Believing this, how pitiful, how perplexing, is the case of the poor souls, in whatever part of the city they may live, who miss their proper work! How sad the chance of those who seek and seek, finding no place for which they are fitted, no work for which they are trained, no corner where the effort of their hands or of their brains is needed! Our cities are full of them. What shall we do with those who desire only the work which seems most agreeable, and who scorn whatever might seem to set them a little lower in the social scale? What shall we do with those who have had no chance for training, no early friend to set their feet in the right path? What shall we do with those who, with the best will in the world, seem destined to be the feather in every wind that blows, missing apparently by the misfortune of their very natures that power of concentration which means success? What shall we do with those who do not care whether they work or not, and who see in the years only so many rounds of days to be spent as pleasantly as possible?

This is the real problem of our day,—how to redeem the work of our humblest toilers from the over-strain of too intense competition and the spur of daily necessity for mere bread, and then how to put into it the uplift and the outlook which come from wider vision of the eternal compensations. We do not want to take away from man the necessity for work, not even the necessity for hard work; for only thus can the sinews of the spirit be strengthened. Not hard work, but hopeless work, demoralizes. This problem has touched many souls. Many are attempting its solution here and there, but it needs helpers on every hand.

It is love and work together that must save the world. We need love to inspire, to teach us to appreciate. We need the desire to do real work in the world if our little lives are to be of any real consequence or value. Love without work may weaken, become sentimental, until we forget that "fine feelings are worth anything only when they serve as the motive power for fine deeds." Work without love may become narrowing, cramping. Mrs. Browning has said it for us,—

"Beloved, let us love so well,
Our work shall still be better for our love,
And still our love be sweeter for our work,
And each commended for the sake of each
By all true lovers and true workers born."

SUCH AS I HAVE GIVE I THEE.

This is said to be an age of transition. It is true that on every hand changes are going on. One finds it not only in modes of doing business and in educational methods, but perhaps even more marked in religious thought. It is almost the exception to find an educated and thoughtful person who accepts in their entirety the religious beliefs and practices which he has inherited from his parents. Many of these changes come from simply sloughing off the old belief, leaving the soul naked of faith. Sometimes they come as the result of religious excitement, now and then as a consequence of weariness. The struggle has been too hard, and the restless thinker drops into the first resting-place where peace seems to come from the giving up of the fight. But those who have escaped the restrictions of the old, and found joy and strength in a genuine acceptance of the new, are agreed that this joy is most permanent when it comes by the highway of intelligence. Every ray of light that can be thrown on the path of those groping in darkness is a help to the wanderer; and no help is better than the printed word which may be read in quiet and meditated upon at leisure. It is the experience of such converts that liberal books and papers are of the chiefest value to those in the restless, uncertain stage between the old, outgrown religious belief and the brighter, more helpful new.

Among the publications thus affording comfort, instruction, and cheer the Christian Register has been recognized by many a grateful soul. Such persons not only say so, but they show their faith by their works, and pass the paper on to others struggling for light who may find inspiration in its pages. Or they look about for friends who might derive pleasure from reading it whose purses will not allow the expenditure of three dollars a year for that pleasure. Probably few papers go to so many families after the original subscribers have read them.

Taking advantage of this disposition on the part of generous readers, a few weeks ago we printed a note to the effect that names of persons who could not afford the Christian Register would be sent to any one who was willing to pass it on after reading. It was hoped in this way to be able to reach some who, for the reasons stated, would be glad of a second-hand copy.

The response was prompt and hearty. Indeed, for a while it seemed as though more papers would be offered than appreciative readers could be found, though names of people in various parts of this country and other countries were furnished. It was decided that here was a means by which new societies might be aided. Cards were sent out to one or two ministers, saying that, if the names of families who were studying the problems of the liberal faith with a view to joining such newly organized societies were sent to "E. E. M.," these second-hand copies of the Christian Register would be mailed to them for a year; if at the end of the time they were willing and able to subscribe for themselves, the gratuitous copy would be transferred to some one else. In this way a church constituency would be built up of people who would have an intelligent conception of what a Unitarian church stands for.

Not the least interesting part of this experiment has been the appreciative and kind words of the men and women—mostly women—who have hastened to offer their papers. One writes:—

"Please send me the name of some one who will not object to the Register's being a little old, as I get it myself second hand. But, to my mind, it is always good and full of meat; and I try to find some one to give it to. I never can bring myself to tear one up."

Another says: "Please send me the name of some one to whom to send the Christian Register after reading it. I ought to say that I get it third hand, but in good condition, and will send it on equally well kept. The person to whom I formerly sent it has become a subscriber."

Many are written in the same tone,—a tone which is as helpful to the editor of the paper, and to all who contribute to it, as to those who are trying to preach a better way to the people. The writers may not give of their gold and their silver, but they may with truth repeat the words of Peter: "Such as I have give I thee."

THE PLYMOUTH SUMMER SCHOOL.

In country places in the north it is customary to have school keep all summer, because in winter the children cannot go through the deep snows. But south of these cold regions July and August are hailed as vacation time. Perhaps it would be better to say used to be so hailed, for the number of summer schools of all kinds is growing large. If one is tempted to attend such a summer seminary, the flesh, which is proverbially weak, may be forgiven for selecting one where sea-bathing, sailing, and beautiful drives may be had. But, if frail human nature is ready to yield to the natural charms offered at Plymouth, Mass., by the School of Applied Ethics, a little further investigation will show that the more substantial attractions are far more alluring. The sessions begin July 7 and continue five weeks, during which time over eighty lectures and conferences will be given. The four departments are "Economics," "Ethics," "Education," and the "History of Religions." Among those who will take part in the last are Rev. S. M. Crothers, Prof. G. T. Ladd, the editors of the Friends' Review, the Examiner, the Congregationalist, and many other well-known men. The reading of the carefully prepared programme makes one willing to forego mountain and forest for the sake of attending some of these courses beside the open sea.

Musings.

THE traveller on the continent sees many a roadside shrine, and the devout worshipper crosses himself as he passes by the figure of Jesus or Mary. The other day, driving through the English lake district, where the worshipper of nature may offer the incense of admiration, I thought I saw a roadside shrine. It was not a cross: it looked more like an altar or a memorial stone, though it was not of stone, but of painted iron. Sober, decorous, and quiet in its appearance, I wondered what form of reverence—patriotic, religious, personal, or historic—it was meant to command, when a nearer approach showed that it was a little temple of Mammon, appealing not to the sweet-hearted, but to the sweet-toothed. You might stand in front of it and cross yourself all day, and make any number of genuflections, you might light candles, and offer prayers; but the goddess would be stern and immovable, and no response would come from her oracle. If, however, you took a copper penny from your pocket, with the image of Victoria upon it, and dropped it in the slot, and then, following the rubric lettered on the altar, you went through a certain mechanical ritual, you would find in the drawer you pulled below a penny's worth of chocolate, or some other candy, of which a great variety was offered to the worshipper, including "Pearls of India" and "Melting Snow." Utility as well as sweetness are combined in some of these outfits. Threaded needles,—exceedingly useful to a bachelor in distress,—various buttons, matches, "Cherry Blossom Toilet Powder," sleeve-buttons, and things neither sweet nor useful nor beautiful, such as ear-rings and "surprise packages," are among the possibilities of the penny-in-the-slot machine. Ruskin and Wordsworth and a society in the lake district have protested against the introduction of railroads into this delightful park; but they have not succeeded in keeping out an automatic candy and thread-and-needle store at certain turns in the road. It is an unobtrusive form of advertising and of trade, very different from the flaming advertisements which are sometimes used to deface natural scenery; and one of our quartette, Mizippi, has such a mania for patronizing these places of refreshment that I suspect the lake district would lose much of its charm if they were not here. My only fear is that she will exhaust her letter of credit, and be obliged to go home earlier than she should.

THE grave responsibility of reporting the English Unitarian anniversary meetings, happily, does not rest on me, but upon the regular London correspondent of the Christian Register, who will, if he has not already done so, discharge that duty with his usual fidelity and felicity. I shall not, therefore, attempt to describe what I saw or heard; but I may say how I felt. For one thing, I felt very much at home; and Rev. W. H. Lyon, my colleague, felt the same. With such a cordial English welcome, how could we feel otherwise? The official greeting was as warm and genuine as it could be; and the personal, individual, and unofficial greeting was as radiant as beaming countenances and gracious words could make it. The courtesy of our English brethren does not spend itself in superficial etiquette and a polished veneer of conventionality. It is genuine goodness and kindness all the way down. Though I would not undervalue that code of politeness which is a ritual of good manners, I value most of all the deep sources of kindness and fellow-feeling. There is a stucco finish which looks well to the eye; but I like better the oak and the marble, in which the polish really comes out of the material. This English oak is sound to the heart.

OUR English brethren have two features in their anniversary programme which are different from our own. One is the Thursday night reception, the other is the Sunday-school breakfast. The former is held at Princes Hall at the time of the annual water-color exhibition. There is no speech-making and no dinner, but a free circulation through the halls, a hum of conversation, which is interrupted, or perhaps promoted, by tea and chocolate. It was on this occasion that the Unitarians showed their strength by completely filling the several halls, so that circulation was somewhat difficult. I hardly suspected that Unitarians could muster so much force. I found so many hands to shake and so many acquaintances to make that the pictures received but little attention; but to a Unitarian Baptist like myself it seemed very appropriate that the gathering should be at a water-color exhibition. The pictures furnished a refined atmosphere and an æsthetic background. The Sunday-school breakfast held on Friday morning fills the place, socially and gastronomically, that is filled by our Thursday night festival. The breakfast is held at nine, and is followed by the business meetings, a paper, and addresses. Such an earnest jollity and jolly earnestness, such frank criticism and generous appreciation, it was refreshing to witness. The personal kindness extended to the American delegates was gratefully appreciated by them; and with it they had the pleasant feeling that this welcome was a greeting to their country, and to the American Unitarian Association which they had the honor to represent.

Brevities.

A pioneer from the frontier who has just called at our office says there is ample room for home missionary work in this country, as he personally knows the names of two thousand places where there is no church and where religious services are not held.

Rev. E. L. Rexford, formerly of Boston, is planning to spend six months in India with Mr. Mozoomdar, that he may "study the habits and customs and the life of the people, and obtain some real insight into the life of that mysterious yet fascinating country."

Of anniversaries there is no end. Our English correspondent, Rev. S. Farrington, reports concerning the Unitarian anniversary meetings in London. The Inquirer devotes the greater part of its last issue to a full report of addresses, speeches, and business.

The interesting article by Dr. Heber Newton on "The Resurrection of Jesus," which we reprint from the Outlook this week, answers the often asked question why no word had been heard from Dr. Newton with reference to the Bishop's Pastoral Letter.

Through a copyist's inadvertence, three errors, we regret to say, crept into the letter by Rev. Thomas Stone which appeared in the Christian Register for June 13. The word "influencing" should have been "in freeing," "communion" should have been "commerce," and "join" should have been "gain."

One of the editors of the Interior, "W. C. G.," has been away on a vacation to the woods, where he has had a happy time with nature; but what would his readers say if his wish could be realized,—"I go back to the city with great regret, and wish I might never see a crowded street or the inside of a newspaper office again while I live?"

There is great rejoicing in the Massachusetts Prison Association at the almost unexpected good fortune of getting the indeterminate sentence bill through the Senate, and the governor's signature to it. Those who wish the surest protection of the community, as well as the best chance to reform the criminal and diminish crime, must likewise rejoice.

Radcliffe College was last Tuesday presented to the public as the daughter of Harvard University, on the occasion of the first Radcliffe Commencement in Sanders Theatre. The diplomas of the thirty or more graduates bore not only the seal of Radcliffe and the signature of its dean, but the seal of Harvard and of President "Carolus Guil. Eliot." So the world moves.

At a recent meeting of the California Unitarian Club, where wit and good humor seem to have prevailed, Charles W. Wendte was one of the after-dinner speakers, and amused the guests by his criticisms on the use of certain words. Says the Pacific Unitarian, "His derivation of the word 'virgin' from vir, a man, gin, a trap,—virgin, or man-trap,—was all the more pointed from his not having been trapped."

There are many who will read Col. Higginson's tribute to Mrs. Louisa Parsons Hopkins in the Boston Transcript with gratitude to him for having so well expressed their own feelings, though few are left to recall with him the day of her graduation with Jane Andrews. "I remember their graduation," he says, "as if it were yesterday. Both were fair-haired, erect, with peach-bloom cheeks and a superb look of courage and hope." Mrs. Hopkins never lost that look of courage and hope, nor the heart that was back of the look.

At the Radcliffe Commencement exercises President Eliot cheerfully confessed that women have proved that they can win honors through the acquisition of learning, but intimated that they had yet to prove that they could do so by original research. But, if exceptions prove the rule, he had before him one woman to whom he might have pointed as a noble example, one whose success in original research is thoroughly appreciated in Europe, and who has the unique distinction of being the only woman holding a fellowship in Harvard University,—Miss Alice Cunningham Fletcher.

A correspondent who is thoroughly conversant with Eastern matters writes as follows: "Added to the sympathy, indignation, and determination to secure justice for the Armenians which every person should feel, my three visits to Constantinople and acquaintance with the Armenians, and my private correspondence with dear American friends in the region of persecution, give me intense feeling and opinions upon this question. I believe there should be immediate action on the part of the so-called Powers, especially England, who has by her past proceedings made herself more responsible than any other nation. Turkey does not believe anybody is in earnest, and will not till war-vessels and armed men proceed to Constantinople. Every week of delay adds to the suffering of the Armenians in the East."

Pro and Con.

A SUGGESTION.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

I suggest the Unitarians of Boston and vicinity buy the old Public Library and use it for a people's temple. I am sure it would be well supported and welcomed by many. UNITARIAN.

MUNICIPAL BEAUTY.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

May I call the attention of your readers to the present movement in behalf of a "more beautiful Boston," and ask if the subjects suggested by this movement might not be profitably considered by our Unity Clubs? I write this naturally not in the interest of Boston so much as for smaller places, where a great deal depends on the general public sentiment in regard to such matters and where politics is not, perhaps, so important an element as it is here. There is a great deal that can be learned in regard to the first principles of municipal beauty; and in this preliminary study our young people ought to be interested, though, as I understand, our Unity Clubs are not intended for the exclusive benefit of the young by any means. The Twentieth Century Club is holding a series of weekly conferences at their club-rooms, 14 Ashburton Street, to consider such subjects as the best use of open spaces, more beautiful schools and school-houses, art exhibitions for the people, public control of buildings, and the like. They have been generous in inviting people who are interested in these matters; and it is altogether probable that they would welcome any one desiring to extend such study, and perhaps be ready with suggestions for his guidance. What better object could our Unity Clubs have than the protection of our towns from mistaken "improvements" that do not improve? A. T. U.

OTHERS, AS WE SEE THEM.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

Andover Theological Seminary, in its Commencement week, affords much inducement for a friendly visit; and, doubtless, the friendship is much more perceptible now than in former days. Certainly, the exercises this present year were of such a nature that the visitor of whatever name must have been impressed with the conviction that the things "commonly believed" were being emphasized, while many other things were happily left behind. At the Alumni meeting the addresses, at least the three I heard on "The Training of Men for the Ministry," had no single word which might not be acceptably spoken at Meadville or Cambridge. President Carter deprecated the tendency of modern methods in the direction of emphasizing culture too often at the expense of spirituality. Dr. McKenzie, with exquisite diction, spoke of the ministry which, perhaps, is needed more than wanted. Dr. Moore's paper on "Biblical Criticism and Theological Investigation" was a fearless plea for that line of study so much feared in the past, but which he vindicated in the most broad and liberal spirit. The papers of the young graduates were all of them productions of great strength and power, and had the ring not only of fearlessness, but of devoutness and consecration. Pleading for critical study of the New Testament, one essayist said it aids faith. There is nothing to fear. Neither is there any necessity to reconcile various readings, for the parts of the Bible are of varying value. We now emphasize the spiritual value of the Bible, for in that is the source of its authority.

A paper on "Christian Comradeship" eloquently argued the necessity for applying Christian ideals of action to daily life and fellowship.

The source of certitude in preaching was stated to be personal experience, reminding me, at least, of Mr. Frothingham's plea at a Meadville graduation, when he said, "Young men, preach yourselves; but in heaven's name make yourselves worth preaching."

A plea was also made for that God-consciousness which realizes God as supreme ruler and judge. To-day exalts man at the expense of God. The measure of human duty is limited only by absolute perfection.

A very mature, incisive, and eloquent paper on spiritual training, given by one trained in Catholicism, received great applause and a cry of "Good!" from the audience. It was a demand for spiritual power as the chief essential in the ministry, having its source in personal touch with Jesus Christ,—that which comes not from study about Christ, but from being with him. The Institutional Church is not forwarding this need. It is only doing what the State can better do. Sociology is not the work of the Church, but of the State. The seminaries need to be more forceful in spiritual training.

So "much was said, and so well said," that it was easy for your correspondent to join in singing

"One in hope and doctrine,
One in charity."

At the Alumni dinner, which each year the kind invitation to "other clergymen" seems to include the "other sheep," and which I am glad to attend, the addresses were, for the most part, forward-looking, broad, helpful. President Smyth declared, "We stand for brave, unfettered investigation."

The visitor at all these exercises cannot but have been impressed with the breadth, spirituality, and touch with modern scholarship and the modern tone which was so very much in evidence. The Andover Creed, to which every professor is required to periodically renew allegiance, seems anything but accordant with what each year's Commencement reveals, suggesting that possibly that creed is only a bit of "ritualism," to which one of the speakers at the dinner slightly referred. Anyhow, the faculty seem to have found some method for reconciling the Creed and their own teaching,—the affair which seems a very difficult task; for, if the yearly graduates are to be taken as proof, the "Andover Creed" is not much in evidence in the teaching.

The Commencement week spoke eloquently of the new day that has dawned in theological training. The young men put forward seemed all in touch with to-day in catholicity, scholarship, and forward look. It was good to be there. G. H. Y.

For the Christian Register.
KNOWN AND UNKNOWN.

BY F. L. PUGSLEY.

Known and unknown, unknown and known,
 Spirit of Life, what words are these?
 I wait on thee, so by degrees
 The depth of mystery to be shown.

I wait on thee, nor turn aside
 To worship at another shrine.
 Thou art the oracle divine,
 In thee all wisdom doth abide.

In thee all love, in thee all power,
 In thee all attributes combine.
 Thou art in all; and all is thine,
 On thee dependent every hour.

Nor height nor depth nor broad extent
 Can separate my soul from thee.
 Thou art in me, and I in thee;
 And in thee will I rest content.

Beneath all depth, above all height,
 Beyond the reach of all extent,
 Thy spirit, by thy spirit sent,
 Turns chaos into law and light.

Thou wert before the ages were,
 And shalt be when they shall not be.
 All things submit to thy decree,
 And thy decree doth never err.

Though all this universal frame
 Back to its elements resolve;
 And, even though elements dissolve,
 Thou art forever still the same.

I wait, while hope with reason vies,
 That, by this gift of life like thine,
 I may become like thee divine,
 And in thy wisdom may be wise.

And, while I wait, my prayer shall be
 That I, as light to me is shown,
 May live consistent with the known,
 And trust the unknown unto thee.

JAUNTING IN SPAIN.

BY LYDIA J. SANDERSON.

II.

Andalusia is the Oriental kingdom of Spain. From the East the Arabs came into Africa, and thence across the Strait of Gibraltar into the southern provinces. It is a garden in which the palm, the sugar-cane, the orange, and citron are among the commonest plants. For eight hundred years the Moors held sway, bringing a wealth of wisdom, science, and learning.

The cities of Cordova, Seville, and Granada are of greatest interest; and all this country is still full of the most glorious monuments of taste, grandeur, and engineering skill which the Moors erected during their reign.

Cordova was at first subject to Damascus, but about the year 756 declared itself independent, and became the capital of the Moorish empire of Spain. In the tenth century, when all Christian Europe was sunk in ignorance, witchcraft, and degradation, Cordova possessed six hundred mosques, fifty hospitals, eight hundred public schools, nine hundred baths, and six hundred inns, and a library of six hundred thousand volumes. It was a far finer city than Rome or Constantinople. It was the centre of civilization, the successful rival of Bagdad and Damascus, the seat of learning, and the repository of arts. The narrow streets, with the rough, pebbly pavements, are an unaltered relic of the Moorish dominion; and the whitewashed walls, whose windows are guarded by heavy iron bars, are the same as of old.

But the glory of that time and the glory of to-day is the wonderful mosque, which is considered the most perfect specimen of the religious architecture of the Moors of Spain. It covers four acres. The court is divided into three parts. In the centre of each is a fountain in the midst of palms, cypresses, and orange-trees. Gayly dressed peasants are at the fountains, filling their water-jars, and chatting over the latest bit of gossip; and the omnipresent beggar is lounging in the sun.

Stepping from the court-yard into this beautiful mosque, you feel that you have entered a forest of marble, alabaster, and porphyry columns. Each one is a single block of polished stone. The Saracen power was so vast that it sent eighteen hundred marble pillars from all the parts of the world it had conquered to build this beautiful temple. There are spoils from the temples of the East and the West, some from the shrines of Carthage, others from Rome and Jerusalem. Constantinople and Damascus added to the glory. These columns are of different colors, and form nineteen spacious aisles from east to west, and twenty-nine from north to south, crossing each other at right angles, and connected by innumerable horseshoe arches. The mosaic ornamentation surpasses the finest examples of this Byzantine art elsewhere in Italy, Africa, or the East. The pulpit, in which was kept the famous copy of the Koran, was made of ivory and precious woods and stones, fastened with gold and silver nails, and was unparalleled in the world. It mysteriously disappeared not long ago. When the Catholics conquered the Moors, they converted this mosque into a cathedral, turning many of its precious nooks into chapels, and setting up crosses and images of the Virgin which are strangely out of keeping in this Moorish sanctuary, the worshippers of which were not allowed to make an image of any living form.

Seville, too, is another wonderfully interesting city, the gayest of all Spain. The people are the merriest and happiest, and the beggars are the thickest. The streets are narrow, winding lanes: the narrowest streets of our old New England cities are wider than those of Seville. Bright-colored curtains are drawn across the tops of the streets to shut out the sun. They are crowded with little shops of every description, and the whole front of the shop is open to the street. In one you will find Irving's "Alhambra" and French authors: in the next Singer's sewing-machine stands in a conspicuous place. Close by is a cobbler at work; while next door are laces, fans, and photographs redolent with odors from the neighboring garlic-vender. Travel has not spoiled the old city, and it is novel in the extreme. The cathedral is one of the marvels of Spain. Here hangs one of Murillo's grandest paintings, "Saint Anthony of Padua." The figure of the saint was cut out and stolen in 1874, and some time after was found in New York, and restored to Seville. A golden cross is kept here, made from a nugget of the first gold brought by Columbus from our shores, and offered by him to the church. In the pavement is a plain marble slab covering the spot where Fernando, second son of Columbus, a man of learning and piety, lies buried. Close by the cathedral is the Giralda tower, decorated with geometrical designs, built by the man who invented algebra. It was used to call the faithful to prayer from its summit in the days of the Moors.

On the banks of the Guadalquivir stands the Tower of Gold, so named because it was used to keep the treasures of the kingdom. Here Columbus deposited the gold which his fleets bore from the New World; and it was from Seville and the Guadalquivir, at the little port of Palos, that he set sail to find the land of his dreams.

The Alcazar is a beautiful palace of the Oriental style, with court-yards with tropical foliage. The marble walks are perforated with holes through which the water comes up in little jets, forming little fountains; but in the olden days perfumed waters and incense danced up through the openings, which penetrated the robes of the ladies of the court as they sauntered amid the luxurious palms and by the orange blossoms. The palace is to-day in a good state of preservation, and is used by the royal family during their visits to Seville.

As in Italy all roads lead to Rome, so in Spain all roads lead to Granada, one of those beautiful old cities with walks by the river banks, shaded with cypresses, limes, figs, and pomegranates, narrow, winding streets, with houses of every form, height, color, and age, market-places, palaces, convents, hospitals, and churches all jumbled together with Roman arches and the ruins of Oriental mosques. In the cathedral lie buried Ferdinand and Isabella.

Granada, the meaning of which is "pomegranate," is built on four hills, at the extremity of an extensive and beautiful plain called the Vega, and intersected by two rivers, the Darro and Genil. In the distance are the snowy heights of the Sierra Nevada, contrasting beautifully with the deep blue sky above and the rich green meadows below. Beyond on the hillside is Granada's matchless gem,—the Alhambra, the Mecca of our Spanish pilgrimage. It is a spot which alone is worth crossing the ocean to see. It is the spot read and dreamed of in our childhood, the spot which Washington Irving has taught us to love and long for through his "Tales of the Alhambra." In all this beautiful world there can be no grander sight than this group of Alhambra's ruins perched in air amid nature's most picturesque surroundings. Never were strength and beauty more happily combined. The Alhambra hill is in the shape of an irregular, oval leaf, forming a plateau. The name "Alhambra" means "red house," from the red stone of which it is built. All around the hill runs a high wall, with gateways and buttresses and strong towers standing to-day just as they were built by the Moors. At the top of the hill stands the Washington Irving Hotel, a house much patronized by English and Americans. It is one of the best kept hotels in Spain. Its proprietor is a clever Spaniard, who speaks English and does all in his power for the comfort and pleasure of his guests. In the parlor of the hotel is a large painting of Washington Irving, who has made this spot known to all English-speaking people through the columns of his romantic history.

Above the portal of the principal entrance to the Alhambra and its gardens is the inscription, "There is no Conqueror but God." A little further on is the "Gate of Justice," so named because here formerly sat the Moorish sovereign to dispense justice to his subjects,—a common custom in the East, and one repeatedly mentioned in Hebrew Scriptures. Within the grounds are ruins of palaces and numerous other buildings necessary to the comfort and completeness of a royal residence, towers, mosques, prisons, hospitals, fortifications, aqueducts, fountains, villages, and shops. At the time of its occupation by the Moors it was capable of accommodating forty thousand persons within its walls. It was built by degrees from the single red castle of the ninth century, very largely increased in the thirteenth, and completed in the fourteenth century.

The Moors did not spend time or money in outside ornamentation. The entrance to the palace is through a low, plain gateway, entering which we seem to pass from Europe into Asia. Crossing the threshold, we find ourselves in the midst of that beauty which has rendered it the marvel of the world; for the builder determined that it should surpass in magnificence all the royal palaces that had ever existed. We are surrounded with graceful porticos and colonnades, walls and ceilings worked in delicate arabesque, and glowing with soft tints and rich gold. The decorations are like gorgeous mantles of delicately woven lace. All the designs of the celebrated lace sold at Granada are copied from the Alhambra walls. Its airy halls were built around gardens full of roses, pomegranates, and jasmines, and courts with fountains playing; and to-day they still stand the delight and admiration of travellers. The most celebrated portion of the palace is the Court of the Lions, surrounded by a low gallery, which is supported by one hundred and twenty-four white marble columns, with decorated stalactite roofs with the most exquisite coloring. In the centre is the fountain,—a magnificent alabaster basin, supported by twelve rudely carved lions, looked upon not in a sculptural way, but heraldically, as emblems of strength, power, and courage. They are supposed to have been the work of Christian captives, and not that of the Moors. The Hall of the Ambassadors is another spot all glorious within, with its domes, its arches, its columns so exquisite in design, and colors of blue, brown, red, gold, and green.

Tradition states that here Ferdinand and Isabella listened to the tales of Columbus, hesitated, and then let him pass out from their presence, down the hillside, through the streets of the old town, and then sent messengers to recall him, and sanction him to go forth into the then unknown world. But words can never tell of the glories of the Alhambra. There are the Halls of Justice, the Court of Myrtles, the Hall of the Abencerrages, the Hall of the Two Sisters, the Tower of Comares, the Tower of Infantas, and the Captive's Tower, the mosque, the many baths, courts, and gardens, each more exquisitely beautiful than the other, yet each perfect, and each rich in history, song, and legend. From the tower windows the views are extensive and grand, looking out over the groves of the Alhambra, down into the old town of Granada, across the rivers to the purple hills beyond, and all encircled with the snow-clad mountains. But the day came when the Moors must give up all this beauty and splendor, and Boabdil is the last actor in the Moorish drama. He left his royal palace accompanied by fifty of his chosen cavaliers, and sadly and slowly rode down the hillside to where the Christian monarchs, Ferdinand and Isabella, were surrounded by a court all splendidly arrayed, banners fluttering and arms sparkling in the sun. He held the great keys of the Alhambra in his hand, and, as he extended them to the conqueror, said: "These keys are thine, O king, since Allah has decreed it. Use thy success with clemency and moderation." Then, leaving the Christian sovereigns and their retinue to enter his city and celebrate their triumphs with the solemn pomp and ceremony of their religion, the Moorish king hurried away.

The spot on the mountain side where Boabdil paused, turned, and looked back upon his lost paradise is called "The Last Sigh of the Moor." Up the hillside rode the conquerors, and soon the silver cross was gleaming from the Alhambra towers. The conquerors, the priests, and the army threw themselves on their knees, and intoned the "Te Deum laudamus," "which," says the historian, "was never sung with more devotion and fervor nor on a grander or more solemn occasion." But the coming of the conquerors brought destruction and ruin to much of the beauty of the Alhambra. The niche of the sacred Koran in the mosque was filled with crucifix and saints. Portions of the marvellous palace were destroyed to make room for a hideous palace of a later date and style, the inscriptions of the Koran were curiously intertwined with those of the Christian religions, and indifferent paintings were put upon the walls where properly belonged only arabesque and Koranic devices, and many of the Oriental nooks and corners were filled in with whitewash; but to-day, thanks to a government which appreciates the wondrous beauty of the East, much of the Catholic decoration has been destroyed, the whitewash removed, and the walls stand fresh and beautiful in their original designs.

But our Spanish pilgrimage was drawing to an end; and, as we took leave of that fascinating country, we felt that, in spite of the discomforts of travel, in the after-glow only the rosy tints would predominate, and the memories of the novelty, the beauty, the poetry, and art of that land would remain with us forever.

IN ENGLISH LAKELAND.

KESWICK TO BUTTERMERE AND AMBLE-SIDE.

II.

[EDITORIAL CORRESPONDENCE.]

The traveller who enters the English lake district may approach it from the north at Keswick or from the south at Windermere. If he enters at the north, he sees the best scenery first. If he enters at the south, the tamer scenery comes first, and the best wine is reserved for the last. But it really is not very important at which end he enters. In a picture gallery I think it wise to see the best pictures first. In this gallery of nature there is no monotony in the changing views and no exhaustion in the prospect. If it becomes tiresome after awhile to see Nature on canvas, it is refreshing to see her in her own fair robes, and with her bright, smiling face.

It was more convenient for our quartette to meet at Keswick, and here one is brought at once in close relation to the very heart of these mountains and lakes. Only thirteen miles away is Cockermouth, the birthplace of Wordsworth. From the first he was a child of Nature, and he always remained so. The literary pilgrim to these mountains may find more than one Wordsworthian shrine,—his birthplace, his home, his grave, his favorite haunts. Southey and Coleridge are with him; and Harriet Martineau, Hawthorne, Thomas Arnold, and many others have lived or wandered among these hills and vales. Derwent-water wins my homage as the most beautiful of all the English lakes. It is only three miles long, and about a mile wide. It is finely set in the mountains which guard and feed it. A row upon its waters heightened the charm. To the north is Skiddaw, bald, rugged, corrugated; to the east are Wallow Crag and Falcon Crag; to the south, Castle Head; and further to the right are Great End and the Scafell Pikes. Wooded slopes and verdant lawns dip to the lake. Peace and rest are incarnated here, and we easily find ourselves in the spirit of this psalm. A drive in the afternoon brought us under the shadow of Skiddaw; and we saw the lake from the slope of the mountain, as we had seen the mountain from the lake. Charming vistas; frank and pleasing vales; hard, smooth roads; leafy sycamores; beeches spreading their arms in benediction; sturdy oaks and shining holly; picturesque stone cottages; brown-faced children; grazing sheep and meditative cattle; lilac plumes, primroses, and golden cataracts of laburnum,—all entered into the panorama. A Sunday evening service at St. Kentigern Church gave me a picture of an English rural parish church. The building itself is not very old, but it stands on an ancient site of worship at Crossthwaite; and its rector, whom I had not the pleasure of hearing, Canon Rawnsley, is the historian of this whole district, and has lately published two charming volumes on the literary associations of the lake country. The gap between the Episcopalian service and the Congregational is great, but I find the former at its best when it is all set to music and intoned. Intellectually, much of it was past explanation; but, emotionally, it was devout and mystical. I am half persuaded that responsive services are much better when chanted or intoned than when they are spoken without the tinge of emotion which a musical tone puts into them.

The finest drive in the lake country is said to be the drive from Keswick to Buttermere via Borrowdale; and, now that we have made it, we are prepared to support the claim. It takes one through the most rugged, picturesque, and virile scenery. We take a high-seated mountain wagon, drawn by two strong, heavy horses. Leaving Derwentwater, we passed through the village of Keswick. We took a glance at Greta Hall, where Southey lived, and stopped at St. Kentigern Church to look at Southey's monument. It is a recumbent statue; but, instead of representing him with his palms together, like a conventional bishop in marble, he lies on his side with a book in his hand, and looks out toward Greta Hall, his happy home. Leaving Keswick, the road skirts the lake, and gives us a fine view of Falking Crag. A short ride brings us to Barrow Falls. It is very interesting to find that you are nominally related to a waterfall, and it is much more respectable than being related to a fall in beer or whiskey. Of course, we must see this family shrine. We pass the porter's lodge, and a woman leads us up the charmingly shaded road till we hear the gentle music of the falls and see them gleaming in the sun through the screen of trees. The volume of water is not large, and it does not fall in a single sheet, but in three or four ribbons, which fray out into fringes of foam. Oak, maple, and elm furnish a leafy bower for the singing brook, spanned by a rustic, moss-covered stone bridge. This modest little waterfall is well worthy of the distinction it confers on the Barrows family. Such a glorification of cold water puts the vat and distillery to shame.

More famous, but more disappointing, was Lodore. It is not a perpendicular fall, but a watercourse made of massive boulders. It needs a large head of water to make it at all dramatic; but now only a thread of a stream winds down through and around the great rocks, with little falls of three and four feet. We cannot tell, as Southey could, how the water comes down at Lodore. We have here simply the architecture of a waterfall, not the cascade itself. A great cliff rises on one side. Tall elms with fresh, green leaves offer arboreal honors. The singing of the waters is a pleasant treble, not the great chorus which comes with the flood and storm. But the poem will continue to sparkle and sing and laugh and roar, whether the waters dry up or not.

Passing along the east side of the lake, we have a good view of Capbells and Maiden Moor; and soon after, at the southern end of the lake, a broad foreground of vivid green stretches to the water, over which the eye swiftly passes to Skiddaw. Mountain, valley, and lake make together a beautiful landscape. The houses along the smooth, well-kept roads are as solid as stone can make them. The road is lined with flowers, and the gardens are all ablaze. Castle Crag looms up as if to dispute our passage, but the road avoids its threatening challenge; and, when we get near it, it is nothing but a hillock, such as Polyphemus, if he had happened to live in this country, might easily have picked up and thrown after us.

Now we leave the lake behind us and come nearer to the crags. Gate Crag is a solid mass of rock tufted with green. A great stone stands to the left of our road. It is the Bowder Stone, a mass of rock weighing two thousand tons. We are thankful we were not under it when it fell from the crags above. We climb to the top of the great boulder by means of a staircase, and get a fine view. The rock is nicely balanced on its keel; and beneath it at one place, where the earth is washed away, you may shake hands through a hole with Mizippi on the opposite side. This fraternal possibility is not mentioned in the guide-books, but the old woman who lives in the cottage expects an extra penny for revealing this secret.

We halt for lunch at Rossthwaite, a pleasant village in the valley. Thence are routes to Sty Head Pass and Wastwater. "Yonder," says the driver, pointing with his whip, "is the highest mountain, the deepest lake, and the smallest church." With mountains high and waters deep Nature can make cathedrals of her own. The rowan, the holly, and the oak,—what a beautiful symphony in green, with striking contrasts of tone! We meet few travellers or natives; but the sheep are grazing on the mountain slopes, and the little lambs skip and scamper to their shaggy-coated mothers as the heavy wagon rolls by.

Then begins the long, steep ascent to Honister Hause. We take to our feet, and give the horses a chance. When we have reached the summit, 1,190 feet, we have a splendid view, as we turn on our heels and look back at the valley below; while before us to the left is the stern, perpendicular face of the Honister Crag. There is slate enough in that crag, 1,750 feet high, to cipher out our national debt, and sponge enough in the ocean, I trust, to wipe it all out. Or there is slate enough there to roof over all the houses in England. Steep tramways scar the face of the crag, down which are sent loads of slate. The scenery now has lost its greenness. The slopes of the mountain are covered with shale. There would be scanty feeding here for flocks. The road turns sharply to the right: the Borrowdale vale is lost to view. Trees as well as grass are wanting; but on the slopes ahead of us are patches of heather, and a long rib of stone wall runs far up the mountain side. Bold, decided cliffs jut out on the left. Our descent is steep, but it brings us down again to pleasant pastures. On the left are the Haystacks, but the cattle would find them stony fare. When we get below to Gatesgarth, we come to a pleasing farm-house, with barns of stone and a pretty green vale. Looking over the Haystacks, we get a view of Great Gables. The sky is clear, without a cloud; and these sharp-cut peaks stand boldly out in profile. Buttermere is lying now before us, glistening in the sun; and, as we pass Hasness, a private residence, the road leading through the grounds, we have a good view of the little lake.

We rest at Buttermere, and while the horses are feeding inspect a little church, but not so small as some of the doll churches which one finds in Greece,—shrines just about big enough for a worshipper. A climb to a neighboring knoll gives us a view of Crummock Water, less than three miles long and half a mile wide. There is not time to see Scale Force, and we eat sour grapes by imagining that there is very little water in this lakeland waterfall.

Leaving Buttermere, the hills become tamer; but their slopes are more graceful and inviting to man and beast, and are tinged with exquisite colors, broad stretches of bracken blending their red with the green of the turf, while the opposite side of the valley, which the sun has left, is draped in shade. The sheep are feeding on bunches of gorse, and a flock of crows lighting on the hillside adds another solemn element of color. A dignified procession of sheep and lambs, each sheep followed by a lamb, all of them in a sober tandem, as though the whole thing had been arranged with ceremonial exactness, passes by on the hill slope, with ridiculous good order. Sheep are among the most pious of animals, but such a ritualistic procession seemed a trifle Pharisaical. But the driver says these Herdwick flocks are hardy. One of the most delightful views opens before us in the vale of Newlands, a trustful, quiet valley, sleeping between rugged hills, the little church completely hidden by a sheltering growth of trees. The wooden hotel which we pass as we descend into the valley is the only wooden building in the hills, the only thing that looks rather cheaply American; and the driver says the owner made some money in the States, and then built this monument to his success.

If not as varied and commanding in view, the ride from Keswick to Ambleside, which we made the next day, had its own aspects of charm and tender association. Thirlmere is a pretty little lake, which Manchester has attached for its water supply. It has destroyed some of its picturesque-ness by building a dam and an expensive road around it four and a half miles, at a cost of $145,000. This has been rendered necessary by the scheme to raise the level of the lake sufficient for a large water supply. Manchester rejoices in this costly enterprise, but some of the old lake-lovers think it a sad innovation. Beyond Thirlmere a little tablet set into a stone wall by the roadside attracted my attention:—

"30th 9 mo. 1843.

"Fallen from his Fellow's side,
The steed beneath is lying.
In harness here he died.
His only fault was dying."

The faithful horse no doubt deserved even better poetry; but, when we get to Grasmere and enter the old churchyard, we find a simple epitaph on a simple slab:—

"William Wordsworth 1850
Mary Wordsworth 1859"

No chronicle could be briefer, and I find it hard to think that anything else could be better. Nor could Westminster Abbey afford so fitting a resting-place, so charming and peaceful a poets' corner, for this nature-lover as the corner of this shady churchyard, not far from the haunts and side by side with the sister he loved.

S. J. B.

WILL IT COME TRUE?

BY JUNIATA STAFFORD.

"Action is equal to reaction" is an axiom we all repeat glibly, and never doubt its truth. I fall back upon this habit of faith, as I think of current literature for children, and hope the axiom will hold good. Let me explain.

The prospectus for a certain magazine says: "Until within the past two decades the interest and concern of readers has been chiefly directed to what relates to the affairs of adult life. It then entered into the consciousness of men that the large, silent majority of unrepresented youth heretofore ignored should receive some consideration; and, in consequence, a new literature has sprung up, devoted to the entertainment and instruction of the juvenile population." It is this second sentence in the quotation that defines the "reaction" in the minds and hearts of those who had heretofore felt that children's literature was a matter of small importance and less provision, and this same "reaction" has flooded the world with reading matter for the young.

Alas! quality has not kept pace with quantity; and any conscientious mother or teacher will bear me out in saying that it is very difficult to find books good and wholesome to read to a child, even with "judicious skippings," and far more difficult to find those to put into his hand unreservedly.

The more intelligent parents are, the higher their standard of adherence to scientific and moral accuracy, and the greater their recognition of the effect of reading upon the plastic mind of a child, the greater will be their difficulty in finding a sufficient supply of proper reading. Especially will this be true of people of the so-called "liberal faiths," who find no use for the great mass of "Sunday-school literature" and its kin that we all knew so well in our youth; and people of this mind are rapidly multiplying. Add to these teachers who are forbidden by school rules to recommend or read any book with distinct "religious teaching," and you will realize that there must be another large field of children's literature to glean from.

One sorry feature of our "reaction" is that the child, who was once always in the background, is now always in the foreground; and it does not take his bright little mind long to find out, from the stories and poems, and the cunning but often impertinent "smart sayings" with which even our newspapers are flooded, that he, the child, is the pivot upon which the whole social world is turning. And his only logical conclusion can be that he is more important than mother and father, although, of course, he does not often formulate his thought. It makes him self-conscious and over-important, nevertheless; and sometimes it troubles him. As an instance, I know a dear little girl of five whose disposition is such as to perplex her conscientious, earnest mother, who gives a great deal of thought as to what is best to do. One day the child looked up suddenly, and asked,—

"Mamma, what are you thinking about?"

"I was thinking about you, Mary."

"I knew it," said the sensitive little creature; "and, mamma, I wish you wouldn't think about me so much!"

The child felt oppressed with the constant earnest thought under which a less sensitive one would only have felt "important." This same sensitiveness, which is becoming more and more strongly developed in our nervous American children, makes it cruelty to read to them the hundreds of tales that harrow up their feelings and sympathies, even when they appeal to the highest sympathies. Many times I have had mothers say to me: "Such and such is a beautiful story; but it is rather sad, and my little Benny cried and cried when I read it to him." What business had she to read such a harrowing story to such a child? You might reply to me with deplorable truthfulness that many of these stories are by our best-known writers for children, whose books are most popular, and concerning which nothing but favorable notices have been written. It is this that makes me protest the more strongly.

Before the holiday season last year a story for children came into my hands to review for a paper. I read it, found it exaggerated, unhealthful, deliberately teaching the child-reader what it was to be "morbid" (the heroine who was thus knowingly morbid was six years old), and at once wrote a truthful but adverse criticism that was duly published. Then I destroyed the pretty, costly book, because I found myself all unwilling to give it to any child. Imagine my dismay during the following weeks, in reading the many notices I saw of this widely popular book, to find not one unfavorable notice! The worst of it is that this book is typical of a large class, that seems to be growing larger.

Is "action" going to be equal to the "reaction" I thus deplore? Is the child to be given his due, but not over-due, importance in the stories he must read? Are they to be wholesome, scientifically and ethically true, full of nature and her ways, an incentive to healthful thought and action? Of course, I am speaking of our "best literature," not the sensational sort for sale on news-stands and to our street boys. Is it going to be less difficult for mothers, teachers, collectors for school and home libraries, and the libraries of our Sunday-schools of "liberal" churches, to find what they are willing to use? I hope so. A revival of some of the old classic literature and its new preparation by some of the best writers and thinkers of our country will help solve the problem.

In conclusion, let me beg of you who have young readers in your care, do not be guided wholly by "book notices," even in what you call reliable magazines and papers; but read or look over carefully the children's books, and see that they are wholesome and true to high ideals.

LONDON LETTER.

It is quite evident to modern thought that anniversary meetings would heighten their interest by a whole heaven if they would restrain themselves and come less frequently,—say, about once in ten years. A year of one hundred and twenty months might bring far more freshness than a twelvemonth can possibly evolve. The scenery of the seventieth anniversary of our British and Foreign Unitarian Association; the persons in attendance; the things that ought to be, but are not; the wonderings and the lamentations and the undying hopes,—are so very like those of the sixty-ninth anniversary that no one is stirred to undue fervor or enthusiasm. It is possible to be calm, and to consider the propriety of memorializing her Majesty's government as to the undue shortness of our denominational year. It really gives us no perspective. Where we are is ten times too near where we were.

Prof. Carpenter of Oxford gave us the Essex Hall lecture on the evening of June 4. Whatever he does is bravely, sincerely, and thoroughly well done. The theme of "The Relation of Jesus to his age and Our Own" is the great one of the end of the century; and scholarship has been studying it these seventy-five years upon its knees. Prof. Carpenter has labored upon it himself with rare freedom and conscientiousness, has entered into the labors of others, and gave us what I heard characterized as "a truly great utterance." Not every one had ears to hear it, but the most part heard it with joy.

On June 5 the annual sermon, on "Glad Tidings of Great Joy," was preached by Rev. Douglas Walmsley of Belfast, Ireland, from Dr. Herford's Hampstead pulpit. An annual sermon is something that must be preached, and one receives honor from men when he is asked to preach it. But it would often be a kindness all around for the askers to give the theme with their request. Then the preacher, in case he had no message burning for utterance, would not have to beat all possible bushes to start his hare; then the hearers would go to the hearing with a certain definite interest and expectation. Mr. Walmsley is a quiet, earnest, excellent man. His theme was an entirely happy one. His interpretation of the glad tidings Jesus brought was "that God is love, and man may trust him." As we left the church, we overheard: "What an excellent sermon! What an altogether delightful service!"

In the afternoon of annual sermon day I went into the meeting of the Unitarian Temperance Association. The distinctively Unitarian type of temperance is not to be confounded with the various superstitious, unenlightened, and orthodox types. It has a much sweeter sound to "a believer's ear." The Earl of Carlisle made a very vigorous little speech; Prof. Carpenter spoke temperately; and then there was some practical talk about a scarlet tablecloth and other minor details of Band of Hope endeavors. I learned that naughty boys may be utilized, like naughty ecclesiastics, by promoting them to office.

The evening brought the usual business meeting, when the machine is wound up to run for another year. The faces and the speeches upon the platform were the dear old familiar ones. The only new wrinkles were two American evolutions, of which the stars and stripes may well be proud, Rev. W. H. Lyon and Rev. S. J. Barrows. They both talked, and talked well.

On June 6 we had conferences. We said several things that have been said before, and will be said again. We said about all that there is to say, talked wisely as ever we could, and got glimpses into each other through that talking. The social problem probably enlisted more interest than any other theme discussed. It is ever with us, and destined to stay. We handled it more soberly and with clearer vision than in some former years. After the social problem came a social crush, made up very largely of delicate Unitarian rosebuds on dress parade. We called this crush the annual conversazione. "The great purpose of anniversaries," said a wise one, "is to meet one another." At this crush we met, and great was the heat of that meet.

On June 7 the Sunday-school lovers sat down to their communion breakfast, and then lingered to talk over their holy work. In the evening, at Dr. Williams's library, came the Ministers' Conference, which it is not lawful to report to the world. This little bit of white-chokerism is the last survival of ecclesiasticism left us. We shut the doors against such as preach not,—as we have a perfect right to do,—and then say how it all seems to us. This conference was the great, best hour of the feast to your correspondent,—made so by the altogether noble and admirable paper of a certain Rev. S. J. Barrows, whom, it is just possible, some of your readers may incidentally have heard of. It had the truest, manliest, most catholic ring all the way through; was cheery, sparkling, and brave. It told us all about liberalism in America, and did not confine liberal Christianity to a single narrow-gauge line. Blessed be Barrows,—yea, even more blessed than drudgery!

Some few weeks since we had our Ministers' Institute at Oxford. This Institute does not as yet "catch on." Of our two or three hundred ministers, only about forty were present. This, however, was but the second meeting of the Institute; and the number present was considerably larger than at the first meeting. The days were most profitable, however, if the numbers were small. Twenty-five or thirty years ago the refreshing thing was to hear a voice crying from the radical wilderness, challenging our little Israel to arouse and think. All that is changed. The refreshing thing now is the strong and manly prophet of the conservative wilderness, speaking as only he speaks who is moved by the Holy Ghost. Mr. Addis and Prof. Carpenter interpret the relation of Jesus to our age very differently, but they have both been baptized into the same Spirit.

More edifying than any of our own meetings, to the peculiar soul of your correspondent, was a Quiet Day in the Church of St. John the Evangelist in Red Lion Square, Holborn. This is an immense church, covering nearly one end of the square. The services run here upon the highest Anglican lines. Once within its "solemn gloom," you are far, far from the world: you are made aware that this is none other than the very gate of ritual. Light only falls from clerestory windows and through the sacred tints high above altar and reredos. People genuflect as they pass the sacrificial mystery. A placard with "Women's Side" warns you off one whole side of the edifice. If the women are the sheep in this fold, you are a goat. There are brothers in monkish array of serge gown and hood, corded waist, and a heavy cross dangling at the side. There are sisters, too, in black and white. There are three hundred or so present half an hour before the opening of the Quiet Day's service. The most part are on their knees. All is hushed and devout. At 10.15 matins are said. After matins we have terce, "in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost." Then Canon Gore, with great simplicity, directness, and power, begins his first talk to us. It is off-hand and off-heart. He assumes that we are all interested in social reform, for none others have been invited. He wishes to point out the things essential if we would have success. The first thing requisite for him who would reform society is to make himself quite sure that he has himself well in hand,—that he is able to bear his own burden, control his passions, make himself the master of his own situation. Without first doing this, let no man suppose that he can do thorough or good work among others or for others. There be many who say, and do not. That is the bane of social reform. Master your own self-indulgence, self-consideration, before you hope to lead others to be unselfish. Then Canon Gore pointedly put it to us how far we each had laid the requisite foundation for our work. Our thoughts were sent home, our consciousness of imperfection was fully aroused; and then we were left alone in the silence, to meditate upon and to wrestle with, not the selfishness and sins of landlord, capitalist, and rumseller, but our own. This silent, prayerful hour was broken by the Office of Lent. After a short interval for lunch we had another address, and a very memorable hour of prayer. It would utterly spoil in the telling. Canon Gore conducted it in the most methodical and deliberate way, taking it for granted that we were there for that purpose,—not saying prayers for us or to us, but telling us what and whom to pray for, and giving us ample time in which to concentrate our hearts' desire on this and that particular thing. The most profitable and suggestive religious day of my life!—showing especially how much we all have yet to learn concerning methods in devotion, spiritual gymnastics. He who does not use his muscles is usually very weak and flabby for any thing like a strong man's work. There is a moral flabbiness—a weakness for want of definite spiritual exercises—as lamentable among the freest thinkers as among the most creed-bound. We shall all wake up to it some day, if we are worth the saving.

It is only by the cross that the world will ever be saved. But the cross of the world's real salvation is not to be found in any far past century, nor yet on any hill of crucifixion in distant Palestine. It is a thing of to-day and of the near at hand. It is to be found, if at all, in the home and the market-place and the human heart.—J. T. Sunderland.

MT. MEIGS SCHOOL.

BY GEORGIA WASHINGTON.

The last time I spoke through your paper to the friends North was in an appeal for help in building a school-house here at the village of Mt. Meigs.

Friends kindly responded to the call, and gave $360, during the summer months, for that purpose.

On my return to Mt. Meigs in September I found the people busy as usual with the cotton picking and ginning, but much discouraged on account of the low price of cotton per pound. No money so far had been paid on the old school debt of last term. Efforts had been made by the women, and some money was already in their hands. A meeting was called the latter part of September. The people came in crowds, and a collection of $40 was raised in one night.

The story of how much interest the people North had taken in the people and school here, in giving money to help build a larger house to teach in, aroused these poor people to a new life. A second meeting was called, and nearly forty dollars more were given; and, in spite of the hard times, during the three months before Christmas, $101 was raised by the people. This amount reduced the old debt considerably.

School opened the 1st of October in the same little house built by the people last term. Just a small number came during the first month to school, for the cotton crop was not half over; but one hundred and forty-seven scholars were enrolled during November. The little house was crowded. So we begged for the church house, and moved into it the 1st of the month. This was quite comfortable at first; but, after winter set in, we could hardly stay there. There were about fifty panes broken out of the windows in the church, and the wind found its way through them to us. So the children gave pennies to the amount of $1.50, and a friend at Hampton gave enough more to pay for stopping up all the holes. Now it is comfortable when the weather is calm.

The two teachers from Hampton, with myself, each occupy a corner in the old church for class recitations, besides keeping a large class busy at the same time in the centre of the room. Our lowest, or baby class, numbers forty-five, and is taught by one of Hampton's girls, whose year out for teaching is being spent here. It seems almost impossible to keep them quiet. How often during the day, when a burst of laughter from the babies' corner turns every head in the room in that direction, have I wished that they had a room of their own! These children are bright and wide-awake, and as interesting as any set found in the Southern States. Everything is in their favor this term. They have a very interesting teacher, a real lover of children; and every child at Mt. Meigs is in love with her.

The school's enrolment for December, 1894, was one hundred and seventy-five; in January one hundred and eighty-nine. The average attendance is one hundred and forty-five. During the month of February and March quite a number of my large scholars leave school to take up ploughing. They are begging for a night school; but there is so much work to be done in day school we hardly know which way to turn. Still, we hope to give what help we can to the boys who are earnest enough to plough all day and walk to school at night. No work has yet turned up here at school for boys; but we are still wishing and hoping that something will, especially since we have so many young men this term.

Since January 1 the girls have had sewing lessons at the teachers' home. They are all perfectly delighted with the idea of learning to sew. Each class in sewing has two and a half hours every week for work. This is short time to give to such important work, but it is all that can be spared from school this term. The material used for sewing classes was all given by the friends North,—even the scissors and cotton. But, with such large classes every day, the work is now running short; and I hope for a new supply before long. Sometimes the mothers drop into the sewing-classes, and watch the girls thread their needles and hold their work. It all seems so new and strange to them that they sometimes forget to go till class is out. The teacher in charge of the sewing-classes is one of Hampton's girls, too, and was trained in the industrial room there. The people at Mt. Meigs already feel her presence and work to be very valuable.

I find the people, in general, this year more interested in the work of education than they were last year. They are making sacrifices to keep their children in school. Some of the mothers bring eggs, butter, potatoes, meat, and chickens to us in payment for teaching their children. They are willing to do almost anything just to keep their boys and girls in school, and the need of a comfortable school-house is greater than ever.

Will not some of the friends North help us to get this? There are great numbers of children here. The people are interested, and are doing all they can to help on the work. The house is sorely needed, but the people cannot build it themselves. They are perfectly willing to do a great deal, but they have not the ready money to give. We have had nearly $500 given by friends North, for which we are very thankful; but, in order to make any sort of a good school-house, over $500 more is needed for the house, to say nothing of the blackboards and seats. We have the ground already to put the building on; and a contractor from Montgomery, with his force of workmen, can get it done in a few weeks. All that is needed is the money to meet the payments.

Money sent for the People's School of Mt. Meigs Village may be sent to the Hampton Institute, or directly to the principal, Miss Georgia Washington.

Religious Intelligence.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be sent in by Saturday Morning; announcements of meetings which are to take place must be sent in before Tuesday Noon.]

REV. HENRY G. SPAULDING sails for Europe with his wife and son on August 15, to be absent a year. His tour will take in Italy and Greece, and possibly Egypt.

THE NEW HAMPSHIRE UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.—This association held its semi-annual meeting with the Church of the Unity of Rochester, N.H., June 25 and 26. The programme included an opening sermon by Rev. Charles G. Ames, an address by Rev. George E. Littlefield, and an essay by Rev. Charles B. Elder of Keene.

THE WORCESTER ASSOCIATION of Ministers will meet with Rev. Nathaniel Seaver, Jr., at Leicester, Tuesday, July 2, at ten o'clock. Sermon by Rev. J. C. Duncan. Essay by Rev. T. E. Chappell. Subject, "Religion as Man's Endeavor to come into Right Relations with what is outside Himself." G. F. Pratt, Scribe.

THE UNITARIAN GROVE MEETING.—The eighteenth annual grove meeting is to be held from July 28 to August 4 at the Weirs, and the meeting promises to be one of unusual interest. Among the speakers will be Rev. E. L. Rexford, D.D., of Columbus, Ohio; Rev. J. H. Crooker of Helena, Mont.; Rev. W. W. Fenn; Rev. Edward J. Wright; Rev. D. M. Wilson; Rev. S. C. Beane; and Rev. Charles J. Staples. One of the notable features of the week will be Layman's Day, when addresses are expected from Senator W. E. Chandler, Hon. Charles F. Stone, and others. For further information address Rev. Frank L. Phalen, Concord, N.H. Already an unusually large number of ministers and laity have expressed their intention of spending the week in attending this unique gathering by Lake Winnepisiogee.

CHELSEA, MASS.—The Sunday-school of the First Unitarian Church closed for the season on Sunday, June 23, with its annual floral service. Garlands of flowers and clusters of greenery made the church beautiful; while the well-taught children, in song, recitation, and response, reflected happily the directing hand of superintendent and teachers. Mr. Record, the minister-elect of the church, gave a brief address. The church will close June 30, and open September 1. The Chelsea Branch of the Woman's Alliance announce for next season a course of five lectures, to be opened October 14 by Rev. Minot J. Savage, and followed by Rev. Thomas Van Ness, Rev. Samuel Crothers, Rev. Charles G. Ames, and Miss Margaret B. Barnard.

HAVERHILL, MASS.—A correspondent writes: "The pulpit of the First Parish was occupied June 23 by Rev. John N. Woodman, a member of the parish who has just completed his studies at Meadville. Mr. Woodman is much liked in the city here, and was honored by a large audience of his former teachers, classmates, and friends. His theme was the value of a receptive attitude toward God. The sermon was spiritual, clear, concise, with fine illustrations, and well delivered. . . . The pastor, Rev. F. A. Gilmore, held an open-air service on the church grounds Sunday evening at five o'clock, which was so successful that a series will be given.

NEWBURYPORT, MASS.—The seventy-first anniversary of the Sunday-school of the First Religious Society of Newburyport was observed on Sunday, June 23. The annual reports showed an encouraging increase of members and of constancy of attendance. At the morning service on that day nine infant children were baptized by Dr. Beane, and a confirmation class of eight young men and women were welcomed to membership in the church.

PETERSHAM, MASS.—A correspondent writes of the surprise given to Rev. Edward Green and his wife on the tenth anniversary of their marriage by townsmen and parishioners. The town hall was none too large for the assembled guests. Cordial words of congratulation were spoken by the Baptist minister of the town, a substantial gift of bank-notes was presented, and then followed a supper and social reunion. Our correspondent adds, "Although Mr. and Mrs. Green needed no such public manifestation of the love and devotion of their people, it must have been a very gratifying reception to them."

SOUTH BOSTON, MASS.—Very pleasant Children's Day services were held on Sunday. Ten infants were brought forward for the rite of consecration, and one youth presented himself for confirmation. The beautiful music of the new Sunday-school Hymn and Tune Book added much to the interest of the occasion. Unity Church will be open through July, and probably all summer, for Sunday evening services. It is hoped that many visitors from the closed churches will drop in to these meetings, which are informal conferences on vital, every-day religion. Next Sunday evening the topic is "Conversion"; the speakers, Rev. Mary T. Whitney, Rev. B. A. Goodridge, and others. Service at 7.30.

TAUNTON, MASS.—The Sunday-school of the First Congregational Society in Taunton, Mass., celebrated its Children's Day on June 23, and made use of the special service of 1892. Underlying all the preparations for this service was the wish to make the children of the parish feel that this was their day, their service, and that the church belongs to them and exists for them as much as to and for the old folk. To this end the organ was but little used, and was replaced by the chapel piano. The children did everything for and by themselves that they could do; and the quartet choir was not included. Their childish voices spoke from the platform, and they stood about the piano, singing of birds and flowers; and the sermon was suited to children. Four little ones and two adults were christened.

NORFOLK CONFERENCE.—The summer meeting of the Norfolk Conference was held with the First Congregational Parish of Canton on Thursday, June 20. Eighteen ministers and two hundred and forty-six lay delegates were present, besides many visiting friends. The weather was charming, the hospitality of the ancient parish without stint, and the programme of such a nature that it could not fail to carry its message of inspiration to every waiting soul.

At ten o'clock a devotional service was conducted by Rev. Benjamin A. Goodridge, the successor of Rev. William R. Lord as minister of the Christ Church in Dorchester. After Scripture reading and prayer and the singing of a hymn Mr. Goodridge spoke earnestly for a few moments on the subject of "Growth in Spiritual Things."

At eleven o'clock the president, Mr. Richard C. Humphreys, took the chair. The minutes of the previous meeting were read and approved. The following committees were then appointed: on nominating a list of officers for the ensuing year, Mr. James N. Ellis of West Dedham, Miss Joanna Rotch of Milton, and Rev. Solon W. Bush of Boston; on nominating a delegation of three to represent the conference at the meeting of the National Conference at Washington in October, Mr. George Dexter of Dorchester, Rev. W. H. Fish, Jr., of Dedham, and Mrs. Charles S. Hathaway of Randolph. The former committee will give its report at the annual meeting in the fall. The latter committee later in the day presented the names of Mr. E. A. Cushing of Dorchester, Mrs. George F. Fisher of Dedham, and Mrs. Samuel Phipps of Dorchester to serve as delegates to the National Conference; and they were elected in due form.

The principal address of the morning was given by Rev. Roderick Stebbins of Milton, on "The Religious Opportunities of To-day." In a graphic and practical fashion this theme was developed and illustrated. "The home, the school, and the church all afford opportunities," the speaker insisted with emphasis, "for the inculcation of the true religious spirit."

The whole tone of the address was hopeful and encouraging, pointing the way to an ever-brightening future for the race. Rev. L. R. Daniels of South Natick and Rev. P. S. Thacher of Needham opened the discussion with brief remarks uttered in the same cheerful vein, and were followed by Rev. Eugene R. Shippen of Dorchester, Rev. Charles A. Humphreys of Randolph, Miss Elizabeth P. Channing of Milton, and the president. The uses of family prayers, the helpfulness and comfort of some phase of this service, was the point in the main address dwelt upon most by the various speakers.

About one o'clock Rev. Mr. Jenks, the pastor of the church at Canton, in his capacity as host, invited the delegates to partake of a bountiful collation which had been prepared by willing hands in the adjoining parish house.

At the opening of the afternoon session Rev. L. R. Daniels, in behalf of the Unitarian society in Sherborn, asked the conference to meet in that place on the occasion of its annual meeting in October, an invitation which was gratefully accepted. The collection for conference uses was announced by the treasurer to be $30.78. The gift of $50 from the Norfolk Unitarian Club was also appropriately referred to, and acknowledged by a hearty vote of thanks. Rev. E. A. Horton of Boston, the president of the Unitarian Sunday School Society, then made an address upon the subject, "What can we do to improve our Sunday-schools?" He was followed by Rev. F. B. Mott of Dorchester and Rev. John A. Savage of Medfield, who gave many valuable suggestions along the same line of argument and appeal. The discussion was closed by the president, who dwelt upon the part the personality of each teacher had to play in the proper instruction of the child.

After votes of thanks to the Canton friends for their generous hospitality, and to the principal speakers of the day for their "golden words," the meeting closed with a benediction by Rev. W. H. Fish, Jr. E. Q. S. Osgood, Secretary.

AMERICAN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.—The board of directors of the American Unitarian Association held their regular monthly meeting at their rooms, 25 Beacon Street, Tuesday, June 11. There were present Messrs. Ames, Batchelor, Brown, Butler, Dole, S. A. Eliot, Fox, Howe, Little, Long, Lyman, Savage, and Wadlin. The president appointed standing committees for the year:—

Finance: Arthur T. Lyman, Hon. Henry J. Hosmer, Henry B. Wells, John Mason Little, and George W. Stone.

Publication: Rev. Charles F. Dole, Rev. Charles G. Ames, Archibald M. Howe, Rev. Samuel A. Eliot, and Mrs. Kate Gannett Wells.

New England States: Hon. Henry J. Hosmer, Archibald M. Howe, Mrs. S. E. Hooper, Mrs. S. H. Bullard, and Rev. Elery C. Butler.

Middle and Southern States: Rev. Howard N. Brown, Rev. Samuel A. Eliot, Henry B. Wells, Mrs. T. C. Williams, and John Mason Little.

Western States: Rev. William W. Fenn, Rev. Minot J. Savage, Francis Cutting, Mrs. Kate Gannett Wells, and John Mason Little.

Pacific Coast: Rev. T. L. Eliot, Arthur T. Lyman, Rev. Charles G. Ames, Francis Cutting, and Mrs. S. E. Hooper.

Foreign Missions: Rev. Howard N. Brown, Rev. W. W. Fenn, Rev. Ellery C. Butler, Rev. T. L. Eliot, and Mrs. T. C. Williams.

Education: Rev. H. N. Brown, Rev. Charles F. Dole, Rev. T. L. Eliot, A. M. Howe, and Mrs. S. E. Bullard.

Executive Committee: Rev. Howard N. Brown, Rev. Charles G. Ames, Rev. Minot J. Savage, Mrs. S. E. Hooper, John Mason Little, Rev. E. C. Butler, Mrs. S. E. Bullard, and George W. Stone.

The Committee on the Montana Industrial School was reappointed to serve so long as may be necessary to complete the transfer to the United States government, and to settle the affairs of the school. As trustees of the Church Building Loan Fund, the board elected Messrs. Charles P. Ware, Rev. Howard N. Brown, Henry W. Putnam, Rev. Samuel M. Crothers, Rev. William L. Chaffin, and Rev. S. A. Eliot.

An official copy of the following resolutions, passed at the recent meeting of the Western Unitarian Conference, was received from Rev. A. W. Gould, secretary:

"Resolved, That each of the various State and district Unitarian conferences shall be invited to nominate triennially one member of its board to serve for three years, or until a successor is chosen in the same way, as a director of the Western Unitarian Conference. The representatives so nominated, when elected by the Western Unitarian Conference, shall, together with the president and secretary of the conference, constitute the Missionary Council a standing committee of the board of directors of the Western Unitarian Conference, whose duty shall be to assist and advise the secretary of the conference in all matters pertaining to missionary work.

"Resolved, second, That it is a part of this plan of co-operation that, when the Missionary Council has been constituted, it shall become the agent and adviser of the American Unitarian Association within the limits of the Western Unitarian Conference; and that it shall also have the privilege of submitting annually to the Nominating Committee of the American Unitarian Association the names of those persons whom it would like to have as representatives of the West upon the American Unitarian Association Board."

These resolutions were referred to the committee, consisting of the secretary and Messrs. Brown and Savage, with instruction to report some recommendation at an adjourned meeting to be held on the 21st inst., and that Mr. Forbush be invited to attend.

The hour of future meetings of the board was fixed at two o'clock.

A resolution offered at the annual meeting concerning the relief of indigent ministers was referred to the Executive Committee.

A resolution concerning the state of the country and the promotion of patriotism was laid upon the table.

The appropriation for summer preaching was increased to $500, to be expended at the discretion of the secretary.

The question of amending the by-laws so as to define the duties of the treasurer and other officers, so far as they are affected by the appointment of a salaried treasurer, was referred to a joint committee, consisting of the Executive and Finance Committees. The Finance Committee was instructed to report the salaries of officers of the Association for the current year. Adjourned.

An adjourned meeting of the board of directors of the American Unitarian Association was held at 25 Beacon Street, Friday, June 21. Present, Messrs. Ames, Batchelor, Butler, Dole, S. A. Eliot, Fox, Hosmer, Howe, Little, Lyman, Savage, Mrs. Hooper, Mrs. Wells, and Mrs. Williams. In the absence of the president, Mr. Lyman took the chair. The Finance Committee reported a list of salaries for the current year: secretary, $3,500; treasurer, $3,500; assistant secretary, $2,500; clerk, $75 a month; stenographer, $12 a week; engineer, $17; porter, $15; boy, $5.

The Committee on Publication was granted authority to revise the list of tracts and to destroy the plates of such as were discontinued, reporting their action to the board. Gifts of Unitarian books were granted to the New Hampshire State Library; Public Library of Riverside, Cal.; Library Association, Perry, Ia.; Town Library, Ashland, N.H.

Appropriations were made to Providence, R.I., Fourth Church, $300, for six months from July 1; St. John, N.B., $500, for ten months from July 1; Albany, N.Y., to Rev. William M. Brundage, to include missionary work in neighboring towns, $150 a month for eight months from May 1, 1895. The appropriation for the salary of Rev. C. W. Wendte was corrected so as to cover the last quarter of the current year.

The special committee, consisting of the secretary, Rev. M. J. Savage and Rev. Howard N. Brown, appointed to consider a communication from the Western Conference, which was attended by Messrs. Savage and Brown, made the following report:

"Whereas the Western Unitarian Conference, at its last annual meeting, adopted a resolution containing the outline of a plan for securing a more effective co-operation of the Unitarian churches of the West, with one another and with the American Unitarian Association, and this resolution has been duly reported to the directors of this Association for their consideration, therefore,—

"Resolved, That we hereby express our approval of the purpose which the resolution above referred to seeks to accomplish.

While we do not wish, at this time, to bind ourselves to acceptance of this proposed plan in all details, we none the less commend it to the careful thought of those State and district organizations whose approval is necessary to its success. Until we know their decision, we deem it inexpedient to take further action; but, should they see fit to constitute a Missionary Council, in the manner specified by the resolution of the Western Conference, we venture to express the hope that all questions pertaining to our work in the West can be settled by consultation between the bodies chiefly interested."

"As the clause concerning the mode of nominating the directors of the American Unitarian Association is not essential to the working efficiency of the rest of the plan, and introduces a revolutionary idea which would affect all the departments, we suggest that this have separate consideration."

Mr. Forbush made a statement which was followed by a general discussion. As it seemed impossible to come to any definite conclusion about the various details of the working scheme presented, and as the adoption of the plan depends in the first place upon its cordial acceptance by all the State and district conferences concerned, the directors voted to instruct the secretary to write to each of the local secretaries a letter describing the general attitude of the Association toward the proposed plan, and asking for the advice of the conferences.

(Such a letter will be prepared and published.) The directors approved the appointment of Mrs. Fanny B. Ames of Boston, Mrs. Mary P. Wells Smith of Cincinnati, Ohio, Miss Eliza B. Leonard of Greenfield, Mass., as trustees of the Prospect Hill School, Greenfield, Mass.

A letter of Mr. Chaney concerning the Atlanta Exposition was read; and the secretary was authorized to expend in co-operation with Mr. Chaney, for a Unitarian exhibit, a sum not exceeding $100.

Adjourned.

Business Notices.

A Tour through Japan.—Messrs. Raymond & Whitcomb's latest announcement is full of interest. It is of a tour through Japan and a part of China, with an incidental visit to Honolulu, and a further opportunity to make a tour of nearly three weeks through the Hawaiian Islands, if desired. The party will leave Boston September 2, or, if the Hawaiian tour is included, August 14. The journey through Japan, which will be very comprehensive, will occupy October and November, the visit to Hong Kong, Macao, and the great Chinese city of Canton following. An interesting book descriptive of the route has been issued. This may be obtained free by addressing Messrs. Raymond & Whitcomb, 296 Washington Street.

They come from the Ottoman Empire.—Every artist and lover of art furnishings realizes the value of a low Turkish table. In any apartment, placed beside a sofa or easy-chair, it gives the room the last finishing touch needed to make it both artistic and thoroughly enjoyable. Preference should always be given to the genuine imported Turkish tables in important rooms where the highest artistic beauty is desired. These Turkish tables are becoming more scarce every day; and it is doubtful if they can be had after this season, except at exorbitant prices. The only place in this city which is now selling them at the former low prices of a few years ago is at the warerooms of the Paine Furniture Company on Canal Street.

Dr. Lyon's Perfect Tooth Powder
Gives the most perfect satisfaction. It has a world-wide reputation. Recommended by dentists.

Marriages.

In Boston, 20th inst., by Rev. Charles G. Ames, Nicholas Paine Gilman and Mary Sherwood Stubbs.
In Ashby, 22d inst., by Rev. Geo. S. Shaw, Osmond C. Kimball and Alice M. Braham, both of Ashby.
In Taunton, 19th inst., at the Unitarian church, by Rev. John P. Forbes, Augustus Richmond Peirce, of Providence, and Ida Ellen Wilson, of Taunton.

Deaths.

At Elyria, Ohio, 6th inst., Dr. L. C. Kelsey.
Lorenzo Conant Kelsey was born at Whiting, Vt., July 18, 1824, and attended the common schools and Brandon Seminary in his boyhood. At the age of seventeen he went to Oberlin, Ohio, to attend college, and taught in the district schools to support himself. He left college in the sophomore year, and went to Geneva, Ill., and there taught a select school with marked success. He subsequently returned to Ohio, and located at Mt. Vernon, where for two years he studied dentistry with his brother, Dr. C. M. Kelsey. After completing his studies in dentistry, he located and practised his profession at Gallon, Ohio, where he remained about two years. Wishing for a wider field of activity and thought, he entered the Unitarian theological school at Meadville, Pa., from which institution he was honorably graduated in 1854, after which he moved to Dixon, Ill., and formed a Unitarian society, raised funds for the erection of a fine church edifice, and remained its pastor for almost three years.

When the war broke out, he enlisted in the 124th Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and remained in the army until after the close of the war. He participated in several engagements, notably those of Port Gibson, Raymond, Champion Hills, and the siege of Vicksburg. After the fall of Vicksburg he was detailed as chief clerk at the headquarters of Gen. Maltby. On his discharge he settled permanently in Elyria, where he has since been a successful practitioner of dentistry.

He was a man of more than ordinary literary attainments, and up to the time of his death took an active interest in the liberal thought of the day. He filled the office of city clerk most acceptably for nearly a quarter of a century. He was widely known, and held in high esteem by the entire community.

Religious Notices.

THE address of Rev. Carl G. Horst is Athol, Mass.

WANTED.

THE UNITARIAN for APRIL, 1886.

One copy to complete file by a Post-office Mission on Pacific Coast. Any person willing to donate a copy for this purpose will please send it to P.O. M., care Geo. H. Ellis, 141 Franklin Street, Boston.

SUMMER REST.

The "OLD MANSE," Amherst, N.H. Large, elegant rooms, luxurious bed and board. Pianos, library. Near post-office. Register and Transcript at hand. Circulars.

E. A. SAWTELLE, Proprietor.

Situation Wanted

By a young man 18 years old (graduate of Bryant & Stratton's) in some business where faithfulness and application will count for future advancement. Address H. A. E., Office Christian Register.

Newton Rest-Cure.

The Befriending Committee of the Women's Educational and Industrial Union wish to call the attention of ladies temporarily disabled through nervous diseases to the favorable terms they have made at the Newton Rest-Cure.

For further particulars address the BEFRIENDING COMMITTEE, 264 Boylston Street, Boston.

For the Christian Register.
SONNET.

BY REV. JAMES C. HODGINS.

One day I stood lamenting death and pain,
Sorrowing that youth, wit, beauty, all should fade,
Having no power to fight death's ceaseless raid;
And my soul cried: Why urge to nobler strain?
What for this desperate struggle? What the gain?
Straight the world's sorrow smote me, and afraid
I cried to God, and all foreboding laid Bare in his sight; nor did I aught restrain.

Then a tall angel with sweet, gracious speech
Spoke to me gently, looking in mine eyes:
"O mortal! not for this thy God beseech:
Death is the prelude before paradise.
Pray thou that life may this one lesson teach,—
That every joy demands a sacrifice."

The Pulpit.

EDMUND B. WILLSON.

BY REV. GEO. T. LATIMER.

"For the prophecy came not in old time by the will of men; but holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost."—2 PETER i. 21.

In the Christian ministry there have always been found two distinct types of mind,—the prophetic and the priestly. The progress of Christianity has been due to their interaction. To the former we owe the fresh insight, escape from ecclesiastical tyranny, our spiritual self-reliance; to the latter we owe the preservation of the religious truth, the devotional aids for the flagging spirit, the vast missionary enterprise. The prophet has given us inspiration: the priest has given us organization. Both are essential for the maintenance of the religious life. The message of Jesus was preserved by the doctrinal system and missionary labors of Saint Paul. And this wide-spread and truly wonderful institution we call the Christian Church has maintained itself and increased its influence in these many centuries because the voices of its prophets have given it fresh and recreative inspiration. The prophetic spirit is indifferent to religious forms. It dreads ecclesiastical machinery, it looks askance at the multiplication of church activities, it doubts the value of missionary labors, it dislikes the sectarian spirit. It is an appeal of mind to mind, of life to life: deep calling unto deep.

The priestly spirit, on the other hand, lays great stress upon the organization of the religious life. It sees the inherent weaknesses of human nature, and would guard it by firm and adequate walls of daily ritual. It holds its particular truth very much as a fixed star by which it can measure its own earthly course. It boasts of its converts; and its work is highly effectual, because of its minute and marvellous organization.

It is difficult to see how either prophet or priest could be spared from the Christian ministry. We draw our inspiration from Jesus and A Kempis, from Emerson and Martineau; but the glorious gains of organized Christianity are due to Saint Paul and Hildebrand, to Calvin and Wesley. Spirit and organization,—these are the essential requisites for the conversion of the world. Unless it is retained in some institution, the finest inspiration may eddy away, like released oxygen, into the cold currents of the higher atmosphere; while the most elaborate propaganda is merely the whirring of dangerous machinery, unless it perpetuates some spiritual attainment. It is when the spirit of the living creature is in the wheels that Christianity moves on its triumphal way.

I have purposely made this contrast of the prophetic and priestly function striking, as, indeed, it is when we think of the most conspicuous examples, the formative influences in Christian history. It is not always so clearly seen, however, in the profession; for there are few prophets who are not identified with a church to whose welfare they are pledged, and there are few priests who do not treasure the spiritual truth above the form that expresses it. But each clergyman, by the particular trend of his spirit, conceives of his ministry in either the prophetic or the priestly mode. And each with his ideal of service, each with his distinct contribution of insight or of method, is needed in the upbuilding of the Christian community.

The late pastor of this society may well stand for the prophet in the Christian ministry. It is significant that on his last appearance in this pulpit he referred at length to the venerable Dr. Martineau, whose influence has been so great upon his own life. For each had the same lofty conception of the pastoral office. There was nothing of the priest in their minds. They had a distrust of organization. Their reliance was upon spiritual insight, and they feared its deterioration as societies multiplied and church functions became specialized. Their idea of the sermon was alike,—a lyric meditation upon some important theme, the efflorescence of carefully trained thought.

There is a conception of the ministry to-day, widely prevalent, with which these men have had no sympathy. Many a society seeking a pastor says, in effect, "Our society is not as prosperous as it was once, as it may be again; and we must have a man who will assure our growth, who will fill the church, and the church treasury as well."

Such a spirit would seem to these men a species of simony, trafficking in holy offices. Like that ancient Hebrew prophet asked to prophesy pleasant things for his monarch, the pastor of this church would have answered, "As the Lord liveth, what the Lord saith unto me that will I speak." His words might or might not fill the pews with eager listeners: that was not in his consideration. It was to your honor as well as his own that he disdained all attempts at rhetoric and oratory, and spoke from week to week, in the language of daily intercourse, the words that seemed of timely need. And these words were not of the little eddies of newspaper events, but they were of the deep currents of our spiritual life. The pulpit was not the place for the discussion of the art or literature or politics of the day: these were the lawful and fruitful topics of newspaper and review. But it was his duty and privilege to guide you, with a fine spiritual insight, among the religious and moral issues in this age of broader views and deeper insight. Such a conception of the ministry meant respect for your intellectual freedom as well as for his own. It will not be forgotten that on that last Sunday he paid a high compliment to the character of this congregation,—to the personal influence of its members, and to that fine tolerance that willingly gave its pastor the freedom of pulpit utterance. He never wished unduly to urge upon you any course of action, any system of doctrine, any critical opinion, even any moral reform; but he gave you his ideas, he asked your sympathy and co-operation, and there he paused. Your integrity of mind he respected even as his own. Scholarly by nature, progressive in his spirit, he was conversant with the changing thought of this century, and frankly, fearlessly, offered you the teaching he had himself verified, in the full confidence that, whether or not you accepted the new view, at least you would recognize his performance of duty. It was so, likewise, when a distinctly moral issue was at stake. Twice in this long ministry of thirty-six years he felt called to take a position that was political only less than it was moral.

At the beginning of Mr. Willson's ministry slavery was the all-important topic of the hour, and then his voice was heard with no uncertain sound. In 1884 the question of reform in a great political party agitated men's minds, and led to the secession of a large and valuable contingent. Again that voice was heard, and with no uncertain sound, as moral issues seemed to overtower all political consequences. And in both these times of heated party feeling, of widely divergent views, he simply and bravely used that right of personal influence he always urged upon you. And you, to whom it must be a fit matter of pride and cause for rejoicing to-day,—you did ample justice to that fineness of insight and that integrity of spirit. As a congregation, you were loyal to the man you had asked to lead you in moral issues; and, if you could not agree with all he said, you could admire the fearlessness of the man who appealed to you for moral support.

It is characteristic of this congregation, as it was of himself, that his public services were so great and varied. You were willing that no small portion of his time and strength should be given to our municipal interests, nobly feeling that the pastor of this society should be a minister at large in this busy community. And thus it was that in the dark days of 1863-64 you spared him from your midst, that he might go to the front with his Salem friends and parishioners. And again, twenty years later, you were willing he should carry his judicial mind and wide experience to the legislature, where he did honorable work in the cause of education.

But how many of them there are, these positions of public trust to which the city welfare called him! As president of the Salem Fraternity, as a member of the School Board for many years, as president of our Prison Reform Association, as trustee of the Salem Athenæum, as president of the Essex Institute, as trustee of the Plummer Farm School, he comes to our mind weighted with the cares of responsible office, associated with the educational and reform life of our city. No wise reform appealed to him in vain. It was sure of his sympathy, and, whenever possible, of his active co-operation. It is only last year he spoke for the public kindergarten, and only last winter he appeared at the State House in a hearing before the Prison Committee.

Here was a man whose ministry was to the whole city, one of the rare men who take time from special interests and private recreation to further the welfare of the community by an unrewarded, often unappreciated, public service. The pastor of a large and important society, he could still give a measure of his strength and talents to the secular movements that aim at a more beautiful public life.

Thus he naturally became the representative pastor of this city,—not merely from the length of his ministry, but even more from the breadth of his services, frequently summoned to appear at public functions, and conspicuously the one to speak for our own branch of the Christian Church on those not infrequent occasions when our Salem churches come together in "the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace."

I cannot better sum up this public life of Rev. Edmund B. Willson than by quoting his own words, when, twenty-three years ago, he preached the memorial sermon at the one hundredth anniversary of this North Society. Speaking of its first pastor, Dr. Barnard, he said: "If asked for what ideas or type of influence this church stood during these earliest forty-two years, I should say, taking its pastor as its representative, first, it stood for the religion of a true humanity,—a religion which made love to man the best expression of love to God; for that interpretation of Christianity which makes prominent its humane spirit." Such words may well speak for the ministry of thirty-six years that has just closed. Noble in his conception of the pastoral office, broad in his interpretation of Christianity, unwearied in the public service, the late successor of the patriotic and public-spirited Dr. Barnard has been worthy of his trust.

Behind the minister was the man. Such valuable public services inevitably come from a personal character strong, broad, active, devout. The stranger within our gates never looked upon that fine face, slightly ascetic, with its blended gentleness and strength, without the reflection that here he saw the rare character that our best New England life has yielded. "Suaviter in modo, fortiter in re," would be his quick comment, as he noted the contrast of the white hairs and slightly stooping figure with the keen dark eyes and firm-set lips. And personal acquaintance could only confirm this prophecy of strength of mind and courtesy of manner. Insistent, even inflexible, in his personal convictions, he could continue or waive argument with a high-bred courtesy that instinctively recalled the lines,—

"And thus he bore, without abuse,
The grand old name of gentleman,
Defamed by every charlatan,
And soiled with all ignoble use."

The occasional visitor who met him in brief intercourse, and you who have had the privilege of calling him friend and pastor, alike felt the influence of a rare personality, a certain distinction of the spirit, as it were, that lent force and dignity to even the commonplaces of conversation, but which found its natural interest in the lofty measures of reform and religious movements.

His mind was essentially, almost uniquely, just. He was able to see both sides of the disputed shield. Rare were the instances when he failed to be just to men or movements. It was said of him that among conservatives he spoke as a radical, and among radicals as a conservative. Any suspicion of injustice was a challenge to that judicial mind. A brother clergyman said of him that for thirty years he had maintained the balance of Christian doctrine in Essex County. And a parishioner has told me that, even as a youth, he was impressed by the strict impartiality of this judicial mind, that would accurately and fully present a view, only to add at the close,—

"But there is another side, and there are wise men who advocate the opposite view."

It has seemed to me that he was most natural, at his happiest, in the open discussion of a clerical club or a conference, when he summed up the pros and cons of argument with felicity of phrase, recognizing the sincerity of different speakers, admitting the full weight of another's opinion, and winning all hearts no less by the clearness of his thought than by his gracious personality. To this eminently judicial mind was largely due his unique position in this community. His indorsement of a man or a measure carried great weight. It was felt that he was quick to perceive the good in an individual or in an institution. He had very little of the sectarian spirit, for he put his faith in the Church Universal. Instances of clerical intolerance, not entirely unknown in our New England life, impressed him very much as the discovery of a seventeenth-century manuscript in the Essex Institute might have done. As an historical student, he was interested in a theological "find," slightly amused by a bigoted doctrine, never doubting the advance of rational theology.

It has been said of oratory by a man of great insight, "It is always the more impressive for the spice of temper that renders it less trustworthy." In this man's word there was no "spice of temper," but instead a serenity of spirit, a breadth of view, a clearness of perception where moral issues were at stake, that well befitted the white hairs and years of service. The listener in this congregation must often have been reminded of the ancient words, "For the prophecy came not in old time by the will of men, but holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost." It was as if some spiritual judge sat in judgment upon the strife of restless men, referring them to the immutable laws of righteousness.

And yet the observer would err who could not see that there was a latent passion under those calm words which an immediate moral issue might fan into flame. Under the snowy head slumbered a volcano that could bury under its scorn and weight of argument the moral offender. Pettiness of spirit, injustice, inhumanity, cruelty,—these traits it was not well to express in his presence. But the occasion for this moral indignation came seldom. You remember rather the slight figure that stood in this pulpit as you grew from childhood to youth, and from youth into manhood, with its serene, saintly face, born spiritual, as were the faces of Newman and Emerson and Martineau, while that sympathetic, reverent voice reasoned of "righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come." It made the public worship of this church more vital when such a man led your public devotions, and his parting benediction was a light upon the upward path.

It were unfair not to refer to that element of self-distrust in his nature, the resultant of his high conception of the qualities of leadership, and his judicial mind, that played around the many aspects of our modern problems. His doubt of himself when he entered the ministry never left him: it always returned to plague him, and the frequent assurance of his friends was needed to restore his confidence in his own work. It was this deep-seated self-distrust, this true humility of spirit, that limited his voice and services in these mature years to this country. Here he found a field opportune, large, fruitful, for his public spirit. Our civic loss is the greater because a natural and unusual modesty made him content with this comparatively limited field of service. He was not allured by the sirens of literary recreation, nor was he lustful to conquer a metropolitan world; but here, in this historic and beautiful old town, he passed his ripe years in a happy service, a familiar figure on the street, a welcome visitor in your homes, and a voice that in moral issues became a trumpet and blew "soul-animating strains."

Of his home life—tender, beautiful, devoted, "the plain living and high thinking" of the poet's ideal—it is not for me to speak. Of his public life, as an associate and admirer, I have ventured to speak, keenly feeling the apparent presumption of such an estimate of his public services by a new-comer. But, as I have been able, I have spoken, finding it a duty and a privilege to bear some slight witness to that long, useful, honored life.

With your grief for our common loss there is mingled the joy for his personal victory. He fought a good fight, he finished his course, he kept the faith. He left us as he wished,—not in "the enforced leisure of slow pain," but in full armor and in the front rank. We mourn the friend: we triumph with the hero. There remains for us the inspiration of a crusading spirit, ever in the field to relieve distress, ever armed to rescue the sacred city of humanity. Devout in spirit, loyal to his Master, consecrated to the service of his fellow-men, this rare personality is not lost to us, but still lives among us,— "In minds made better by his presence, . . . In pulses stirred to generosity, In deeds of daring rectitude, in scorn For miserable aims that end with self."

THE RESURRECTION OF JESUS.

BY DR. HEBER NEWTON.

For years my humble endeavor has been to set before those who listen to me a thought of Christ which finds in him the norm and type of humanity,—the ideal man in whose nature we are to see our own true nature, in whose powers we are to read our own potentialities, in whose experience we are to find the law of our true life.

His experience of the supreme mystery of death was, therefore, in my view, of necessity, no mere exception to the general experience of man, but the interpretation of that experience, the historic illustration of that great transformation. . . . In this way we can read in his post-resurrection life some hints of the nature and capacities of our own life after death, because thus the one great historic witness to the life beyond became an illustration of the general law of the transition from this world to the world to come rather than a violation of that law, and because faith was thus eased instead of being superfluously burdened.

That I am not wholly alone in this judgment is shown by one letter out of many which I have received. In this letter one of the most distinguished jurists of the country thus writes: "I have not only been gratified, but relieved in my own mind, by what you have said about the resurrection of our Saviour. The popular view of this matter has always been a stumbling-block to me. I have always believed that Christ was raised from the dead just as we all shall be, with this difference,—that his glorified body was seen by the faithful, to strengthen their faith and round out the lesson of this life." . . .

In January of this year there appeared a "Pastoral Letter" from our House of Bishops which many among us felt to be very dangerous to the liberties of thought in our Church, by its assuming to interpret the creeds authoritatively. The silence which followed that remarkable letter is not to be construed as an acquiescence in that pronouncement. For one, I could not have yielded such acquiescence. I was sorely constrained to an open criticism of that letter. One consideration which restrained me was the fear that, if I ventured any open criticism, grace would not be sufficiently abounding to preserve me from making that criticism of my ecclesiastical superiors somewhat caustic. One other course remained, as a relief to my own mind and conscience. This was to make a silent protest against that letter, by exercising the right of interpreting the creeds in a way to render it clear that the bishop of New York was entirely right when he declared, in his letter to the Tribune, that the "Pastoral Letter" had "no conciliar authority."

At least three of the four points discussed in the letter were not open to such a treatment. For one, I found no fault with the language of the letter concerning the incarnation. I am a thorough Athanasian. My only fault with this section of the letter was that it failed to meet the needs of our age by translating the language of ancient Athanasianism into the philosophic thought and speech of our day, so as to lead men to find in the Nicene Creed the key to that larger vision of the incarnation which is gained by our modern mind, in the spiritual interpretation of nature and of man.

As touching the doctrine of the miraculous birth of Christ, I am, for one, far from denying this article of the faith. If I ever feel constrained to deny it, I must leave our Church. The only thing that could ever constrain me to deny it would be that, as the result of new critical finds, the evidence should become overwhelming against the historical character of this belief. Until this takes place, I am content with an assent to the Church's traditional belief, holding always, with the Head of the Church, that the letter killeth while the spirit maketh alive, in the words of the Church as in those of its Head. What I object to on this point is the emphasis which the "Pastoral Letter" places upon this article of the creed,—an emphasis which is as far as possible removed from the temper of the New Testament records, in which Paul makes no reference to this belief, and John passes it by in silence,—the silence of a spiritual philosophy which has no need for emphasizing a material fact.

The last point of the "Pastoral Letter" admitted of no direct issue, for the simple reason that, for one, I could not understand what our bishops meant in their language concerning inspiration.

There was, therefore, just one point on which such a direct issue could be raised. Resurrecting the Thirty-nine Articles from their comfortable slumber, the "Pastoral Letter" interpreted the noble reticence of the Nicene Creed by the loquaciousness of the articles, and affirmed that Christ rose in his body of flesh and bones. Not content with giving this dogmatic interpretation to the undogmatic language of the creeds, the "Pastoral Letter" insisted upon this as the only allowable interpretation of the creeds. For years I had held this forbidden view, but was content to assume it without emphasizing it. When the proper season came round in the Christian year, I affirmed my reasons for holding it, and thus exercised the right which had been apparently denied.

It is now evident that the "Pastoral Letter" has "no conciliar authority," since a view which it had emphatically condemned is seen to be a legitimate interpretation of the creeds, held by men of widely different thought on other matters, and allowed utterance within our Church.

It is clear, therefore, that our liberty of interpreting the creeds, seemingly endangered by the "Pastoral Letter," is in reality safe.—The Outlook.

ON THE DEATH OF JESUS.*

BY SAMUEL DAVIDSON.

On this fertile but melancholy subject I can but touch the most important points which have recently occupied my attention, and have divided the opinions of serious thinkers. The space appropriated to subjects like the present, even in a religious newspaper, is not large; but I will endeavor to compress my observations.

Jesus foresaw and foretold his own death. He went to meet it with willing submission to his Father's will. It was a unique martyrdom, though reported by the evangelists inaccurately. It is also probable that at the time he spoke of his death he did not omit his resurrection in order to comfort his disciples, but not in the way represented. Their unbelief of the fact is otherwise unaccountable. The three days appear to be derived from Hosea vi. 2.

The words which Jesus uttered on the cross as given by Matthew and Mark are "Eloi, Eloi, lama sabachthani?" (Mark xv. 34; compare Matt. xxvii. 46.) This exclamation seems one of agonizing pain. Luke, however, supplements the dying exclamation by "Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do," and "Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit" (xxiii. 34, 46), the former of which has been questioned as to its genuineness, chiefly because it is bracketed. A subsequent corrector, however, has tried to efface the brackets. The spuriousness is defended in an elaborate note by Dr. Hort, who calls it a Western interpolation. But it has the support of the Sinaitic manuscript and

* Written before Mr. Gladstone's on the same subject appeared.

Irenæus; and, on the whole, the weight of evidence favors it. As to the exclamation contained in the Fourth Gospel, "It is finished," as if it were the expression of triumphant joy that the great consummation had at last arrived, it is evidently the gospel writer's. Luke makes one of the robbers crucified with Jesus a penitent, who is about to enter Paradise along with his Saviour; but this disagrees with Matthew's account, and is improbable.

The protracted series of sufferings which began at Gethsemane and ended on the cross, as described in Matthew's Gospel, cannot be read without emotion. The solitary sufferer, availing himself of the sympathy of friends who, he well knew, could render no help, is a figure that attracts and fixes the deepest feelings of our nature. He stands out peculiarly and distinctively human. Was something veiled from our view in the agonizing death of Jesus? The manifestations of mental anguish have been supposed to indicate something peculiarly mysterious, and the Christian Church generally has entertained the belief that Jesus was expiating human sin. This theory has been offered to account for what seems mysterious in the sufferings and death of Jesus, lifting him out of the category of ordinary martyrs; but, as far as the gospel accounts reach, it is unnoticed. Although Jesus himself speaks of his death in various aspects, the atonement theory does not appear. And yet the death was to take place according to prophecy (Isaiah liii.). It was the seal of his doctrine, and his followers must be partakers of it in spirit. Such allusions as to the effect of his death are contained in the Synoptics, and even the Fourth Gospel expresses no doctrine of propitiation while speaking of his dying for the salvation of the world. General statements of this kind are remote from the specific nature of an atonement for the accumulated sins of humanity. There is but one real echo of expiation in the Synoptic Gospels; namely, "For this is my blood of the New Testament, which is shed for many for the remission of sins" (Matt. xxvi. 28). It is observable that Mark omits part of the words, and that only Luke has them exactly. It is evident that the clause "for many for the remission of sins" is a late addition.

Should any wish to add another and later echo of the atonement to the above expression, such as Matthew xx. 28, "a ransom for many," I do not object.

In the absence of a genuine statement in the Synoptic Gospels that Jesus' sufferings and death constituted a great expiatory sacrifice for the sins of the world, we have not far to seek. The doctrine is apostolic, having been developed out of the death of Jesus by Paul. Nor is it the only development from the same source, for that of justification by faith alone belongs to the same origin. Theologians have taken apostolic doctrines and put them on the shoulders of Jesus. The great apostle of the Gentiles is answerable for most of them. All their value belongs to him; and the creeds of the Christian Church have done Paul full justice in readily accepting them. But I disagree with theologians who set the teachings of any man on a par with those of Jesus. Had development stopped with Paul, Christianity would have presented a peculiar form of Arianism. But his disciples, the authors of the Colossian and Ephesian Epistles, continued the process until it came in contact with the philosophy of Alexandria, and under the influence of various Church Fathers settled down into the Nicene Creed, which has dominated the field of theology ever since the fourth century.

The majority of professing Christians seem to like a long creed, if it be metaphysical and antagonistic, a fancied bulwark against error.

Spiritual Life.

"Where grows the golden grain?
Where faith? Where sympathy?
In a furrow cut by pain."—Exchange.

The Spirit of God, buried in the heart, passes out into action. This is Christian life.—F. W. R.

Perseverance.—The weakest living creature, by concentrating his powers on a single object, can accomplish something; the strongest, by dispersing his over many, may fail to accomplish anything.—Carlyle.

There are certain manners which are learned in good society, of that force that, if a person have them, he or she must be considered, and is everywhere welcome, though without beauty or wealth or genius.—Emerson.

Your suffering blesses others; it teaches you sympathy; it gives them firmness and example. No man dieth to himself; for his pain and loss is for others, and, unconsciously to himself, brings with it to others joy and gain.—F. W. Robertson.

If a man deserves praise, be sure that you give it to him, else you not only run a chance of driving him from the right road by want of encouragement, but you deprive yourselves of the happiest privilege you will ever have of rewarding his labor.—Ruskin.

All truly consecrated men learn little by little that what they are consecrated to is not joy or sorrow, but a divine idea and a profound obedience, which can find their full outward expression, not in joy and not in sorrow, but in the mysterious and inseparable blending of the two.—Phillips Brooks.

It is no great matter to associate with the good and gentle; for this is naturally pleasing to all. But to be able to live peaceably with hard and perverse persons, or with the disorderly, or with such as go contrary to us, is a great grace and a most commendable and manly thing.—Thomas à Kempis.

A little prayer composed by Robert Louis Stevenson has this passage: "Go with each of us to rest: if any awake, temper to them the dark hours of watching; and when the day returns to us, our sun and comforter, call us with morning faces and with morning hearts, eager to labor, eager to be happy, if happiness shall be our portion."

Make yourselves nests of pleasant thoughts. None of us yet know, for none of us have been taught in early youth, what fairy palaces we may build of beautiful thought, proof against all adversity,—bright fancies, satisfied memories, noble histories, faithful sayings, treasure-houses of precious and restful thoughts.—Ruskin.

Consider the relations of reason to the Bible. This book makes its appeal to man's heart on the basis of having already conquered his intellect. It asks no man to take anything for granted. It covets analysis and challenges proofs. The trustworthiness of reason is everywhere assumed. It could not be otherwise, since man is in the small what God is in the large.—Dr. Hillis.

I see the autumn prefigured in the spring. As the bud now lying cold and close upon the bark of every tree throughout our northern clime is a silent prophecy of yet another spring and other summers, and harvests, too, so this instinctive love of justice, scantily budding here and nipped by adverse fate, silently, but clearly, tells of the kingdom of heaven.—Theodore Parker.

SPECIAL GLOVE SALE.

We have a fine lot of Five-button Dressed Kid Gloves in Black and Colors from the factory of our celebrated Duchesse Glove, made of slightly heavier kid than the Duchesse, but same cut and finish, and a great bargain at $1.00 PER PAIR.

Many poorer gloves are sold at $1.50.

Mail orders solicited.

CHANDLER & CO.,
Winter St., Boston.

Literature.

HISTORY OF THE UNITED STATES.*

A history of the United States that would be at once comprehensive, brief, and popular, without any base concessions to the groundlings in its form or spirit, has long been a desideratum. Since the appearance of J. R. Green's "Short History of the English People" our appetite for such a book has been more keen. Many of us have hoped that Dr. Fiske would write this history. He has the requisite knowledge and an unrivalled skill in exposition, and several of his books might be incorporated with little change in such a work as we desire. On the other hand, the proportions of his recent school history, and what a painter would call "the values" of its several parts, were not encouraging, though from a book less directly mercantile in its inspiration and of larger scope we might very properly expect something far more satisfactory. Mr. Higginson's "Larger History" and Mr. Goldwin Smith's were excellent books in their way, but too rapid and condensed to meet all the demands of the ideal short history, which must not be too short.

We have had many books that will prove extremely serviceable to the "not impossible he," when he arrives,—the great "Constitutional History" of Von Holst, Mr. Rhodes's and Mr. Henry Adams's excellent volumes, Mr. Bryce's admirable constitutional and social studies, with Mr. Woodrow Wilson's books, and a large number of political biographies, of which the exhaustive one of Garrison is easily the most important.

President Andrews's handsome volumes make a promise to the eye that they are the long-awaited thing, but they break this promise to our hope. They have many admirable qualities. They are written clearly and forcibly; they sweep a multitude of facts into their wide array; they give an impressive view of our political and social history; the majority of their political and moral judgments are such as stand approved by that common sense, that afterthought, which so frequently revises the contemporary judgments of the community. At the same time it must be confessed that the book is neither all that we could wish nor all that it deliberately declares itself to be in the preface, with seven specifications. There is hardly one of these the intention of which is not violated in the body of the work. A competent criticism has detected many inaccuracies,—some of them of slight importance, but others grave and difficult to understand. They carry with them, together with other characteristic features, a sense of hasty preparation and rapid composition, and make it easier to understand how the president of a college could write a history of such dimensions in connection with his official duties. Take, for example, the history of the Civil War. It is told in four chapters, with two additional chapters for the beginning and the end; and each of the four carries along the history to the end quite independently of the other. The fourth chapter, on the naval warfare and our foreign relations, follows the death of Lincoln, when the reader has imagined himself quite done with the whole business. Evidently, it is much easier to write history in this way than to bring together the different aspects of the struggle in one coherent view; but it is at the same time much less instructive.

The matter of relative emphasis on the different parts is one of the particulars in which President Andrews claims to have obeyed an exigent ideal. And yet he gives us eleven pages on Salem witchcraft, and only nineteen on the whole period extending from the end of the Revolution to the adoption of the new Constitution. We have thirteen pages on "The Fisheries Dispute" and seven on "Reconstruction." These may be the most glaring disproportions, but there are others which must arrest the attention of the most casual reader.

It is impossible to read the book, and not find one's self comparing it with Green's "Short History"; and the comparison is painfully disadvantageous to the American book in several particulars,—the style, the biographical sketches, and the method of presentation. The style of President Andrews's book, as if a nervous fear of being dull possessed him, often becomes newspaperish, with words and phrases bordering upon slang, and others smacking of the verbal manners of the Fourth of July oration. This fault is sometimes more than superficial: the style is inflated because the thought and sentiment behind it are so. There are passages which read like quotations from Mr. Andrew Carnegie's "Triumphant Democracy." For example: "In one artistic line we already excel every other people; namely, the application of the principles of taste in beautifying homes, churches, structures intended for business, such as exchanges, railway stations, and bridges, cars, and all kinds of machinery. We lead the world, too, in propriety and neatness of apparel,—at least, for men." In the concluding paragraphs there are sentences that sound like echoes of the pure and unadulterated Jingoism of Senators Frye and Lodge. Here are three of them:—

"Unless we are mistaken, one may observe a more or less conscious disposition on the part of thoughtful Americans to insist that this influence be exerted, to have the nation break over the policy wisely laid down by Washington, and again in the Monroe doctrine, for earlier times, and assert itself more in the parliament of man."

"Why should we not, without being meddlesome, strive to disseminate our ideas, extend our civilization, and make our nationality felt?"

"We do not prophesy, as more than one voice out of Europe itself has of late done, that the United States will some day cross the Atlantic as a conqueror."

Another fault of President Andrews's style is its avoidance of such homely words as "spade" and "silver." The latter is "the white metal," and the seceded States are "Secessia." This fault is rare, but another is extremely common. If this fault is not the man,—Le style c'est l'homme même,—it is the book, it is so pervasive. It is a fault like that which makes a picture "spotty." It is a predominance of short sentences, often two or three in succession which might easily be articulated into one.

Green's short biographical sketches are wonderfully good. The same cannot be said of President Andrews's. We have a number in Chapter VIII. "American Manhood in the Revolution," and others separately. Without exception, they are fragmentary and disjointed, lacking organic unity.

The method of presentation is a matter of even more importance. Green's method was that of ideal aggregation. That is, he so massed his facts as to bring out the ideal, the characteristic, quality; and he did this in a strong and memorable way. What a far cry it is to this from President Andrews's method can best be seen in his treatment of the anti-slavery conflict, where he makes the nearest approach to Green's method in treating of "The Monarchy," "Puritan England," and "The Revolution." And, by the way, the general character of "Immediate Abolition" is slovenly in the extreme. Lewis Tappan becomes "Louis"; Wendell Phillips's first speech is misplaced; both the Bible and the Liberator are misquoted in the words, "a league with death and an agreement with hell"; and there is no recognition of the fact that the Liberty Party made haste to substitute the territorial limitation of slavery for its abolition as "the mark of its high calling."

Difference from the method and manner of Green's "Short History" does not necessarily mean something less excellent, but President Andrews's differences from that noble book are certainly for the worse. It does not follow that the average reader or student could not add much to his knowledge of American history from reading and studying this book. Those, however, who care much for the root of the matter, with the least possible accretion of indifferent clay and sand, will fall back on Higginson and Goldwin Smith, and on Alexander Johnston's article in the Encyclopædia Britannica, and, within its limits, on Prof. Walker's recent and most admirable "Making of the Nation." No one of these, however, is the ideal "Short History of the United States," which President Andrews's disappointing volumes have not advanced a single step.

"OUT OF THE EAST." Reveries and Studies in New Japan. By Lafcadio Hearn. Boston and New York: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.—The author of "Glimpses of Unfamiliar Japan" has given us in this additional volume much that is of interest and value. Though this new venture is not so elaborate as the former, it helps in revealing the peculiarities of this interesting nation. The "Reveries" contain the author's opinions and speculations; but, in addition, we have much that lets us into the real life of the Japanese,—their religion, education, social life, literature, and national characteristics. The social life of Japan rests upon the idea of filial piety. In its social system marriage and the love to which it gives rise plays a subordinate part. Moreover, in Japanese literature of the best class, where love is the theme, it is not that sort of love which leads to the establishment of the family relation. This whole subject, including the typical woman and etiquette presented in the discussion, brings to light the radical difference between the social life of Japan and the West. In speaking of the question of Christian missions, the writer is very pronounced in his conviction "that the whole work of the foreign mission societies has been little more than a vast expenditure of energy, time, and money, to no real purpose." Whether one accepts this or not, what the author has to say on the subject deserves thoughtful consideration. The Western World has been astonished at the power and intense nationality of the Japanese as shown in the present war with China. This book reveals the sources of this power and patriotism. The whole system of education is such as to create an intense national spirit. The children are early trained to sing the songs of war. The youth are regularly drilled. The duty of loyalty to the emperor and the nation has the strength and intensity of an all-pervading passion. There are many other topics of interest treated in this last volume of Mr. Hearn which throw light on the character of this unique people, who in the future are destined to play so important a part in the history and civilization of the East. Many valuable suggestions will be found in these "Reveries and Studies of New Japan."

DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION AND THEIR TIMES. 1769-76. An Historical Romance. By Charles Carleton Coffin. Boston and New York: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.—The design of this volume is to portray the leading events and features of the struggle of the Revolution before actual hostilities, and extending to the evacuation of Boston by the British forces. We have here history woven upon the background of romance, so that we see in full action the various forces at work in the early phases of the Revolution. The various leaders move upon the stage, and the features of social life are portrayed. Upon the whole the author is correct in his representations of actual events; and the coloring of romance gives vividness to the facts of history. We see what an important part the daughters as well as the sons played in the drama, and the sacrifices and devotion which were displayed alike by rebel and loyalist. The work is designed chiefly for the young, and is admirably fitted to give them a correct idea of these important events, scenes, incidents, and spirit of the people. How far the author has succeeded may be illustrated by the following test. A lad to whom the book was given to read, as he came to the end, closed it with emphasis, exclaiming, "This is one of the most interesting books I ever read." The various illustrations, including both portraits of eminent persons and places of historic note, add to the value of the book. Mr. Coffin has succeeded in giving life to the dry skeleton of facts, and done good service by making this very important period so attractive to the young, while retaining the truth of history.

THE PHANTOMS OF THE FOOT-BRIDGE, AND OTHER STORIES. By Charles Egbert Craddock. Illustrated. New York: Harper & Brothers, Publishers.—Miss Murfree has given us in the present volume five of her stories, all characterized by the same vividness of description, strong individual personification, and dramatic power which mark what she has before written. Notwithstanding the scenes and characters belong to the region of the Tennessee Mountains, there is variety both in her descriptions of natural objects and delineations of character. The pictures of the home life are so real that the reader feels that he is dealing with actual scenes and persons. Here we see one of the striking peculiarities of Miss Murfree as a writer. Taking the rough and familiar life of these wild regions, she is true to nature, and portrays the essential features of human aspiration and passion which are found beneath all outward conditions. Love and hatred, selfishness and tender, self-sacrificing devotion, sordid greed and noble spiritual idealism, are drawn with powerful distinctness in the lives of these rude and rough mountaineers; and we thus have brought vividly before us the essential features which belong to human nature, whether in the palace or the shanty in the nook of the mountain. This ability to go beyond the conventional and recognize the realities of life is the mark of true genius. Few American writers have done this more fully than the author of these stories. The present volume has also illustrations which help us in our conceptions of the text.

THE LAND OF THE SUN: VISTAS MEXICANAS. By Christian Reid. Illustrated. New York: D. Appleton & Co.—This book is the sketch of a trip through Mexico put into the frame of a story. A party of six friends, three gentlemen and three ladies, are the actors in the drama; but the chief design is to give the reader an idea of the scenery, climate, churches, and cities of Mexico. The author sees with an accurate and observing eye, and describes what he sees in a vivid and graphic style. He has little sympathy with the changes which are taking place, and, in the spirit of Ruskin, turns with distaste, not to say disgust, from the influences of the railroad and the industrial features of the age, to dwell on the glories of the past. Hence little or nothing is said in these pages of the present forces which are working a revolution in this country, but very much of the climate, picturesque scenery, and the glories of the institutions, society, and monuments of the olden time. As the country abounds in magnificent churches, these are admired and described with the appreciative enthusiasm of the artist. The several characters introduced as sidelights give us touches of romance. The chief interest and value of this book is its descriptions of the scenery, climate, and buildings of "The Land of the Sun."

RIVERBY. By John Burroughs. Boston and New York: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.—The readers of this volume will have a twofold interest,—the first because it contains that keen and lively perception of nature for which John Burroughs is known. The second, the name Riverby is the place on the Hudson where these sketches were written, and where also, for years, the writer has "been an interested spectator of the life of nature, as with changing seasons it has ebbed and flowed past my door." This series of essays gathered into a volume covers a variety of topics, and has those high qualities for which the author is so well known. He not only sees with clear insight, but has also the power of making his readers see with him, as he walks among the wild flowers, catches glimpses of nature, studies bird-life in an old apple-tree, notes the birds' courtship and their eggs, or talks with young observers. This book is full of interesting and rich suggestions.

FAGOTS FOR THE FIRESIDE. One Hundred and Fifty Games and Amusements for Evenings at Home. By Lucretia Peabody Hale. New and Enlarged Edition, illustrated. Boston and New York: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.—The volume published years since by Miss Hale had so wide a circulation and excited so much interest that she has reprinted it with an addition of thirty

From Constantinople.

Our fashion of using low tables or tabourets was borrowed from the Turks, who to-day, more than any other nation, understand the employment of these low tables to the greatest advantage.

It is to the Ottoman Empire that we must turn for the best patterns. Here is one from Constantinople direct.

On the panelled top is emblazoned the Star and Crescent of Turkey. The proportions of this table are perfect, and its height from the floor makes it amenable to a dozen needs. They are always used for smoking and tea tables in artists' studios.

PAINE FURNITURE CO.,
48 CANAL STREET.

* HISTORY OF THE UNITED STATES. By E. Benjamin Andrews, President of Brown University. With maps. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.

new games, and among them golf has been introduced. This rich fund of one hundred and fifty suggestions for amusement furnishes a great variety from which can be drawn what is needed alike for out-door pastimes, summer rainy days or winter evenings, both for old and young. The very many who are familiar with the former book of Miss Hale will welcome their old favorite with its new additions, and those who have not known the former will find here valuable hints and suggestions.

A HISTORY OF THE UNITED STATES. By Allen C. Thomas, A.M. Boston: D. C. Heath & Co.—This work gives us briefly, accurately, and with judicial fairness the main facts of our history. Special attention has been given to the important events of the period, beginning with 1879 and extending to the present time, including the political, social, and economical development of the nation. The whole work is admirably done, and is enriched by maps, portraits taken from authentic sources, and an appendix containing information which throws additional light upon the topics treated. It is well adapted, both for the school and for home reference, as it presents in a very satisfactory manner much needful and valuable information of the history and progress of the United States.

RUSSIAN RAMBLES. By Isabel F. Hapgood. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $1.50.—Miss Hapgood possesses exceptional qualifications for writing such a book of travels. She is an intelligent, keen-witted observer, she knows her Russia as few book-writing Americans have had a chance to know it, and she has a supreme indifference as to the things she might be expected to say, caring only to give her own impressions of persons, customs, and conditions. The result is a vivacious and interesting book,—one which may be read for the information it contains, for its insight into the life of another nation, or merely for its charm of anecdote and description. Two chapters describe visits to Count Tolstoi in his summer home, and no part of the book is more valuable than this.

HISTORICAL SKETCH OF CHAUNCY HALL SCHOOL. With Catalogue of Teachers and Pupils. By Thomas Cushing, Boston.—Mr. Cushing, who is now in his eighty-second year, is a familiar figure in Boston. In writing the history of the school with which he was connected for many years, he had a congenial subject, and one which well deserves such treatment as he gives it. The aims and methods of a private school which has run for nearly seventy years a career of usefulness and prosperity, without any endowment or outside help, are certainly worth studying, independently of the especial interest which its history must have for its friends and graduates. The sketch of the condition of education in Boston between 1820 and 1830, though brief, is interesting.

THE PYGMIES. By A. de Quatrefages. Translated by Frederick Starr. New York: D. Appleton & Co.—Quatrefages died in 1892. The work here translated was written in 1887. No man did more to further anthropology in France, and his labors and influence have commanded both respect and confidence. The value of the ethnological studies depends more upon historic industry and comparison of physical characteristics than upon broader powers of generalization. The author never accepted the doctrine of evolution, though he believed in the extreme antiquity of man.

THE PRICE OF PEACE. By A. W. Ackerman. Chicago: A. C. McClurg & Co. $1.25.—This Biblical romance is a story of the times of Ahab, king of Israel. Its hero is the prophet Micaiah, and it offers a close study of his life and character. It is not easy reading,—at least, not until one has entered well into the book; but the task of constructing a consecutive, connected narrative has been performed at least with better taste than has always been the case in these Biblical stories. It will be chiefly interesting to those already familiar with these names and places.

HANDBOOK OF BIRDS OF EASTERN NORTH AMERICA. By Frank M. Chapman. New York: D. Appleton & Co.—This book about birds is made so free from technicalities that it may be used without a glossary, and it is written out of a personal experience with students and constant consideration of their needs. It gives keys to the species of birds, with descriptions of their plumage, nests, and eggs, their distribution and migrations, and a brief account of their haunts and habits, besides introductory chapters on ornithology and how to identify birds.

A HILLTOP SUMMER. By Alyn Yates Keith. 10 Milk Street, Boston: Lee & Shepard, Publishers.—We have here a series of papers which originally appeared in the New York Evening Post. The writer wields a graceful pen, and her sketches of

New England scenery and character are bright and true to life. The reader is brought face to face with nature, and the description of places and portraiture of character are both vivid and real. No native rural New Englander will fail to be charmed with this reproduction of country folk and village life.

PEDAGOGICS OF THE KINDERGARTEN. By Friedrich Froebel. Translated by Josephine Jarvis. New York: D. Appleton & Co.—This collection of fifteen essays, put together by Richard Lange, presents a thorough discussion of the first five gifts in the kindergarten. Like most of the other books in this "International Education Series," it is intended mainly for educators, but may prove of interest to mothers who try to keep themselves informed about kindergarten methods, and to those who wish to understand the symbols used by Froebel.

THE PARASITE. By A. Conan Doyle. New York: Harper & Brothers.—Dr. Doyle has written the most vivid story of hypnotism that has yet appeared. It is short, and fortunately so, as the reader will probably not be inclined to let it alone until he has finished it. It is painful, as all stories of obsession must be in a greater or less degree; but it may possibly do some good by warning people against yielding their wills to the control of another, however harmless the experiments may at first appear.

SEA YARNS FOR BOYS, SPUN OUT BY AN OLD SALT. By W. J. Henderson. Illustrated. New York: Harper & Brothers.—These yarns from an old sailor, spun for Henry and George Hovey, will be read with a delight as great, if not greater, than they were listened to on the outer end of the pier. They recount a variety of startling and thrilling incidents relating to cyclones, yacht-racing, ships at sea, dangers from storms and rocks and waves.

The Magazines.

Though the New World for June is not so cosmopolitan as usual in the residences of its writers, it is in their creeds. There are representatives from the Episcopalians, the Congregationalists, the Universalists, the Presbyterians, the Unitarians, the Baptists, the Friends,—perhaps of the Lutherans, also. The New World is an organ of the Broad Church. First of all comes a representative of the Broad Church among the Episcopalians,—Dr. S. D. McConnell of Philadelphia, who may be remembered for a previous article in an early number of the New World. He writes of "Broad and Narrow in the Episcopal Church" with great vigor, apropos of the Pastoral Letter of certain bishops. "In the Episcopal Church the men who ask, 'What is true?' have been denominated 'Broad Churchmen': those who ask, 'What is proper for us to believe?' are the Narrow Churchmen. Of these, those who care for the Church more than for the truth are the High Churchmen; and those who care more for the integrity of their creeds are the Low Churchmen, or Evangelicals. With half a dozen exceptions, neither the men of learning, of influence, of reputation, nor of ability, are of the 'Catholic' party. It possesses a strong esprit du corps and adroit managers, but not many scholars, preachers, or men who in any way touch the public." Rev. J. W. Chadwick follows with a delightful, while discriminating, review of the autobiography of Frances Power Cobbe. In "Sentimentalism and Political Economy" Rev. W. Kirkus sturdily defends economic law against "ungoverned passions and irrational sentimentalism." Prof. H. H. Wendt of the University of Jena describes "The Present Standing of the Synoptic Problem in Germany." The Tendenz theory of Baur has been overworked; and "we practise much more reserve in judgments on the tendency, the 'Jewish-Christian,' or the 'Pauline' character of the whole Gospels, or of single utterances and narratives in them. . . . In the second place, . . . continued and careful research and comparison of the Gospels has furnished increasing evidence that the Gospel of Mark is much more probably the oldest, and formed a foundation for the other two." Rev. J. H. Crooker shows clearly, in "Democracy and Religion," that theological doctrine follows closely the form of government prevalent at the time. "The spirit of democracy rescues the universe from monarchical superstition. It brings God and man together in such a manner that no room is left for a mediator. . . . All souls lie equally and immediately in touch with the Father." Prof. John Bascom of Williams College writes with his usual breadth and spirituality of "The Philosophical Basis of the Supernatural," which is the "hitherto unknown penetration of physical forces by personal powers." President Cone of Buchtel College contributes a scholarly article on "The Pauline Eschatology." "No cle on "The Pauline Eschatology." "No dogmatic statement of the universal destiny of mankind can be extorted from his teachings. . . . Apocalypse has had its day, and must now give way to the conception of an evolution of human society attended by a constant, silent judgment, announced by no 'trumpet' or 'voice of an archangel.'" Rev. Dr. J. H. Allen, ever welcome with his rich learning and genial style, writes of "The Alleged Sympathy of Religions." There is no sympathy of religions with each other. They are antagonistic and aggressive. But there may be "a broad and broadening sympathy in religion." The last article, by Mrs. Sara Y. Stevenson of the University of Pennsylvania, discusses with much learning the Egyptian "Book of the Dead." The "Book Reviews" are furnished by Profs. Everett, Toy, and Emerton of the Harvard Divinity School; Profs. Upton of Oxford, England, Buckley of Chicago, Vincent of Union, Jastrow of Pennsylvania, Freeman of Meadville, Budde of Strassburg, Hopkins of Bryn Mawr, and Messrs. Moxom, Benu (of Florence, Italy), Peters, Cressey, Griffis, Gilman, and Lyon.

W. H. L.

Miscellaneous.

Alfred Wiedermann, professor of Oriental languages at the University of Bonn, has written a thin volume entitled "The Ancient Egyptian Doctrine of the Immortality of the Soul," which is published in London by H. Grevel and in New York by G. P. Putnam's Sons. Its object is to give a clear exposition of the most important shape which the doctrine of immortality assumed in Egypt. The system here explained was the popular belief among all classes of Egyptian people from early to Coptic times. The book is illustrated.

Literary Notes.

Miss Margaret Stokes has in the press a volume entitled "Three Months in the Forests of France," a pilgrimage in search of vestiges of the Irish saints. It will be published by Macmillan & Co.

Books Received.

TO PUBLISHERS.—All books sent to the CHRISTIAN REGISTER will be promptly acknowledged under the head of "Books Received," with statement of publisher's address and price, if known. But we can guarantee no other return, as the rapid multiplication of new works compels us to limit the number selected for critical notice and review.

From Harper & Brothers, New York. History of the United States from the Compromise of 1850. By James Ford Rhodes. Vol. III. 1860-1862. The Martyred Fool. A Novel. By David Christie Murray. Terminations. By Henry James. The Elements of Navigation. Designed for the Instruction of Beginners. From G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York. Water Tramps, or the Cruise of the "Sea Bird." By George Herbert Bartlett. From D. Appleton & Co., New York. Hand-book of Sanitary Information for Householders. By Roger S. Tracy. From Charles H. Kerr & Co., Chicago. Life and the Conditions of Survival. Popular Lectures and Discussions before the Brooklyn Ethical Association. The Garden of Eden, U.S.A. A very Possible Story. By W. H. Bishop. Price $1.00.

Music Received.

From Oliver Ditson Company, Boston. On the Wing. Banjo and Piano. Sword and Musket March. Banjos and Piano. By Gus C. Knight. My First Waltz. Contentment. Galop. Menuet. Cradle Song. Barcarolle. By P. A. Schaecker. A Dream. Song. Words by Chas. B. Cory. Music by J. C. Bartlett. John D. Creamer. By the Fountain. Song. By Stephen Adams. Du Allein. Song. Words by C. H. Hamilton. Music by Perry C. Orem.

The Free Church Record

is a periodical of 44 pages published at Tacoma every other month from February to December. It is devoted to the advancement of the NEW IDEAL IN RELIGION; namely, the promotion of Free Spiritual and Universal Religion, frankly independent of Brahmanism, Buddhism, Parsism, Judaism, Christianity, and all other special historical religions which are by nature dogmatic, based on personal leadership and limited in fellowship. No other religious journal in the world is dedicated to this ideal. The FREE CHURCH RECORD is the organ of real Universal Religion; i.e., religion reconstructed on the basis of universal human nature, wholly unsectarian in principle and purely scientific in method, seeking truth in the spirit of love by obedience to the universal laws of thought and the universal facts of the Cosmos.

Editorial Committee.

ALFRED W. MARTIN. WALTER J. THOMPSON. E. N. FULLER.

Publication Committee.

SAMUEL COLLYER. R. P. BRADLEY. FREDERICK WATSON.

Occasional Contributors.

Rev. Octavius B. Frothingham, Paul Carus, Ph.D., Edmund Montgomery, Ph.D., Prof. Thomas Davidson, Ph.D., Babu B. B. Nagarkar (of the Brahmo-Somaj), Fred. May Holland, W. L. Sheldon, B. F. Underwood, Rev. P. R. Frothingham, Rev. R. B. Marsh, Francis E. Abbot, Ph.D., Prof. Elliott Coues, M.D., Ph.D., Mrs. Eduard D. Cheney, D. J. H. Ward, Ph.D., William M. Salter, Edwin D. Mead, Rev. T. G. Milsted, Rev. H. L. Wheeler, James H. West, Rev. Leslie W. Sprague, Rev. Charles F. Dole, Wm. Lloyd Garrison, Prof. A. E. Dolbear, Rabbi Schindler, Rabbi Fleischer.

Subscription, $1.00 per Year.

Address FREE CHURCH RECORD, Tacoma, Wash.

OLD AND NEW UNITARIAN BELIEF.

BY

JOHN WHITE CHADWICK.

Price, $1.50.

CONTENTS.—Historical Introduction, The Doctrine of Man, Concerning God, The Bible, Christianity, Concerning Jesus, The Future Life, The Great Salvation, Loss and Gain.

"A valuable as well as very readable treatise. . . . The best popular history of Unitarian doctrine that has come to our notice. . . . Mr. Chadwick has most interestingly set forth the rapid transformations of Unitarian belief."—The Nation.

"The best summary of Unitarian history and doctrinal development, and the most radical and optimistic outlook on the future which has yet been produced among us."—Pacific Unitarian.

"A weighty testimony to a notable religious movement from the religion of the letter to the religion of the spirit. . . . His attitude not always that of the contemplative philosopher; . . . his pulse throbs strongly, and quickens that of the reader. There are some passages that belong to the anthology of prophetic literature."—CHAS. G. AMES, in the New World.

"We can here trace the growth of the New Unitarian gospel, see something of the great moulding influences that have shaped and changed it, note the dangers it has encountered, thrill with the warm light of its newly discovered hope, feel ourselves taken into comradeship with its noble army of workers and saints. . . . Decidedly marking a clearer point of vision in the development of Unitarian thought."—The Unitarian.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,

141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

IMPORTANT WORKS BY

FRANCES POWER COBBE

The Peak in Darien: With Some Other Inquiries touching Concerns of the Soul and Body. An Octave of Essays. 266 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

"Vigorous in thought and style. We have read the volume through from preface to 'the end,' and enjoyed it."—Watchman.

Darwinism in Morals, and Other Essays. 422 pages. Cloth, $2.00.

Some of the chapters: Darwinism in Morals; Hereditary Piety; The Religion of Childhood; Prehistoric Religion; The Religions of the World; The Religions of the East; The Religion and Literature of India; Unconscious Cerebration; Dreams; The Evolution of Morals and Religion.

The Duties of Women. A Course of Lectures. 193 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

"The profoundest, wisest, purest, noblest book in principle, aim, and tone yet written upon the true position of woman in society."

The Scientific Spirit of the Age, and Other Pleas and Discussions. 243 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

Religious Duty. 311 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

A Faithless World. Cloth, $1.00.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,

141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

A College Town Pulpit.

MR. SUNDERLAND'S MONTHLY SERMONS.

50 Cents a Year. 5 Cents a Number. Reduced rates in quantities.

Series for 1894-95.

1. The Soul's Cry for God.
2. Jesus as Humanity's Ideal.
3. Sectarianism: Its Evils, Causes, and Cures.
4. The True Cross of Christ.
5. Was Jesus God? How he came to be worshipped.
6. Loyalty to Conviction.
7. Is Life a Blessing?
8. Robert Ingersoll's Treatment of the Bible.
9. A Religion for a Republic.
10. The Surest Way of Doing Good.

Order from Rev. J. T. SUNDERLAND, Ann Arbor, Mich.

Scraps of Travel.

BY

MINOT J. SAVAGE.

Under this title Mr. Savage's letters written to the Commonwealth during his last trip abroad have been printed. Although not regularly published, copies in pamphlet form, at 50 cents, may be obtained of

GEO. H. ELLIS, 141 Franklin St., Boston.

The Home.

BROWNIE'S APPEAL.*

Dear Mistress,—I write in the greatest of haste
To tell you the terrible news I have heard!
Now, won't you come, please, by the very next train,
And quiver the fears which this message has stirred?

As I lay on my rug, all curled up for a nap,
To chapel the bell called believers to prayer.
So I shook out my wrinkles, and put on a look,
And followed the worshippers all the way there.

I never had cared for the prim little priest,
Though his doctrine was ancient and orthodox,
too;
But I went ('twas a weak and a dog-like excuse)
To see if perhaps he brought tidings of you.

Well, the chapel was crowded, and no one observed
That I entered, and sat in a fat Christian's shade,
Far away from the minister, organ, and choir;
For the sight of such multitudes made me afraid.

But I heard; for my ears are as keen as a knife,
Oh! they quivered and burned as the parson went on
With his terrible eloquence, building it high
Then crashing it down again, stone after stone.

How he raved and exhorted,—that hot little man,—
And scattered the hymn-books to left and to right,
Till I grew so uneasy I sprang to my feet,
And held myself ready to bark or to bite.

Then the storm died away, and he pleaded so hard,
With a smile that was soothing and pleasant to see,
Inviting them all to some beautiful home,
But never a mention of "Wally" or me.

I'm a poor little dog, and can only bow-wow,
Yet his want of politeness quite made me ashamed;
And as for his nonsense, if that should be true,
Why, whether is he or am I to be blamed?

The words of his text were familiar enough,
And, when he said "Come" I knew well what to do;
And "hungry" and "thirsty" I'm sure I've been both,
Not for long at a time, thanks to master and you.

But, mistress, the lesson the parson would teach
Has struck me, I own, with the saddest surprise;
And I ponder and question, as never before,
Oh! where does a little dog go when he dies?

Now I know why my "Auntie" sighs over her work
Or calls me pet names with a tear in her eye:
She is thinking, no doubt, of the parting to come;
For we never can meet in "the sweet bye and bye."

Had you heard, have you known, of this wonderful need?
Have you missed this fair "essence," and still loved me so?
Then, if something I lack, and it be not too late,
Let me earnestly, hopefully, beg for it now.

Most humbly I offer my pretty white paws,
Sweet mistress, if this lies within your control.
Whatever it is and whatever its cost,
Come home by express, and, oh, bring me a soul!
BROWNIE.

NANNIE'S LITTLE MINUTE.

BY MABEL GIFFORD.

Mother said, "Take good care of Charlie while I am gone"; and Nannie meant to, and she did for an hour or more. But the afternoon was very long, the longest afternoon Nannie could remember. The waves sang so sweetly, the air was so bright, and she could see the great brown rocks glisten, though she could not see the white foam climbing up their steep sides.

How Nannie longed to see the ships rocking in the harbor, and to hear the voices of the jolly fishermen as they called to each other! She wanted to hunt the pretty colored pebbles on the beach, and build wonderful houses in the white sand, and scoop wells for the tide to fill. And she was never tired of clambering over the rocks, discovering cosey corners, and spying the tiny shells hidden among them.

Such a long afternoon! and baby Carl must not be taken outside the gate.

Baby Carl was good-natured, and amused himself while Nannie leaned over the gate and looked at the glistening brown rocks.

The longest afternoon must have an end; and the great red sun did at last get down to the tree-tops, and the shadow of the house stretched out to the gate and beyond. Just as the sun dipped below the tree-tops Bennie Thorp came along. The "Mermaid" was coming into the harbor, and he had been down to see it. He had hastened to tell Nannie; and, when he found how things were, he said, "Run along, Nan, I'll tend Charlie."

The "Mermaid" was the handsomest sloop in the harbor, and was returning from a week's cruise along the coast. Nan hesitated, her feet slowly taking her outside the gate. "I think I'll run down just for a little minute," she said.

Nannie saw the sloop majestically round Katoo's Point, and skim up the harbor like a great white bird. Then, as she was so near the beach, she took a run down to it "just for a little minute." She stood close to the water, and let the waves break twice over her bare feet. Then she saw a stone, almost as round as a ball, just out of reach in the water; and she waded in after that. She slipped on the stones and wet her frock, and, while she was wringing it, she spied a great red jelly-fish. Now, Nannie had never seen a red jelly-fish. She had heard the fishermen say they were poisonous, and she watched this with great interest.

While our little maid was examining her curiosity, a party of sandpipers alighted near her. They looked so funny, their little bodies perched on such long, slender legs. Nannie laughed as she watched them running so nimbly after their supper. Then one, two, three great white sea-gulls flew over the water, following the beach. They skimmed so close to the waves, Nannie watched to see if they did touch the water; but the more she looked, the more uncertain she was.

When the sea-gulls had vanished, Nannie turned from the beach with a sigh, only halting once to see if the tide had reached the well she had made in the morning. She reached it just in time to see it washed down, and then hastened home.

Nannie did not see anything of Bennie or Charlie in the yard, and it was suspiciously quiet. "They are playing around on the west side," said Nannie, with an uncomfortable fear that they were not.

The west side was as deserted as the front yard; and Nannie said, "They have gone into the house: it is growing chilly." But no Bennie or Charlie were to be found in the house.

"Oh, dear! I wasn't gone but a little minute: he might have waited," said Nannie.

Now, did he go off and take Charlie with him, or did he leave Charlie there alone? that was the question. Going out to the gate and looking up and down the road in great anxiety, Nannie discovered a scrap of paper pinned to the gate.

"Gone home with Joe. I told Charlie you had gone down to the beach and would be back in a minute. He promised to stay right here. BEN."

That was what the note said. Nannie's brown cheeks grew pale. "He's gone to find me," she thought; and without an instant's delay she sped to the beach, looking in every direction, and shouting, "Charlie, Charlie, Charlie dear!" But only echo answered.

Oh, the great, wild wilderness of rocks, with the fast coming waves dashing against them, and the dark shadows gathering among them! They never had looked so fearsome before. What if—what if Charlie boy was out there!

Nannie scrambled over the rocks, stumbling and slipping in her haste, and brushing the tears from her eyes, that she might see into every dim niche. She fancied now that she spied Charlie's pink frock, and now that she saw a tiny hand. "Dear God," she murmured brokenly between her sobs, "you can see everywhere. Do please take me right to Charlie; and I never, never'll leave him again, even for a little minute, when I'm taking care of him."

Then she came upon Charlie's gay-colored reins,—his horse he called them,—and she did not know whether to be frightened or glad. "Charlie, sweetheart, Nan's darling, can't you hear?" she called, wringing her hands as she listened in vain for an answer.

Scrambling down under a jutting rock that shut out the waves, she heard a tiny voice, "Now I lay me down to sleep," and at the same instant beheld Charlie leaning against the great towering rock, his golden curls making a faint halo against its blackness. "Don't let some fishes bite me, an' don't let sister be drowned, an' don't!"

"Charlie, Charlie!" shrieked Nannie, in a frenzy of joy. "You dearest, dearest, blessedest baby!" She tumbled down the rocks beside him, threw one arm over him, and lay there sobbing and laughing. Charlie looked on with wide open solemn eyes. "I did wait," he said, "one, two, free, four, a hundred minutes, an' then I fought sister drowned."

"Let's go home now," he said, when Nannie grew calmer; and she took him by the hand, and began to retrace her steps over the slippery, uneven rocks. It was quite dusk, and the ledges had become mountains, and the boulders sea monsters, and she must go slowly for Charlie's little feet. The hurrying waves were so near!

"Shall we be home to-night, do you fink?" asked the child after a time of climbing up and down, and still the dark rocks loomed before them.

Nannie stopped and looked about her. She had seen that the tide had cut her off from the shore, and the waves were dashing high above the low reef between the point and the beach.

"Charlie," said Nannie, "I am as tired as I can be, and so are you. Let's stay here until morning. It will be great fun."

"But it's cold, and I'd ruver have my supper," objected Charlie.

"I'll put my frock over you; and we will not mind about supper, just this once. We'll play we are wrecked, and some brave sailors will come and get us and carry us home, and we'll have supper with our breakfast in the morning."

"We'll have the beautiful angels to take care of us all night; and in the morning we'll see the great golden sun come up out of the ocean and put all the stars to sleep, and wake up all the birds and flowers and folks."

While she had been talking, she made her way to the highest and most sheltered niche she could reach, and, tucking Charlie in the farthest corner, began to sing his "sleepy songs." Very soon the twin stars, looking up from the dark rock, disappeared under their little white curtains.

Nannie was sure she should keep awake all night, but soon her head drooped and all was still in the dark niche.

When Charlie awoke in the morning, he found himself in his own little bed; and he looked about with astonished eyes.

"Nannie," he called, "did ve angels take us home?"

"They showed Uncle Foster and Mr. Craig where to find us," said Nannie.

"Bennie," said Nannie to her little playmate, when he came over to hear the wonderful story, "I think you might have waited just a minute: you promised."

Bennie straightened up, and answered with all the dignity he could command: "Nannie Whitcomb, you were gone almost an hour; and that's almost sixty minutes. I thought, of course, you'd be back pretty quick after all that time."

"Who'd think," said Nannie, "that a little minute could be such a long time!"

ROSIE'S NOSES.

"Oh, dear," sighed Rosie.

The sigh was so deep and Rosie's face so sober that Aunt Em and Sister Lillie looked up from their work.

"What's the matter, Puss?" inquired auntie.

"I wish I didn't have a pug nose," said Rosie, sadly. Auntie and Lillie looked amused; while Rob, who was lying on the lounge, laughed outright. She was such a little girl that no one suspected a heavier trial than a broken doll or a dead kitten.

"Well, I do," she persisted. "Rob says it points to my bangs."

"So it does," said Rob, still laughing, "straight up to her little curly bangs. Look at it."

"Don't tease her, Robbie," said Aunt Em.

"Don't mind him, my dear," she said to Rosie. "Pug noses are nice. See, mine is a pug."

Rosie looked at Aunt Em's nose critically.

"Well, I don't think it's very nice," she said. "Anyway, I wish I didn't have one."

"You ought to be satisfied with your looks, Rosie," remarked Lillie. "Now my nose is a pug, too; but I don't feel bad about it."

"But you ain't satisfied with your hair, 'cause you curl it with hot irons every day."

"Oh, that's only to make it look a little better," said Lillie, in self defence. "Now, I wouldn't dye it to make it any other color."

"Well, I only want to make my nose look a little better. I don't want to change its color, only its shape."

"What kind of a nose do you want?" asked Aunt Em.

"Like Hannah Lee's," said Rosie. "I heard her mother say yesterday that Hannah's nose was just perfic; and, when she saw me, she said to the lady that was with her, 'What a horrid pug nose that child's got!' and the lady said, 'Yes, ain't she?'"

"I tell you what, Puss, that was hard," exclaimed Rob, "but you just get your nose fixed over. You can do it as easy as a wink. There is a man down town that makes noses grow any shape you want them. And I read the other day that, if you wear a patent clothes-pin on your nose, it will grow straight and 'perfic.'"

"But, Pussie," said Aunt Em, "suppose you changed your nose, and we didn't any of us recognize you, what would you do? I am sure we would all miss that dear little pug if it were gone."

"There'd be my mouth and eyes, and I'd know all the rest of you, and I'd tell you who I was," answered Rosie.

"Of course, you would," said Rob: "no danger but we would know you. I'll send along the first good fairy I see, and have the thing fixed up."

Rosie wondered if he meant it; but she didn't ask him, because he teased so much. Then auntie and Lillie left the room, and Rob soon followed. After that Rosie settled down in the big soft chair by the fire, and as it began to grow dark she wondered why nurse didn't come to put her to bed. While she wondered, the door opened; and the queerest creature came in and walked up close to her. He was very little, not half as high as the table. He had funny thin legs and a big body. His eyes were round and bright, his mouth large and well turned up at the corners, giving him a very jolly look, and his nose was the puggiest of pugs. The little girl knew he was a Brownie. She had seen Brownie pictures often. At first she was frightened and was going to scream, when she caught sight of a little basket he was carrying. It was full of noses of all shapes and sizes. He must be the good fairy Rob was going to send, so her brother wasn't teasing her, after all.

- ARMSTRONG & McKELVY
Pittsburgh
- ANCHOR,
Cincinnati
- ATLANTIC,
New York
- BEYMER-BAUMAN,
Pittsburgh
- BRADLEY,
New York
- BROOKLYN,
New York
- COLLIER,
St. Louis
- CORNELL,
Buffalo
- DAVIS-CHAMBERS,
Pittsburgh
- ECKSTEIN,
Cincinnati
- FAHNESTOCK,
Pittsburgh
- JEWETT,
New York
- KENTUCKY,
Louisville
- JOHN T. LEWIS & BROS. CO
Philadelphia
- MORLEY,
Cleveland
- MISSOURI,
St. Louis
- RED SEAL,
St. Louis
- SALEM,
Salem, Mass.
- SHIPMAN,
Chicago
- SOUTHERN,
St. Louis and Chicago
- ULSTER,
New York
- UNION,

Customers

are attracted and their trade held by dealers and painters who know their business. Neither can afford to be ignorant. They know these brands of White Lead (see list) are genuine, and reputable dealers sell and practical painters everywhere use and recommend them.

For colors, use the National Lead Co.'s Pure White Lead tinting colors. No trouble to make or match a shade of color. For pamphlet and color-card—sent free—address

NATIONAL LEAD CO.,
1 Broadway, New York.

* Brownie is a little collier.

"I hear you don't like your nose," said the Brownie.

"No," said Rosie, not quite sure whether or not she ought to say "sir."

"Well, all you've got to do is to choose the one you want out of my basket, and I'll have it on for you in no time."

Rosie forgot her fright, and thought only of the new nose that there was a chance of getting. So she watched with interest as the Brownie held up one after another for her inspection.

"Try that now," he said, holding up a large red one, with a big bend in it.

She held it up to her face, and looked in the glass. It made her think of the woman in the fairy story whose chin turned up and nose turned down, making her look like a nut-cracker. "Oh, that won't do at all," she said, laying it back in the basket. "There, let me see that." And she pointed to a beautiful straight white one, as perfect as Hannah Lee's own.

The Brownie handed it to her, and she held it in place.

"Ah, that is fine!" cried he. "What do you think?"

Rosie said it was just what she wanted. So the Brownie took a bag of tools from the basket, and, climbing upon the arm of the chair, began to put the nose on. When he had finished, he said: "Now you look fine indeed with that beautiful nose. All the other children will wish they had seen me, too." And before she could say a word he had gone.

Rosie sat and stared in the glass for a long time, thinking how glad papa and mamma would be to have her look so nice, and how Rob couldn't tease her about her nose any more. But, alas! just as Aunt Em had said, no one knew her. Their Rosie hadn't a straight nose like that, they declared, but a cunning little turned-up one. In vain she told them that it had been made over, and begged them to look at her eyes and hair and mouth, and showed them two rows of pearly teeth. She looked for Rob, but he was not to be found.

It made her sad not to be recognized; but she would go to the Sunday-school picnic, anyway. "I guess they'll know me there," she said to herself.

So she started off, and looked with such scorn upon several girls with pug noses that she met on her way that she almost made the new straight one turn up. She went into the Sunday-school room, and took her seat. Soon Rosie's teacher came in.

"Who are you, my dear?" she asked.

"I'm Rose Cady," the child replied timidly.

"Oh, no, you can't be: Rosie hasn't that kind of a nose."

Poor, poor Rosie! The happy moment had come for starting, and hundreds of little eyes danced with pleasure, and hundreds of little feet could scarcely keep from dancing; but Rosie stood sorry and ashamed. Her teacher called the superintendent, and said to him, "Here is a little girl who says she is Rose Cady, but she doesn't look the least like her."

"It's funny," thought Rosie, "that noses are the only things girls are known by"; and then she said aloud, "I came to go to the picnic."

"Why not let her go?" asked the superintendent.

"It wouldn't do at all: we can take only our own pupils, and likely her mother knows nothing about it. I'm sorry, my dear; but we couldn't think of taking you."

Rosie walked out, her heart almost bursting, and that horrid nose hurting all the time. Here were a hundred happy boys and girls all dressed clean, and with their very own noses, going in a big boat up the river, with music, too, and plenty of good things to eat; and she, because she hadn't been satisfied with her nose, was turned right away from her own Sunday-school picnic. This state of affairs would never do, and she didn't know where the Brownie had gone. Soon she caught a glimpse of him a little way ahead.

"I want my own nose," she shrieked, and put up her hand to pull off the one he had given her, it was hurting so; and then she sat up in the big soft chair, and saw Rob on the lounge, laughing. In her hand was—what? Not a new nose at all, but a patent clothes-pin, one of the kind that work with a spring, and is warranted to make pug noses grow straight, if worn long enough. "Did you put that thing on my nose, Rob?" she asked.

"Why, yes, Puss: I wanted to help you get a 'perfic' nose. I thought you'd be glad to get rid of your pug."

Rosie jumped down from the chair, and smoothed her skirts. "I think a pug nose is as nice to have as any other," she replied, with dignity.—Alice A. Smith, in Harper's Young People.

For the Christian Register.

IN THE MILL.

BY ANNA J. GRANNIS.

The sun comes up, and the day is crowned,
With its face turned toward the west;
And all day long in the mill is found
The bustle of toil's unrest.

The steam sings out to the silent steel,
Till pulley and shaft reply;
The thread unwinds from its mimic reel,
And slips through the needle's eye.

Click, click, and over the long white track
The stitches begin to go,
Like tiny steps where none turn back
In crossing a field of snow.

Or whether the softest south winds blow,
Or the north grows dark with fears,
While the changing seasons come and go,
I'm stitching away the years.

And the great world never asks nor cares
What may go in with the seams,
Whether bits of song or broken prayers
Or only a toiler's dreams.

When toil is done, and the day kneels down,
With its worn face turned away,
While cool hands take off its fevered crown,
And slip on its robe of gray,

Then up and down through the busy mill
Its swift wheels begin to slow,
And the loud pulse of the steam grows still
In the engine-room below.

And the old bell, waiting in its tower
For pulley and shaft to cease,
Rings the first stroke of the closing hour,
For the toiling hands' release.

And then from the great deserted rooms
The grim shadows chase the light;
The dim corners quickly fill with glooms,
And the mill shuts down for night.

A LINCOLN STORY.

Two letters were once addressed to a certain corps commander of the army of the Potomac on the eve of a forward movement,—one of them written by Gen. Halleck, chief of staff, and the other by Mr. Lincoln. Gen. Halleck's letter contained a warning couched in this fashion: "In undertaking to place your command on the opposite shore of the Rappahannock, you will exercise extreme caution in affording full protection to your advance, rear and flanks, in order that the enemy may not be encouraged to make an attack while your forces are separated in the act of crossing." This was good advice. Lincoln gave it to the same commander in the note which he wrote to him, but this was the form in which he expressed it: "Look out, when you cross the river, that you don't hang yourself up in the middle like a steer on a fence, neither able to hook with your horns nor kick with your hoofs."—Exchange.

GRANDPA'S PIGS.

Tom had come to spend a week on grandpa's farm. Tom was a city boy, so he loved to run in the green fields, feed the chickens, and ride to the mill with brown Dobbin. Grandma said Tom was a very good boy, and grandpa said he would make a fine farmer some day. Tom loved to see Henry, grandpa's man, feed the little pigs. How they would gobble up their supper! and Tom would laugh to see them tumbling over each other, as if they were trying to find out which one could eat the most.

One day grandma had a tea-party. She dressed Tom in his new suit, and sent him out to walk in the flower-garden until the ladies came. But Tom thought he could at least go and look at the piggies. So he climbed up on the fence, and threw bits of leaves on their backs to wake them up.

All at once there was a big crash, and the board Tom was sitting on broke in two. Down went poor Tom into the pig-pen! Oh, what frightened piggies! And, oh, what a dirty boy, all over mud!

Grandpa heard a sob as he passed near by, and he thought the piggies must be very funny ones if they could cry like that. So he looked over the fence; and there in the corner of the pen sat poor Tom, crying as if his heart would break.

"Oh, ho!" laughed grandpa. "What new piggy is this in my pen?"

Grandma washed him and changed his clothes. But Tom had to wear his old sailor suit to the tea-party; and grandpa said every time Tom came near him that night,—

"Well, how is my new little prize pig?"

Mother said Tom deserved it all for not staying in the garden, as grandma told him to do; and, whenever Tom wanted to disobey, she would say,—

"Remember grandpa's little pigs."—Sunbeam.

OCCUPATIONS OF A HINDU WOMAN.

Some consider her a painted idol kept for amusement and pleasure as a plaything. Others know her to be a drudge on whom all the hard work of the family falls, and which takes up all her time and attention. Both their views are exaggerations of the real state of things, and do her injustice. She rises in the morning very early and sees to the work of sweeping the house and sprinkling water on parts of it, and the utensils cleansed and washed. This is ordinarily done by the menial servant. This done, she prepares to bathe. She dresses her hair and anoints it and her body with oil, generally some scented oil, and then goes into the bath, or some river, if there be one hard by. The bathing over, she changes her clothes, and, having arranged for the cooking, enters into the room where the family idol is kept. There she makes the necessary arrangements with her own hand for the morning devotions, and goes through her religious exercises. The cooking is done either by herself or by a Brahmin, male or female, entertained for the purpose. All the members of the family then partake of the dinner,—the males first, then the females, and last of all the menial servants. She then takes a little siesta, lying down either talking with the other members or reading some religious work, rarely going to sleep. In the afternoon again the house is swept clean, and the members are busy with their respective works. The accounts of milk and bazaar expenses are kept up. In the evening clothes are again changed; and the requirements of the evening religious service are attended to, and the arrangements for the evening meal made. After all have taken their supper, the ladies attend to their toilet, and prepare to go to bed. The children share a good portion of the attention of the housewife as well as the chief male members of the family.—Unity and the Minister.

WILLIE'S SCHEME.

"My pa's going to get me a parrot some day," said Willie; "an' I'm going to keep him in my room when mamma reads stories to me, so's he'll learn 'em, and tell 'em to me when nobody's got time to read to me."—Harper's Young People.

NONE SUCH MINCE MEAT

is particularly valuable in the summer because it is always fresh and sweet.

It is unexcelled for the home, the camp, seaside or mountains.

Sold everywhere.

Merrell-Soule Co.,
Syracuse, N. Y.

"A HAND SAW IS A GOOD THING, BUT NOT TO SHAVE WITH."

SAPOLIO

IS THE PROPER THING FOR HOUSE-CLEANING.

Prevents

* Infection

in disease where infection is caused by bacilli, which is the case in fevers, consumption, and many other complaints formerly considered non-contagious, nothing can compare with

Bovinine

Its life-giving qualities, in the most concentrated form, fortify by nourishment every part of the body, and defy disease germs.

A. P. BUSH, 149 Pearl St.

Education.

The oldest high-class educational magazine in the country ($3 per year) is read by thoughtful people of all classes, as well as educators. It ought to be in every library and reading-room in the land. Is it in yours? From a new subscriber we will accept $2 for the first year. Send 12 cents (in stamps) for a sample copy.

Nova Scotia Tours. The associate editor of Education offers again this year several delightful personally conducted tours to Evangeline's land. Select companies of cultured people. No heat, romantic scenery. An ideal vacation. First party, June 25. Shad, salmon, and strawberries in their prime. Expenses low. Write for particulars.

KASSON & PALMER,

50 Bromfield Street, Boston, Mass.

JOSEPH GILLOTT'S STEEL PENS.

GOLD MEDAL, PARIS EXPOSITION, 1889,
AND THE CHICAGO EXPOSITION AWARD.
THE MOST PERFECT OF PENS.

Mr. HALE'S SCHOOL 86 BEACON ST., BOSTON.

The 13th year will begin September 25. Preparation for Harvard College and the Institute of Technology. Full Classical and Scientific Courses. Primary department for young boys nine or ten years of age. Fine situation, directly opposite the Public Garden. Large, sunny, high-studded rooms, open fireplaces, gymnasium, extensive laboratories, covered fire-escape, lunch-room. Teachers: ALBERT HALE (Harv.), E. D. MARSH (Harv.), E. K. STEVENS (Harv.), C. S. STREET, Amherst. Address ALBERT HALE.

PROSPECT HILL SCHOOL FOR YOUNG LADIES, GREENFIELD, MASS.

Twenty-fifth Year. Reference, Rev. E. E. Hale, D.D. REV. JAMES C. PARSONS, Principal.

PROCTOR ACADEMY, Andover, N.H.

For both sexes. Healthful location. Liberal management. Expenses low. Prepares for college or for teaching, etc. For catalogue, address JAMES F. MORTON, A.M., Principal.

Mr. Knapp's Home School for Boys, PLYMOUTH, MASS.

Powder Point School (DUXBURY, MASS.). These schools have always had the same interests, and will now be united at Duxbury, the Plymouth school closing with the present term.

MAGNOLIA TERRACE Springfield, Mass.

Home and Day School for Girls. JOHN McDUFFIE, Ph.D.

SCHOOL FOR THE CORRECTION OF ALL SPEECH DEFECTS.

For circular address E. J. E. THORPE, Principal.

MISS KIMBALL'S SCHOOL FOR GIRLS, Worcester, Mass.

Thorough preparation for College. Intermediate, Academic, and Special Courses. Send for Illustrated Circular.

Miss Gibbons' School for Girls.

Preparation for all colleges. 55 West 47th St., N.Y. MRS. SARAH H. EMERSON, Principal. October 2. A few boarding pupils taken.

HOME SCHOOL FOR BOYS

In the family of Rev. Eugene De Normandie, Danvers, Mass. Address HENRY N. DE NORMANDIE.

THE HIGHLAND MILITARY ACADEMY.

WORCESTER, MASS., begins 40th year September 11. Classical, Scientific, Business, Preparatory Departments. Gymnasium. Athletics encouraged. Careful training. Home influences. JOSEPH ALDEN SHAW, A.M., Head Master.

Boston, 10 Ashburton Place.

BOSTON UNIVERSITY Law School.

Fall term opens Wednesday, October 2. For circulars address EDMUND H. BENNETT, Dean.

CONTINENTAL.

Atlantic City, N.J. Desirable location, best service, and moderate rates. H. C. DURAR.

VACATION FOR BOYS.

—Mr. and Mrs. John McDuffie receive at seashore home four boys between twelve and fifteen, July and August. Lessons in school studies, also in rowing, sailing, etc., if desired. JOHN McDUFFIE (Harv.), MAGNOLIA TERRACE SCHOOL, SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

A TRAINED NURSE will care for, at her own home in the country, a chronic invalid of either sex. For references, etc., address Box 736, PORTLAND, ME.

THE DISAPPEARANCE OF BIRDS.

BY ISABEL C. BARROWS.

In undisturbed forests and meadows, where the foot of man rarely penetrates, the proportion of birds varies little from decade to decade. But where man has entered the proportion changes with each passing year. Few persons who have not looked into the matter realize to what an extent this is true. This country is so wide in extent that it might be hard to tell just how many species of birds have become extinct, but in England the geographical limits make this more nearly possible. Mr. W. H. Hudson, the well-known ornithologist, in a pamphlet entitled "Lost British Birds," shows that, of the four hundred species formerly at home in Great Britain, but two hundred can now be claimed; and many of those are never seen on land. They are sea-fowl, and rarely touch the shore. "Hark, hark, the lark at heaven's gate sings," wrote Shakespeare; but it will soon sing only in poetry. In London the markets receive daily, in the early spring, from twenty to forty thousand larks, which arrive every morning in sacks, and are sold to the dealers by the bushel measure!

How is it in this country? One has but to go through the markets of any city, especially in the South, to see scores and hundreds of song-birds exposed for sale. New England people watch for the blue birds, and herald their arrival in the newspapers, rejoicing in the advent of summer which they prophesy. But the heralds who last year essayed their first flight among the branches of the apple-trees will not all come back this year. An ornithologist, walking through the market in Washington, paused to count three hundred blue-birds in one stall. The feathers had been stripped off to hide the iniquity from the general public, but the trained eye of the naturalist was not deceived. Such was the welcome these songsters had on their northward way!

Myriads of song-birds of many species lose their lives every year to gratify the appetite of man. Robins are considered legitimate table birds in some parts of the country, an expert sometimes bagging three thousand in a day. Even the oriole and song sparrow share the same fate, and the bobolink is shot by the thousand wherever the merry little fellow is found. Even the tiny wren is killed for food in some places.

But, shocking as it seems to slaughter these exquisite songsters for the mere bite of food that they supply, the number of lives sacrificed to fashion mounts up to millions, in spite of the long crusade against this Vandalism. The natives of India are learning that by selling their ploughs and draught animals and buying guns and ammunition they can make more money shooting birds for ladies' hats. They have yet to learn that, when the birds are all gone, it will be impossible to raise crops. In one province of India, within a period of three days, thirty thousand birds were killed for the milliner's trade. One consignment brought to England thirty-two thousand humming birds, eighty thousand water fowl, and eight hundred thousand pairs of wings. From South America and the West Indies, at one auction, three hundred and sixty thousand bird skins were sold. It is not strange, then, that careful estimates place the unnecessary slaughter of birds at eight millions annually. Think what a royal symphony is hushed, what beauty of form and color is thrown away, and what a flood of joyous, innocent life is barbarously cut off!

It is said that sentiment has been developed to the extent of no longer demanding the sweetest singing birds for millinery purposes; but, if they are not songsters, they are at least harmless, and in almost every case they are the valued friends of man. Who can estimate the loss to the world, not only in beauty and cheer, but in the more material shape of loss of crops of grain and fruits? A few years ago, in the blossoming season, the orchards of the land were filled with myriads of tiny warblers and other migratory birds, so small that they were hardly noticed among the flowers. With their busy little bills they killed countless numbers of injurious insects, and their coming was a blessing to the horticulturist.

Their disappearance has been followed by fruit diseases of every kind. The same is true of the grain fields. The birds that lived on weed seeds are rapidly disappearing in their turn, and the weeds rejoice and spring up with renewed vigor. In the gardens the cut-worms, learning that their foes in birdland have been conquered by man, thrive apace, and in turn will win the victory over man himself.

It may be asked, What can be done about this matter? Can the lost birds be found again? Not those that have been exterminated. But there are some species in danger of extinction that in time, by protection, might be restored in large numbers, as has been done in a few places in regard to the beautiful little sea tern. Much can be done by legislation if a wise public spirit will insist on having the laws obeyed.

Nothing but enlightenment can cure this evil. And that brings the whole reform back to the parents' door. It is slow work trying to reform the gourmand who is willing to sacrifice a life for the tasty bit of a wild bird's breast. It is dreary trying to reform the devotee of fashion who worships an ever-changing god. But there is some cheer in the thought that every new generation gives fresh soil in which to plant new germs of good. It is the mothers and fathers who, by precept and example, must teach the children the value, the beauty, and the sacredness of bird life. It is in the home that the little ones must learn the cruelty of robbing these defenceless creatures of their sunny existence, and the unkindness to the world in depriving the earth of the charm of their presence. If it be true as is claimed by some naturalists that the small boy is the bird's worst enemy, then half the battle is won if the small boy can be conquered.

But, as the parents alone cannot do everything for their children, teachers and pastors must be enlisted in this fight. Intelligent teachers, whose interests and sympathies are on the side of the birds, can have a great influence in developing the humane spirit in their pupils. And, if preachers are inclined to think that bird life is beneath pulpit notice, they should be reminded who said that not a sparrow falleth to the ground without the Father's notice. Ruskin was not far from right in saying that perfect sympathy with animals is necessary, not only for the education of a gentleman, but of a Christian. The rule of the Society of St. George might well be the rule to be adopted by all who would come into this sympathy: "I will not kill nor hurt any living creature needlessly, nor destroy any beautiful thing, but will strive to save and comfort all gentle life, and guard and perfect all natural beauty upon the earth."

Personals.

Rev. J. S. Thomson, pastor of Unity Church, Los Angeles, Cal., will not be able to visit his mother in Liverpool, England, during his summer vacation, as he had intended to do. He and Mrs. Thomson will spend August and September in Montreal, New England, and New York.

The death of Emily Faithfull, the well-known English philanthropist, has brought out many tributes to her effective work. By her practical ideas and her unwearied earnestness she has done more than any other one woman in England to help on the industrial freedom of her sisters.

Gold is tried by fire — salt by water. Here's the way to try Bradley's

"Yorkshire"
Salt

Stir well two tablespoonfuls of "Yorkshire" in a clear glass nearly full of water and let it stand five minutes. Do the same with the salt you are now using and compare the two. Which one contains lime and dirt?

Send your address and receive free a sample bag to make the trial. All grocers can supply "Yorkshire"—if you insist.

BRADLEY SALT CO.,

49 Jay St., New York. 4 Commercial St., Boston.

Count Up

the number of times you have to rub a garment to get it clean; multiply it by the number of garments washed in a year.

Then you can see just how many back-breaking rubs Pearlina will save you, annually. You don't do the washing yourself? That doesn't make any difference. You need Pearlina just the same. Every one of these tire-some rubs is wear and tear on the things that are washed. They suffer, even if you don't. Hundreds of millions of packages of Pearlina have been consumed. Think of the number of useless and harmful rubs that have been saved to the women of America.

Beware

you an imitation, be honest—send it back.

Peddlers and some unscrupulous grocers will tell you, "this is as good as" or "the same as Pearlina." IT'S FALSE—Pearlina is never peddled, if your grocer sends JAMES PYLE, New York.

Monthly Magazine. Tenth Year.

THE UNITARIAN.

No religious periodical in America has abler writers. Its matter is fresh, living, varied, abreast of the best thinking and scholarship of the age. Contains Sermons from the ablest Liberal Preachers; Articles on religious topics of living interest; Editorials; Literary Notes; Notices of the best Liberal Books; News from the Churches; Woman's Word and Work, etc.

UNSOLICITED COMMENTS:

I take great pleasure in the Unitarian and recommend it right and left. There are few other magazines I read so much.—Massachusetts.

I take a good many papers and magazines, but no other periodical so full of spiritual nutrition as the Unitarian. It is splendid.—Nebraska.

I thought the first number of the publication, years ago, a good thing, and I may say that my first estimate rather increases than otherwise, right up to the current number.—Wisconsin.

CONTENTS FOR JUNE.

"The Flowers appear on the Earth." Rev. Charles G. Ames.

Just to lie Still! Maud L. Cotton.

A Philosopher's Mother: Johanna Schopenhauer. II. Ursula Tannenforst.

Italy of To-day. Marie C. Remick.

A Sermon in Rhyme.

Dr. Martineau's Ninetieth Birthday.

The American Unitarian Association. Martha Perry Lowe.

Western Unitarian Conference. Leon A. Harvey.

Religious Study by Clubs and Guilds. W. H. Fish.

Correspondence. E. L. Reynolds.

One Upward Look Each Day.

Editorial.

DEPARTMENTS:

American Unitarian Association, George Batchelor; Sunday-schools, Edward A. Horton; National Alliance of Unitarian Women, Alice R. Jackson; Guilds; Temperance Work, C. R. Eliot; Literary Notes.

NEWS FROM THE FIELD.

*.*Terms, $1.00 a year. Sample copies free. Will be sent three months on trial for 10 cents.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher, 141 Franklin St., Boston.

Register Tract Series.

- No. 1. MY NEW NEIGHBOR. By Rev. W. H. Lyon $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 2. THE CONGREGATIONAL METHOD: How it is worked and how it ought to be worked. By Rev. Charles F. Dole. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 3. BEHOLD THE MAN. By Rev. W. P. Tilden $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 4. PRACTICAL CHRISTIANITY. By Rev. Charles A. Allen. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 5. AMERICAN UNITARIANISM: Its History and Development. By Rev. Edward Everett Hale. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 6. CHURCH ORGANIZATION. By Rev. William L. Lawrence. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 7. OF MAKING ONE'S SELF BEAUTIFUL. By Rev. William C. Gannett. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 8. THE JUDGMENT: The True Doctrine of the Judgment Individual and Universal. By Rev. William R. Alger. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 9. THE BREATH OF LIFE. By Rev. H. M. Simmons. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 10. WHAT DOES THE UNITARIANISM OF TO-DAY STAND FOR? By Rev. W. P. Tilden. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 11. LIBERAL CHRISTIANITY AS MOTIVE-POWER. By Rev. E. A. Horton. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 12. MORALITY IN THE SCHOOLS. By William T. Harris, LL.D. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 13. JOSEPH PRIESTLEY: The Old Unitarianism and the New. By Rev. C. C. Everett, D.D. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 14. WHAT O'CLOCK IS IT IN RELIGION? By Rev. M. J. Savage. $2.00 per hundred.
- No. 15. A SOUL WITH FOUR WINDOWS OPEN. By Rev. James Leonard Corning. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 16. SCIENTIFIC THEOLOGY THE GROUND OF ALL RELIGION. By Francis E. Abbot, Ph.D. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 17. REFORMS ABOUT WHICH GOOD MEN MIGHT AGREE. By William M. Salter. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 18. HOW WE HELPED OUR MINISTER TO WRITE GOOD SERMONS. By Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D. 50 cents per hundred.
- No. 19. FOUR SERMONS ON REVIVALS. By Rev. S. M. Crothers. $3.00 per hundred. Single copies, 6 cents.
- No. 20. THEODORE PARKER'S LETTER TO A YOUNG MAN. 50 cents per hundred.
- No. 21. THE THEOLOGY OF THE FUTURE. By Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D. 50 cents per hundred.
- No. 22. THE RESTRICTION OF VIVISECTION. By Albert Lettingwell, M.D. 50 cents per hundred.
- No. 23. A WORKING THEORY IN ETHICS. By Rev. J. H. Crooker. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 24. THE CHRISTIAN UNITARIAN POSITION. DOCTRINAL. By John Hamilton Thom. 60 cents per hundred.
- No. 25. THE NEW BIRTH AND THE NEW TYPE OF MAN. By Rev. Charles F. Dole. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 26. THE RESURRECTION OF JESUS. By Rev. W. H. Furness. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 27. SHORT AND LONG VIEWS. By Rev. Charles F. Dole. $1.00 per hundred.

Sent post paid on receipt of price by

CHRISTIAN REGISTER ASSOCIATION.

141 Franklin Street, Boston.

The Essential Man.

A Monograph on Personal Immortality in the Light of Reason.

BY

George Crosswell Cressey, Ph.D.

CONTENTS: Preface; I. The Conditions of the Problem; II. The Nature of Man; III. The Persistence of Mind or Soul; IV. The Nature of the Universe; V. Personal Belief; VI. Conditional Immortality; VII. Conclusion.

Price 75 Cents.

For sale by all Booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,

141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Lectures and Sermons

BY

WILLIAM J. POTTER.

With a Biographical Sketch

BY

Francis Ellingwood Abbot, Ph.D.

This book is published in style of Mr. Potter's previous volume, "Twenty-five Sermons in Twenty-five Years." Gilt top, bevelled boards.

Price $2.00.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,

141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

MESSAGES OF

Faith, Hope and Love.

Selections for Every Day in the Year from the Writings of

JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE.

PRICE $1.00.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,

141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

The Deeper Meanings.

BY •

FREDERIC A. HINCKLEY.

CONTENTS:

The Cost of the Divine Spark; The Poet-vision; Looking at Life through New Eyes; Rejoice, we Conquer!

Price 50 Cents.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,

141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

DR. MARTINEAU AT NINETY.

"In the retrospect of ninety years there is a pathetic mixture of gratitude for ample opportunities and humiliation for insignificant performances."—Dr. Martineau on his ninetieth birthday.

Ho! petty prattler of sparkling sin,
Paradox-monger, slave of the queer!
All your wish is a name to win,
To shock the dullards, to sack the tin,—
Wait till you come to ninety year!

Curled locks cover your shallow brains,
Twaddle and tinkle is all your cheer,
Sickly and sullied your amorous strains,
Pessimist praters of fancied pains,
What do you think of this ninety year?

Ninety times over let May day pass
(If you should live, which you won't, I fear),
Then you will know that you were but an ass,
Then you will shudder and moan, "Alas!
Would I had known it some ninety year!"

Pledge him round! He's a man, I declare:
His heart is warm, though his hair be gray,
Modest, as though a record so fair,
A brain so big and a soul so rare,
Were a mere matter of every day.

His eloquent lips the truth have kissed,
His valiant eyes for the right have shone.
Pray and listen,—'twere well you list,—
Look not away lest the chance be missed,
Look on a man ere your chance be gone!

Martineau lives, he's alive, he's here!
He loved and married seventy years syne.
Look at him, taintless of fraud or fear,
Alive and manful at ninety year,
And blush at your pitiful pessimist whine!
—From Punch, May 11, 1895.

The Sunday School.

Children's Sunday was noticed in Lawrence, June 16, by the Unitarian Sunday-school, Rev. George H. Young, pastor and superintendent. The exercises occurred in the forenoon, taking the place of the morning service. Flowers decorated the pulpit, songs were well sung by the children, remarks were made by Rev. Edward A. Horton, and Mr. Young christened one child. A goodly attendance of adults helped to fill the church.

A notable union service commemorative of Children's Sunday was held in Dorchester at the Third Religious Church, Rev. F. B. Mott, pastor. Dr. Daly, the superintendent of the Sunday-school, and others have worked hard to make this the great success it was. The Methodist, Orthodox, and Baptist Sunday-schools joined with the Unitarian, and used the Flower Service for 1894 published by the Unitarian Sunday School Society. The effect of this large volume of voices was inspiring. Remarks were made by several clergymen. Such a union service as this should be repeated in many places.

In Barre, Sunday, June 23, similar exercises were held in the Unitarian church, Rev. A. F. Bailey, pastor. The songs and services were in charge of Mr. Wheelwright, and these were given in the forenoon. There was a large congregation in attendance. The Flower Service of 1893 published by the Unitarian Sunday School Society was used to good effect, the carols being finely rendered. The chief address was given by Rev. Edward A. Horton. The appearance and spirit of the school were admirable. In the evening the guild of this church held its last meeting of the season, with a very large number present. Mrs. Cook read a paper, which was excellent, on "Religion in Every-day Life." Remarks were made by various members, and the evening passed with great profit. This guild is one of the most vigorous in the denomination, and proves a helpful part of the church life.

Spirit of the Press.

The Southern Presbyterian on the Armenian question:—

If diplomacy brings nations to such a pass that they cannot lift up a stern voice for fair dealing, then diplomacy had better be laid aside, and common sense and common righteousness be assumed as the principles of international government. England had little excuse in the days of Cromwell for interfering in the affairs of Savoy, but her letter calling for a halt in the persecution of the Waldenses shines out as a bright star in the night of a dark and troubled time.

The London Christian World, in commenting on one of the recent lynchings in this country, says:—

Granting that the three men were guilty and deserved death,—though that is not proved without a fair trial,—the lynching remains as an act of lawless barbarity that might, perhaps, be expected from Turks in Armenia, but not from nominally civilized Christians in America. If the men were guilty, the law would have sent them to the scaffold. The white mob, by ignoring the law, have brought it into contempt, and have put themselves on a level with the guilty blacks by turning themselves into wild beasts. If the State has any respect for its honor, it will inflict on the lynchers condign punishment.

Zion's Herald sees in the work of Mr. Roosevelt an effectual means to promote the single standard of morality for both sexes:

Mr. Roosevelt's latest stroke—to treat men arrested for "disorderly conduct" with the same severity which is visited upon women apprehended for the same offence—will mark a new epoch in morality in our metropolitan city.

The Lowell Times recognizes the divinity of a mother's love:—

The preference of motherhood is generally based on an instinct which tends to protect the one whom others do not favor,—not only the weak and feeble, but the bad and worthless. And it is better so. It is better that the mother heart, erring in its judgment and hoping against hope to the end, should still go out, loving and condoning, pitying and sustaining where none other can and will; for there will always be plenty to bear hardly upon the sinner, while endless compassion and undying love are seldom found in this world outside the mother's heart. Many a black sheep can vouch for the truth of this maternal instinct. Many a man has been rescued and brought back to manhood and good citizenship who, without the tender, pitying compassion and sustaining force of a mother's love, would have been wholly lost.

Charities and Reforms.

The annual report of the New England Watch and Ward Society shows active continuance of the work that this society has been doing for the past seventeen years toward the promotion of a purer public sentiment. Lotteries, gambling, objectionable posters and theatrical performances, have all been the objects of their successful crusades. An article by Frederick B. Allen, on "How shall a Great City deal with the Social Evil?" is included in the report.

COUNTRY WEEK CHARITY.—The Ladies' Committee in charge of the "Country Week" at the Young Men's Christian Union are hoping to receive donations from many more of the friends of this beautiful charity, so that they will not be obliged to disappoint the many worthy and needy little children now on their carefully prepared lists from having a health-and-pleasure-giving vacation in the country this season. Very kind donations have recently been received from friends travelling in Europe, accompanied with pleasant words showing their interest in this charity for the poor little children of this city. It is hoped that others, in the enjoyment of their own vacations, may similarly remember those in great need of a country visit and without the means of enjoying it. Contributions may be enclosed to William H. Baldwin, President, 48 Boylston Street, Boston, marked "Country Week," for which receipts will be promptly sent.

Here and There.

The Turkish government intends to establish an earthquake observatory at Constantinople.

A one-shilling scarlet Newfoundland postage stamp recently brought $282 at the sale of the Levison collection in New York.

Italian grape-culturists are now making illuminating oil from grape-seeds, from which they get a product of from 10 to 15 per cent. It is clear, colorless, and inodorous, and burns without smoke.

The manner in which Protestantism in the south of Ireland is decreasing, mainly through emigration, can be inferred from the fact that in the parish of Killarney, according to the rector, Archdeacon Wynne, there was in 1889 a total church population of 268 persons, while last year there were in the same parish only 178 church people, or a decrease of over 66 per cent. in five years.

Don't Scrub

your silverware, it's hard work, useless work, and besides, injures your ware. The easy way of cleaning it is by using that does it quickly and without scratching or wearing it.

SILVER ELECTRO-SILICON POLISH

Isn't the easy way worth trying?

Enough for trial for the asking or box post-paid, 15 cts. in stamps. It's sold everywhere.

THE ELECTRO SILICON CO., 72 John St., New York.

BUFFALO LITHIA WATER Spring No. 2

In the Preparation of Artificial Food for Infants.

Value of this Water in Diseases Incident to Teething.

Hunter McGuire, M. D., LL. D., President and Professor of Clinical Surgery, University College of Medicine, Richmond, Va., says:

"For some time I have been using BUFFALO LITHIA WATER in the preparation of artificial food for infants. Cow's milk is the substitute usually resorted to when the mother is not able to suckle her child and it is impossible to get a wet nurse. One serious objection, along with many others, to cow's milk, is its acidity. Human milk is always alkaline, but cow's milk, except when the animal is fed entirely upon grass, is almost always acid. This is the principal reason why the milk of cows disagrees with many babies, and lime water is often added to this milk to correct the acidity. I believe the long-continued use of lime water is hurtful to digestion, and last summer, when I was feeding two of my own children on cow's milk, and found the nurse adding lime water to prevent colic and intestinal derangement, which the food otherwise produced, I directed her to use BUFFALO LITHIA WATER in preparing the food, with immediate and continued good results. The water was added until the milk lost its acidity and was neutral or alkaline."

Dr. John H. Tucker, Henderson, N. C., President of the State Medical Society of North Carolina, referring to Spring No. 1:

"I have observed marked beneficial results from BUFFALO LITHIA WATER Spring No. 1, in the disorders of Teething Infants. I have sent many patients of this class to the Springs for the use of this water and, without exception, they have returned to me cured or greatly benefited."

This water is for sale by druggists generally, or in cases of one dozen half gallon bottles $5.00 f.o.b. at the Springs. Descriptive pamphlets sent to any address.

Thomas F. Goode, Proprietor, Buffalo Lithia Springs, Va.

RAYMOND & WHITCOMB'S TOURS.

ALL TRAVELLING EXPENSES INCLUDED.

A party of limited numbers will leave Boston, Monday, September 2, for a Grand Tour JAPAN AND CHINA.

—TO—

The westward voyage will be via Honolulu. The tour through Japan will be much more comprehensive than is usually made, and there will be longer sojourns at all the chief cities and points of interest. In China there will be visits to Hong Kong, Macao, and the great city of Canton.

In connection with the foregoing, and leaving Boston Wednesday, August 14, a tour through the HAWAIIAN ISLANDS, with visits to Honolulu, Hilo, the Volcano of Kilauea, etc. July 2 and 16. Alaska and Yellowstone Park. July 15. Colorado, Utah, and Yellowstone Park. September 3. Yellowstone Park and return, also Yellowstone Park, the North-west, and California.

Throughout the Summer and Autumn numerous short tours to popular resorts.

Independent Railroad Tickets via the Boston & Albany and Other Principal Lines; also, Steamship Tickets to all points.

Send for descriptive book, mentioning tour desired.

RAYMOND & WHITCOMB,
296 Washington St., opposite School St., Boston.

NOTE.—Mr. LUTHER L. HOLDEN, who has travelled over the entire route, and arranged the details of the tour, thus becoming thoroughly familiar with all the places to be visited, can be consulted at Messrs. Raymond & Whitcomb's office daily, between the hours of 2 and 6 P.M., and will be glad to give any desired information.

Important Works.

The Evolution of Christianity. By M. J. SAVAGE. 178 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

CONTENTS: Old World Religion; Judaism and its Hopes; Conditions when Christianity was born; Jesus and What he attempted; The Influence of the Christ Idea; The First Church and Paul; The Problem of the Trinity; The Church of Rome; Growth away from Jesus; The Protestant Revolution; Science and the Church; Free Christianity.

"One would seek in vain for a more enlightened application of the scientific method to the history of religion; and one can believe that, if close reasoning and rational faith could convert Mr. Savage's words, might bear a message to those who are without the churches and within. One reads with pleasure and confidence and hopefulness, and finds the end come all too quickly."—Boston Times.

Uplifts of Heart and Will. Religious Aspirations in Prose and Verse. By JAMES H. WEST, author of "The Complete Life," etc. Second thousand, with additions. 106 pages. Cloth, 50 cents.

"Full of a happy sense of Nature's beauty and bounty. One unceasing aspiration towards the 'Moral Ideal,' the 'Blessed Best.'"—William C. Gannett, in Unity.

"One is very strongly impressed with the sincerity and reality of expression. Mr. West is a devout and earnest religious writer."—Boston Herald.

The Work of the Ministry. Lectures given to the Meadville Theological School. By Rev. W. P. TILDEN. 186 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

CONTENTS: The Ministry; Object of Preaching; Pastoral Work; Sunday Schools and Guilds; Pulpit Services; Usages and Duties; Personal Influence; Sealed Orders.

Written in a delightfully fresh style, free from pulpit tone and theological terminology, but serious, earnest, and up to the high plane of ministerial responsibility.—Independent (New York).

Kindling Thoughts. By ELIZABETH P. CHANNING. 315 pages. Cloth, $1.25.

Contains fifty-seven brief essays, such as Dev upon the heart; The angel in the shadow; A disappointed life; Plain living and high thinking; The spiritual tangle; The charm of the old; Accepting ourselves as we are; etc., etc.

It is a long time since anything so brightly refreshing as these Kindling Thoughts has come to us. They are full of that best cheer which comes from the deepest, clearest springs of faith.—Unitarian.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Topics of To-day.

- Essays and Lectures on Important Themes.
18. THE RELATIVITY OF KNOWLEDGE: The nature of sense-perception; sight, sound, taste, smell, feeling; the doctrine of the Unknowable. By ROBERT G. ECOLES, M.D.
 19. A STUDY OF MATTER AND MOTION: An excellent digest of a much vexed question, with quotations from many authorities. By Hon. A. N. ADAMS.
 20. PRIMITIVE MAN: Pliocene, paleolithic and neolithic races; the ages of bronze and iron, cave-men and lake-dwellers; mound builders; primitive tools. By Z. SIDNEY SAMPSON.
 21. GROWTH OF THE MARRIAGE RELATION: Its earlier forms; polygamy; polyandry; marriage by capture; monogamy; divorce and divorce laws. By C. STANILAND WAKE.
 22. EVOLUTION OF THE STATE: The growth of political institutions; family tribe, clan, city; the State's final form. By JOHN A. TAYLOR.
 23. EVOLUTION OF LAW: How law begins; statute law and judge-made law; the conversion of customs into law. By PROF. RUFUS SHELTON.
 24. EVOLUTION OF MEDICAL SCIENCE: Supernatural ideas of disease; the beginnings of medical science; modern sanitary science. By ROBERT G. ECOLES, M.D.
 25. EVOLUTION OF ARMS AND ARMOR: The struggle for existence; Nature's methods; individualism and co-operation; final universal peace. By JOHN C. KIMBALL.
 26. EVOLUTION OF THE MECHANIC ARTS: Development of the human hand; earliest use of implements and tools; inventions; the laboring classes. By JAMES A. SKILTON.
 27. EVOLUTION OF THE WAGES SYSTEM: The definition of wages; economic characteristics of the wages system; wages the outgrowth of slavery; development of the system. By PROF. GEORGE GUNTON.
 28. EDUCATION AS A FACTOR IN CIVILIZATION: Early methods in Egypt, Persia, China, Greece, and Rome; early Christian ideas of education; Catholic and Protestant views; the common-school system. By MISS CAROLINE B. LE ROW.
 29. EVOLUTION AND SOCIAL REFORM. I. The Theological Method. By REV. JOHN W. CHADWICK.
 30. EVOLUTION AND SOCIAL REFORM. II. The Socialistic Method. By WILLIAM POTTS.
 31. EVOLUTION AND SOCIAL REFORM. III. The Anarchistic Method. By HUGH O. PENTECOST.
 32. EVOLUTION AND SOCIAL REFORM. IV. The Scientific Method. By DANIEL GREENLEAF THOMPSON.
 33. ASA GRAY: His life and work. By MRS. MARY TREAT.
 34. EDWARD LIVINGSTON YOUNG. The Man and his work. By PROF. JOHN FISKE.

"Replete with facts and suggestions; not only interesting, but a substantial contribution to sociological literature."—Christian Register.

"The mode of presentation seems to me admirably adapted for popularizing Evolution views."—Herbert Spencer.

Pamphlets, 34 numbers, 16 to 32 pages each, some of them illustrated.

Ten Cents Each.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Theodore Parker to a Young Man.

This letter from Theodore Parker, to a young man just starting out in life, was first printed in the Christian Register in 1885, and afterwards in leaflet form. It has been some time out of print, and yet, from its straightforward, manly tone in relation to life, duty, wealth, study, religion, is still called for as a very available tract to be handed to boys and youth. It is now entered permanently in the Register Tract Series, and may be had at any time.

Single copy, 2 cts.; per hundred, 50 cts.

Address Christian Register Association,
141 Franklin Street, Boston.

Pleasantries.

So long as Ireland was silent under her wrongs England was deaf to her cries.—Irish Newspaper.

"Whin I walk," said an Irishman, who objected to the bicycle, "I prefer to have my feet on the ground."—Youth's Companion.

"How many bells are in this chime?" asked the curious traveller. "Eight, all tolled," said the sexton.—Indianapolis Journal.

"Ah," said the old printer, who had just come down to be a waiter in a cheap restaurant, "this is like old times. Here I am distributing pi!"—Philadelphia Record.

At a country school in England it is said that one of the examiners in a general exercise wrote the word "dozen" on the black-board, and asked the pupils to each write a sentence containing the word. He was somewhat taken aback to find on one of the papers the following sentence: "I dozen know my lesson."—Harper's Round Table.

Nobody can deny that postage-stamp collecting is a great help in teaching boys geography. Jack showed this at school when his teacher asked him where Nicaragua was, and what it produced chiefly. "It's on page ninety-eight," said Jack, "and it produces more sets o' stamps than any other country of its size in the world."—Harper's Young People.

In one of the primary Sunday-school classes the lesson of the Good Samaritan was being reviewed. The teacher asked, "What had happened to the poor man who had been hurt and was at the side of the road?" Little Johnnie, who seldom speaks, raised his hand. The teacher was pleased, and said, "Well, Johnnie, you may tell." "Please, Miss A., he was run over by a 'lectric car."—Indianapolis Journal.

As many of you know who have big brothers and sisters in college, c is pronounced like k in Latin words. Two little boys had heard something about this difference of pronunciation. They were overheard talking, and this was what they said: Bobby: "Our dog's name is Cicero, but since my brother's been to college he calls it 'Kickero.'" Johnny: "I s'pose that's the way they pronounce it at college. They're all crazy on football!"—Good News.

Miss Sawyer, who is poor, was introduced at a lunch party to Miss Taylor, who is rich, and was coldly received. Miss Sawyer is bright, and knows her own antecedents and Miss Taylor's also. She was unabashed, and spoke cheerily: "I'm so glad to meet you. I've often wanted to. It's so funny. My name is Sawyer, and my grandfather was a tailor; and your name is Taylor, and your grandfather was a sawyer. Mine used to make clothes for yours, and yours used to saw wood for mine."

An absent-minded young preacher in New England, wishing to address the young ladies of his congregation after the morning services, remarked from the pulpit that he would be very glad if the female brethren of the congregation would remain after they had gone home. He was almost as badly mixed, the narrator of this story says, as another speaker, who, after describing a pathetic scene he had witnessed, added huskily, "I tell you, brothers, there was hardly a dry tear in the house."—Harper's Young People.

Highest of all in Leavening Power.—Latest U. S. Gov't Report

Royal Baking Powder

ABSOLUTELY PURE

This Elegant 'New Rochester' Nickel or Gilt Sewing Lamp

without glassware will be sent express paid to any address for $120

Chimney and Shade sold everywhere, or we can supply you.

We make 70 other styles of the famous 'New Rochester,' now greatly improved.)

The desideratum for a Summer Lamp; sufficient light with one-quarter the heat of larger sizes.

Bridgeport Brass Co. Bridgeport, Conn. 10 Murray St., N.Y.

The EDDY REFRIGERATOR

Has been before the public for nearly fifty years, and is still acknowledged everywhere to be

ABSOLUTELY THE BEST.

Slate Shelves, cold dry air, and built to last a lifetime

ASK YOUR DEALER FOR THEM.

MANUFACTURED BY

D. Eddy & Sons, 336 Adams St., Dorchester District, Boston, Mass.

In connection with our wholesale business, we are accustomed to sell

CHURCH CARPETS

at manufacturers' prices.

John H. Pray, Sons & Co., Wholesale and Retail CARPETS and UPHOLSTERY, 658 Washington St. (opp. Boylston), Boston. Correspondence Solicited.

Established 1857.

The Great CHURCH LIGHT

Frink's Patent Reflectors for Gas, Oil, or Electric, give the most powerful, softest, cheapest, and best light known for Churches, Stores, Banks, Theatres, Depots, etc. New and elegant designs. Send size of room. Get circular & estimate. A liberal discount to churches & the trade. Don't be deceived by cheap imitations.

I. P. FRINK, 561 Pearl St., N.Y.

Foundry established in 1790 by PAUL REVERE.

You Can't take too much of HIRES' Rootbeer

It quenches your thirst That's the best of it.

Improves your health That's the rest of it.

A 25 cent package makes 5 gallons. Sold everywhere. Made only by The Chas. E. Hires Co., Phila.

PALMER HAMMOCKS.

PAT. MAY 21 '89

The merits of the Palmer Woven Patent Hammocks have never been equalled. Their superiority of material, construction, and design has made them the Standard since first introduced. While there is a continual effort by imitators and infringers to produce something similar, it has all been without success, and the "Palmer Patent Hammocks" still stand pre-eminently superior to any of the imitations. They are produced in larger quantities and infinitely more varieties than the combined production of all others.

Before purchasing, insist upon seeing the "Palmer Patent Hammocks." Remember, the name "Palmer" is a synonym for all that is best in Hammocks. If your dealer does not have them in stock, he can get them for you, but be sure that he does.

I. E. Palmer, Middletown, Conn.

Ladies Travelling Alone to Boston

WILL FIND THE

HOTEL BELLEVUE

A quiet hotel, with a café of rare excellence. Located on Beacon Hill, near the State House, and convenient to all the large stores and places of amusement.

Adjoining American Unitarian Association Building, BEACON STREET, BOSTON,

EUROPEAN PLAN,

J. W. SMITH, Proprietor.

MILLER'S REFORM BOOTS AND SHOES.

For Women and Men. Will annihilate corns, bunions, and all troubles of the feet. Warranted Hand-made. Need no breaking in, and recommended by our best physicians. Send for pamphlet for ordering by mail. Edmund W. Miller, 8 R Beacon St., Boston.

Sold from stock or made to order.

TO LET. The desirable house, 118 Highland Street, Roxbury; 11,000 feet of land; beautiful location; Norfolk House cars now run near. Two furnished cottages, West Falmouth. S. G. DAVIS, 113 Devonshire Street.

USE "DURKEE'S SALAD DRESSING"

GEO. H. ELLIS, Printer,

141 FRANKLIN ST. BOSTON.

CHANNING BUILDING.

WITH extensive, light, and commodious rooms, large and fast Presses, embracing all the latest improvements, Type-setting Machines, new and modern material throughout, the Establishment ranks with the best in the City for the execution of Letterpress or Plate Printing.

- BOOKS
- PAMPHLETS
- NEWSPAPERS
- MAGAZINES
- SERMONS
- CATALOGUES
- REPORTS
- LAW WORK
- AND EVERY VARIETY OF

Mercantile and Job Printing.

Excellence in Workmanship.

Promptness in Delivery.

The Pamphlet Bindery, included in the office, is furnished with every facility for rapid and good work.

The Christian Register

Liberty, Holiness, Love.

VOLUME LXXIV.

BOSTON, THURSDAY, JULY 4, 1895.

NUMBER 27.

The Christian Register.

TERMS: $3.00 per year. Single copies, 6 cents.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY THE
CHRISTIAN REGISTER ASSOCIATION,
141 Franklin Street, Boston, Mass.

Entered as second-class mail matter.

Contents.

EDITORIAL.	PAGE
Notes; Liberal Confederation,	417
Teaching Patriotism; Distant Misery,	418
MUSINGS,	418
BREVITIES,	419
PRO AND CON.
A Deserved Tribute; Another Tribute; A Grateful Response,	419
ORIGINAL AND SELECTED.
Taste, and See, by George S. Merriam; The Flag, by Lydia J. Sanderson,	420
Antioch College,	421
The Japan Mission, I.; Sympathy with the Armenians,	422
National Conference of Unitarian and Other Christian Churches,	423
Revivals of Religion, by Rev. W. H. Fish, . . .	425
The Mollusca; Boys in China; Olives in Mentone; Children's Mistakes with Words, . . .	430
RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE,	423
THE PULPIT.
God out of Doors, by Rev. M. J. Savage, . . .	424
SPIRITUAL LIFE,	425
LITERATURE.
Church's Life of Cromwell; Other Book Notices,	426
Miscellaneous; Books Received,	427
THE HOME.
One Subscription, by Sarah Winter Kellogg; The True Story of a Garden Box,	428
What puzzled Margery; A Story of a Shoemaker; An Oriental Story,	429
POETRY.
The Hillside Cemetery, by Theodore F. Collier,	420
Sonnet,	424
The Morning-glory, by William Brunton, . . .	428
After the Rain,	429
June,	430
SPIRIT OF THE PRESS,	431
CHARITIES AND REFORMS,	431
PERSONALS,	431
EDUCATION,	431
PLEASANTRIES,	432

Editorial.

REV. C. F. DOLE's article in the New England Magazine for July, "The Evangelical Movement in America," is an unusually fine piece of work. It has great clearness of thought and keen insight into the action of religious forces. He presents his subject with judicial fairness, and his outline of the different phases of this movement is analyzed and stated with signal fidelity to the facts and the motives of the parties. It breathes a high ethical tone, and has the ring of the Puritan and the prophet. It is inspiring and uplifting to read a sketch like this, which rises above the narrowness of the partisan into the higher atmosphere of historic and religious truth. We hope that all our readers, for their own instruction and quickening, will not fail to read it.

THE drama that took place last week at Jackson, Ky., is one which cannot fail to excite sadness in the minds of the thoughtful. "Bad Tom Smith," who has been associated with several murders, was found guilty, and sentenced to be hanged. Before his execution he was converted to the Baptist faith, and received a public immersion. So far-spread was the excitement that several thousand people attended the scene, after which the crowd went in a body from the river's bank to the place of execution, and there in a hollow square listened to his confession. So general was the sympathy for the murderer, it is reported that one hundred one-gallon jugs of whiskey were sent to the jail by admiring friends within a few days of his execution. The various features of this spectacle were such as could only exist in a low moral state of society, and they make a burlesque of the sanctity both of law and religion.

A CONVENTION of the Young People's Christian Union of the Universalist Church will begin its session on July 10 in Boston. Delegations from all parts of the country will be present, and a special feature will be the presence of a considerable number of women preachers. Foremost among these will be Rev. Augusta Chapin, the only woman, it is said, who has received the degree of D.D. She is a college graduate, and has been preaching more than thirty years. She is described as "a brilliant speaker, a forcible writer, and an untiring worker." Rev. Florence E. Kollock, who recently took a special course at Newnham College, England, and is a colleague pastor at Pasadena, Cal., will also be present. A number of other women preachers from the West will take part. Probably there are more women in the Universalist pulpit than in any other single Christian denomination, and their presence at this convention will add interest and value to the proceedings.

DR. LYMAN ABBOTT's recent address on "Evolution" before the North-western University has made quite a stir among the old-school Western orthodox. A correspondent voices this in a rambling protest sent to the Chicago Inter-Ocean. He says it was evident that the aim of Dr. Abbott was to overthrow the orthodox teachings of the Bible, and to substitute uncertain speculations. It is unaccountable to him that an orthodox institution should spend a whole year in teaching the cream of orthodox truth, and then send for a man to kick it over and leave the sour milk of speculation. Of the government of the universe his critic says that Dr. Abbott takes a purely theistic view. Then the same critic, in his wrath, turns upon Dr. Drummond the charge of teaching Pantheism. Dr. Drummond, he adds, not only differs from the Bible on minor points, but also on the fundamental and essential doctrines on which the whole of Christianity rests. The fact is the science and history of the college professor and the preacher of Plymouth Church are in antagonism with the creed taught in the orthodox theological school. If you accept as truth the teaching of the old theology, you must reject the new science and history. Dr. Abbott and Dr. Drummond, in accepting the new science and history as truth, have to throw overboard the old creed; and this is the alternative which all clear and logical thinkers must accept. In the end opinion must always yield to fact.

THE death of Prof. Huxley is a great loss to the world. Few men of our time have filled a larger place or done a nobler work. In the paths of science he was an original discoverer, and he has made very valuable contributions to human knowledge. He brought to the examination of nature keen faculties of observation, a vigorous intellect, and that power of quick generalization by which laws are derived from facts and the horizon of knowledge enlarged. He was a lover of truth for its own sake, and was both frank and brave in his utterance and defence of his own convictions. As the conclusions he reached in his investigations frequently brought him into conflict with the prevailing religious opinions, he often took up the lance in defence of his teaching; and he was a vigorous fighter. He crossed swords with many of the higher dignitaries of the Church, and gave as well as took many severe thrusts. In the domain of science he ranks among the chief. His services and the nature and extent of his labors must be left for a future and fuller treatment. What he has done in various ways is of priceless worth and of imperishable value. Though his mind had a large sweep, it had its limitations. In the heat of controversy with theologians he would sometimes lose his judicial fairness. But, take him all in all, his name will remain with that of Tyndall and Darwin, as illustrious examples of men who by their tireless industry and devotion in the pursuit of knowledge have made extensive acquisitions and become benefactors of mankind.

DEAN EVERETT, at the annual meeting of the alumni of the Divinity School, made a favorable report of the work and the condition of the school during the past year. Fifty-two students have received instruction, though only forty-four have attended at a single time. There are nineteen who at present design to enter the Unitarian ministry: the rest now belong to other denominations. Some of them will probably later in their studies graduate from other theological schools. There are five graduates from Meadville who are taking a post-graduating course. The next year the proctor will be a Methodist who entered with the intention of only remaining a portion of the time, but was advised by Bishop Vincent to take the entire course, and has decided to do so. There is a very kindly spirit among the students; and, while there is a marked difference of opinion and a frank expression of this difference, there is a wide-spread social feeling among them, and a deeper tone of spiritual life. In various ways the students were working together in full harmony. There has been an increase in the teaching force of the school by the appointment of a new professor, a graduate of the Andover School, who for two years has been studying in Germany for this purpose. He will be associated with Prof. Thayer in the department of the New Testament, and will bring to his work unusual ability and promise. The new plan at Cambridge in its working has proved to be a signal success. The result gives great pleasure to the government of the school, and should encourage the faculty of the Union Theological Seminary in their efforts for broader and more independent lines of study.

WE have an illustration of how to solve the strike question in the method adopted by the bricklayers and the builders of New York City. This, as probably may be known by many of our readers, was adopted in 1885, and grew out of a strike. After a struggle both sides became eager to come to an agreement. A joint committee from seven labor unions met an equal number selected by the builders; and they entered upon a mutual agreement April 9, 1883. The builders promised to pay at once 42 cents an hour, to be raised to 45 cents as soon as all the builders could be brought into line. In 1887 the rate was raised to 50 cents an hour, and this has continued until now. Thus it will be seen that for ten years the men have been getting better wages than before. The joint arbitration board consists at present of sixteen members,—one from each of the eight bricklayers' unions of the city and an equal number from the Mason Builders' Association. By March 1 each year this committee has passed upon the agreement for the coming year. All past grievances are brought before the board to be settled; but, while the questions are under consideration, the men continue their work. The cases after a full hearing are decided. If the workman is in the wrong, the men sustain the builders; and, if the builder is in the wrong, other builders compel him to pay the fine or right the wrong. The success of this plan rests on the fact that both parties have strong organizations. The results in this case have been such that the builders three years ago aided the hod-carriers to form an organization, and made a like arrangement with them. The builders, we are told, are now seeking, and with probable success, to extend arbitration to all the building trades in New York City. If in other cities both parties would enter into this plan in the right spirit, what is to prevent it from becoming universal?

RECENTLY we noticed the existence of prejudice against race and color in Rhode Island. In Eastern and Central Europe this spirit has burst forth with intense fury. When the new czar was crowned, the Jews indulged the hope that the severe laws existing in Russia against them would be softened; but they have been doomed to disappointment. These edicts are still burdensome. Besides other hardships, their schools are closed; and the children have no instruction. Not long since in Germany a funeral procession of Jews was broken up, and thus the most sacred affections were outraged. In Vienna the late city election resulted in returning so large a number of anti-Semitic officials that they, by combining with other groups, held control of the municipal government. The emperor, fearing the consequence of this coalition, has ordered the city affairs to be taken from the hands of the elected officers. In various ways the race hatred is blazing with great fury, and the most atrocious outrages are committed against the Jews. Worst of all, in some cases even the authorities wink at this savagery toward the despised people. The feeling is very much intensified by the addition of religious hatred; and, from present indication, the fierceness and cruelty seem to be on the increase. This spirit of antagonism which so extensively prevails proves that large strata of savagery still exist, untouched as yet by the higher forces of intelligence and justice. The very alphabet of the religion of Jesus is yet to be learned and practised before a radical reform can come and a higher civilization prevail.

LIBERAL CONFEDERATION.

It is not surprising that the general tendency of the time toward a consolidation of kindred organizations should show itself in the religious field, and that, together with much effort among the Christian sects to combine for practical work, there should be talk of a liberal confederation. What may be possible and what impossible in this direction is a question worth careful and candid consideration.

There are now in existence three denominational organizations to which the name liberal may be fairly applied,—those controlled, respectively, by the Jews, the Universalists, and the Unitarians. There are besides these many local religious societies bearing no denominational name and entirely independent in their character. Of all these organizations it may be said that they are working on closely parallel lines and toward the same ideal. Neither of them probably cares very deeply at heart for the name it bears, save as that name stands for an effective working fellowship which time has matured and strengthened.

But, while the three main branches of the liberal movement in religious thought have grown to be so like one another, in many respects, that it is hard to tell the difference between them, one can see that anything like consolidation is, for the present, as impossible as if they were entirely unlike. It is both a wise and a strong instinct which tells each one to cling to the organization it has, and forbids it to exchange that for any new form of union, whatever theoretical gains may be promised, because of the uncertainties that beset such an experiment. These organizations are the fruition of great labors and sacrifices. They are filled with sacred memories and traditions, which constitute a large measure of their power; and they constitute, in the hands of those who have charge of them, a very sacred trust. Courage is a good quality, and men must often risk serious losses for the sake of more splendid gains; but, when it comes to the surrender of what has been built up by long and costly effort as a means of good to all the world, the certainty of something better must be very clear to free one from the charge of foolish recklessness.

But, if consolidation be out of the question, has not the time come for some form of confederation to be adopted? Undoubtedly, such a means of united action can be established if the results to be looked for are sufficient to repay the effort. What results are set before us? It is said, in the first place, that in this manner needless and wasteful antagonisms could be avoided. But it must be replied to this argument that, if any large amount of antagonism exists between the bodies it is proposed to federate, that must render their union impossible; and, if there is little antagonism, then there is little need of taking steps to correct it. The latter is probably the truer statement. Some jealousies may show themselves here and there in out-of-the-way places; but these are hardly worth noticing, in comparison with a general feeling of mutual respect and good will.

It is urged again that independent churches throughout the country would join a new federal organization, though they will not unite with any existing denomination. On what ground this expectation stands it is hard to see. Neither is it plain what greater attractions the new organization would possess, nor is there any evidence of a new desire on the part of these isolated societies to ally themselves with a general organization. Their whole history shows a strong preference to stand by themselves; and, if we are to judge by the experience of the Liberal Congress, they are by no means generally eager to unite among themselves or with some larger religious body.

A third argument for federation is that there are many small places where there are liberals enough of different names to support a church, if only they could be brought together, though each class is too weak to support a church by itself. This is undoubtedly true, and we must all wish that there were some way of meeting the problem which these small communities present. But, when we ask where the means for doing this much needed work are to be found, there is only one answer to give: they must come from churches which think they are already doing their utmost in support of missionary work. In other words, the denominational churches must carry forward their denominational work, and add to that the burden of maintaining the new federal organization proposed.

The probabilities are that, for the present at least, liberal churches could not or would not support both these lines of work and support them well. No one can say that the field which confederation might be expected to reach and cultivate is not important; but, with limited resources at our command, we have to ask ourselves, What is the most important thing we can do? And the liberal denominations are likely to feel for some time to come that their own work of church extension demands all the support they can give.

TEACHING PATRIOTISM.

In former days it seems to have been believed that patriotism was best taught at home beside the paternal knee, around the winter fire on windy nights, when the thoughts easily reverted to great and heroic deeds done by the fathers and mothers of the country, and the story of battle and moving incident and glorious sacrifice for the sake of country came readily to the lips of the elders who were fond of instructing and delighting the young.

But now life is too rapid and absorbed, too much filled with unimportant but exacting trifles, to give time for the best of all teaching—that of parents and grandparents and elder kinsfolk—to eager-minded and alert-eared children, who listen with absorbed interest to the tale of the ages and the deeds of the forefathers. The first mode of teaching history and patriotism, the oral mode, invented by Homer and handed down by the Grecian rhapsodes, was the best; but, unfortunately, there is no longer time and leisure to thus instruct the young. It was therefore imperative that some systematic teaching of children should be instituted in the schools, that they might not be left to grow up absolutely ignorant of the history of their country, its organization and laws, and the duties of citizenship, nor wholly to miss that kindling of mind and heart that comes from the glowing recital of deeds worthy of emulation. The patriotic spirit grows by noble examples of men who have lived and died for their native land, have laid the foundations of free institutions in struggle and endurance and the sacrifice of their lives, and propped the infant State by their devotion and wisdom.

Thus the custom has grown up of setting apart a day for the recital and commemoration of these things, and of saluting the flag in the schools, pledging fealty and love to the symbol of the nation. Of late years a little more attention has been paid to the teaching of American history; but this tentative effort still falls short of what it should be, in order thoroughly to ground the young in knowledge of the great principles on which our government rests, and the love and reverence requisite to its perpetuity. It is said that no thoroughly admirable school history of the United States has as yet been produced. Scores of writers have tried their 'prentice hands at this worthy task, but nothing comparable to Green's "Short History of England" has resulted. The work is yet to be achieved, and it is worthy the attention of the best writers of the time.

But books, after all, can teach less than the living voice, and the object-lessons of the great anniversaries which have been thickly strewn over the past twenty years, from the battles of Lexington and Concord to the monster fair at Chicago. These have been of prime importance in the education of the people, and especially of the young. Concrete history is always the best. Pageants, memorials, statues, picture, story, help to make vital the driest detail of the past. Gradually we are gathering a great body of these things, that will help the American boy and girl to read as they run, and to remember the important fact, and work it into life and experience. What boy with a seeing eye in his head and a feeling heart in his breast can pass unheeded by the pathetic statue of Nathan Hale in City Hall Park, New York, unmoved to pity and admiration for the young hero and martyr, who, when led to execution as a spy by his country's enemies, exclaimed, "Would that I had a hundred lives, that I might give them all for my dear country!" Here is a living, concrete bit of history,—a fact that still throbs with red blood and pregnant meaning for ardent souls. We need more such memorials for the education of the young. The vivid presentation of example is the propulsive force of patriotism.

The scholastic training is good, especially for the swarms of dark-skinned children who crowd now the school benches in cities,—peaceful invaders from over seas, who come with strange, outlandish words upon their tongues, as ignorant of our history and laws and traditions as the occupants of cattle ships. But they have in them the stuff to make Americans, if rightly kneaded; to become the upholders of the peace and prosperity of the nation, if light is let in on their untutored souls and a spark of love is kindled for their adopted land,—no stepmother, but more generous than any own mother the Old World provides for the moneyless and untaught. What a task for a nation,—to turn Slav, Italian, Scandinavian boys and girls into patriots and lovers! And yet it must be done if these dense incoming hordes are to buttress, and not to wreck, the republic.

These inchoate masses have strained the capacity of the schools. New methods of teaching have been adopted, new adaptations to conditions that scarcely existed ten years ago. This stubborn material,—how can it be made to run into the mould of American citizenship, with an enlightened love of country? It is a great problem, unthought of by the founders of our system of free schools. It was not dreamed that we were to be pedagogue to all Europe, and part of Asia and Africa. But for these strange new-comers, more than for the others, is the concrete, patriotic lesson the best,—something to be embraced by eye and mind, to be printed as an image, a picture, on the brain. For this reason it is a pity that the great opportunity offered by our noblest anniversary, the Fourth of July, is mainly squandered. All that has come out of it for the children is the fire-cracker, the deadly toy pistol, the rocket and Roman candle, and other contrivances by which the day, instead of being a time of joy and gratitude to the peaceably disposed, has become a period of dread and torture, leaving behind it a long trail of casualties and fatalities to life and limb. It shows how careless we are of our most precious heritage, that this great day of memory, hope, and promise, the grandest in our history, and perhaps in the history of the world, should be allowed to fall into the hands of noisy hoodlums, who profane its most sacred associations and make it a terror to the law-abiding.

When will this blatant, uproarious Fourth of July yield to a reform movement for the proper observance of the day? The invention of the American people has signally failed in the illustration of this our noblest holiday. It should be rescued from the hands of roughs and rowdies who profane its sacred memories, and restored to its pristine use, as a stimulator of pure patriotism, a means of kindling a new spirit of devotion to the fatherland. Noise, vulgarity, carousing, profanity, now mark its path; and the precious opportunities of the day are wasted because of the apathy and indifference of the American people.

DISTANT MISERY.

Is it not Gibbon who says, "Our sympathy is cold to the relation of distant misery"? But that was written more than a hundred years ago. There is no longer any distant misery. The railroad, the swift-coursing ocean steamer, the telegraph, have brought all places near. A hundred years ago, had there been at Kiel a great international celebration of a bloodless naval victory, it would have taken weeks for the news to reach us; and whatever ebullition of joy and gladness there might have been would have effervesced and passed away before the cold type could have told the story. To-day the flash of the electric spark brings the message to our doors almost before the hour of the celebration has struck.

The latest geographies hardly indicate by so much as a line or a dot places in the far East which have suddenly sprung into such importance that they seem in our immediate vicinity, and we read of them and speak of them at the breakfast-table as though they had adjoined our birthplace.

Nebraska was once a great way from Massachusetts; but, by the lacework of wires that enmesh the country, not a hamlet in New England but feels its contiguity when starvation threatens the distant State. The Sea Islands sun themselves in their sparkling sea, unthought of by the world at large till the sky is hidden by clouds and the waves sweep over the land, leaving desolation and misery behind. Instantly the whole nation is aware of this group of islands, with its patient, hard-working people reduced to beggary. Their misery is no longer distant.

There is another reason why, for the people of the United States, distance is quickly annihilated in times of joy or sorrow in other lands. Not a country on earth but has its representatives here. Invisible ties by the ten thousand stretch away across the oceans to every place beneath the sun; and over these unseen strands come messages of weal or woe, to gladden or depress. However cold the general pulse may be, the individual heart throbs with warm sympathy with its far-away kin.

There are some people who seem to have no red corpuscles in their blood. They brand every man "sentimentalist" whose sympathy leaps forward at any cry of misery, as the sword of the knight of the Round Table almost flew from its scabbard to meet a wrong half-way. Such people would have called the old pagan who found nothing in humanity alien to his interests a crank. They have never discovered the educational value of a wide sympathy, to put it on no higher ground. A young man who was graduated at Harvard the other day chanced to hear some one speak of the Armenian outrages, and naïvely asked to what the speaker was referring. He had not heard the subject mentioned before. Latin and Greek history? Oh, yes: he was familiar with that. Mathematics and philosophy? He had taken honors there. But to him Armenia was as unknown a country as the back of the moon. Naturally, his sympathy was cold to that distant misery. He had not only lost the satisfaction of feeling for another's woes, but he betrayed a lack of information that seemed like painful ignorance. As love of nature inspires a man to learn all that he can about the department which most appeals to him, so love of humanity, a sympathy with all who suffer, leads one to inform himself as to that family, that people, that land, whither his sympathies fly.

Those who are cold to distant misery lose a great inspiration. The warmth of sympathy quickens the religious feelings of gratitude and aspiration. A sweet-souled invalid, who for years had been shut up in a tiny bedroom on a hard bed, when asked what she did all day long, replied, "I lie here and count up my mercies." She had reached the solvent for selfish trouble. No misery on earth was distant to her. With a quick leap her heart flew out to every case of suffering which reached her ear, only to fall back with gratitude for the blessings which were hers. To refer again to Armenia, what greater lesson in gratitude for the priceless blessings of a free country could that college boy have had than to have been able intelligently to compare the condition of an American citizen with a subject under the accursed domination of Turkey; what greater cause for aspiration, for a desire to make himself worthy of the liberty into which he had been born, and to do his part as a worthy citizen in his native land, than to be able by the power of imagination, quickened by sympathy, to look on the Oriental Christian under the heel of the Moslem, and then to see the American under an open sky, with every right of manhood freely his?

Keen sympathy may bring its pang of pain, but it brings blessings that can come in no other way. It must tread a "thorn-road"; but, like the wild eglantine, the thorns are beset with beauty and sweetness.

Musings.

A SUNDAY in London! There are many ways of spending it. Twenty years ago I heard Spurgeon in his tabernacle; but Spurgeon had no message for me, and now his voice is sealed. Two years ago I heard Stopford A. Brooke; but now his chapel is closed, and he has been taking a winter's rest on the Continent. Let us hope that we may see and hear him in our own land the coming winter, all the better for this enforced rest. Farrar I have heard, and Parker I have read; but there is no lack of new preachers who have been slowly making their fame. Canon Gore and Page Roberts and Archibald Carpenter are three prophets in the Established Church who have something to say, and who draw crowds to hear them say it. St. George's Church, Bloomsbury, was in easy range; but it was something more than an idle curiosity that drew me there. I had heard that the preacher was a brother of W. Boyd Carpenter, the Bishop of Ripon; and the Bishop of Ripon I knew was a brother of the late H. Bernard Carpenter, to whom I publicly gave the right hand of fellowship in the old Hollis Street Church when he came to Boston fourteen years ago. Could it be that there were three pulpit orators in one family? I entered the church, and was shown a seat close to the pulpit. I needed no one to tell me who the rector was among the white-robed priests and singers. There was one face that was unmistakable. The bright new coins in my purse bearing the image of Victoria have scarcely a greater resemblance to each other than the face of this preacher bore to his gifted brother. It was as if Bernard Carpenter stood before me. If the resemblance was great when the face was at rest, it became startlingly lifelike when the preacher announced his text and threw himself into his discourse. His voice seemed to be pitched a little lower, but his facial expression was almost identical. He spoke like his brother, without a note, and with even greater fluency and rapidity. His discourse had a stronger logical framework than the discourses of Bernard Carpenter were wont to have, and the treatment was more systematic: there was not that flaming rhetoric which set the preacher in a blaze and often kindled his hearers. Few men have so fervid an imagination as had Bernard Carpenter. It sometimes ran away with him, but he generally took his hearers with him. Mentally, the brothers differed; but, theologically, I could see no marked contrast. The sermon was broad, catholic, ethical; and the slight reference to the Trinity it contained treated it not as a complete expression of truth, but as a threefold manifestation of the love of God. In a pleasant chat after the sermon Mr. Carpenter paid a warm tribute to Dr. Martineau, as the greatest mind in England, and said he had written him on his birthday and sent an offering of flowers.

In the afternoon I had an experience which was unusual, to say the least. What would the old Puritans who founded the town and church of Dorchester, Mass., have thought of one of their ministers preaching in cassock and surplice? Certainly, some of their successors would have thought it intolerable. The black gown, as much the garb of the scholar as of the minister, is not a stranger to that pulpit; but the long cassock and the white surplice over it,—what would they think of it? On the other hand, what would the Bishop of London or any other of the constituted authorities of the English Church say, if told that a Unitarian minister, who had never received ordination through the historic episcopate, had preached in a London pulpit? Which of these contending critics must I satisfy first? The Puritans, most of them, are dead, and cannot wreak their vengeance; and I doubt if the bishop has any vengeance to wreak (or if he could wreak it if he had) when he learns that it was not at a regular, but at an extra service that I spoke, and that, though I wore the clerical vestments and spoke from the pulpit, my auditors were not sheep, but nearly all lambs. Technically considered by "the Church," perhaps it was not "preaching," but only an American ministerial layman's address at a Sunday afternoon service for children. It was held in the church itself, with surpliced boy choir and organ; but the service used on the occasion was not from the Book of Common Prayer, but from a very uncommon prayer book, which, I suspect, is used as yet only in this parish. Think of standing up in the chancel side by side with the rector, just behind a division of the choir boys, and intoning a service made up of extracts from responsive services by W. L. Sheldon of the Ethical Culture Society of St. Louis and by Rev. J. Vila Blake, Unitarian minister of Chicago, with hymns by Gannett, Hosmer, and others. Well, it did seem a strange but a delightful conjunction of ritual and geography that St. Louis, Chicago, and Boston, Ethical Culturists, Unitarians, and Episcopalians, should all be represented in a devotional service in a London church of the established order. Could catholicity go any further? If cassock and surplice seemed strange, the matter of the service was sweet and beautiful, and a thousand times better than saying over passages which could not mean anything to anybody. This service book has but lately issued from the press, and bears upon the title-page the names of Rev. A. W. Oxford of London and W. L. Sheldon of St. Louis. Mr. Oxford was the compiler, but he has freely used and generously acknowledged the material furnished by Mr. Sheldon, and has also availed himself of Mr. Blake's service-book and various other hymn and service books. The volume is not, however, either a literary or theological bit of patchwork as variegated as Joseph's coat of many colors, but is well fitted together, like the seamless robe of Jesus, which may well be the symbol of unity in worship. Mr. Oxford's catholicity has been before shown in the compilation of the Berwick Hymnal, prepared several years ago, and containing, in addition to the grand old hymns of the Church, many hymns by modern Unitarian writers. This book is one of three which I like to think of as showing the freedom, fellowship, and faith attainable in modern hymnology. The other two are the hymn-book compiled by Rev. Dr. John Hunter of Glasgow, a Congregationalist, and that compiled by Rev. Dr. Gottheil of the Temple Emanu-El, New York, the distinguished representative of Reformed Judaism. Mr. Oxford's parish is in one of the densely populated districts of London, with a large foreign element. But, in addition to ministering to the wants of his people, he has been elected a member of the London School Board, and has found time withal to prepare himself for assuaging the ills of the body as well as of the spirit, and will shortly have from Oxford his degree as Doctor of Medicine. In his delightful home several beautiful clocks bore witness to his love of horology. Certainly, at any rate, he means to keep up with the times; and he will not pray, I am sure, with Hezekiah, that the dial may be set back, or, with Joshua, that the sun may stand still.

ONE more pleasure and one more surprise awaited me. I had been to church twice, but I determined to go a third time. My excuse for this dissipation is that I wanted to hear my dear friend, Dr. Brooke Herford, in his own church Sunday evening. So, after sitting with him under his own vine and fig-tree, with olive plants around the table, with my cup running over in the midst of my friends, which is so much better than having it run over in the midst of one's enemies, I went to Roslyn Hill Chapel. The lady who walked with me and sat by me was Miss Hallie Q. Brown, a colored lady of Wilberforce University, who is speaking in England in behalf of the education of the colored race. We sat in front, directly facing the choir. One of the singers was a sweet-faced brunette, but not a Saxon brunette. There was African blood in her veins. My companion confirmed my opinion. Our curiosity passed into admiration when she rose and sang "O thou that bringest good tidings to Zion" with splendid voice and fine artistic expression. Years ago Aldredge, the most distinguished actor of the colored race, finding that he had but little opportunity in America, came to England, and settled. He died just after his little girl was born. It was this girl, educated in London and Brussels, who had sung to us. To sit in a London church beside an American colored lady, and listen to a beautiful rendering of "The Messiah" by another colored lady, was an unusual experience, and seemed to indicate that here, at least, the Messiah had already come, and that men would no longer hate and destroy in all this holy mountain. Such a scene in certain American cities would break up the church, and possibly occasion violence and bloodshed. But the time will come, I trust, when black and white may sit together in the same church pews in our Southland, and listen to a colored girl sing the gospel of "The Messiah,"—"O thou that bringest good tidings to Zion." Surely, then, the good tidings will have come! As for the sermon by Dr. Herford, it was not only an exposition of the threefold benediction, but was a benediction in itself, rational, natural, devout, and full of sweet reasonableness. In three months many of my readers will have a chance to hear that familiar voice, and to welcome again in our own land the genial face. Thus ended my London Sunday, a day as full of pleasures as it was of surprises.

Brevities.

The glorious Fourth! May the sentiments it awakens find quiet expression!

Michigan University sends out seven hundred graduates this summer. Coeducation does not seem to diminish the numbers of that thriving university.

An exchange says, "It is somewhat startling to read that a railway station has been opened at Gehenna"; but it hastens to explain that it is the termination of the line from Jaffa to Jerusalem, and is therefore purely mundane.

The Berea Quarterly, published by Berea College, Kentucky, has a picture showing students, whites and Negroes, from seventeen different States. Education and mutual acquaintance are the best antidotes for race prejudice.

In a recent issue of the Christian Register "The Evolution of Character" should have been ascribed to Miss L. Lamprey, a graduate of Holyoke of about 1890, instead of to R. E. Whitman, by whom the manuscript was sent to the office.

The following description taken from a letter recently received from Jamaica will appeal to those who have ever seen the brownish-yellow, ragged banana, as it grows in the tropics: "The wind is blowing, and the tattering leaves of the banana. The trees, with their old, faded leaves hanging around them, look like the slovenly Negroes here, in their untidy, torn, and dirty clothes."

With Americans crossing the seas by the thousand, it is good to be assured that modern steamship machinery is now so complete that a great vessel like the "St. Louis" could average eighteen and one-half knots an hour and reach port only one day late without a rudder! Such is the advantage of twin screws.

If there were a Theodore Roosevelt in every city, who would close every saloon on Sunday, what a blessing it would be! And, if the people would support him by keeping the saloons closed the other six days, one might hope to see the dawn of the millennial day. As it is, it looks as though they would persist "to the crack of doom."

The love of liberty runs in the blood of the Poles. Disliking, for some reason, the priest assigned to them in Buffalo, they have voted to call an independent priest, and in the interim are holding services among themselves without a priest. As one of the papers says, "Ecclesiastically, the bishop has the case; but the people have the sympathy of American Protestants and of many Catholics also."

The New York papers are comparing the Long Island member of the board of education, who thinks it will conduce to immorality for school children to see their teachers dismount from a bicycle at the school-house door, to the Brooklyn school trustee who denounced Longfellow's "Building of the Ship" as an indecent poem. To such men the words "To the pure all things are pure" must be meaningless.

An American traveller in England writes enthusiastically of the beautiful lawns and well-kept parks, and is surprised to find how interested the people are to know of the wildness of regions not remote from Boston. "Nor," says the writer, "can they understand why we try to imitate wild nature in our parks. They love nature, it seems to me, better than most people at home; but it is a very sedate Dame Nature, in a tailor-made gown. Our wild, barefooted, bare-headed lass they have never met."

"Butchered to make a Roman holiday," the school-boy recites, and thinks with horror of the barbarism of those old times. Then he picks up the morning paper, and reads that on the twenty-eighth day of June a murderer was baptized in a southern river and hanged the same day, the execution being public, with excursion trains bringing hundreds, and hundreds more coming on foot and on horseback to witness the two occurrences. The American holiday seems not unlike the Roman of two thousand years ago.

As we go to press, a postal card reaches us from Japan. It is of special interest, as showing that Mr. MacCauley is the object of missionary effort there. The card is addressed to Dr. C. MacCaulay, Unitarian College, Tokio, and reads as follows:—

Bring nothing but thy GUILT, plead nothing but the BLOOD, and God must welcome thee,—yea, far more than welcome. The Everlasting Arms shall be thrown around thee, on thy finger shall be placed the seal of Forgiving Love, and there shall be JOY in the presence of the Angels of God.

In view of Turkish proceedings in Bulgaria and Macedonia, in addition to the harrowing troubles in Armenia, there is a growing dissatisfaction that the United States government has not made any moral protest to Turkey, and that there has been no expression of sympathy with the great powers in their attempt to secure reforms in Turkey. At a meeting of the United Friends of Armenia held last week a resolution was passed, petitioning the President to at least make such a protest as was made by this government at the time of the Crete massacre.

The North Carolina Christian Advocate waxes sarcastic in its indignation at what it believes is the drying-up of the stream of a true and noble beneficence, and a dependence on social entertainments to raise money for religious and philanthropic purposes: "Ice-cream and sherbet are 'holiness to the Lord,' and that lady engaged in the service of the sanctuary who never suffered the agony of bruised muscles over these commodities is not yet ready to wear the starry crown. There is virtue in penance done in freezing sweet morsels for the millions at home, that we may have money to keep up the sanctuary where God's name is recorded, and may be able to send the good news of salvation to the millions abroad. It is such a delightful way to give our money! It makes us feel as if we had value received, and we don't mind the loss of it so much!"

Pro and Con.

A DESERVED TRIBUTE.

To the Editor of the Christian Register:—

The following letter from the Board of Instruction of the Meadville Theological School was sent to Rev. A. W. Jackson at the close of his period of service there:—

REV. A. W. JACKSON:

Dear Sir,—Your colleagues, instructors in this school during the past year, have already expressed their appreciation of your work in asking to have you reappointed to the position you have so ably filled, and now wish to assure you of their profound regret in the action which has deprived the school of your faithful and highly successful labors.

With sentiments of high esteem and regard,

GEORGE L. CARY.
HENRY H. BARBER.
GEORGE R. FREEMAN.
FRANCIS A. CHRISTIE.

ANOTHER TRIBUTE.

To the Editor of the Christian Register:—

Your columns contained recently an expression of regret because of the failure to retain Rev. A. W. Jackson as professor in the Meadville Theological School, but the Unitarian public may not know how keenly his pupils feel the loss to themselves and to those who may come after. The character of Mr. Jackson's scholarship needs no defence; yet it should be made known that, in a remarkable degree, he was able to reach and help the students. Undertaking, at short notice, a prolonged and severe course of instruction, he carried it through with rare fidelity and success. His high ideal of preaching especially influenced the sermons that passed under his kindly criticism. Religiously and homiletically, they grew in power.

Were this tribute merely personal, it would hardly warrant publication. It expresses, however, the nearly unanimous feeling of the whole body of students, whose individual indebtedness, like my own, can be but half realized or expressed.

RICHARD W. BOYNTON,
Class of 1895.

A GRATEFUL RESPONSE.

To the Editor of the Christian Register:—

The Liberal Church League of our city sent out a short while ago about two dozen requests for books for our free library; and the responses were so hearty and generous that we wish to make public acknowledgment of them,—not only that all may know how kindly our people have acted toward us, but also that you may know how well we are getting on in our efforts to establish a first-class library in connection with our church of liberal Christianity.

We have received up to date: from the American Unitarian Association, 50 books; from Dr. W. H. Furness, 9; from the Unitarian Sunday School Society, about 45; from Rev. Joseph May, 56; from the Cheerful Letter Exchange, through Misses Lilian F. Clarke and Bertha Langmaid, 120; from the Second Church of Boston, through Miss Howard, 7; from the First Church, Boston, through Miss Storer, 10.

Besides these, we have received some very valuable books from Prof. C. C. Everett, Mrs. Martha Perry Lowe, Mr. L. F. Young, Mr. Charles Daniel, and Rev. J. T. Sunderland.

All of these books are good, and most of them are the very choicest. We feel very much encouraged now to keep on working for our library. The whole library has been turned over to a competent committee appointed by the church; and this committee is already at work arranging for the very earliest possible use of the books, of which we feel so proud, and for which we are so grateful.

The books thus far have been sent to Rev. George L. Chaney; but, as Mr. Chaney is to be away from the city for some time, it may be safer for any who are willing to add still further to our collection to send them to

JOHN T. JOHNSON,
President of the League,
2 So. Sixth Street, Richmond, Va.

For the Christian Register.

THE HILLSIDE CEMETERY.

BY THEODORE F. COLLIER.

What holy calm! and what Elysian peace!
Such as the Lord to his disciples gave;
Peace conquering all the terrors of the grave;
Peace without end, which time doth but increase
To fearful hearts presaging glad release
From death's grim horrors, which so oft deprave
Minds that no human bonds could e'er enslave.
Here rest ye quietly till time shall cease!

So, when for me the wearying course is run,
And when I've neared the oft-retreating goal,
But one request I have,—a simple one,—
That on this hillside, on this quiet knoll,
I may await the dawn of heaven's sun,
The glorious resurrection of the soul.
Clinton, N. Y.

TASTE, AND SEE.

BY GEORGE S. MERRIAM.

Every thoughtful person—perhaps every person—finds himself sometimes asking the question, Is the world friendly to me? Is nature, or the sum of events, or the power behind the whole, responsive to my desire and helpful to my need, or is it regardless or hostile?

Suppose we consult each one his own experience for an answer. Have I, as a matter of fact, found life kind to me? How have I been dealt with by events? Have I been treated, so far as I can see, like a child, or been abused or neglected? Perhaps the first off-hand answer will generally be: "I have had such a mixture of good and evil that the balance is not altogether clear. I have enjoyed much, and I have suffered much. Perhaps the happiness in my life has so far outbalanced the unhappiness that I ought not to complain. But so much has been adverse—I have so often been thwarted, I have not only suffered so often and variously, but I have so often been disappointed, my desires and capacities for happiness have so greatly outrun any fulfilment they have received—that I cannot say I have found Life a tender mother or anything like it."

Some such answer might be the first honest thought of most of us. The standard we instinctively apply is the measure of pleasure and of pain, so much happiness and so much suffering. But, on a second thought, we see that that standard is hardly an adequate and all-sufficient measure of existence. Let us reshape our question, and ask, Does life, as a matter of experience, meet and satisfy man's highest needs? Then you see we must ask: What are his highest needs? What constitutes the highest, genuine, undeniable success? By way of answer we look around upon the faces we know best, we call up our most treasured memories, we send our thoughts questing among the books we have read, the men and women we have revered. Well, out of such material what do we instinctively choose as the elements of a successful life? We choose the brave people, the stout of heart, the sweet of spirit; those who were rich and soaring in imagination; those who shed sunshine around their path; those in whom were deep springs of peace; they who fought the good fight of endurance; they who in Siberian exile still held to their cause, and hoped for their children,—all the strong, the tender, the true. These are the successful people, are they not? These things constitute the highest success,—the power to do and dare, the spirit of sympathy and sweetness, the hardihood that cannot be broken, the tenderness that cannot be exhausted. Those are the highest needs of man.

Put the question so, then, Does life, as it actually comes to us, offer scope and exercise and education for fidelity and courage and generosity and patience? Why, it seems as if life from first to last offered just that,—just that and all the time! It is one continuous moral opportunity. "Is that what you desire?" says Life. "Then open your hands and eyes and heart,—I will fill them all! You want to be strong? Here is a task for every hour, to harden your muscles. You aspire to a noble patience? Oh, never fear but you shall have lessons in that! Heroism and hardihood? I have winter cold and summer heat, pangs of nerve and of soul,—the tools and fires by which heroes are forged. You would like to grow helpful, sympathetic? Dear child of mine, at every step of your path is some other of my children who wants your help."

And, after we have pondered that answer awhile, perhaps we say: "Dear mother, we will do our best; but we are little children yet. We cannot always be climbing toward the heights. Sometimes we want playthings." And she answers: "Take them, children! Would you have beauty? Here is the loveliest world about you. Here are the ocean and the mountains to delight you; here are the grass-blade and the dew-drop. Would you be amused? Here are the drollest things imaginable. Carry a sense of humor with you, and you will find this a most humorous world. Have you an appetite for knowledge? You live in a great museum and library."

And in another mood we come back to her, and say, "There is a deeper need,—our hearts crave love." And she answers with a smile whose depth of reassurance cannot be interpreted in words: "Be lovable, so shall you be loved. The very element which encompasses your inner existence is an atmosphere of love. You cannot understand the mystery. But just so far and so fast as your own nature expands, as it grows stronger and sweeter, so it is ensphered, interlocked, embraced in the heart of all."

But perhaps we falter: "You speak of things we have so dimly realized, so little attained to! The divine face we seem to see by glimpses is so soon veiled; our own lives in their daily actuality are so poor and broken." "Be of good cheer!" is her word. "The best you reach and the best you crave make together a promise of the gift I hold concealed until earth's work is done."

To put the whole matter in the simplest way, the question, "Is life friendly to me?" gets its answer according to what we mean by friendly, according to what we really want to have given us. If we want just to escape trouble and "have a good time," as children say; if ease and physical comfort and undisturbed enjoyment make up our ideal of life,—why, then, we shall be baffled and beaten all the way along. We shall say in our heart, There is no God, no higher power that answers our importunate call. But if we really and habitually set our desires on character, if we want above all to be full-statured men and women, to be children of God, we shall find ourselves helped and forwarded at every turning. We shall find that disaster means opportunity. We shall find that our happiest hours, instead of being lost and swallowed up as time passes, leave, somehow, the best of themselves as a perpetual enrichment of our lives. We shall feel that love has in itself the promise of eternity. We shall find perpetually opening to us new avenues of interest and knowledge and achievement. We shall find new and unexpected ties binding us to our kind, new vistas beckoning us on.

Let each one consult his own sober, best-weighted experience. Each of us has led a more or less inconstant and wavering course, has striven upward sometimes, drifted sometimes, sometimes plunged wilfully downward. Recall those times when your purpose was purest and strongest, and did you not find life itself making in your favor? Did you not, somehow, feel yourself on the right road? Have you not felt the ground firm under your feet just in proportion as you were honestly trying to do the best you knew how?

The riddle finds its answer when a man practically accepts as his law and aim to be true to the highest right he knows. Science makes us familiar with the idea that all depends for each creature on being fitted to its environment. We speak familiarly of "a fish out of water." What the water is to the fish, what the air is to the bird, that, to man's higher nature, is the moral law, the moral ideal. Let him accept that, conform to that, and he is in his right place. The world he feels is friendly.

The moral ideal, we say, for brevity of speech; but we mean that large ideal which, with the so-called virtues, includes the noble hunger for knowledge, the delight of manly action, the divine joy in beauty, the human sense of the humorous, and every normal, wholesome taste and faculty of man.

But why,—the thought occurs,—why is mankind so fearfully slow in learning what is its true law and aim? You personify the supreme power as a mother. Why has the mother let a myriad generations grope so blindly? We do not know. That is a part of the great mystery which encompasses us. But what we do see is that somehow the lesson is being taught. Mankind has groped, and still gropes, but more and more into the light.

To come back to that individual experience which means most to us, can we not, each one, in looking back, see how again and again and yet again we have been taught that there is no safety but in well-doing, no happiness but in love? And is there anything for which we are so grateful as those moments when we learned the lesson? A child pores, anxious and troubled, over its book—it has reached one of the great stumbling-blocks, the first sum in long division or the Latin verb—until the eye brightens, and the word comes, "I see it! I've got it!" And so, at times when we have been beset and perplexed over some problem of action, the perception flashes on us, "That is the right thing to do!"

Have you ever watched a dog, bidden to perform some well-known trick, capriciously reluctant and resisting, though urged, coaxed, commanded, until with a sudden yielding he rushes through his performance, and springs on his master in a transport of satisfaction? So, perhaps, the higher intelligences sometimes watch us! Ah, how we struggle, resist, brace the shoulders, and set the teeth in resistance! And then some gracious wave of impulse lifts us; and suddenly, we know not how, we do the thing we said we would not, and rest and peace enfold us!

"But as I raved, and grew more fierce and wild

At every word,
Methought I heard one calling, "Child!"
And I replied, "My Lord!"

That is the new birth, that is the most blessed moment of life.

But it is not the occasional birth-hours but the hours of daily living, which make up the warp and woof of our existence. And along with each hour comes always, always, the choice. There is hardly a circumstance so commonplace, so trivial, but, perhaps unconsciously, we meet it in the better way or the worse. There is no distress so profound, no situation so hopeless, but it offers us a choice,—the right way or the wrong. Happy they in whom the right choice becomes so inwrought that it is the spontaneous, unquestioning impulse. Well is it with him who, though not spontaneously, yet strugglingly, resolutely, wages his daily battle.

And what of those in whom the wrong choice has become habitual till all power to choose the right seems lost? What of the moral wrecks, the souls that apparently never waked to the struggle or waked but to perish? For these, too, is there opportunity hereafter? The veil of that mystery is not lifted. All we know is that the highest disposition in us, as it seeks to reclaim up to the very end of earth, must of its own nature and necessity hope beyond earth.

"Oh, taste, and see that the Lord is good!" Taste, and see. Do not take it at second-hand report. Do not rest on any man's assurance about it. Do not expect satisfaction from any mere argument to prove that God is good. Taste! Honey is not so sweet to the tongue! See! Yonder vision of mountains and ocean is not so glorious to the eye.

And mark what follows: "Oh, taste, and see that the Lord is good! Blessed is the man that trusteth in him." Blessed is he who trusts in God; that is, as we must take it home, who accepts goodness as the law and aim of his life. Saving faith is just simply the hand outstretched to do the duty; and, when it clasps the duty, it clasps God's hand. Consciously it may be at times, with a thrill so transporting that life could hardly bear its continued rapture. Unconsciously or with dim consciousness for the most part, but all is well. When God is wholly veiled, the soul that takes duty for its part is still divinely befriended.

"Return unto thy rest, O my soul; for the Lord hath dealt bountifully with thee. For thou hast delivered my soul from death, mine eyes from tears, and my feet from falling. I will walk before the Lord in the land of the living."

THE FLAG.

BY LYDIA J. SANDERSON.

"A sceptre all who meet obey."—Byron.

What is a flag? Whence comes it? How does a bit of silk become the rallying-point and a guiding star of armies and people? How does a bit of cloth of no intrinsic worth influence the destinies of nations who struggle, suffer, and conquer? Why do the faded colors, tattered as they may be, enslave the mind, excite the fiercest animosity, and kindle the warmest enthusiasm? How comes it that these seeming trifles are enriched by a thousand memories? Why is it we pay to them royal honors? Why is the flag "a sceptre all who meet obey?"

Truly, these questions are interesting; and, connected as they are with national history, what more interesting study can be engaged in than that afforded by the symbols and emblems that have in all ages stirred the hearts and kindled the emotions of man?

The use of distinctive standards in an army for its many divisions and to mark the place of its leaders must have been an early necessity in the art of war. Symbols that had thus become associated with victory would become sacred, and hence would be introduced in religious rites. In this way, doubtless, originated the numerous devices which are connected with war and religion in all ages and countries. In common language, the words "banner," "ensign," "standard," "colors," and "flags" are used, generally, to mean the same thing.

We have authentic records from the early times that standards or banners were borne by nations and carried in battle. Allusions to them are frequent in the Old Testament. They are repeatedly referred to by David and Solomon, while the expression "terrible as an army with banners" shows the importance and awe with which they were regarded. It was customary for many centuries to choose the colors of a saint in whose intercession much confidence was placed for a military standard, and it has been the practice of the pope in all ages to give consecrated banners when success was wished for the enterprise. In the early Anglo-Saxon poem of the tenth century, "Beowulf," we read, "Then to Beowulf he gave a golden banner"; and the early poets tell it was a custom to have banners suspended from trumpets, for Chaucer says, "On every trump hanging a brod bannere," while we find Shakspeare saying, "I will a banner from my trumpet take."

At what time the form of standard which we call a flag was first used is not known. Some accounts state that the present form was first acquired in the sixth century in Spain, while others state that the waving flag was first used by the Saracens. Previous to this time the ensigns were generally extended on cross-pieces of wood. Ancient military standards were fixed on the tops of towers or on platforms, and were stationary. Hence the name "standard": this spot was the rallying-point in battle. When borne in battle, they were carried on a pole.

Representations of standards were found on the oldest bas-reliefs of Egypt. Their invention is attributed to Egyptians. Diodorus states that they consisted of figures of sacred animals borne on the end of a staff; and the paintings at Thebes show such objects as a king's name and a sacred boat, while a semicircular fan was a common figure. The standards of Pharaoh's army had various figures, including reptiles, beetles, etc. It was believed that Isis, upon her death, made her resurrection into the moon; and to-day the Egyptians honor the crescent on the flag.

It is certain that the Hebrews carried standards after the exodus, which practice they probably derived from the Egyptians from whose bondage they had just escaped; for they bore figures of birds and animals. We read in Numbers of the divine command given to Moses,—"Every man of the children of Israel shall pitch by his own standard, with the ensign of their father's house." Isaiah, in foretelling the ruin that would fall on Assyria, found no stronger expression than to compare the overthrow of the Assyrian king to be "as when a standard-bearer fainteth." Layard says Assyrian standards were carried by the charioteers, and were similar to those of the Egyptians. According to Wilkinson, the Egyptian and Assyrian vessels carried no flags; but their devices were embroidered on sails.

The royal standard of ancient Persia, adopted by Cyrus, was a golden eagle with wings expanded; and the sacred standard of the Persians was the leather apron of a blacksmith, around which the people rallied when he aroused them to deliver Persia from tyranny.

Many other national standards have originated in similar ways. Something at hand was seized in an emergency and hoisted as a rallying-point, and afterward adopted for the attachment which clung to it as an object identified with freedom and patriotism. The Basarac sheriff, the green (some writers say black) standard of the Turks borne by Mahomet, is believed to have been brought from heaven by the angel Gabriel, and is preserved with the greatest veneration; and the present standard, with star and crescent, was adopted by Mahomet II. from its being the device of Diana Byzantina, the patroness of Byzantium. It was first hoisted by him in 1453, after the capture of Constantinople.

The Greeks usually placed a piece of armor at the end of a spear, as a signal for rally, though Homer tells us that Agamemnon

"Lifted in his hand
His purple robe, bright ensign of command."

—Pope's Iliad, VIII., 269, 270.

The Athenians bore Minerva's emblem, an owl, and the olive for their standard; while the Corinthians carried a winged horse. The Lacedæmonians carried the letter L, and the Messinians the letter M. When Alexander the Great began to claim a divine origin, he had a standard made inscribed with the title "Son of Ammon." Greece as a nation to-day has adopted the colors (blue and white) of Bavaria, in honor of her first king.

The Romans had various forms of standards; but, according to Pliny, the eagle was the chief military ensign. The eagle surmounting the thunderbolt, with the letters S P Q R (Senatus Populusque Romanus), was also a common standard. The ball, often used as a standard, was emblematic of the dominion of Rome over the world. It has been said that the emperor Constantine bore on the top of his standard the sign of the cross, but this could hardly be; for the cross at that time was known only as a heathen emblem, and not adopted by Christians till later. The sign which was borne by Constantine was the only recognized Christian emblem, the first two letters of our Lord's name—the Greek X (English Ch) and P (in English, R). The numerous red, white, and black eagles, single and double headed, which we find in so many standards of modern Europe, have come down from the Roman standard, the countries they represent standing for fragments of the great Roman Empire.

We find in China, Japan, and Tartary the dragon-shaped emblems which were adopted for military ensigns from the earliest age to the present, and to-day is found in the flag of China. Dragons in black, gold, and silver, were most common in the Far East, while white, red, and green were more general colors among the Celts.

Some of the Asiatic devices are of a religious significance. Burmah bears a peacock, one of the incarnations of Buddha; and Siam, the sacred white elephant. Japan, the source of the sun, as her name signifies, has adopted for her flag the blood-red rising sun.

Spain, in the early period of her power, bore the Castilian flag, quartering Castile and Leon, which Columbus bore on his ships to this country, as well as a personal flag given to him by Queen Isabella,—a white swallow-tailed pennon. The national ensign of to-day is in marked contrast to the present royal standard,—a very complicated construction, including the arms of Aragon, Sicily, Burgundy, and several others, being composed of red and yellow stripes taken from the bars of Aragon.

We find among the celebrated banners of France the royal banner of St. Louis,—blue powdered with fleur-de-lis in gold, a peculiarly French and royal device of extreme antiquity, the emblem of an ancient worship much older than any record of the Trinity, of which some have supposed this flower to be a symbol.

The famous St. Martin's banner has, singularly enough, furnished the English language with the word "chaplain." It was a blue banner in the form of a cape or cloak,—in French, chape. The oratory in which it was preserved took the name chappelle, the person intrusted with its care being termed chapelain; and thus, according to Collin de Plancy, our English words "chapel" and "chaplain" are derived.

In Chambers's "Book of Days" we read that one of the legends connected with St. Martin is that he divided his cloak with a naked beggar at the gate of Amiens. This cloak, being miraculously preserved, formed one of the most sacred relics of France. When war was declared, it was carried before the French monarchs as a sacred banner, and never failed to assure certain victory. The canons of St. Martin of Tours and St. Gratian had a lawsuit for sixty years about a sleeve of this coat, each claiming it as his property; but Count La Rochefoucauld put an end to the proceedings by sacrilegiously committing the relic to the flames.

The oriflamme, the sacred banner of Clovis, was a piece of red silk with flowers of gold wrought in gold thread (hence its name). It was cut into five points, each having a green tassel. At the end of the tenth century it had become the royal standard. It was first carried into battle by Louis le Gros in 1124, and appeared at Agincourt in 1415 for the last time, then hung in the old abbey Church of St. Denis till it was destroyed when the tombs of the kings of France were despoiled during the first French Revolution; but a reproduction still hangs from one of the pillars of St. Denis. The flag of Hayti to-day honors the banner of St. Martin and the oriflamme of France. The cornette blanche, or white banner, emblematic of the purity of the Virgin Mary, followed the oriflamme, and was adopted in the fifteenth century. It was powdered with fleur-de-lis.

Previous to the Revolution the French can hardly be said to have had a national flag. Each regiment in the army carried its own colors, while colors of reigning families were accepted in the place of national standards.

The tri-color was introduced at the Revolution; but the origin of the design is unknown. It bore the imperial crown, with the letter N and the eagle on the blue and red portions, with the imperial bees, and over all the inscription, "L'empereur Napoléon à la Garde Nationale de l'île d'Elbe." To the staff, the top of which was surmounted by a golden eagle, was suspended a tri-colored sash, also richly embroidered. This splendid standard was presented by Napoleon to his guards in Elba shortly before his invasion of France in 1815, and captured by the Prussians at Waterloo, and by them sold to an English gentleman, who took it to England. It is now on exhibition in the collection of Mme. Tussaud in London.

We find Napoleon's design again in the flag of Italy, which is a modification of the French, the division of the field next the staff being green, a favorite color of the emperor, instead of the blue. In the centre is a red shield charged with a white cross, the arms of the dukes of Savoy.

The flag of Portugal is a modification of the old flag carried by the early discoverers, which brought glory to Portugal in the days of Henry the Navigator.

The Austrian flag originally bore the Roman eagle; but now her ensign is red, white, and green, bearing the arms of Austria and of Hungary, surmounted by the royal crown.

The czar of the Russias considers himself entitled, as an imaginary successor to the Roman Cæsars, to bear on the imperial standard the double-headed eagle, the two heads denoting his Western and Eastern empires; while the merchant flag, white and blue, and red, traces its origin to Peter the Great. This ensign, as also the Dutch, has the same colors as the French flag, but the same colors as the French flag, but the former has the white uppermost, the two colors together, not according to heraldic laws, which provide that metal must not be placed upon metal nor color upon color. The latter has the red uppermost, then white, and the blue at the lower edge.

The National Assembly at Frankfort in the revolutionary year of 1848 brought out the old German colors of the time of Barbarossa,—black, gold, and red; and there was much discussion as to which color had the precedence. Freiligrath said, "Powder is black, blood is red, and golden flickers the flame." Then followed the substitutition of white for gold; and Frederick William II. was the author of the meaning of the German standard, "From night through blood to light."

The Belgian colors adopted in 1831 are those of old Germany,—black, yellow, and red,—but arranged like the French flag.

The oldest flag now in existence is the Danish,—a red field bearing a white Latin cross. Tradition says it descended from heaven ready-made, in answer to King Waldemar's prayer as he was leading his troops to conquer the pagans of the Baltic.

In the Swedish-Norwegian flag we see the Danish design with colors changed. The union was introduced in 1817, when the two countries were united under one king. Switzerland's flag is a red field bearing a white Greek cross.

For many years the standard of Ireland was three golden crowns on a blue field; but Henry VIII., fearing it might interfere with the triple crown of the pope, chose the green field, representing the emerald isle, and the harp, the land of song.

Of the English national flags the earliest forms bore the cognizance of the ruler for the time being. The Danes, during their dominion in Britain, carried the raven on their ensign. Wessex claimed the dragon, and the Saxons bore a white horse. We find a variety of forms of English flags. At the time of the crusades they became subject to established rules, when heraldry began to assume a definite form.

The famous Bayeux tapestry, about which so many opinions have been formed as to its age and by whom and where it was executed, is said to exhibit a complete display of the military ensigns in use at the time of the Conquest, by both the Norman invaders and the Saxon occupants of England.

There is an old tale of how the pendant originated with the English,—after the Dutch Van Tromp, in 1652, defeated the English fleet under Blake, and sailed into the Channel with a broom at the masthead, to show he had swept his enemies off the sea, how a year later, when the English fleet defeated the Dutch, the admiral hoisted a long streamer from his masthead, to represent the lash of a whip, to show he had whipped his enemies off the sea; and the pendant has flown ever since.

Probably no flag is more familiar to the world than the Union Jack of Great Britain. The first Union Jack was composed of St. Andrew's Cross of Scotland and St. George's Cross of England, in 1606, under the reign of James I. In 1801, in consequence of the union with Ireland, the cross of St. Patrick was combined with the other two. At what time or for what reason the name of Jack was given to this flag is conjectural by the old historians. In old records it is almost universally styled the Union Flag.

Hulme, in his book on heraldry, says: "The favorite theory is that, as the union took place in the reign of King James, who in heraldic French would be termed Jacques, the flag would naturally be called l'Union Jacques. Several other theories have been broached of varying degrees of improbability, the best of these being derived from the word jaque (hence our modern jacket), the surcoat worn over the armor in mediæval days. This had the cross of St. George always represented on it."

The royal standard of England is a gorgeous banner, never hoisted except on occasions of the first ceremony, and never displayed on shipboard except when the sovereign or some member of the royal family is present or on a sovereign's birthday. When the Prince of Wales embarked at Portland, Me., October 15, 1860, to return to England after his tour through the United States and Canada, the royal standard of England was floated to the breeze,—the only occasion on which this standard of royalty is known to have been displayed within the United States, though it may fly again should he revisit us this fall.

In the olden days flags were of many shapes, and often of only one color. Sir Walter Scott, in "Marmion," speaks of where "A thousand streamers flaunted fair,

Various in shape, device, and hue,—
Green, sanguine, purple, red, and blue;
Broad, narrow, swallow-tailed, and square,
Scroll, pennon, pensil, bandrol,—there
O'er the pavilions flew."

To-day they are mostly oblong and of many hues.

ANTIOCH COLLEGE.

Many readers of the Register will be glad to have a word from Antioch College. The thirty-eighth annual commencement was held on Wednesday, June 19. It was not lacking in those interests and attractions which mark the day to those who are annual pilgrims to Antioch. The village is outwardly but little changed. The old-time beauty clothes the wooded ravine, the same summer quiet broods over the land. The ample campus stretches from the turreted hall and the dormitories, its trees more beautiful with each year, and giving wider shade. The surrounding fence is still bordered for a long distance with the carriages that have brought in the friends from the country round about, always a pleasing evidence of the local interest which the occasion awakens. New faces appear in the group of instructors; but there are still those whose life labors have been most faithfully given to the college, and who keep up the connection with its honorable past.

The year just closed seems to have been a very successful one. In the various grades there have been enrolled altogether two hundred and ten students. There were four graduates in the regular academical course (A.B.): Thomas L. Lockhart, Walter J. Mason, Charity J. Judy, and Arnetta B. Hopping. Their commencement "orations" were thoughtful and well given. Several graduates received the degree of A.M., for which they had specially studied and given proof of the requisite qualifications. The large chapel was completely filled by the congregation of young and old, though the young largely predominated,—a sign of hope for the future of the college. It was a delight to look into the fresh, earnest, happy faces, full of the health of the open air and country-side. Following the parts of the graduates came the presentation of a Bible to each of them, in accordance with the custom from the beginning of the college. The presentation address was made by President Long. Then the whole audience joined in the familiar strains of "Antioch," to the accompaniment of the orchestra. This also is an inseparable feature of an Antioch commencement, as "St. Martin's" is of a Harvard commencement dinner, to lead which used to give our John Langdon Sibley such delight, and thereby an added reflected joy to those who followed in the days gone by. But one must be present to appreciate an Antioch commencement dinner, following the exercises in the chapel, in the college commons on the first floor of the women's dormitory. The plain but excellent and abundant tables, the friendliness and informality of the fellowship, the mingled seriousness and mirth of the unstudied after-dinner talking,—all this cannot be put in any description to the uninitiated. All participants, from the president of the college to the humblest visitor, deposit their half-dollar in exchange for a dinner ticket; and the profits (financial) of the feast go to the gain of the College Commons Fund, though one wonders what profits can accrue from such a generous quid pro quo. Certainly, it could not be so anywhere else but at Antioch, where one dollar is mysteriously made to do the work of three in all things connected with the college. It is this feature that has made possible to many young men and women an education at Antioch, who would otherwise hardly have obtained it elsewhere,—an education not only from the text-books and faithful instructors, but from the economies practised amid the simple and hardy democracy of the institution from the very beginning, and wherein "a man's a man for a' that." And this leads me to say a word of the present service and constituency of the college. Few students take the full academical course. Few, apparently, are able to do so. Yet this course is maintained from year to year by a few, and gives an intellectual standard and backbone to the institution. But many are able to acquire here a partial training who otherwise would probably have little opportunity besides that furnished by the public schools of the small towns and the country-side. The convenient supply inspires the demand. In this respect Antioch has been doing in these recent years, and continues to do, a work well worth the doing, and which amply justifies the interest taken in it by its friends. Indeed, it may well be doubted if there be another institution wherein the same amount of expenditure brings equal return in aiding young men and women the better to meet the duties and rise to the possible opportunities of after life. The institution has a good showing in this respect, as the record of its students will bear witness, whether full graduates or not.

The meeting of the two literary societies of the college, the Star and the Union, was held in the chapel on the morning of the day before commencement. The address this year was given by Rev. George A. Thayer of Cincinnati, who spoke on "The Character and Career of George William Curtis," a subject which he made full of suggestion and inspiration to the large audience that listened to him. The alumni meeting was held in the evening, on which occasion addresses were given by Rev. Arthur M. Judy of Davenport, Ia., and Rev. E. A. Coil of Cincinnati, who were once students at Antioch, and the former of whom is now upon the board of trustees. The same day there was held the annual meeting of the board of trustees, at which the reports showed the college to have suffered no lessened service or diminution of strength through the past year, but rather to be in a somewhat more hopeful condition, despite the disaffection in certain quarters which of late it has had to face. The addresses at the commencement dinner were of good cheer, and marked by loyalty to the college and by confidence that it has a work to do and will do it. Several graduates were heard, as well as others interested in the institution. The corps of teachers deserve high commendation for their work and the spirit in which it is done. Their salaries are miserably below what they deserve; but these men and women are attached to Antioch, and they find in their work and in their good fellowship in it a compensation that is more to them than dollars. The old-time spirit survives in the Antioch of to-day,—the pursuit of learning for its advantages to the whole man and its uses in the better conduct of life.

F. L. H.

THE JAPAN MISSION.

I.

A REPORT TO THE DIRECTORS OF THE AMERICAN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

In opening my annual report as superintendent of your mission in Japan, I desire to speak of the general situation and interests of the mission somewhat at length and freely. It is my hope that what I say may have a wide hearing among the home churches, and receive their careful, serious judgment.

Your mission has a position in Japan quite unlike that of any other representative of a foreign religious body. Of all such bodies, it has the smallest representation and the smallest financial support. Yet it has a place in popular attention wholly out of proportion to its apparent insignificance and weakness. It is more talked and written about, more praised and blamed, more advised and misrepresented, than any other of the missions. To judge from the number and earnestness of its friends and its enemies, one would say that it is a host in power and wealth. Why is this? Because Unitarianism is, or at least professes to be, in the farthest advance in free methods and in rational opinions in its relations to the problems of ethics and religion, and because the sympathies of the educated Japanese are, at least in intention, given to free thought and to rationalism in belief. Making the largest professions, therefore, the Unitarian mission has come under the most jealous and rigid scrutiny laid upon the religious bodies at work in this country. It has been subjected to a severe twofold criticism. First, from its natural enemy, conservatism in both orthodox Christianity and in the instituted religions of Japan, Buddhism, Shinto, and Confucianism; second, from the Japanese, who are free thinkers and rationalists, who are either indifferent to or sceptical of all religion, or who are not yet convinced that Unitarians are sincere in their professions or who yet do not understand what Unitarianism is. Confidence is a plant of slow growth among the Japanese; and, also, free-thinking Japanese are not naturally inclined to religion in any form. I will illustrate what I am saying.

Many times in the Christian periodicals and from Christian pulpits here the whole Unitarian movement in America has been brought under review for the information of the Japanese public. The conditions and history of the American Unitarian Association have been laid before the Japanese people time and again since your mission has been established, and the review has not been one of praise. Your fewness in numbers, your "moribund state," the "absurdity" of your attempt to carry on a foreign mission, sending one sole representative to a country which was imagined to be eagerly awaiting his coming that all might gather under the Unitarian banner, the gradual decrease of the mission until but one man bears its burdens,—all these things and many more have been laid before readers and audiences in Japan by certain orthodox Christians representing missions larger in men and money.

Next the mission itself has come in not only for its share in the proclaimed weakness and insignificance of the American churches and associations, but for its own supposed unworthiness. Certain Japanese Christians, liberally inclined, have resented our presence here as an intrusion upon their domain. I have been told by a leading man among them that the privilege of extending liberalism in Christianity, and indeed in religion, in this country is the natural right of the liberalized Christians; i.e., of the men trained in, but emancipated from, orthodox Christianity. He urged upon me the duty of not recognizing any one who had come out of Buddhism as a co-worker in the religious development of Japan, at least not to co-operate with him as a leading worker in the Unitarian movement. Another fault found with your mission is that it represents a wholly negative faith. Both Christians and Buddhists have sought to turn popular favor from us through this charge. Lying before me now is a Buddhist criticism of the seven principles of belief common to Unitarians, which stand from month to month on the first page of our magazine. The writer says in a long article that Unitarianism arose originally to correct the defects and errors of Roman Catholicism and Protestant Christianity. Here is its standard. First, the old Christianity was based on traditional dogma, Unitarianism says faith must be based on rational truth, not mere dogma; second, old Christianity suppressed man's intellectual liberty, Unitarianism lifts the banner of free inquiry; third, Unitarianism aims above all to develop moral character individually and socially, but all religions aim at this also. There is nothing new in this threefold standard. The Buddhists have it also. Moreover, this threefold standard is not religion. Positive faith is needed for that. There are things lying above science needed for religion. "True!" answer the Unitarians; "but we have our seven common beliefs." The writer then comments on what we say in short sentences of God, Christ, man, the Bible, sympathy of religions, etc. These beliefs are nearly all negative, says the criticising Buddhist. The value of Unitarianism lies in its negations, not in its positive faith. The writer advises us, therefore, not to call ourselves religious, but to be content with being "the critics of the religious world," to "correct its defects." This is a good work, is needed; and we should do it. Then, for our own sake, we should take a step forward, and become religious by accepting Buddhism. Superstitious Buddhists would do well to become Unitarians; but Unitarians, in order to accomplish anything in the world for positive religion, should become true Buddhists. A third fault found with your mission arises from the fact that Unitarians are Christians in origin and by profession, and that Unitarianism, therefore, in no true sense has universal value. We have to bear a great deal of criticism from the free-thinking Japanese on this plea. In several non-Christian magazines the name "Christian" is used always for exclusiveness and bigotry. All Jewish and Christian history is read so as to support this claim. The Christian antecedents of Unitarianism have been used for the purpose of obstructing all the work we do, however large our conception of Christianity or hospitable our offered religious fellowship. Again, to many, indeed to most, Japanese the Unitarian mission is unintelligible on account of its intellectual individualism. It is difficult for Japanese to understand how men can "agree to disagree" or how men of differing faiths can work together. Our mission is charged with having no unity among its workers. Recently in a magazine a writer sought to discredit our work on that account. Both in America and here, it was said, there is union among Unitarians on the side of negation. But, since they lack positive faiths, Unitarianism is valueless for creating a denomination or in producing practical organized beneficence. The writer urged his countrymen not to contribute time, money, or strength to a body which has no positive policy, because time, money, and strength are positive things. Unitarians can unite temporarily when they are bent upon destruction; but their weakness, too, lies in this fact. They cannot unite for any positive service to society. And so long as they cannot do this there awaits the Unitarians of Japan no such glory as that which follows practical constructive effort.

There is a fifth cause of complaint against your mission, arising from our deliberate purpose and also from our financial limitations. The mission is often reproached for not organizing, supporting, and directing a denominational movement in Japan. All missions but yours have engaged in the work of building and supporting churches, and of educating young men for the ministry, and of giving them positions and salaries after their graduation. It was expected by a large number of young men when Senshin Gakuin was founded that they would receive specific theological education in its classes, would have their support while studying, and, when graduated, would be sent to the chief cities of the country to propagate a Unitarian creed and to build up churches, sustained from our treasury until they could become self-supporting. The fact that your mission makes no provision for doing this kind of work is not yet understood generally. Notwithstanding all attempts to make our policy clear, the impression is still left in many places that the Unitarian mission must follow in the way in which the other foreign missions have gone. Our policy has been to leave the responsibility for religious organization and support with the Japanese themselves. We have founded a post-graduate school in which the higher education has been offered, free of cost, to students. We support a mission church. We support a magazine, publish books and tracts. We have a Post-office Mission which is working as far as possible into all parts of the empire, circulating the best literature, and answering inquiries from persons interested in religious and ethical questions. Farther than this we cannot and we do not desire to go. We are seeking to co-operate with the Japanese, to help them to help themselves in this matter of the development of their religious faith and life. We are trying to show them the way. We do not propose to carry them any distance onward in the way. If the way is worth taking, we believe that they will find means of their own for going forward in it. Then, further, your mission has to meet with exactly the same antagonism in Japan that confronts the Unitarian Association or churches in America. The educated men of Japan are even more affected by the scepticism and indifferentism associated with the speculative activity of the present age, than are the educated classes at home. There is no phase of philosophic or scientific criticism in Europe or America which is not, as soon as possible after its appearance, known also in Japan. Intellectual activity here is just as varied and almost as acute and intelligent as in Berlin, Paris, London, or Boston; and, besides, it does not have the weight of tradition or institution to hamper it. The logical conclusions of materialism, agnosticism, positivism, the destructive effects upon traditional religion of scientific criticism, are more widely and more quickly reached among young men in Japan than in Europe or America. It is a great mistake for any one to imagine that there is a noticeable movement in State, Church, literature, art, or what not in the West which is not known, commented upon, and judged here as soon as modern means of communication can make the movement known. So far as the educated classes of Japan are concerned, the same conditions prevail as those which affect educated men and women at home. In this respect the Japan mission of your Association and any Boston church are conditioned alike, the advantages of the past being on the side of the church in Boston.

In contact with this people, stirred as it is by these and yet other moods, your mission thus has received a public attention out of all proportion to its personnel or its purse. We are in touch with all the questions of the day connected with religion, ethics or the social welfare. We appear as freemen, as leaders, yet as reconcilers and mediators. We are both of the future and of the past, progressive and yet conservative. We represent many churches who are trying to prove all things that they may gain new, and yet to hold fast old, truth and goodness. Consequently, small though we are, we are forced into exceptional prominence, are challenged, criticised, and often violently opposed.

But there is another side to our position. Our prominence is not wholly unpleasant. We have many friends as well as enemies. During the early part of last year there was a noticeable awakening of educated public opinion here concerning the higher needs of the people. The problems of morality and religion, and social questions in particular, occupied periodical literature and public gatherings to a degree much more marked than had been the fact for some time. A decided reaction from the previous political excitement began. In the summer the war with China broke out. Since then the people have been almost engrossed by that. Nevertheless, the momentum of the aroused interest just spoken of has not spent its force. In this interest your mission has been found to have a part of growing importance. The number has been rapidly increasing who believe that Unitarianism can give valuable help in the effort to solve the important problems. The Buddhists are evidently drawing much from us and from the same sources which Unitarians use. The Japanese Christians, especially those of the Congregational churches, are liberalizing so rapidly that a good number of prominent persons among them differ from us only in name. There are some Japanese Christians who have conferred with me in recent months who, were circumstances favorable, would co-operate with us. I said to one of them, "You would have nothing to do with me three years ago, when I sought your acquaintance." "I know," he said, "but times have changed since then."

SYMPATHY WITH THE ARMENIANS.

The Unitarians of England, at their anniversary meeting, showed their sympathy with the Armenians in Turkey by the following resolution on the atrocities committed there. It was offered by the president, Mr. Joseph T. Preston:—

"That the oppressive misrule of Turkey over its subject Christian provinces has long been a scandal and a by-word, and that the horrible massacres and outrages in Armenia in which that misrule has recently culminated demand the interference of the civilized world; that we do not charge these atrocities upon Mohammedanism, believing that they are as repugnant to what is best in Islam as to Christendom, but we charge them upon Turkey; and, in the name of the treaty obligation which England has undertaken, we call upon our government to take immediate and decisive action for protecting these oppressed Armenians, and for so placing them under rulers responsible to Europe as to make such outrages henceforth impossible."

Rev. Brooke Herford, D.D., seconded the resolution. He said that the previous week he was invited to attend an arbitration meeting with reference to the Armenian atrocities; but he wrote to the secretary of the meeting, saying that the arbitration he would most like to see was the British fleet sailing up to Constantinople. His remarks were received with applause.

Out of the dusk a shadow,
Then a spark;
Out of the cloud a silence,
Then a lark;
Out of the heart a rapture,
Then a pain;
Out of the dead, cold ashes,
Life again.

—John B. Tabb.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE OF UNITARIAN AND OTHER CHRISTIAN CHURCHES.

Arrangements for the meeting of the National Conference of Unitarian and Other Christian Churches, to be held in Washington, D.C., October 21-24, are now nearly completed. The programme, subject to a few possible changes in minor details, will be as follows:—

MONDAY, OCTOBER 21.

8 P.M. Sermon. Rev. Minot J. Savage.

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 22.

9 A.M. Communion Service.

10 A.M. Address of Welcome by Hon. Carroll D. Wright, Chairman of the Board of Trustees of All Souls' Church, Washington. Response by the President, Hon. George F. Hoar. Appointment of Committees, etc.

10.30 A.M. Address of the Chairman of the Council and Secretary of the American Unitarian Association.

11 A.M. Address of the Secretary of the National Alliance of Unitarian and Other Liberal Christian Women.

11.20 A.M. Address of Rev. Brooke Herford, D.D., representative of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association.

12.10 P.M. Introduction of new business

TUESDAY AFTERNOON.

3 P.M. "The Church and the Masses," a paper by Rev. John Cuckson.

3.30 P.M. "Our Congregational Polity," a paper by Rev. Edward E. Hale, D.D.

4 P.M. Discussion, to be led by Rev. Frederick L. Hosmer.

TUESDAY EVENING.

7.45 P.M. "Our Young People: Their Relations to Church, Denomination, and Life at Large." (Programme arranged and meeting to be conducted by Rev. Edward A. Horton.) Opening remarks by the President of the evening. Prof. G. Stanley Hall, President of Clark University, Worcester, Mass., will speak on "Pedagogical Methods in Sunday-school Work." Rev. Benjamin R. Bulkeley, "Cultivation of the Spiritual Nature" (Guilds). Rev. Ida C. Hultin, "Religious Development through Intellectual Leadings" (Unity Clubs). Rev. Thomas R. Slicer, "Character and Citizenship through the Sunday-school." Rev. Edward Everett Hale, D.D., "Enthusiasm for Humanity" (Lend a hand Clubs, etc.).

WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 23.

9 A.M. Devotional Meeting, to be conducted by Rev. Stephen H. Camp.

10 A.M. "Church Extension." Addresses, twenty minutes each: Rev. Messrs. D. M. Wilson, D. W. Morehouse, George L. Chaney, T. B. Forbush, A. W. Gould, and C. W. Wendte.

12.20 P.M. Report of the Business Committee.

WEDNESDAY AFTERNOON.

3 P.M. Meeting of the National Alliance of Unitarian and Other Liberal Christian Women.

4 P.M. Meeting of the Unitarian Temperance Society.

WEDNESDAY EVENING.

8 P.M. "The Origins of Liberal Thought in America," a paper by John Fiske.

9 P.M. "Our Unitarian Theology," a paper by Prof. Charles Carroll Everett.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 24.

9 A.M. Devotional Meeting, to be conducted by Rev. Edward Hale.

10 A.M. Four papers, twenty-five minutes each, as follows: "The Holy Spirit," by Rev. Howard N. Brown; "Incarnation," by Rev. William C. Gannett; "Atonement," by Rev. W. Hanson Pulsford; "Forgiveness," by Rev. Mary A. Saford.

12 M. Report of the Business Committee.

12.15 P.M. Election of Officers.

THURSDAY AFTERNOON.

3 P.M. "The History and Principles of the Unitarian Church in Relation to Social Problems," a paper by Prof. Francis G. Peabody, D.D.

3.30 P.M. "The Modern Applications of these Principles," a paper by Anna Garlin Spencer.

4 P.M. Discussion, to be led by Rev. Joseph H. Crooker and Rev. Paul Revere Frothingham.

THURSDAY EVENING.

8 P.M. Platform Meeting. Subject, "The Outlook." Rev. Rush R. Shippen will preside. Speakers to be announced later.

Metzerott's Music Hall, one of the finest auditoriums in Washington, has been engaged for the meetings of the Conference.

Full particulars in regard to hotels, reduced fares, etc., will be announced in a week or two.

D. W. MOREHOUSE, Gen. Sec'y.

Religious Intelligence.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be sent in by Saturday Morning; announcements of meetings which are to take place must be sent in before Tuesday Noon.]

BOSTON UNITARIAN CHURCHES, SUMMER SERVICES, 1895.—Second Church: Open all summer for union services, 10.30 A.M., in which the First Church, Second Church, King's Chapel, and Arlington Street Church unite. July 7, Rev. Thomas Van Ness; July 14, Rev. Henry F. Jenks; July 21, Rev. Edward C. Guild; July 28, Rev. Francis B. Hornbrooke; August 4, Rev. Hilary Bygrave; August 11, Rev. Hilary Bygrave; August 18, Rev. Francis B. Hornbrooke; August 25, Rev. Stopford W. Brooke; September 1, Rev. Henry F. Jenks; September 8, Rev. Stopford W. Brooke; September 15, Rev. Stopford W. Brooke; September 22, Rev. Thomas Van Ness.

Church of the Disciples (corner Warren Avenue and West Brookline Street): Open all summer for union services, 10.30 A.M., in which the South Congregational Church, Church of the Unity, Church of the Disciples, and New South Church unite. July 7, Rev. Loren B. Macdonald; July 14, Rev. Henry G. Spaulding; July 21, Rev. Minot J. Savage; July 28, Rev. William H. Savage; August 4, Rev. William H. Savage; August 11, Rev. Orello Cone, D.D.; August 18, Rev. George E. Littlefield; August 25, Rev. Loren B. Macdonald; September 1, Rev. W. S. Key; September 8, Rev. Edward E. Hale, D.D.

First Parish, Dorchester (Rev. Eugene R. Shippen, pastor): Open all summer. July 28, Rev. Charles A. Humphreys; August 4, Rev. John W. Chadwick; August 11, Rev. E. Q. S. Osgood; August 18, Rev. Henry G. Spaulding; September 1, Rev. Eugene R. Shippen.

Hawes Unitarian Congregational Church, South Boston (Rev. James Huxtable, pastor): Closed during July and August.

Bulfinch Place Chapel (Rev. S. H. Winkley and Rev. C. R. Eliot, pastors): For July and August, Sunday-school at 11 A.M.; vesper services at 7.30.

Barnard Memorial (Parker B. Field, superintendent): Service for children at 3 P.M. during the summer.

All Souls' Church, Roxbury (Rev. W. H. Lyon, pastor): Closed from July 21 to September 8, inclusive.

Third Religious Society, Dorchester (Rev. F. B. Mott, pastor): Closed during August. Church of the Unity, Neponset (Rev. George Herbert Hosmer, pastor): Closed during August.

Norfolk Church, Dorchester (Rev. W. H. Branigan, pastor): Closed during July and August.

Church of Our Father, East Boston (Rev. Richmond Fisk, D.D., pastor): Closed during July and August and first Sunday in September.

Unity Church, Allston (Rev. J. L. Seward, pastor): Closed July 14 to September 1, inclusive.

Unitarian church, Roslindale: Closed during August.

Christ Church, Dorchester (Rev. B. A. Goodridge, pastor): Closed during August.

First Unitarian Society, Revere (Rev. E. R. Butler, pastor): Closed during August and first Sunday in September.

Church of the Unity, Beachmont (Rev. E. R. Butler, pastor): Closed during August and first Sunday in September.

Unity Church, South Boston (Rev. Herbert Whitney, pastor): Open all summer for an evening service at 7.30.

First Parish, West Roxbury: Closed during July and August.

Unitarian church, Winthrop (Rev. W. S. Key, pastor): Open all summer.

Boston Common: The religious services under the big cottonwood-tree near the band-stand, which have been so successful, will be continued through the summer. The exercises begin at 5 P.M. every Sunday, and end about six o'clock. Two prominent clergymen will take part at each service. Singing from slips, led by cornet and chorister.

Ministerial Services and Supplies: Any one needing the services of a minister can find response at once by applying at the Unitarian Headquarters, 25 Beacon Street, Room 5, office of the Benevolent Fraternity of Churches, Rev. Edward A. Horton, president.

HARVARD DIVINITY ALUMNI.—The Association of the Alumni of the Harvard Divinity School met on Tuesday last, June 25, in the chapel of Divinity Hall at Cambridge, at two o'clock in the afternoon. The meeting was called to order by the president, Rev. E. J. Young, D.D., of Walham. Prayer was offered by Rev. Augustus Woodbury, D.D., now of Concord, N.H. The report of the last meeting was read by the secretary, Rev. J. L. Seward of Allston, and approved. It was voted that a committee of three be appointed by the chair to nominate a list of officers for the coming year. The chair appointed Rev. Thomas D. Howard of Charlestown, N.H.; Rev. E. C. Guild, now of Pembroke; and Rev. B. F. McDaniels of Newton Centre. They nominated the following list of officers for 1895-96, who were unanimously elected: president, Rev. William Orne White of Brookline; vice-president, Rev. Samuel B. Stewart of Lynn; secretary, Rev. J. L. Seward of Allston. Business Committee: Rev. Samuel C. Beane, D.D., of Newburyport; Rev. E. C. Guild of Pembroke; and Rev. William H. Fish, Jr., of Dedham. The venerable William H. Furness, D.D., of Philadelphia was chosen as the "first speaker" for 1896; and Rev. Samuel C. Beane, D.D., of Newburyport was chosen for the "second speaker." Rev. C. C. Everett, D.D., dean of the faculty, gave an interesting report of the Divinity School during the past year. There have been in all fifty-two students. The dean's report of the school's progress was most gratifying to the alumni. The secretary then read the necrology for the year. There have been nine deaths: (1) Rev. Henry Adolphus Miles, D.D., class of 1832, died at Hingham, May 31, 1895; (2) Rev. Frederic West Holland, class of 1834, died at Concord, March 26, 1895; (3) Rev. George Edward Ellis, D.D., class of 1836, died at Boston, Dec. 20, 1894; (4) Rev. Edmund Burke Willson, class of 1843, died at Salem, June 13, 1895; (5) Rev. John Farwell Moors, D.D., class of 1845, died at Greenfield, Jan. 27, 1895; (6) Mr. Robert Stanton Avery, class of 1846, died at Washington, D.C., Sept. 12, 1894; (7) Rev. Grindall Reynolds, D.D., class of 1847, died at Concord, Sept. 30, 1894; (8) Rev. Loring Everett Beckwith, class of 1870, died at Boston, March 18, 1895; (9) Mr. Henry William Robinson, class of 1879, died at New York, N.Y., Jan. 28, 1895. At four o'clock a recess of five minutes was taken, after which Rev. William R. Alger of Boston delivered an eloquent address upon "The Culture of Religious Faith," to which no brief report could do justice. At 5.30 a collation was served in the library building. J. L. Seward, Secretary.

BOSTON.—The Church of the Disciples Union Services: Rev. L. B. Macdonald will preach next Sunday. After September 15 the Pastoral Committee will provide for supplying the pulpit until the end of October, when Mr. Ames is expected to return from a four months' trip to Europe.

GREEN HARBOR, MASS.—The second year of Rev. Mr. Savary's pastorate here is drawing to a close. It is to be regretted that, after the faithful service of both Mr. and Mrs. Savary, there should be deficits in his salary. Last year this deficit was $100; this year it is $51. Will not some church, branches, or individuals make this up before the year expires, that the pastor and his wife may begin the new year with renewed hope and courage? The annual fair for which the loyal members of Green Chapel Society work so earnestly will be held August 7 and 8, Wednesday and Thursday afternoons and evenings. The friends in Boston and vicinity are earnestly invited to be present. Contributions of articles, materials, or money may be sent to Mrs. William H. Savary, Grace Chapel, Green Harbor, Mass.

MEADVILLE, PA.—The church here will close with the last Sunday in June. Mr. Lawrance is away in quest of health. During his absence the pulpit has been supplied by members of the Senior Class of the Theological School and resident ministers.

NEEDHAM, MASS.—"The First Church of Christ" in Needham, which celebrated its one hundred and seventy-fifth anniversary in April, still continues to flourish. The second year of the pastorate of Rev. P. S. Thacher began at that time, and an increase of $200 to his salary gave practical proof of the esteem of his people. The sixty-ninth anniversary of the Sunday-school was observed the last Sunday in April, an original feature of the exercises being a brief review of the lessons of the year given by the different classes. "Children's Day," June 9, witnessed an unusually large number present, the sermon being especially for them and their parents. The christening service was followed by a tenor solo, "O Father, our little ones keep!" The children too young to attend Sunday-school were presented with little bouquets. The floral concert was held in the church in the evening, the speaking being by the primary and intermediate classes. All were presented with blooming plants. June 23, "St. John's Day," was commemorated by the Masons, who attended church in a body, and listened to a strong and earnest sermon upon "Lessons from the Life of John the Baptist," which cannot fail of being remembered with profit by all. The "King's Daughters" recently held (in aid of their charitable work) a unique entertainment. This was a babies' reception, which was a great success, both socially and financially.

PROSPECT HARBOR, ME.—Summer services will be resumed the first Sunday in July, in charge of Mr. C. A. Sangston, a recent graduate of the Meadville Theological School. Visitors in the community are invited to attend.

TACOMA, WASH.—A correspondent sends the following items: "Rev. Alfred W. Martin returned from his trip to Boston on June 15, and resumed services, which will be continued Sunday evenings until the middle of July, at which time he will take a vacation until the middle of September. On the evening of June 19 a reception was held in the parlors of the First Free Church for Mr. and Mrs. Martin and their guest, Miss Parker of Boston. The membership of the First Free Church is growing rapidly; and, although the church will seat about two hundred and fifty, there are generally no vacant chairs. Mr. Martin has returned from his Eastern trip full of new hopes and ambitions for the cause of universal religion."

THE NEW HAMPSHIRE UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.—The association met with the Church of the Unity, Rochester, N.H., on June 25 and 26. The meeting was one of those double blessings which come to us when circumstances are just right: the old New Hampshire Association was blessed with the hospitality which the youngest society in New Hampshire could give, and the thriving little church in Rochester was joyously proud to have the association with it. Who would have thought, even a few years ago, that the Rochester people could do what they did a few days ago? Now, with the right man in the right place, as Rev. W. H. Walbridge seems to be, this gem of a church and wide-awake society bid fair to do greater things yet.

On Tuesday evening Rev. Charles G. Ames gave the sermon, and on Wednesday morning Rev. Charles J. Staples gave an excellent address on "The Revival of Religion." At 9.45 o'clock Col. C. C. Danforth of Concord, N.H., took the chair, and congratulated the Rochester society for its good work, and also the association for its good fortune in meeting with the new church at Rochester. Rev. Enoch Powell discussed the paper of Mr. Staples in an interesting manner, and then Rev. G. E. Littlefield of Peterboro addressed the meeting on "The Present Duty." This was followed by remarks by Rev. J. B. Morrison of Laconia, Rev. Frank L. Phalen of Concord, Rev. Lyman Clark of Andover, and Mr. C. B. Tebbitts of Lynn, Mass., the donor of a pretty memorial window in the church. Hon. Solomon Spaulding of Nashua, Hon. Woodbury L. Melcher of Laconia, Mr. J. C. A. Hill of Concord, and Mrs. W. B. Neal of Rochester also addressed the meeting.

Besides the lowering weather, the necessary absence of the local minister, Rev. W. H. Walbridge, owing to the critical illness of his wife, touched the meeting with a bit of sadness. On motion of Rev. Mr. Phalen it was voted that the association express its sorrow for the trial of the pastor of the Rochester church in the illness of his wife. The association, owing to the suspension of an afternoon session, also expressed its thanks to the Rochester society for their cordiality and the anticipated collation.

Then the devotional meeting, which was postponed to eleven o'clock to accommodate Rev. Mr. Staples, who had to leave early, was conducted in a helpful sermon by Rev. Alfred Gooding of Portsmouth, during which Rev. C. B. Elder arrived from Keene. Mr. Elder then gave a very thoughtful and stirring address on "The Revival of Religion," based upon a criticism of an editorial upon that topic in the New York Sun. After this Rev. Messrs. Powell, Clark, and Phalen made remarks, and the meeting adjourned to a bountiful collation prepared by the good ladies of Rochester.

Business Notices.

Dr. Lyon's Perfect Tooth Powder

Gives the most perfect satisfaction. It has a world-wide reputation. Recommended by dentists.

An Eclectic Exhibition.—The purchase of rattan goods at a rattan store is not always wise, for one sees only the shapes and styles of a single manufacturer. It is much better economy to visit a large furniture establishment (as, for example, the warerooms of the Paine Furniture Company on Canal Street), and there make selection from the popular pieces of all the leading rattan manufacturers. At the Paine warerooms there may literally be found the gems of rattan ware from all the leading makers of this country. A trifle may also often be saved in the price by making purchases in this way.

Marriages.

In Belmont, 29th ult., by Rev. Hilary Bygrave, Arthur Pineo and Rose Taylor, both of Waverley.

Deaths.

In Cambridge, 1st inst., Mary, daughter of the late Rev. Samuel Willard, D.D., in the 84th year of her age.

Newton Rest-Cure.

The Befriending Committee of the Women's Educational and Industrial Union wish to call the attention of ladies temporarily disabled through nervous diseases to the favorable terms they have made at the Newton Rest-Cure. For further particulars address the BEFRIENDING COMMITTEE, 264 Boylston Street, Boston.

SONNET.

O world, thou chooseth not the better part.
It is not wisdom to be only wise,
And on the inward vision close the eyes;
But it is wisdom to believe the heart.
Columbus found a world, and had no chart
Save one that faith deciphered in the skies.
To trust the soul's invincible surmise
Was all his science and his only art.
Our knowledge is a torch of smoky pine
That lights the pathway but one step ahead
Across a void of mystery and dread.
Bid, then, the tender light of faith to shine
By which alone the mortal heart is led Unto the thinking of the thought divine.

—George Santayana.

The Pulpit.

GOD OUT OF DOORS.

ABSTRACT OF SERMON.

BY REV. M. J. SAVAGE.

"Day uttereth speech unto day, and night showeth knowledge unto night."—PSALM XIX. 12.

If we trace the beginnings of the growth of the religious life of any people, we shall find that it began in the simplest and most natural way. Among the Hebrews, almost the first trace that we have of their thought about God is that he is represented as walking in the garden of Eden in the cool of the day, under the trees, under the open heaven. It was many a long year before they offered worship to their God in any covered place. It was under some sacred oak, like that at Mamre. It was on some hill-top, or in such places as these, where they offered their worship. So the Greeks believed that the rustling of the leaves of certain consecrated oaks had a divine meaning, and they looked to their priests to interpret these messages from the gods. And the Greeks were right. There is never the rustling of a leaf but has a message from the divine, if only we may rightly interpret it.

But by and by the Hebrews erected a tent, a tabernacle within which they placed their sacred ark, and supposed that God made this his special abode. Gradually, all peoples, according to the degree of civilization they had attained, erected sacred enclosures of one kind or another, until at last there was the magnificence of Solomon's temple, and some of the most marvellous architectural structures that the world has ever known crowning the hills of Greece. The people got to believe that God himself is shut up in these enclosures, and is not any longer abroad in the world.

As religions have developed, instead of keeping God out of doors, seeing God, feeling God everywhere throughout his universe, the people have come to shut him up in buildings, to shut him up in books, to shut him up in verbal statements; and the rest of the world outside is looked upon as profane, secular, natural.

It is well that we should associate in our minds the worship of God with special places, special forms, special ceremonies. It is well, when we come in here, that we should come with our heads uncovered, as in a sacred presence. It is well, when we take the name of God upon our lips, that our heads should bend in recognition of that presence. These sacred associations are natural, and not confined to the religious life.

I have no fault to find with this: it is sweet and true and natural. But I do have fault to find with the way of looking at God that leaves him in the churches, that does not take him away with you when you leave here, that does not make you feel that you can no more escape that blessed presence than you can escape the air you breathe.

Every spring the newspapers begin to discuss the question of the closing of the churches; and the assumption on their part seems to be that the religion of any particular congregation that closes its church has for the time being come to an end, that worship has ceased, that the service of God and of our fellow-men is suspended until the vacation comes to an end. The implication is that God is located here, and that, unless we meet here once a week, we do not meet with God; that service for God is exclusively that which we perform in this place; and that, when we are not here, we are not serving God. This is what I find fault with,—this assumption that religion is a thing necessarily and always connected with a specific place; and, if we believe it, it is very likely to be so, so far as we are concerned.

Then, as I said, the world has come to shut up God in certain books, called Holy Scriptures or Bibles. They were not thought to be holy scriptures or bibles when they were first written. They were literature then. They were history; they were song; they were hymn; they were proverbs, wise sayings; they were letters; they were visions. But after a long period of time they came to be regarded as so consecrated, so specially sacred, so specially holy, that the people accepted the idea that all of God's truth was in that particular book, and that the minute you read any other book you were reading something which was not God's truth, though it might be ever so true. It was not religious truth, although it might be ever so intimately concerned with our duties to our fellow-men or with the highest services that we are able to render the world. In this way people have come to talk about sacred history and profane history. God was in the history of the Hebrews, but was not in the history of Greece or in the history of Rome or England or America. He was with certain men who fought thousands of years ago, and helped them to fight battles and win victories for humanity; but we have had to fight our battles and win our victories for humanity without him. God's truth is in the psalms of David, but not in the psalms of Samuel Johnson or Samuel Longfellow or John W. Chadwick or Theodore Parker. God's truth is in the letters that Paul happened to write; but, if a modern minister writes ever so sacred, helpful a letter to guide, to teach, to lift some human soul, that is secular, that is not religious. I have no fault to find with the discovery of God in the Bible; but I find fault with shutting him up in that book, and not seeing and feeling him everywhere in the history of the world, in the wise saying, the sacred song, the proverb, the literature, the letters of the world.

Again, they have come to shut God up in certain creeds. Now, these creeds, so far as they go, may be ever so accurate. They may be most "dreadfully true," as Lowell says. But any definition of the divine leaves out more than it includes. And so we need to remember that God is not only in our statements of belief, whether they be Presbyterian or Unitarian, but that he is outside of all statements, and that there is more of him outside of the statement than in all the wise devices men have ever been able to include in all their statements. It is a God out of doors, out of the church, out of the Bible, out of the creeds, that we need to remember if we wish to find our God.

We have condescendingly given God one day in seven. The other six we have reserved for our own use, as though God were not in Monday as well as in Sunday, and in Tuesday and Wednesday and all the days of the week, and as though righteousness and true thinking and true feeling and true worship and high aspiration were not as incumbent upon us on Wednesday as on Sunday. I have no fault to find with your discovery of God on Sunday. I have no fault to find with your giving more time to the conscious finding of God that day than on other days. I find fault only with your talking about the rest of the week as though God were not connected with it.

Take your business. You have been accustomed to put God into your so-called religious devotion, but you have left him out of business. You have left him out of politics. You have left him out of society. You have left him out of all worldly affairs, until people have actually come to feel that it is somehow an impertinence for a minister to suggest the intrusion of God into these other affairs. Religion is one thing, and business is another; religion is one thing, and politics is another; religion is one thing, and amusement is another. So people divide their lives, giving a little space and a little time and a little thought to God, and thinking of all the rest of their time, and all their other occupations, as worldly, secular, divorced from God.

In other words, we have created a distinction which does not exist between the natural and the supernatural. We have made a distinction of the natural that leaves God out; and then we have been obliged to invent a process called supernatural, or miraculous, by which to get him back into his own world. We rob ourselves of God by these arbitrary divisions; and we make our lives barren and empty and poor because we live so much without God in the world.

Let us for a moment step out into the outside world, and see whether we have left God behind us or not. Stoop down and examine a grass-blade, and see God at work before your face, clothing the world with greenness and beauty by the same process as that in which his creative work has always been carried on from the very beginning. When the sun sets in his glory, and the stars come out, lift your eyes to the heavens, and see away off beyond these bodies that shine out in their distinctness a cloud of light. Get the most powerful telescope that has been invented up to the present time, and you shall not be able to pick out star points in it, for they are not there yet. What is it? a nebula, God overhead creating a system, as at your feet he is creating the blade of grass; world-building going on just before us; we admitted into the workshop of the Almighty, into the very secrets of creation itself, seeing the mighty hand, that is not too mighty to shape a rose-leaf, shaping a galaxy,—sun, planets, and moons.

Then, as you take your excursion this summer, through the river valley or among the hills or by the seashore, if you are not wise enough yourselves to read the meaning of it, ask some geologist to tell you. Right here God is at work just the same as he has always been at work with this beautiful old earth of ours, sculpturing it, scooping out the river valleys, shaping the courses of the brooklets, creating as of old.

If you get the microscope and study more deeply until you untangle the wondrous combinations of the infinitesimal, you discover everywhere infinite order, no confusion. You find perfect arrangement of atom on atom, molecule on molecule, perfect order everywhere. Can you think of this, and feel that God is very far away?

Then take the mystery of life, the miracle that takes these particles of dust and absorbs them into that which grows, into that which feels, into that which thinks, into that which hopes, aspires, and worships,—one life from the little particle of protoplasm up to the brain of Shakspeare and the soul of Jesus. Can you face this, and for a moment even partly comprehend what it means, and think that you are away from God?

And, then, the beauty! The poet in very familiar lines has told us:—

"Full many a gem of purest ray serene
The dark unfathomed caves of ocean bear:
Full many a flower is born to blush unseen,
And waste its sweetness on the desert air."

I do not believe a word of it. The old Greek sculptor knew better than that, who, when he was finishing some secret part of his statue, and a critic said, Why do you take all that trouble: no one will see it? replied, Yes, the gods will see it. So I do not believe any gems are lost in ocean caves, or that any flowers waste their perfume or their beauty in desert places. I believe that the infinite, loving heart of God has infinite joy in every beautiful thing that the infinite skill has chosen to create. In the presence of the beauty of the world, then, you are close, very close to him who has made this beauty, and who has taught us to worship him "in the beauty of holiness."

Then, if we choose to study it farther, we find ourselves everywhere in the presence of righteousness; that is, absolute law-keeping. For absolute law-keeping in any department of the universe, when lifted into the range of human thought and life, becomes righteousness. There is not a thing that God has made until we climb up into the free action in free creatures that does not perfectly keep all his laws. And we, by this very process of hurting ourselves and finding the way again by pain, are being trained into the more perfect and voluntary obedience.

Where will you turn, then, out of doors, where will you get away from God? Emerson sings,—

"When me they fly, I am the wings."

I wish, then, to help you this summer, during our vacation, when this particular place is closed, to feel that you are in a world full of God, as full as it is of air; that you cannot escape from his presence. But I would not put that as I used to hear it, when I was a boy, in the form of a threat, until I came to dread his presence, and wish I could escape from it. It now has become to me an unspeakable joy that I cannot escape from God. Wherever you go, accustom yourselves to feel this tender, loving, sweet, infinite presence. Try to gain a glimpse, to get into sympathy with what Wordsworth knew when he said,—

"And I have felt

A presence that disturbs me with the joy
Of elevated thoughts: a sense sublime
Of something far more deeply interfused,
Whose dwelling is the light of setting suns,
And the round ocean, and the living air,
And the blue sky, and in the mind of man."

I want you to feel that everywhere you are in this living presence, the presence that shines in the sun, that is blue in the sky, that ripples in the water, that which alone can explain any miracle of this wonderful world all round us, the thrilling presence of God.

I want you to come to have a sense of comradeship with this presence. I do not believe that it is fancy when we have a sense of a presence, of comradeship in the woods, among the mountains, under the stars. There is a presence dearer to us and nearer to us than any dearest and nearest friends that we have on earth. I believe you can commune with this presence.

"Speak to him, thou; for he hears, and spirit with spirit can meet,— Closer is he than breathing, and nearer than hands and feet."

In this presence may come the truest, sweetest, noblest sense of worship. When I stand under the stars at night, and look and long until the tears come, until I am lifted in the presence of their brightness,—is it not worship? When I stand beneath a mountain, and feel it call to me,—feel the thrill and the lift in what I speak of inadequately as the sublime,—is it only so much rocks and trees? The ancient polytheists talked about the gods in the mountains, the gods in the trees, the gods in the brooks, the gods in the clouds. I agree with them, only I would leave off the letter s,—that is all. I would say God in the clouds, God in the brooks, God in the leaves, God in the mountain, calling to me, lifting me, saying, "Come up higher"; God in the voice of the infinite sea, that rouses my blood, and thrills me with high feeling and high purpose and high resolve. Is this irreligious? Is this unworshipful? Am I away from God because I am out of doors?

When Tennyson, walking out with James T. Fields, who tells us the anecdote, catches the smell of the violets, and, dropping on his knees, calls out, "Down on your knees, man,—down on your knees, man,—violets, violets," is it not a recognition of the beauty of God? Was he not engaged in worshipping the supreme power, the skill, the beauty, that made the violet? And when James Russell Lowell, stooping down on the edge of a pool by the seashore, where there were all sorts of tiny fishes and sea creatures and marine vegetable growths,—when he looked at the wonder of shape and color and beauty, and exclaimed, "What a poet God is, what an imagination God has, that expresses itself in this infinite variety!"—was he not engaged in an act of worship ten thousand times more worshipful than the perfunctory bending of the knee of thousands of people who go through their formal rituals in churches merely from a sense of habit, without any thrill or touch of feeling, of life and soul? Worship is of the heart, the feeling, and not of the lips or the bending of the knee.

I want you to go out of doors, and to have such a sense of comradeship as Lowell has partly expressed in "Under the Willows."

"I care not how men trace their ancestry
To ape or Adam; let them please their whim.

But I in June am midway to believe
A tree among my far progenitors,
Such sympathy is mine with all the race,
Such mutual recognition vaguely sweet
There is between us. Surely, there are times

When they consent to own me of their kin,
And condescend to me, and call me cousin,
Murmuring faint lullabies of eldest time,
Forgotten, and yet dumbly felt with thrills
Moving the lips, though fruitless of all words."

Well may we be touched with this feeling of sympathy, this comradeship, when we are out of doors. And we cannot stop with saying all life is my relation, unless we include in the all life Him who is the life of all. For it is God's life in the protoplasm and God's life in the grass-blade. It is God's life all the way through; and, when we recognize that feeling of comradeship and rejoice in it, we are conscious of the presence and the love and the care of our Father who is in heaven.

I want you, then, as you go away this summer, to recognize that you are a part of this all of life; and I want you to feel a tenderness and a sympathy, not only for life in man, but for horse, for dog, for cat, for bird, for fish, for insect, for all that is dowered with this marvellous gift of the divine life. I want you to learn to rejoice in the joy that is all around you this summer. Remember what Lowell again said,—

“There's never a leaf nor a blade too mean
To be some happy creature's palace.”

Rejoice in the joy of life. Be touched with tenderness and sympathy for all this life that can feel and can suffer, and do not dare to add a pang to the burden of the world's sorrow. As you enter into this life, include in it the trees and the grass-blade. Count it a part of your religion not wantonly to destroy or injure anything that God has taken the pains to make. Recognize your kinship with them, enter into the life and joy for all, and then think how many million times more you multiply the capacities of this joy when you can rejoice in the joy of all that is living. How like God you become in sympathy and tenderness when you can feel with everything that feels! How like God you become in service when you remember that he, the omnipotent, is the universal servant of everything that he has made! God serves every grass-blade, every insect, every reptile, every worm that crawls; and we become likeliest God when we enter into this life of universal sympathy and service.

When you walk away from the church door this morning, do not think you are walking away from God. Learn to walk your pathways of life as happy, blessed children, friends, and comrades of God, walking the earth hand in hand with him, feeling a consciousness of his presence until you can say with the Psalmist that there is no place in the universe where any power of evil or good can put you where you will be away from him. Take the faith of Whittier when he said,—

“No harm from Him can come to me
On ocean or on shore.”

Walk this earth as God's earth, make your life a life of service, make every day an hour of worship. Let your round of existence be religious until you feel the sense of this comradeship so real that you can look even death in the face without any fear, for God is in those worlds as yet inaccessible to us. If we pass into the shadow where these eyes cannot see, the pathway will be lighted by him, so that we may be with God now, with God everywhere, with God always.

REVIVALS OF RELIGION.

BY REV. W. H. FISH.

Why not revivals of religion as well as “the revival of learning” when learning had fallen so low, or, as now, revivals of trade and business, revivals of patriotism and politics, or of any other important and valued human interests, where there is a dearth or deadness of any of them? And why should religion be made an exception, particularly in its higher and more reasonable forms, wherever it is dormant in many souls and churches? Why, also, should there not be a revival of Unitarianism, if only on a high intellectual and spiritual plane, corresponding with its great and divine ideas and principles, entirely free from the superstition and fanaticism often connected with the common revivals, in harmony with reason, and in fraternal fellowship with all who love righteousness, hate iniquity, and would live and labor to advance the kingdom of God? Are Unitarians generally religious enough already, by virtue of their “unfallen” nature, and so none of them needing any “second birth”? And is the chief thing that the young men and women of the denomination need,—intellectual, ethical, and æsthetic culture, fine and fashionable manners and accomplishments that fit them for “the best society,”—the moiety of religion that comes through these higher educational channels quite sufficient, particularly if a commendable attendance at church once a Sunday, at least, is added, even with no special desire, much less earnest work, for the religious welfare of others less favored and outside of their charmed circle?

In its full and rounded form Unitarianism is the grandest faith thus far made known to mankind. Even the best form of the “New Orthodoxy” only nearly approaches it at certain points, if an advance, perhaps, at others. Beginning as the Christian Unitarianism that it always has been, with God, as specially revealed or manifested in Christ, and ending with God as “all in all,” good triumphant over evil and love over selfishness, and thus universal holiness, harmony, and happiness secured,—now the commonly received view of Unitarians, though not wholly confined to any one denomination, is fast spreading through them all, excepting the most creed-bound and exclusive. Its ethical and humanitarian requirement is the highest possible, summed up in the injunction of Jesus: “Be ye perfect as your Father in heaven is perfect,”—perfect men and women as he is perfect God. And, interpreted by this sublime faith in the “One God and Father of all, above all, through all, and in all,” the fundamental foundation and central doctrine of Unitarianism, we have our perpetual being in a glorious universe, subservient to and answering a divine purpose and end. But, if the faith had no real basis except in the imagination and wishes of mere idealists, then would the universe seem a mysterious, perplexing, tormenting riddle and muddle,—its night side all dark and cheerless! and as Channing has said, “Human life would be mean, and man poorer than the brute.”

But, if Unitarianism should not keep the spiritual life, the enthusiasm for the religion of Jesus, awakened in it at the last Saratoga Conference, and even have it deepened and broadened by its own faithfulness under divine influences, so that it will become a spiritual awakening and inspiring power in various of its churches where there is very little social religious life and genuine Christian co-operation, its outward and forward look would be gloomy enough.

But other denominations are becoming liberal, and the one that shall have the most divine life and reasonable enthusiasm to advance this cause of God will undoubtedly be the prosperous and leading denomination, whatever its name. But it is the history of sects that sometimes “the first shall be last, and the last first.” As Paul said to the Jews, “Seeing ye put the word of God from you, and judge yourselves unworthy of everlasting life, so we turn to the Gentiles,” so it is possible that the grand opportunity of the Unitarian denomination may be a lost one to it, through lack of fidelity and zeal, though the denomination is the best prepared of any by its grand history to fill the land with its faith and a divine religion of humanity.

Not to be satisfied with the slow progress and growth of Unitarianism is most reasonable, and to be justified. Hence my advocacy of the need of a general and genuine and wide-spread revival or simultaneous awakening of dormant religious natures into a new or a fuller appreciation of our faith, and also into such deep and earnest religious aspirations and endeavors as will turn many from darkness to light, from coldness and indifference, as also from sin and unbelief, to the taking of a strong and sure hold on God and eternal life, which will be equivalent, with a baptism of the Divine Spirit, to a new birth,—birth into a spiritual world, a world of love and light, whose revelations alone can satisfy the desires and needs of the soul for unseen and eternal things. And when I see “Evangelists” full of earnestness and zeal, with a mixed system of beliefs, bad and doubtful as well as true and good, and yet quickening the religious sentiment of many young and no longer young persons into desires and purposes to be Christians, and committing themselves to this high calling and entering into their churches, the inefficiency in this respect of much of our Unitarianism is all the more marvellous to me; but that is simply unapplied Unitarianism, which ought to be used as effectively to awaken sleeping souls as to lead on in the path of progress those already awakened. Gloomy views of death and vindictive views of hell are certainly not needful for this purpose.

Some time since one of our wisest and best and much beloved Unitarian ministers (Dr. Miles, lately departed) told me that he had met somewhere in the writings of the late distinguished Dr. Bushnell, “liberal orthodox,” an expressed anticipation of grand revivals of religion at some future time under the influence of Unitarianism, and that in such a man's view this great faith contains “the potency and promise” of a divine life, yet to be widely diffused by it. Is not this significant and worth considering, how its latent power can be brought out and applied? At a late Norfolk Conference the new and able secretary of the American Unitarian Association gave the denomination twenty years to take on new and more vital and vigorous life and strength to make itself pre-eminently worthy of its great and divinely appointed mission; but, failing in this, what then? Unitarianism “for substance of doctrine” cannot die; for God “keepeth watch o'er all his own.” And this is his own, and he will in some way preserve it; but the opportunity to make it the great reviving, regenerating, uplifting, and transforming power in the world it was designed to be may some time, I repeat, pass into new hands.

But no, the denomination of the Channings, the Wares, Walkers, Peabodies, Mays, Parkers, Clarkes, Furnesses, and the rest of the class, and of noble women not a few, and many kindred successors, cannot pass away nor become insignificant among the denominations, as though it were designed only as a preliminary theological and ethical movement or simply the “leaven” that some have thought it; but the denomination will live on, grandly improving the secretary's “twenty years” of probation, and before that time, we will trust, become one of the most flourishing and fruitful trees in the garden of the Lord, the incarnation then better understood than now, and clearly seen to be not in one man only, though the divinest and the special revealer and leader, but in all men in proportion to their Christ-likeness and oneness with the universal Father by a fulness of his spirit. And, had not Theodore Parker fallen on the evil times that he did, slavery and the kindred abominations and a barbarous theology abounding, monopolizing much of his time and great capacities, he might have been the pre-eminently efficient reviver of a pure and fervent as well as reasonable religion throughout the denomination, as he certainly was in a limited sphere; for no man, perhaps, has ever stood in an American pulpit more deeply, devoutly, earnestly religious than that great heresiarch of Music Hall, or more impressively, efficiently so at his best. For proofs of this see his “Discourse,” his “Ten Sermons,” and especially his two sermons of “The Soul's Normal Delight in God” and “The Delights of Piety.” With Parker “piety was the seed, philanthropy the blossom and fruit”; and the motive power of philanthropy, the love of God, essential to the love of man. Unfortunately, many of his partial disciples have accepted and emphasized his denials, but not so earnestly his affirmations, his theology, nor his religion; and I have known his religion to be called, by such iconoclasts, “sentimentalism,” but a revival of such sentimentalism throughout the Unitarian denomination would be its surest salvation and growth,—a newly awakened consciousness of God and eternal life in him.

But that this talk about “revivals of religion” or the awakening of slumbering souls to life and light is not mere unreasoning and unreasonable enthusiasm, reconsider also what James Martineau has said germane to the subject:—

“The times and people that have visibly felt the proximity of God have always been characterized by hearty and productive affections, by vast enterprises and great sacrifices, by the seeds of mighty thought dropped upon the world and the fruits of great achievements contributed to human history. In contact with every grand era in the experience of mankind will be found the birth of religion, a fresh discovery of the preternatural and the mysterious; a plenary sense of God; the descent of a Holy Spirit on waiting hearts; a day of Pentecost to strong and faithful souls, giving them the utterance of a divine persuasion and dispensing a new gospel over the world. We, alas! are far enough—far, at least, as the days of Wesley—from any such period of inspiration in the past; perhaps, however, the nearer to it in the future, as there is no night unfollowed by the dawn.” See also Dr. J. H. Allen, in the June number of the New World, especially on the 317th page and in paragraph 2. And do we not see in the great Martineau awakening—so many ministers testifying to their great and grateful indebtedness to him, expressed in such fervor and earnestness—an encouraging sign of the dawn of a new day, the great spiritual leader, illuminated and illuminating, living again in them, to carry forward the great and divine cause he has so magnificently represented,—the cause of God and humanity? Surely, these younger ministers will not go to sleep, but so live and labor that they in their turn will live in many faithful disciples as Martineau lives in his. And this outward sign of a great harvest from this great teacher's quiet, patient, persevering sowing of the seeds of the divine kingdom must be a very great reward to the noble seer; and in due time, though we hope to hear from him still further, he may well say, “Now, Lord, let thou thy servant depart in peace; for mine eyes have seen thy salvation.”

Spiritual Life.

One secret act of self-denial, one sacrifice of inclination to duty, is worth all the mere good thoughts, warm feelings, passionate prayers, in which idle people indulge themselves.—J. H. Newman.

The conception of man's freedom as ethical and spiritual, as resting upon the infinite worth of human personality, and its direct relation with the divine Personality, has been the direct source of all that is noblest in modern civilization.—Quarterly Review.

There is a time when religion is only felt as a bridle that checks us; and then comes another time when it is a sweet and penetrating life-blood, which sets in motion every fibre of the soul, expands the understanding, gives us the infinite for our horizon, and makes all things clear to us.—Lacordaire.

God never works only for to-day. His plan runs on and on. The web he weaves is from everlasting to everlasting; and, if I can fill a part of that web, be it ever so insignificant, it will abide forever. And this is one of the most comforting thoughts to us. While on earth we may do something for eternity.—Bishop Simpson.

Bear in mind that, to be truly great, it is not necessary that you should gain wealth and importance. Steadfast and undeviating truth, fearless and straightforward integrity, and an honor ever unsullied by an unworthy word or action make their possessor greater than worldly success or prosperity. These qualities constitute greatness.—Peabody.

CHANDLER & CO.

Comfortable, Easy Summer Gloves.

During the warm summer days Kid gloves are distressing, and Silk gloves handsome and expensive, but not very serviceable. We have always in stock

The Ideal Summer Glove.

Fits like a kid glove, and wears perfectly. Made of Silk and Lisle, with buttons, 75c., and without buttons, 60c. per pair.

Ask to see

THE IDEAL SUMMER GLOVE.

CHANDLER & CO.,

Winter St., Boston.

The end of all political struggle is to establish morality as the basis of legislation. 'Tis not free institutions, 'tis not a democracy that is the end,—no, but only the means. Morality is the object of government. We want a state of things in which crime will not pay, a state of things which allows every man the largest liberty compatible with the liberty of every other man.—Emerson.

To know that there are scattered all over the world kindred souls whom we shall never see, perhaps, but whom we may at any time happen upon, makes the whole mass of men and women more interesting than they otherwise would be. We see them all at their best, and it keeps us at our best. We come to realize more fully that they and we must all be loved to be understood. So our quest for the holy grail in human souls congenial and uplifting becomes its own exceeding great reward.—Selected.

Literature.

CHURCH'S LIFE OF CROMWELL.*

If there are and have been and will be many lives of Oliver Cromwell (as of Abraham Lincoln and George Washington), the world may be assured there never can be too many. For, since the world was made, the biography of a strong and Heaven-appointed man has ever been its best literature. Novels are an adumbration of that; and poems, even Homer's and Shakspeare's, are the quintessence of such lives, presented in the metrical and idealizing form so acceptable to mankind. Besides, in Cromwell's case, so complex was his character, and so great the misconception of him which the stolid and traditional conservatism of England formed and long cherished, that no life of him now for two hundred and fifty years has been able to set him forth as he was. Carlyle, with his piercing but distorting genius for history, was strong enough to puff away at one blast the nonsense of old slanderers and the effect of party rage in Clarendon, Ludlow, and the cold bigot of Toryism, David Hume; but he gave a new twist of error to the conception of this great man's mission. To Carlyle arbitrary power was in itself a good thing,—as, doubtless, it is in the divine Ruler,—but never, if men are to wield it. It is an occasional necessity rather, not to be assumed from ambition, as by Napoleon, nor by a system of fraud and force, as by the spurious Napoleon, who made Canrobert the instrument of his murderous assault on France, but only to be taken up as Cromwell received it, at the hands of a necessity great enough to be qualified as divine,—the call of God. But even the chosen instruments of Heaven are fallible men, and Carlyle felt bound by his theory to defend and explain Cromwell sometimes upon false grounds.

The centuries bring clearness of vision where great men are concerned, although they often do oblivious injustice to men of a lower rank. The farther England sees Cromwell recede in the past, the wiser is her verdict upon him; and now we hear that his statue is to be placed in the great Parliament House, where room was found half a century ago for elegant third-rate heroes of romance and friendship, like Falkland, or representative English gentlemen, like Hampden and Chatham. Above such men—famous and even great as some of them were—the genius of Cromwell rises into the higher rank of those few soldiers and statesmen who have changed the political fortunes and face of the world. Mayell, the Puritan Horace, had a profound appreciation of Cromwell, when in his lifetime he wrote:—

"And, if we would speak true,
Much to the man is due
Who from his private gardens, where
He lived, reserved and austere,
Could by industrious valor climb
To ruin the great work of time,
And cast the kingdoms old
Into another mould."

The latest life of this hero is by Samuel Harden Church; and, without indicating any considerable genius or even penetration in the writer, it is a compilation of real value, from his openness of mind and careful sifting of authorities. Although the book has more than five hundred pages, he is compelled to omit many things that would throw light on Cromwell,—among others, his transactions with his witty and shabby cousin (Hampden's cousin, also), the poet Edmund Waller. There is an anonymous life of Waller, printed in the London edition of his poems and speeches in 1711, which might have been profitably consulted by Mr. Church (as it was, without giving credit, by Mr. Gosse, in his Lowell Lectures, ten years ago), and would have furnished a racy anecdote or two, in a style a little more picturesque than our modern author uses. But he has given us so much that is good, especially in Cromwell's own words, that we will not find fault with his omissions.

BEYOND THE DREAMS OF AVARICE. By Walter Besant. Illustrated. New York: Harper & Brothers.—This last venture of Mr. Besant is a sad but powerful story. It is largely the tale of misery, meanness, and crime. But, though the drama is set in the shadow, it is lighted up with rays of noble thought. The opening scene represents a young physician at the death-bed of his father, who in his last hours revealed to his son the story of his life. He was the son of John Calvert Burley. The latter was the member of a family who were marked by their miserly cruelty. Misfortune and suffering ran through several generations. The present living representative was John Calvert Burley, who had acquired a vast fortune by pandering to the worst vices. He was a miser; and his son was so impressed with the conviction that the money gained by the family had been a curse for two hundred years that he resolved to renounce his inheritance, run away, assume a new name, and begin life free from all the dishonor which had brought so much misery and moral ruin. At fifty-five, after an honorable career, he died; and in the confidence of his last hours he reveals to his son that the latter has a grandfather still alive, who soon after died and left a fortune of sixty millions. Who are the heirs? This was the question sent forth to the public while the millions were placed in the public treasury, waiting for the real claimant. This was the grandson; but, as his father's dying charge to his son was not to have anything to do with this ill-gotten wealth, he kept in the background. And various members of the family were in a furor of excitement and hope. Notwithstanding his wife had resolved never to have anything to do with this money, there began to grow, on the part of the real heir, the desire to claim his prize. With it he would found a great scientific college, which would bless the world. The various phases of the struggle by which he at last revealed himself is vividly drawn, as well as the craze which possessed other claimants before the true heir was discovered. To cap the climax, just as the heir was to receive his own, a will was discovered which left the whole estate to the founding of a college of science. This is a brief outline of a story which is both sad and tragic. Throughout the whole we see exemplified the great moral fact that, whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap, and how often the consequences of our own misdeeds affect others. This is done, however, not in the way of moral preaching, but in the natural working out of results in character. The personages in the drama are vividly drawn with individual distinctness. On the whole, this may be classed among Mr. Besant's best novels. It is alive with interest, abounds with strong delineations of character, such as Margaret; the American girl, Ella; the Australian family; Clarence; and the chief personage, Dr. Lucian. We see here also the working of a weird imagination common to the author's works,—sometimes a tendency to exaggeration, and with flashes of noble sentiment.

A WOMAN OF IMPULSE. By Justin Huntley McCarthy. New York and London: G. P. Putnam's Sons.—A woman of impulse, as drawn by Justin H. McCarthy, is of noble family, rich inheritance, attractive in person, and with high intellectual and moral aspirations. Living in a period when literature abounds in quotations, and the public reads what is written about Shakspeare, Milton, and other great authors, instead of studying their original work, she is filled with the earnest desire to get at the realities of life. She had been specially interested in a book of a somewhat radical character called the "Cry for Liberty," written by Brander Swift. Naturally self-willed and fond of adventure, Dorothy Carteret resolved, under the assumed name of Candida Knox, to take humble apartments in London, and begin life in earnest. Among other things, she had a strong desire to know the author of the "Cry for Liberty." This was done in a very unconventional way. Swift, in the pursuit of his studies, was a frequent visitor to the British Museum. Here he met a girl with "the most beautiful face he had ever seen." He was haunted by it; and, after seeing it several times, he was desperately in love with it. One day the girl asked him, "Are you a student of these things?" And the ice was broken. They soon became companions in their quest for knowledge; and with frank and sincere confidence the girl told him her name and residence, but gave him to understand that their relation was that of friendship. Swift, though desperately in love, had to recognize this, and so the story goes on, with a variety of incidents and characters, until, Candida Knox, with all her eccentricities, having a woman's heart, the intimacy ripened into love, and then, assured of the truth of his affection, she tells him of her own love and real name. While other personages figure in the story, the chief interest gathers round these two. The woman of impulse was thoroughly unconventional; yet, under all her freaks, frankness, and eccentricities, she is a true woman, striving her best to reach her noblest ideal. This book is far from the common type of novels, both in its characters and aim, and gives us glimpses of some of the peculiar phases of social life and the teeming thought of the times.

PRINCE HENRY, THE NAVIGATOR: THE HERO OF PORTUGAL AND OF MODERN DISCOVERY, 1394-1460 A.D. By C. Raymond Beazley, M.A., F.R.G.S. With an account of Geographical Progress throughout the Middle Ages as the preparation for his work. New York and London: G. P. Putnam's Sons.—The plan of this volume is well described on its title-page. The author, availing himself of original sources, describes the knowledge of geography which existed during the Middle Ages to the end of the fifteenth century, and the various enterprises of discovery which preceded. This takes about a third of the book, and is, so to speak, a prelude to the life of Prince Henry. The period of the latter may truly be regarded as the turning-point in the development of many centuries. The author says that the interest which surrounds Henry "is somewhat clouded by the dearth of complete knowledge of his life; but enough remains to make something of a picture of a hero, both of science and of action." The work has been done with carefulness; and the reader has a large amount of useful information relating to what has been done in the way of discovery before Henry, and also the very important results of the labors of the Portuguese sailors under the inspiration and aid of the prince. These hardy mariners sailed along a large section of the western coast of Africa, and prepared the way for the more brilliant deeds which soon after followed. The series of maps given, which illustrate the continual geographical progress, are of special value. "These," says the author, are "the first English reproduction in any acceptable form of several of the great charts of the Middle Ages; and, taken together, they will give, it is hoped, the best view of Western or Christian map-making before the time of Columbus that is to be found in any English book outside of the great historical atlases." This book has an unusual value, because it contains the best available knowledge, in a small space, of the discoveries of the period it covers, and gives us an insight into the spirit and purposes which guided these hardy sailors in their discoveries.

INSTITUTES OF THE CHRISTIAN RELIGION. By Emanuel V. Gerhart, D.D., LL.D. Completed in two octavo volumes, 1,744 pages. Per volume, $3. New York, London, and Toronto: Funk & Wagnalls Company.—The first volume of this work appeared in 1891, and treated of "The Sources of Theological Knowledge," "The Christ Idea," "The Doctrine of God," and "Cosmology." The present volume is devoted to "Anthropology," "Christology," "Pneumatology," "Soteriology," and "Eschatology." The author's point of departure in the construction of his system is the conception of Jesus as both divine and human,—both God and man. The supposed method of the process of incarnation is developed with a fulness which leaves far behind the simple story of the Gospels; yet even a dissenter must confess that the discussion is conducted with great soberness, and with all the clearness of presentation of which such a subject is capable. So in his eschatology the author is to be ranked with those who free the traditional doctrine of the resurrection from some of its difficulties by extending the view of Paul, and giving not only to the righteous a spiritual body in place of the disintegrated physical organism, but also to the wicked a new devilish body suited to the conditions of their hellish life. In the underworld the soul is without a body, but at the resurrection it will create for itself a new tenement-house. The conception of the solidarity of the family is evoked to furnish a way of escape from perdition for the infant children of Christian parents. "By nature, infants are fallen: they are subject to the power of the law of sin, they are the heirs of death." From this death they may be saved through Christian baptism. One may protest at every turn against the author's positions, but can hardly withhold from him the praise due to a most thorough, painstaking, and conscientious treatment of themes which are likely yet for many generations to be considered of supreme importance by the great majority of Christians.

IN THE HEART OF THE BITTER-ROOT MOUNTAINS. The Story of "the Carlin Party," September-December, 1893. By Heclama. Illustrated. New York and London: G. P. Putnam's Sons.—The narratives of the experiences of those who travel in rough and unexplored regions have always a special fascination, because they deal with danger and hardship. The story of the Carlin Party is one of these. It is the record of a hunting trip taken for recreation and pleasure. Leaving behind the comforts of civilized life, this small party plunged into the wilds of the Bitter-root Mountains. It was by no means a holiday affair. At an unusually early period they were confronted with severe snow-storms, which covered and hid the trails; and they were forced on their return to descend the Kooskooskee on rafts built with their own hands. As they crept along, they were tossed by the rapids upon high and pointed rocks. Thus they toiled slowly, gliding amid cold and rain, in daily peril of their lives. To add to their trials, one of their comrades was ill unto death; and they were obliged to leave him on the banks of the river to die alone in the sleet and snow. After various thrilling incidents they were met by a rescuing party, and reached their homes. The author has told the story in a literal and informal way, yet full of pictures of camp life and vivid descriptions of scenery. As one of the party was somewhat of an artist, we have a large number of illustrations reproduced from photographs taken on the spot, and also a valuable map of the Clearwater basin and adjoining territory. The book closes with a reprint of portions of the narrative of the Lewis and Clark Expedition, which treats of their travels through this section.

THE RELATION OF RELIGION TO CIVIL GOVERNMENT IN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA. By Isaac A. Corneilson. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons.—The outcome of this dull, learned, careful, and laborious book is that we have in America a State without a Church, but not without a religion. The government, he says, is Christian, but it is not sectarian. We cannot think he has made out his positive case. That we have no State Church and no State sectarian religion he has proved easily enough. But he has again disproved it, if he has proved that the State is Christian; for, in that case, it is sectarian as against the Jew and the agnostic. It is true that many Christian forms and laws and practices are implicated in the procedure of our State and national government. It is right that it should be so, perhaps, seeing that the Christians are in a vast numerical majority. The Jew and the agnostic, if they are wise, will good-naturedly concede so much when the incident is not burdensome. But that hence our State and national governments are formally Christian we cannot well make out, and we are very glad that we cannot. If they are, the battle of religious liberty is not yet fought out to the end; and the spirit of Roger Williams must hold itself in readiness to be again invoked.

THE NEW WORLD, WITH OTHER VERSE. By Louis James Block. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons.—The elaborate poem which names Mr. Block's handsome volume has been already noticed in our columns. The defects of its qualities, as also the advantages, reappear in the other longer poems that are now printed with it. They are noble in sentiment, generous in admiration, abounding in suggestive and inspiring thoughts; but they are exceedingly expansive, seldom musical, and "over-languaged," with a tendency to use words for their own brilliance and color without sufficient reference to the thing to be expressed. The first in the collection, "The Friendship of Faiths," was read in part at the Parliament of Religions. It must have made an impression far below its real worth, the form being quite unsuitable to public reading. Even the shorter poems would be improved by condensation. Of these, that on David Swing impresses us as one of the best; and it contains no better stanza than the first:—

"The engulfing night that clips the world around
Has reason to rejoice:
The voicelessness that girds the realm of sound Receives another voice."

YOUR WILL: HOW TO MAKE IT. By George F. Tucker, author of "A Manual of Wills," etc. Boston: Little, Brown & Co. The criticism which spontaneously arises as we read the title of this book is disarmed by the excerpt which follows from Flood's "Pitfalls of Testators." It is: "What testators really want is, not a book to show them how to construe badly worded documents, but one to indicate to them how a will ought to be worded under professional guidance, which will construe itself." When a lawyer of Samuel Tilden's ability makes a will that is broken in the courts, so that millions of dollars go to those who have no moral right to it whatever, it would seem that nobody should make his own will unaided, though it is evident that a blind lawyer may lead a blind testator into the ditch. But Mr. Tucker's book is one that will certainly conduce to greater carefulness with or without legal help. He gives many interesting examples of wills that have failed to carry out the intentions of the persons making them. Some of these examples may be commended to the novelist as much better calculated for his purposes than any he is likely to invent.

* OLIVER CROMWELL: A History, comprising a Narrative of his Life, with Extracts from his Letters and Speeches, etc. By S. H. Church. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons.

HISTORY OF RELIGION. By Allan Menzies, D.D., Professor of Biblical Criticism in the University of St. Andrews. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.—We have here in the first place a sketch of primitive religious beliefs and practices, and then a fuller account of the origin and character of the great systems of the world. The scholar will not go to it for anything new, for its character is essentially popular. So much the better! This statement of a Presbyterian scholar is even broader and more sympathetic than Dr. Clarke's "Ten Great Religions." No such claim is made for Christianity as a pleroma as is made by Dr. Clarke. Indeed, nowhere is the treatment more genuinely critical than in the chapter on Christianity. In the account of the teachings of Jesus there is not a word to suggest that he was a Presbyterian, not a word to suggest that the dogmas of the Calvinist have anything to do with Christianity. The book will be a good one for class instruction. Those using Dr. Clarke's book would do well to supplement it with this. It would be hard to name a book that indicates the growth of liberality in religion more pointedly than does this.

TOM CRINGLE'S LOG. By Michael Scott. With an Introduction by Mowbray Morris. New York: Macmillan & Co. $1.25.—The name of Michael Scott suggests rather the wizard who spoke the words that cleft Eildon hills in twain than the writer whom Christopher North called "the best sketcher of sea scenery that ever held a pen," and whose essays were hailed by the Quarterly Review as the most brilliant series of magazine papers of the times. The introduction to the present edition of this vigorous sea story places it among the classics of English fiction. It is certainly a vivid and striking book, varied in its presentation of life, rapid in action, melodramatic in character, as Marryat asserted at the time it was written, yet with a spirit and humor of its own. In such a book one does not expect all the characters to be "respectable" or conventional, and the reader may make up his mind for plenty of blood-shedding and the like.

THE FRIEND OF THE PEOPLE. By Mary C. Rowsell. New York: Frederick A. Stokes Company.—The drama based on this novel was written by the author in conjunction with Mr. H. A. Saintsbury, and seems to us more likely to be really successful than in the form of fiction. It is the story of two claimants to one wife and one estate, the impostor being the natural brother of the rightful husband. It is also a tale of the reign of terror,—almost the only time, as the preface points out, that a fraud of such extent could be planned with any hope of success. The story is interesting after one escapes from the melodramatic scene with which it opens, and reads into the main portion of the story. The wicked brother is very wicked indeed, and there is little attempt at delicacy of shading or study of character.

TREASURES OF KURIUM. By Ellen M. H. Gates. New York and London: G. P. Putnam's Sons.—It has been the good fortune of Ellen M. H. Gates to write a few verses that have sung their way into the popular affection, and are likely to remain favorites indefinitely. Such are "Beautiful Hands" and "Your Mission," which go the rounds of the newspapers periodically, always finding fresh welcome. Hers, too, are the verses which may be found in many a guest-room, printed on satin ribbon, and bought, probably, at some fair, beginning, "Sleep sweet within this quiet room." They are good, but would be very much better if the writer would change the first line, as she might easily do, and correct the printer's mistakes in punctuation. Such simple, musical heart-songs as these find always their friends. The book is attractively printed and bound.

ÆSTHETIC PRINCIPLES. By Henry Rutgers Marshall. New York: Macmillan & Co. $1.25.—Mr. Marshall's earlier volume, entitled "Pain, Pleasure, and Æsthetics," was a thorough and carefully written treatise, showing the close student of psychology and physiology. The present volume does not attempt to cover the whole subject discussed in the other, but it sketches out the results which are of greatest interest and most practical value in reference to the study of æsthetics. It is written for less critical readers, and the phraseology is less technical. Prof. William James has said of Mr. Marshall's work in general that acquaintance with it will be necessary to every future student of the subject, and that its various qualities render it almost "epoch-making" in the present situation of science.

WITH THE PROCESSION. By Henry B. Fuller. Harper & Brothers. $1.25.—Mr. Fuller's knowledge of Chicago is of two kinds. He knows it from the inside, as it seems to the inhabitant who has seen it grow from town to metropolis; and he knows it also from the outside, from the point of view of one who has travelled and compared and analyzed. He gives us keen, brilliant pictures of this restless, eager, generous, delightful city, whose friends may criticize it severely, though they never yield that right to a stranger. The story itself is not of great importance. The value of the book is in this delineation of character, affected by local influences. His style is refined and telling; and this novel, like its predecessors, is clever.

SELECTIONS FROM THE POETRY OF ROBERT HERRICK. Edited by Edward Everett Hale, Jr. Boston: Ginn & Co.—The Athenæum Press Series is intended to furnish a convenient library of the best English literature from Chaucer to the present time, and thus far it is fulfilling its purpose well. Mr. Hale's edition of Herrick is intended for those who are content to enjoy his poetry, and also for those who desire to study a little the things which they have enjoyed. He has tried to give all the best poems, and some not the best, but representative.

WEE LUCY: LITTLE PRUDY'S "WEE CROODLIN DOO." By Sophie May. Boston: Lee & Shepard.—The little children who remember and love "Little Prudy," and to whom this book is dedicated, will welcome with eagerness and delight these bright and charming stories. They enter into the spirit of child-life, and therefore are very fascinating to children. Sophie May is too well known in our households to need an introduction, and many mothers will be glad to greet "Wee Lucy."

Miscellaneous.

Rev. Charles H. Pope has compiled a small book which he calls "The Gospels Combined." He has blended parallel passages and connected separate accounts so as to present the life of Jesus in a continuous narrative. The language is that of the revised version, with free use of its marginal readings when that seemed advisable.

N. J. Henderson, ensign in the First Naval Battalion of New York, has written a small book entitled "The Elements of Navigation," designed for the instruction of beginners in this science. It gives a short and complete explanation of standard methods of finding the position of a ship at sea and the course to be steered. It is published by Harper & Brothers.

A. C. McClurg & Co. of Chicago publish a book by Dr. Chalmer Prentice, M.D., entitled "The Eye in its Relation to Health," in which some new theories are set forth for which the author claims attention and invites criticism. It is a book which will be chiefly interesting to specialists, though it is written in a popular style, which allows it at least to appeal to ordinary readers.

Ginn & Co. issue a "Complete Geography," by Alex. Everett Frye, which is well up to date in all that pertains to use, convenience, and suggestive help in this study. There are simple study maps and full reference maps, there are numerous and interesting illustrations, the surface-forms and climate of various parts of the world receive full treatment, and everything is planned for intelligent study by pupils.

The object of "The Handbook of Sanitary Information for Householders," written by Roger S. Tracy, M.D., and published by D. Appleton & Co., is to furnish information which has been scattered or so buried in technical discussions that it has not been generally accessible. It is mainly a compilation, and contains facts about ventilation, drainage, care of contagious diseases, disinfection, food, and water.

Another outcome of the interest in the philosophy and practice of mental healing appears in a book by Annetta Gertrude Dresser on "The Philosophy of P. P. Quimby," published by George H. Ellis. It is dedicated to the sick everywhere, and consists of a biographical sketch of the man who, according to the writer, first claimed that "disease is an error or belief, and truth is the cure,"—an exposition of his philosophy and selections from his manuscripts.

Rev. Alexander H. Crauford has written a book entitled "Enigmas of the Spiritual Life," which is published by Thomas Whitaker of New York. This series of essays evidence an attempt to think out some of the gravest and most important problems of man's higher life as they present themselves to inquirers of the present age. He writes from the point of view of Broad Church Christianity. While he does not intend to assail revealed religion, the volume is only suited to those who believe in the progressiveness of moral and spiritual knowledge.

Mr. James P. Munroe is the author of a suggestive book published in Heath's pedagogical library, entitled "The Educational Ideal," which traces the outline of a special phase of development in the history of education. He shows how the permanent influences that have affected the growth of this ideal from the narrow pedantry of the schoolmen have been those alone which paid heed to the natural development of the man and studied the normal growth of the child; that is, toward "natural education." He considers successively, as types and leaders in educational progress, Rabelais, Bacon, Montaigne, Locke, Fénelon, Rousseau, Pestalozzi, Froebel, and, collectively, women.

Books Received.

TO PUBLISHERS.—All books sent to the CHRISTIAN REGISTER will be promptly acknowledged under the head of "Books Received," with statement of publisher's address and price, if known. But we can guarantee no other return, as the rapid multiplication of new works compels us to limit the number selected for critical notice and review.

From the Universalist Publishing House, Boston. Praise and Thanks, A Hymn Book for the Young People's Christian Union of the Universalist Church.

From G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York. Doctor Izard. By Anna Katherine Green.

From Harper & Brothers, New York. Billy Bellow. By W. E. Norris. Diplomatic Disenchantments. By Edith Bigelow. The Mayor of Casterbridge. A Story of a Man of Character. By Thomas Hardy. In Deacon's Orders, and Other Stories. By Walter Besant.

From Charles Scribner's Sons, New York. The Plated City. By Bliss Perry. Our Western Archipelago. By Henry M. Field. Price $2.00. A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on Deuteronomy. By Rev. S. R. Driver, D.D. Price $3.00.

Music Received.

From Oliver Ditson Company, Boston. Dance of the Whip-poor-will. Polka for the Pianoforte. By Helen Frances Lowe. Minuet for Pianoforte. By Henry Levy. Bagatelle for the Pianoforte. By G. D. Wilson. Remember, O Beloved! Song. Words by Owen Meredith. Music by C. Lamar. Moonlight Festival. By J. J. Gallaher. Polonaise Brillante for the Pianoforte. By C. D. Wilson. Who'd not be a Vagabond? Words by Maude Loader. Music by Sydney Brown. Marche Romaine. For Mandolins and Guitar. By V. Leon.

"A Great Good Man."

Charles Francis Barnard.

A Sketch of his Life and Work by FRANCIS TIFFANY. With a Portrait and a View of Warren Street Chapel. 12mo, gilt top, $1.25.

The Rev. Francis Tiffany, who wrought well as the biographer of Dorothea Dix, has quite doubled his claim upon public gratitude by producing a sketch of the Life and Work of Charles Francis Barnard. . . . The Warren Street Chapel, opened in 1836, and now aptly known, in honor of its founder, as the Barnard Memorial, was the offspring of his passionate zeal for exposed and neglected children, to thousands of whom he became a good genius and a guardian angel, as many old chapel boys, scattered over New England and the West, survive to testify. His big heart and fertile brain produced also the seeds which have grown up into many accepted agencies of education and charity; for Boston is indebted to him for the beginnings of sewing schools, evening schools, vacation schools, infant schools, day nurseries, music in schools, free libraries and reading-rooms, free art exhibits, rides for invalids, and the methods by which our Associated Charities and "settlements" seek to bring the prosperous into sympathetic relations with the unfortunate and the poor. . . . Into this little volume is compacted the story of a life of enlightened, practical, saintly philanthropy, which is not dimmed by comparison with that of John Howard, Florence Nightingale, or Vincent de Paul.—Boston Gazette.

He left behind him a name and a work with which nothing in Boston is to be compared except Father Taylor's. Mr. Tiffany's book is one of very great and rare interest.—The Independent (New York).

Sold by all booksellers. Sent, postpaid, by

HOUGHTON, MIFFLIN & CO., BOSTON.

Has Mental Healing a Valid Scientific and Religious Basis?

A tract of 32 pages, containing a paper by Henry Wood, read before the Clergymen's "Monday Club," composed of the Unitarian ministers of Boston and vicinity. Mailed free on receipt of 3 cents, or 4 for 10 cents, or 10 for 25 cents.

LEE & SHEPARD, Publishers, Boston.

JOHN FISKE

Begins a series of Historical Articles in the July Atlantic

with a paper on

The Elizabethan Sea Kings.

Other articles of special interest are

The Ship of State and the Stroke of Fate, by Dr. WILLIAM EVERETT.

An Architect's Vacation,—Rural England, by ROBERT SWAIN PEABODY.

The Canals of Mars,

by PERCIVAL LOWELL.

A Talk over Autographs,

by GEORGE BIRKBECK HILL.

A Philosopher with an Eye for Beauty, a Short Story, by ROBERT BEVERLY HALE.

Chapters of the two strong Serials, A Singular Life, by Miss PHELPS, and The Seats of the Mighty, by GILBERT PARKER; and Poems and Papers by LOUISE CHANDLER MOULTON, CLINTON SCOLLARD, J. M. LUDLOW, HENRY VAN DYKE, OLIVE THORNE MILLER, and others.

$4.00 a year; 35 cents a number.

HOUGHTON, MIFFLIN & CO., Boston.

SUMMER READING.

A Child of Nature.

By MARION D. SHUTTER, D.D.

Cloth, red edges, neatly stamped, 50 Cents.

Special gift edition, full gilt, $1 00.

Philadelphia To-day.—One of the most charming little collections of essays that have recently come under notice. Written with lovely simplicity of diction, taking us into a happy apprehension of Nature, and withal habited in the happiest thoughts and conceits. Altogether delightful.

Minneapolis Journal.—Dr. Shutter has a keen zest for Nature, and a mind to receive lasting impressions from her manifold moods in sky, water, cloud, leaf, grass, and flowers. He makes some charming applications and analogies in this volume, which will be prized by all who love homilies in stones and running brooks.

Toronto Week.—The ideas are so simply and so strikingly expressed that it is a pleasure to read it from cover to cover. The author strikes us as having eyes to see.

For sale by booksellers, or sent postpaid, on receipt of price by

JAMES H. WEST, Publisher,
174 High Street, - - - Boston.

Lectures and Sermons

BY

WILLIAM J. POTTER.

With a Biographical Sketch

BY

Francis Ellingwood Abbot, Ph.D.

This book is published in style of Mr. Potter's previous volume, "Twenty-five Sermons in Twenty-five Years." Gilt top, bevelled boards.

Price $2.00.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

The Essential Man.

A Monograph on Personal Immortality in the Light of Reason.

BY

George Croswell Cressey, Ph.D.

CONTENTS: Preface; I. The Conditions of the Problem; II. The Nature of Man; III. The Persistence of Mind or Soul; IV. The Nature of the Universe; V. Personal Belief; VI. Conditional Immortality; VII. Conclusion.

Price 75 Cents.

For sale by all Booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

The Home.

For the Christian Register.

THE MORNING-GLORY.

BY WILLIAM BRUNTON.

The glowing splendor of the sky
Has found a little flower,
That sleeps with half-awakened eye
To greet its rising hour.
So, when the sun is in the east,
It opes its fairy cup,
And of the sunshine makes a feast,
And asks the bees to sup!

For the Christian Register.

ONE SUBSCRIPTION.

A FOURTH OF JULY STORY.

BY SARAH WINTER KELLOGG.

"I won't take it to Squire Tracy's. I won't, I won't!"

"Law, Mars Marley, how you do 'splode!"

"It would make a mummy explode,—to hand him this subscription paper, and watch him read, 'James Coleman, a goose.' A goose! That's all that your pa subscribed to the Fourth-of-July barbecue."

"He's your pa as much as he is mine," the little sister replied with a kind of spirited meekness.

She was afraid of Marlborough when in his scornful, angry mood. He was often in such mood in these days, as he was beginning to realize the policy of stinginess prevailing on the plantation, which stood out markedly against the background of traditional largess and hospitality of the Southern planter. Sukey did not fear personal harm, but was vaguely frightened to see her brother stamping around with flushed face and hot words.

"Is a goose toler'ble little to subscribe for a barbecue?"

"Little! Just read this: 'W. V. Strong, four sheep; T. J. Philpot, two steers; Henry Lamar, ten turkeys; William Buck, wagon-load watermelons; Mrs. Lane-Tucker, ten dozen beaten biscuits.'"

"Boun' doze biscuits woan be light. I kin beat Miss Lane-Tucker's cook makin' beatum biscuits."

"Yes," Marley snorted: "you think that you can beat everybody making everything. Why don't you cook something for this barbecue? Everybody's coming to it for twenty-five miles,—from Cross Roads, Turnpike, Trezvant's Ferry, Jackson Bluffs, and everywhere. If all the neighbors were as stingy in subscribing as pa, there wouldn't be a bite around. A goose! And I've got to take the subscription-paper to Squire Tracy and around the neighborhood; and everybody'll read pa's name,—'James Coleman, a goose.' I won't take the paper around! I won't go to the barbecue! I won't!"

"An' not have no Fou' July? Doan you ker nothin' 'tall 'fer you' country?"

"No, if all it's worth is a mean old goose. Pa will pick out the scrawniest old goose on the place, and it will taste like burnt feathers; and all the boys and girls in the county will know about it. Oh, I can't stand it!"

Marley's face was suddenly quivering, and hot tears were filling his eyes. Sukey went caressingly closer.

"Go away!" he ordered. "You shan't go to the barbecue, either, to be shamed and hurt. Stop crying! What do you want to go for? To be made scorn of?"

"Oh, Marley, isn't a goose, if it's a gander, toler'ble much for a subscription? I wish pa would give all our flock of geese."

"Now, looky yere, all boaf you two honeys! You write on dat suscription you' ma's name,—'Miss James Coleman, fife poun'-cakes.'"

"Pa'd never let her give them."

"Nebber min'! I'll bake dem poun'-cakes."

"O Aunt Silvy, you couldn't! They'd never let you have the time or the flour and sugar."

"Doan you pester. Bake 'em in my cabin night befo'e de barbycue."

Marley felt revived. Five pound-cakes! Pound-cake was a dainty variety in those days, when sugar and flour had to be hauled by ox-cart from the distant river mart. Five cakes would count up like gold pieces in a contribution-box. Five pound-cakes would rank anything yet subscribed or likely to be.

"But how can you get the things? The flour and sugar are kept locked in the closet; and, besides, you oughtn't to take them without leave."

"Doan unpussuade me. Jis' put down, 'Miss James Coleman, fife poun'-cakes.'"

"I won't put it down till you tell how you're going to manage. You go to stealing, and you'll get turned out of the church; and, when you die, you'll go down." And Marley pointed toward the earth's centre.

"I keeps chickens. They's comerdatin': they'll lay me eggs. Sunday mawnin's mistis s'tribits flour to de black folks, so dey kin have a session from co'ase cawn-bread. Nex' Sunday I'll git a s'ply uv flour from de black folks. I kin make it up to 'em heap 'er ways: they'd swap flour fer a slice uv taut."

Sukey started. "O Marley! You and I can leave our slices of tart on our plates, and Aunt Silvy can pay some with them. Oh! I forgot all our food's pa's."

"How'll you get the sugar?"

"Mistis gives me sugar 'lowance fer de tauts. Every time I makes tauts I'll put in toler'bul little sugar, an' save de res' fer poun'-cakes."

"Rut, Aunt Silvy, that sounds like stealing. I have six bits. Marley can go to town, and get flour and sugar."

"Thar's butter. I doan reckon I can't git no butter nowhars."

Suddenly Silvy's face looked inspired.

"I kin make sponge cakes: dey doan want no butter. Thar's sally-rattus,—make de batty foamy. I'll jis' ax mistis to gimme a little sally fer my heart-burn."

"You mustn't cheat," said Sukey, promptly. "You can have my picayune that the doctor gave me for letting him put leeches on."

"Dat's all 'cep' milk. Git de milk from de calves."

"Calves don't give milk," Sukey protested.

Silvy chuckled, then explained. When the eight cows kept to furnish milk for the "white folks" table had yielded the requisite pigginful, she would, before the calves were let to their mothers, levy an assessment, taking "jis' a few draps all roun' from de cows."

"O Aunt Silvy! That'll be stealing from the calves. That's the same as stealing from pa, for all the calves belong to him."

"Law! Nebber saw nuther sich tickler chile."

"The calves don't all b'long to pa. He gave me Brindle's calf, and you Cherry's. Why can't we subscribe our calves to the barbecue? But pa wouldn't let us."

"Aunt Silvy might take some of the milk that belongs to our calves."

"But, Marley, that wouldn't be fair to the calves. Oh, I can't think of any way that we can do. My heart is tired."

"Doan be uncouraged, honeys. Put on de suscription: 'James Coleman, one goose an' one cook.'"

"For to barbecue?" cried Sukey.

"Mussy, no! To cook an' wait on barbycue table. I woan haf no white folks' dinner to git to home, so you see I kin spar myself to de barbycue."

"No: pa wouldn't let you go. I heard him say, when ma asked him to send a hand to weed the garden, that Silvy could do it while we went to the barbecue. He wouldn't let you have a holiday."

"I could pay him back Christmus, when we black folks always has a week holiday,—could wuck one day outen my hol'day week."

"Weeding won't wait till Christmas. The ochre an' sweet-potato vines,—every thing will get choked by weeds."

"O Marley,"—Sukey was eager, yet doubtful,—"we could, couldn't we, Marley? Couldn't you and I weed the garden? Couldn't we get it all done before the Fourth?"

"I reckon we could," Marley said brightly.

"An' I'll he'p you, honeys."

Silvy wanted to go to that barbecue, to show her cooking skill.

"No, your work belongs to pa. At last Sukey and I have come to something that's our own. We'll take hold of the garden. We won't tell pa about it till barbecue day."

Marley was about to add eagerly to James Coleman's subscription "and a cook," but a sudden lump of doubt in his throat sent him to his mother with the plan. "Would it be wrong?"

"Not to hoe the garden and give Silvy the chance of the barbecue; but it isn't right to give, without his knowledge, your pa's written promise to furnish anything. But I'll put my name down for a cook if you'll truly weed the garden."

"Yes, ma; and for five pound-cakes, please, ma."

"Well, there."

"We'll begin before breakfast."

By that meal hosts of weeds lay in dew-wet heaps. Sukey had plucked the weeds growing close to the plant-stalks, that these might not be endangered by Marley's hoe, unduly near, and that his hoe might not lose time in wary strokes. A quaint figure was Sukey, as she rebent to the weeding, her face far back in her deep sun-bonnet, pantalets hanging to the bare insteps, the small hands in half-fingered gloves, home-knit. Indeed, these were entirely home-made. The cotton had been seeded by hand instead of by gin, and then mixed with black-silk lint. With this silk lint in view, every scrap of black silk, both new and worn, was carefully saved and, in time, picked to lint. This lint carded in with cotton was hand-spun into a fine gray thread, of which a soft, pretty glove was knit.

Marley worked under a large straw hat, whose crown was kept wet; and so was the bandage on his forehead. Meanwhile Aunt Silvy brought fresh water from the gum-tree spring, and peaches and slices of cold watermelon for refreshing the children. At ten o'clock Sukey brought out an umbrella, trying to shelter Marley as he hoed; but this pestered him. But she weeded in its shade, stooping, holding it with the left hand. At length they both fled to the shade, and lay in the open "passage" between the two log rooms. That evening they worked as long as they could distinguish weeds from plants. The second and third days were like the first.

"To-morrow's the Fourth. The cabbage patch isn't weeded. I am as lame as if I had been put on the biscuit-block and pounded with the rolling-pin."

Little sister was too weary to reply. She would have relinquished the patriotic opportunity, had Marley hinted at capitulation. But he said with the death-in-the-ditch manner,—

"I've got to fetch those weeds before breakfast in the morning."

When he waked, breakfast was ready. He was appalled at finding himself belated.

"There isn't any use. I can't finish that cabbage square, and Aunt Silvy can't go to the barbecue. We can't any more than get ourselves ready. Why didn't you wake earlier, Sukey?"

"I is goin', sho's you bawn." Aunt Silvy's face was shining. "De gauden's all finish, clean's dis flo'."

"Aunt Silvy, if you,"—

"I nebber done it. You chilluns ought er be shame yerselves, callin' you' pa stingy. I hearn him tellin' you' maw he's sorry fer dem poo' chilluns, an' he'd finish de weedin'."

There was another trial of the children's pride. They had to ride to the barbecue double, behind the father and the mother. They were glad to be early in the hickory grove. They found dug a long, deep ditch, in which men were kindling fires, laying on great hickory logs with a view to getting clear barbecuing coals. Marley and Sukey walked the length of the long tables, trying to reckon the probabilities of there being room for them. They witnessed nearly every arrival, and could have told a year after how each one came,—in stately coach or lumber-wagon, on horseback or by foot.

Duly, they found mates and social pleasures and woodsy enjoyments, making returns to the centre of movement to note the dying of the hickory logs into clear, clean coals that floored the ditch with fire. They were fascinated in watching the men suspend, by cross-poles, over the glowing coals the huge roasts, loins of beef, legs of mutton, quarters of steers, halves of shoats, turkeys, and the one goose. Then the sputtering and hissing of the meats and the savory odors,—it was all novel and alluring to the child fancy. It pleased Marley and Sukey to have it recognized that the busiest, the most important person on the grounds was Aunt Silvy. She watched the meats, trying them with probes, poked and stirred the coals to new efforts, engineered the shifting of the roasts to fresher fire. She saw to it that the drinking-water was renewed, baked corn-dodgers, and duly had dozens of coffee-pots breathing out fragrance. Finally, she sliced the pound-cakes, and set plates of the golden wedges along the centre of the long table.

There was a flag. A drum and fife made music. Then a young lawyer from the Ferry gave the oration, making the most of his gestures with his head. Marley cheered as loud as he wanted to; and Sukey envied him the privilege, so patriotic and happy did she feel, though she had torn her lawn dress, riding in the brush top of a tree cut for the barbecuing coals. There was so much of the jolly dinner that, when everybody had enough, there remained mammoth pieces of the barbecued meats and turkey skeletons well padded. Nothing of the goose was left, and none of the pound-cake.

Finally, the marshal made a speech, thanking the people for turning out to honor the glorious Fourth, and for all that had been done to make the occasion a success worthy of the nation's new President, James K. Polk.

"But," he concluded, "without making invidious comparisons, I must say that no one person has contributed more to the success and enjoyment of the entertainment than has the superintendent of the cooking. The meats were done to perfection, the coffee was fit for President Polk, the pound-cake would have been a treat for the gods. I move a resolution of thanks to Mrs. James Coleman's cook, Aunt Silvy."

Seconds were shouted from all parts of the audience. The motion carried with a roar that set the hickory-trees to singing. Aunt Silvy, spreading with both hands her red oil-calico frock, dropped a deep courtesy, saying, "Thanky, master; an' thanky, Laud Jesus"; while two children soared away to a happy "new earth."

THE TRUE STORY OF A GARDEN BOX.

Kate Quiner had ten cents; and, as she never had owned even one before, the little silver piece seemed a fortune to her. She found it in the gutter where she was making mud pies.

There were other children all about. In fact, the street where little Katy lived was swarming with children that warm spring morning. "Show it to us, Katy," they begged; and "O Katy, come and spend it at the shop!"

But Katy was firm. "None of yez can see it, an' I won't spend it till I shows it to Miss Marg'et at the kindergarten," she declared; and off she ran, holding the precious money tight in her dirty little hand.

Pretty Miss Margaret was all ready to say good-morning when the children reached the kindergarten; and Katy poured out the whole story of her good fortune before she even took off her hat.

"An' shure, Miss Marg'et dear, me mother would ruther yer'd tell me how to spend it. Me mother's a scrub lady, yer know, an' she says the quarters is hard to get; but she thinks you's an illegant lady, an' yer knows the best thing, shure."

When all the children had sung good-morning to the new day, and the sunshine, and had thanked the Father in heaven for all his care, Miss Margaret took up the ten-cent piece again.

"Where did it come from, children?" she asked; and step by step they traced it back from the gutter where Katy found it to the big mine from which the silver first came....

"Have yer thought, Miss Marg'et?" asked Katy's eager little voice at noon.

"Yes, Katy. I know something very nice for you to buy. Can you guess what it is?"

"Candy? peanuts? a pianner? a watch? a dolly?"

"No, something better than any of those. How should you like a garden of your very own?"

"A garding! oh! oh! But I ain't got no garding, Miss Marg'et, not even a yard. We lives way up lots of stairs, we do."

"I know it, Katy," replied Miss Margaret; "but, if I had a box of nice earth put outside your window, should you like to spend your money for seeds to plant there?"

Katy loved flowers dearly, and hard-working Mrs. Quiner was delighted at the thought of having a bit of green near her room. "Shure, it'll seem like home," she said. "Didn't I used to pick the flowers by the handful when I was a child? and now it's years since I've had a bit of a sprig to call me own."

Every one in the house was interested; and, when the big box of earth came, willing hands helped lift it up the steep stairs, and a crowd watched the workman as he hammered and screwed until the box was really fastened in its place.

Kindergarten seemed very long to Katy the next day; and she could hardly wait for Miss Margaret to lock the school-room door, she was in such a hurry to spend her precious money.

Surely, ten cents never went so far before. Miss Margaret told the florist the story of the little garden; and, besides seeds of various kinds, he gave Katy a red geranium in full bloom, and a tiny rosebush with two buds. Then Miss Margaret went home with Katy to the little room where the box was waiting for them, and they planted seeds and set out the plants. A little boy who lived on the floor below brought water for them all the way up the four long flights of stairs, and felt repaid when he was allowed to plant some seeds and have a long, long smell of the geranium.

I do not think any little window garden ever did as well as Katy's. Perhaps it was because she took such good care of it, never forgetting to water it and pull up the weeds. Whatever the reason was, by the end of June the little garden was very beautiful. Strings were carried from the box to the neighboring windows, and morning glories and nasturtiums were climbing over them in every direction, mounting high enough to peep in at the little lame girl who lived on the floor above. The box itself was full to overflowing; for, besides her geranium and rosebush, Katy has pansies, mignonette, and pink and white daisies.

Miss Margaret told Katy not to be afraid to pick her flowers, for they would bloom all the better if the blossoms were taken off. So she used to take little bunches, or sometimes a single flower, to her friends.

The flowers helped many people that summer. Old faces grew soft and gentle at the sight and smell of the sweet blossoms, and there were fewer angry looks and cross words among the children. Katy, who was a little sunbeam herself, utterly refused to give her flowers to any one with a scowling face. "If yer ain't pleasant, I can't give yer a flower," she would say sadly; "for yer'd likely forget it or break it, an' flowers' feelin's hurt easy!"

But perhaps the greatest change was in Katy and her mother. When the plants began to grow, Mrs. Quiner found that she could see them better if the window was clean; and, when that was washed, the other looked so badly that it had to be scrubbed, too. Then so many visitors came up to see the garden that the room began to look more tidy. At last, one day, when there was no work to be done away from home, Mrs. Quiner swept and dusted and scrubbed until everything was as neat as could be.

When all was in order, our Katy looked about with delight. "We'll keep it so, won't we, mother?" she said. "An' I'll keep myself clean, too! Me hands has been clean because the flowers was too sweet to be touched when they was dirty, but now I'll be clean all over!"

"That ye shall, me darlint," cried her mother; "an' I'll wash the bits of clothes of yer, too, att'er ye're safe in bed, an' then yer'll be fine an' clane in the mornin'."

It was all done as they had planned; and that clean little room was such an example to the neighbors that little by little other rooms became more tidy, and faces and clothing cleaner. Best of all, kinder words were spoken, and a greater love for one another began to show itself.

The garden bloomed all summer; and, when the cold nights came, the plants were potted for the winter, and the box was taken down to wait for another spring.

At last the days grew warm once more; and then, instead of one, there were ever so many little window gardens in the neighborhood, and Katy's ten cents helped to start them all. She had so many more seeds and slips of plants than she needed that she gave away a great many; and in boxes and bottles and old pans the bright little plants grew and blossomed, helping little children and old people, too, in that hot, dirty street to be happier and better.

All this happened several years ago, and Katy has grown now to be quite a big girl. She and her mother have been able to move out of the city into the country, and are very happy in their new home; and Katy says that all their good fortune has come to them from "Miss Margaret's garden-box."—The Churchman.

AFTER THE RAIN.

Dropping the hollyhocks beneath the wall,
Their fires half-quenched, a smouldering red;
A shred of gold upon the grasses tall,
A butterfly is hanging dead.

A sound of trickling waters, like a tune
Set to sweet words, a wind that blows
Wet boughs against a saffron sky; all June Caught in the breath of one white rose.

—Lizette Woodworth Reese.

WHAT PUZZLED MARGERY.

This is Margery's first year in school, and she is greatly interested in everything that occurs. One morning recently she came home at noon greatly excited. "Oh mamma," she said, "what do you think? Our teacher stopped right in the middle of a music lesson, and asked us how many turnips there are in a bushel. We just couldn't understand what that had to do with our music."

Mamma couldn't understand it, either; and, the more positive Margery grew about the matter, the more her mamma felt she must be mistaken. Finally, to satisfy her own mind, one morning when she met the teacher, Margery's mamma asked her what she had meant by asking the children how many turnips there were in a bushel, during a music lesson.

The teacher, too, was just as puzzled as Margery had been.

"Why, surely, I didn't ask such a question as that," she said. Then, after thinking a moment, she exclaimed, laughing,—

"Why, I asked the children how many beats there were in a measure!"

Margery's bright mind had done the rest. Youth's Companion.

A STORY OF A SHOEMAKER.

Gibraltar, you know, is in Spain, but Spain has only of late years been permitted to possess an open Bible; for prior to 1868 it was almost an unknown book among the people, its circulation being forbidden by the authorities. During those dark times a Presbyterian minister, from Scotland, went for his health to Gibraltar, where, though in Spain, being under British rule, the Bible society had a depot. While sojourning there for a considerable time, the good man used frequently to put some copies of God's word into his pockets, and, crossing over into Spanish territory, would circulate them among the people, who received them joyfully.

On one of these excursions he visited the house of a shoemaker, with whom he had an interesting conversation, from which he found that the Spaniard had a meeting at his house every week to talk over public affairs and the state of the country. As the shoemaker, however, confessed that these discussions had never yielded much profit, his visitor said, "You should get the Bible, and read that: it would do you more good." "Ah," was the reply, "I wish I could get it; but our priests won't let us have the Bible." Great was his joy when one was presented to him, with the intimation that, if his friends would like copies, on his coming to a certain house in Gibraltar a further supply could be obtained.

A few weeks afterward, a Spaniard, in his holiday dress, knocked at the door where the minister was staying, and, asking earnestly to see him, was shown into his room. He soon made himself known as the shoemaker who had received the Bible, stated that it was regularly read at the weekly meetings, and that his friends were so anxious to have copies he had come to beg a further supply. His request was readily granted, on which he pulled from under his arm a parcel, and said: "I have brought you a little mark of my gratitude, which I hope you will accept. I have made and brought you a pair of shoes." "It is very kind of you," said the good minister; "but I fear the shoes may not fit, and so will not be of use to me." "Try them, sir," said the other; "for I think you will find them just your size."

The trial was made, the shoes were found an excellent fit; and, on the maker being asked how he had guessed the size so exactly, he replied: "I knew after you left my house you had to pass over some soft clay. So I followed you, and from your footprints I took the size of your foot; and I was then able to make you the shoes, which I resolved to bring you. I hope you will wear them as a mark of gratitude from a poor Spanish shoemaker for the precious book you brought him."—Gleanings for the Young.

AN ORIENTAL STORY.

An Eastern king was once in need of a faithful servant and friend. He gave notice that he wanted a man to do a day's work, and two men came and asked to be employed. He engaged them both for certain fixed wages, and set them to work to fill a basket with water from a neighboring well, saying he would come in the evening and see their work. He then left them to themselves, and went away. After putting in one or two bucketfuls, one of the men said:—

"What is the good of doing this useless work? As soon as we put the water in on one side, it runs out on the other."

The other man answered:—

"But we have our day's wages, haven't we? The use of the work is the master's business, not ours."

"I am not going to do such fool's work," replied the other; and, throwing down his bucket, he went away.

The other man continued his work till about sunset he exhausted the well. Looking down into it, he saw something shining at the bottom. He let down his bucket once more, and drew up a precious diamond ring.

"Now I see the use of pouring water into a basket," he exclaimed to himself. "If the bucket had brought up the ring before the well was dry, it would have been found in the basket. The labor was not useless, after all."

But he had yet to learn why the king had ordered this apparently useless task. It was to test their capacity for perfect obedience, without which no servant is reliable.

At this moment the king came up to him; and, as he bade the man keep the ring, he said:—

"Thou hast been faithful in a little thing: now I see I can trust thee in great things. Henceforward thou shalt stand at my hand."—The Sunday Hour.

The bells of Westminster Abbey chime hourly a sweet simple melody. Every one does not know the words allied to the tune. They are:—

"All through this hour,
Lord, be my guide;
And through thy power
No foot shall slide."—Exchange.

NONE SUCH MINCE MEAT is particularly valuable in the summer because it is always fresh and sweet.

It is unexcelled for the home, the camp, seaside
or mountains.
Sold everywhere.
Merrell-Soule Co.,
Syracuse, N. Y.

"A HANDFUL OF DIRT MAY BE A HOUSEFUL OF SHAME." CLEAN HOUSE WITH

SAPOLIO

Save

the Babies

Protect their little lives from the ravages of Cholera Infantum by giving them proper and sufficient nourishment. The dreaded diseases of children which come with hot weather are unknown when is used. Add a few drops to baby's milk. Thousands of eminent physicians are continually recommending it for this purpose.

Bovinine

A. P. BUSH, 149 Pearl St.

Education.

The oldest high-class educational magazine in the country ($3 per year) is read by thoughtful people of all classes, as well as educators. It ought to be in every Library and Reading-room in the land. Is it in yours? From a new subscriber we will accept $2 for the first year. Send 12 cents (in stamps) for a sample copy.

Nova Scotia Tours. The associate editor of Education offers again this year several delightful personally conducted tours to Evangeline's land. Select companies of cultured people. No heat, romantic scenery. An ideal vacation. First party, June 25. Shad, salmon, and strawberries in their prime. Expenses low. Write for particulars.

KASSON & PALMER,

50 Bromfield Street, Boston, Mass.

Mr. HALE'S SCHOOL 86 BEACON ST., BOSTON.

The 13th year will begin September 25. Preparation for Harvard College and the Institute of Technology. Full Classical and Scientific Courses. Primary department for young boys nine or ten years of age. Fine situation, directly opposite the Public Garden. Large, sunny, high-studded rooms, open fireplaces, gymnasium, extensive laboratories, covered fire-escape, lunch-room. Teachers: ALBERT HALE (Harv.), E. D. MARSH (Harv.), E. K. STEVENS (Harv.), C. S. STREET, Amherst, Address ALBERT HALE.

West Newton English and Classical School.

ALLEN BROTHERS.

Family School. Both Sexes. Unsectarian. Prepares for College, Scientific Schools, Business, and for a useful life. Forty-third year begins Wednesday, September 18. Catalogue of ALLEN BROTHERS, WEST NEWTON, MASS.

PROSPECT HILL SCHOOL FOR YOUNG LADIES, GREENFIELD, MASS.

Twenty-fifth Year. Reference, Rev. E. E. Hale, D.D. Rev. JAMES C. PARSONS, Principal.

THE MORGAN SCHOOL, PORTSMOUTH, N.H.

This Home and Day School for Girls will reopen September 25 for its second year under the new management. College, Preparatory, and Finishing Courses. Address for circular Miss GEORGIANA S. WOODBURY, Principal.

Mr. Knapp's Home School for Boys, PLYMOUTH, MASS.

Powder Point School (DUXBURY, MASS.). These schools have always had the same interests, and will now be united at Duxbury, the Plymouth school closing with the present term.

PROCTOR ACADEMY, Andover, N.H.

For both sexes. Healthful location. Liberal management. Expenses low. Prepares for college or for teaching, etc. For catalogue, address JAMES F. MORTON, A.M., Principal.

MAGNOLIA TERRACE Springfield, Mass.

Home and Day School for Girls. JOHN McDUFFIE, Ph.D.

NEWTON CENTRE, MASS.

SCHOOL FOR THE CORRECTION OF ALL SPEECH DEFECTS. For circular address E. J. E. THORPE, Principal.

MISS KIMBALL'S SCHOOL FOR GIRLS, Worcester, Mass.

Thorough preparation for College. Intermediate, Academic, and Special Courses. Send for Illustrated Circular.

Miss Gibbons' School for Girls.

Preparation for all colleges. 55 West 47th St., N.Y. Mrs. SARAH H. EMERSON, Principal. October 2. A few boarding pupils taken.

HOME SCHOOL FOR BOYS

In the family of Rev. Eugene De Normandie, Danvers, Mass. Address HENRY N. DE NORMANDIE.

THE HIGHLAND MILITARY ACADEMY.

WORCESTER, MASS., begins 40th year September 11. Classical, Scientific, Business, Preparatory Departments. Gymnasium. Athletics encouraged. Careful training. Home influences. JOSEPH ALDEN SHAW, A.M., Head Master.

Boston, 10 Ashburton Place.

BOSTON UNIVERSITY Law School.

Fall term opens Wednesday, October 2. For circulars address EDMUND H. BENNETT, Dean.

SUMMER REST.

The "OLD MANSE," Amherst, N.H. Large, elegant rooms, luxurious bed and board. Pianos, library. Near post-office. Register and Transcript at hand. Circulars. E. A. SAWTELLE, Proprietor.

VACATION FOR BOYS.—Mr. and Mrs. John McDuffie receive at seashore home four boys between twelve and fifteen, July and August. Lessons in school studies, also in rowing, sailing, etc., if desired. JOHN McDUFFIE (Harv.), MAGNOLIA TERRACE SCHOOL, SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

JUNE.

June with sunshine in her eyes
Passed her hand across the skies,
Then, with archly smiling lips,
Blew upon her finger-tips.
Soon the air grew wondrous sweet.
Overhead and under feet,
Under feet and overhead,
Trooped the roses, white and red;
Trooped the roses—crimson, white,
Pink and yellow, pale and bright—
Till they perfumed earth and air,
Roses, roses, everywhere.
Wearied then, she shook her head;
And the petals, white and red,
All the petals—crimson, white,
Pink and yellow, pale and bright—
Fluttered slowly, softly down
To the border of her gown.
Half dismayed to see them fall,
Quick she turned to leave them all.
Looking back to say good-by,
She met the glance of warm July.

—Anna J. Granniss, in the Congregationalist.

THE MOLLUSCA.

We imagine that few persons have heard that the mollusca are, in some cases, capable of producing musical sounds. Yet in Ceylon there is a lake species which produces sounds "like the gentle thrills of a musical chord, or the faint vibrations of a wine-glass when its rim is rubbed by a moistened finger,"—an excellent way of accounting for the songs of the sirens. But others disbelieve in the mollusk theory, and hold that the music is produced by a certain fish. A striking instance of the musical powers of the mollusca is quoted in a work on mollusca by Rev. A. H. Cooke: "When up the mountains of Oahu, I heard the grandest, but wildest music, as from hundreds of Æolian harps, wafted to me on the breezes; and my companion (a native) said it came from, as he called them, the singing shells. It was sublime. I could not believe it, but a tree close at hand proved it. On it were many of the achatinella, the animals drawing after them their shells, which grated against the wood, and so produced a sound. The multitude of sounds produced the fanciful music."

The mollusca are, with few exceptions, provided with ears, so that the appreciation of sound is certain, though there are no experiments to tell us what sort of sounds they prefer. In powers of vision, too, the snails and their kind are far from being deficient. The two black eyes of the snail on their inquisitive horns are familiar to everybody. The scallop shell, which is a lower type than the snail, being a simple, headless form, has quantities of beautifully iridescent eyes of varying tints upon the edges of the mantle. There are rudiments of these even in the dull oyster, so that Mark Twain's contempt of the oyster's probable appreciation of scenery loses some point. But these animals, all of them, are very short-sighted. There is nothing to be alleged against the perfection of their eyes as organs of vision; but they do not seem, all the same, to be particularly effective. A little mollusk, whose name is Onchidium, has developed in certain districts a huge number of eyelets upon its broad back. In the places where the Onchidia can see there also exists in the same localities a fish with a longer name still, Periophthalmus. This fish, instead of disporting itself in the sea, prefers the dry land, at any rate the margin of the shore. It hops along, looking about it with a pair of goggle eyes on the top of its head. The great object in life of the Periophthalmus is to catch as many Onchidiums as possible; and, conversely, the great object of the Onchidium is not to be caught. Each has some advantage, so that they are fairly balanced. The peaceful mollusk moves but slowly. It has, however, the innumerable eyes already spoken of, which enable it to command the neighborhood. When the shadow from the hopping Periophthalmus falls upon it, it proceeds to squirt out from certain glands in the skin little pellets of secretion, which rain round the fish, and tend to deter it from advancing further. That the eyes really have this use seems to be shown from the eyeless condition of other species of this mollusk which live where there are no Periophthalmus. That, at any rate, is the opinion of many. Other mollusks escape their foes by their resemblance to inanimate surroundings,—a small kind of limpet, which, when young, has an iridescent hue which matches well with the similar hues of the leaves of the great Laminaria, upon which seaweed it makes its home. When the mollusk is older, it loses the brilliant tints of youth, and moves down to the stem and the roots of the seaweed, where it is still inconspicuous. This almost looks like intelligence on the part of the mollusk. Another mollusk is so wise as to live invariably upon colonies of the creature known as "dead men's fingers," to the polyps of which it bears a close likeness in color. In any other situation it would be obvious, and an easy prey for aggressive fish or crustacea. There are other means for defying enemies which are possessed by certain mollusca. In the Philippine Islands a few land forms have the power of casting off at a moment's notice the end of the foot, precisely that part of the body most likely to be first grabbed by a bird. Unlike the fox in the fable, the mollusk would soon repair the damage. One Fulvius Hirpinus was the introducer of the snail as an article of food. He instituted snaileries, which were surrounded with a ditch to prevent the animals from crawling away too far and getting lost, and fattened his herds with meal and wine. The employment of shells as money is widely spread. A gentleman in India built himself a house at the cost of about £400, which was paid for entirely in shells, the number of cowries representing this sum being sixteen million. But the cowrie is not by any means the only shell used as a medium of exchange. In some parts of Scotland shells were lately used as receipt forms. When a bargain was made, each party to the transaction got one-half of a bivalve shell, such as mussel, cockle, or oyster; and, when the bargain was implemented, the half that fitted exactly was delivered up as a receipt.—London Chronicle.

BOYS IN CHINA.

A boy indulges in many games from which his sister is restrained both by her bound feet and general sentiment. The women and girls often gather in their doorways on summer evenings to watch the boys at their games,—wrestling, walking on stilts, ball-playing, kite-flying, battledore and shuttlecock, etc. But the Chinese boy never engages in his sports with the zest of a Westerner; and after he enters school his teachers discourage games as undignified.

The poor boy is sent out on the hills to gather grass and sticks for fuel or is apprenticed to a trade. If he is a farmer's boy, he finds plenty to do about his father's farm; and his life contains very little playtime. He does not work as hard as the Western boy.

Every family that can afford it sends one or more boys to school at six or seven years of age, and from the time of entering school the pupil is a being set apart from his less favored brothers. He at once becomes a gentleman. He is not expected to engage in any manual labor or help about the home any more; and if, after many years of schooling, he is unable to get an official position or a place as a teacher, he will sponge on his relatives and friends, or send out his wife to beg or starve, rather than work with his hands. If the boy is bright and industrious, he may rise to any position of power and wealth which is within the Chinese civil service. Educated men and pure women are the Chinaman's ideals for his sons and daughters.—Mrs. George S. Hays, in the Sunday School Times.

OLIVES IN MENTONE.

The growth of the olive-tree is very slow. The seed will not germinate until two years after planting, and the tree is fifty years in coming into bearing. The Tuscans have a saying, "Plant a vineyard for yourself, an orange grove for your children, and an olive orchard for your grandchildren."

The olive blossoms in the neighborhood of Mentone in April, and has small white flowers with thick, waxy petals. The most beautiful period of the groves is when the young olives are ripening, the trees then being laden with plum-shaped fruit varying in color from bright green to bluish-purple and dark red.

Picking begins in October, before the fruit is fairly ripe, and is the occasion of much innocent mirth and jollity. Both sexes and all ages engage in it. Some of the trees are shaken; but most of the fruit is picked, since thus it is less liable to be bruised and broken.

From the orchards the olives are carried to large dry-rooms, where they are stored until a quantity sufficient for pressing has been gathered. Then they are carried to the mills, which may be seen in the ravines about Mentone, driven by the torrents which come foaming down from the mountains in all directions.

These mills, with their huge water-wheels rising sometimes tier above tier, form picturesque features of the landscape. The most notable of these, in the valley of the Carrei, have four stages of water-wheels.

The olives are reduced to pulp by being passed through a grater much like that of a cider-mill, and the mass is put into hempen baskets constructed for the purpose. These, to the number of ten or twelve, are piled up together, and pressure applied.

The oil thus extracted is of the best quality, "virgin oil." Upon the refuse, called marc, boiling water is poured, pressure again applied, and oil of the second quality is produced. The refuse is then permitted to undergo a short fermentation, and is again pressed after being treated with boiling water, yielding an inferior fatty oil called huile de rehouse.

But the thrifty peasants are not yet done with it. The residue is put into a series of brick or stone troughs, filled with water, and beaten with poles. The oil rising to the surface is skimmed off. The mass is next put into caldrons and boiled, and, being again placed in the presses, yields the second huile de rehouse, which is mixed with the first, and used in the arts, principally for soap-making.—Exchange.

CHILDREN'S MISTAKES WITH WORDS.

Mr. James Payne tells us that he knew a boy who for years substituted for the words "Hallowed be thy name" "Harold be thy name." In this and similar cases it is not, as might be supposed, defective hearing. Children hear words, as a rule, with great exactness. It is the impulse to give a familiar and significant rendering to what is strange and meaningless. A friend of mine could recall that, when a boy, he was accustomed, on hearing the passage, "If I say peradventure the darkness," etc., to insert a pause after "peradventure," apprehending the passage in this wise: "If I say 'Peradventure!' the darkness is." In this way he turned the mysterious "peradventure" into a mystic "Open Sesame," and added a fine touch of romantic color to the passage. My friend's daughter tells me that, on hearing the passage, "shewing his mercy unto the thousands, and visiting the sins of the fathers to the third and fourth generation," she construed the strange word "generation" to mean an immense number, like billions, and was thus led to trouble herself about God's seeming to be more cruel than kind. In some cases, too, where the language is simple enough, a child's brain will find our meaning unsuitable, and follow a line of interpretation of its own. Mr. Canton relates that his little girl, who knew the lines in "Strumpelpeter,—

"The doctor came and shook his head,
And gave him nasty physic, too,"— was told that she would catch a cold, and that she at once replied, "And will the doctor come and shook my head?" It was so much more natural to suppose that, when the doctor came and did something, this was done on the person of the patient.—Prof. James Sully, in the Popular Science Monthly.

Walter Baker & Co. Limited,

The Largest Manufacturers of
PURE, HIGH GRADE
COCOAS and CHOCOLATES

On this Continent, have received
HIGHEST AWARDS
from the great

Industrial and Food
EXPOSITIONS
IN EUROPE AND AMERICA.

Caution: In view of the many imitations of the labels and wrappers on our goods, consumers should make sure that our place of manufacture, namely, Dorchester, Mass. is printed on each package.

SOLD BY GROCERS EVERYWHERE.

WALTER BAKER & CO. LTD. DORCHESTER, MASS.

Look Carefully

when buying silver polish either at the store or your own door; see that the full name

SILVER
ELECTRO-SILICON
POLISH

is on the box and also the figure of a woman cleaning silver, printed IN RED. None other is genuine.

We do not employ
Peddlers or agents.

If in doubt send to us for trial quantity.

THE ELECTRO SILICON CO., 72 John St., New York.

THE UNITARIAN

The "Unitarian" unites

many opinions, many suggestions, many individual methods in one spirit, the spirit of Jesus, love to God and love to man.

CONTENTS FOR JULY.

The Water-lilies. Maud L. Cotton.
"Good News of God." Rev. Douglas Walmsley.
Man a Factor in Evolution. John M. Scott.
Resignation. Herbert H. Yeames.
A Confessional. I. Ursula Tannenforst.
Reasons for spreading Unitarianism. W. G. E.
American Unitarian Association.
The Anniversaries.
In the Pulpit.
The Pansy's Lesson. Clara K. Daly.
What Birthdays teach. J. T. Sunderland.
True Liberty. H. Hayes Robbins.
Types of the Spirit. W. M. Bicknell.
A Hymn. C. A. Rohrabacher.
What would You Do?
One Upward Look Each Day.
Editorial.

DEPARTMENTS:

American Unitarian Association, George Batchelor;
Sunday-schools, Edward A. Horton; National Alliance of Unitarian Women, Emily A. Fifield;
Guilds, B. R. Bulkeley; Temperance Work, C. E.
Eliot; Literary Notes.

Children's Corner.

NEWS FROM THE FIELD.

*Terms, $1.00 a year. Sample copies free. Will be sent three months on trial for 10 cents.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher, 141 Franklin St., Boston.

Topics of To-day.

Essays and Lectures on Important Themes.

1. HERBERT SPENCER: His life and personal characteristics; his views on education; his religious opinions. By DANIEL GREENLEAF THOMPSON.
2. CHARLES ROBERT DARWIN: His ancestry, life, and personal characteristics. By REV. JOHN W. CHADWICK.
3. SOLAR AND PLANETARY EVOLUTION: How suns and worlds come into being. By GARRETT P. SERVISS.
4. EVOLUTION OF THE EARTH: The story of geology; how the world grew. By DR. LEWIS G. JONES.
5. EVOLUTION OF VEGETAL LIFE: How does life begin? By WILLIAM POTTS.
6. EVOLUTION OF ANIMAL LIFE: The evidences from geology, geographical distribution, and comparative zoology. By ROSSITER W. RAYMOND, Ph.D.
7. THE DESCENT OF MAN: Man and the brute creation; his ancestral line; duration of human life on the planet. By E. D. COPE, Ph.D.
8. EVOLUTION OF MIND: The mind and the nervous system; the nature of mind. By ROBERT G. ECCLES, M.D.
9. EVOLUTION OF SOCIETY: Primitive man; growth of the family, city, and State; development of the domestic relations; is society an organism? By JAMES A. SKILLTON, Esq.
10. EVOLUTION OF THEOLOGY: Origin of religious beliefs; ancestor-worship; nature-worship; the Absolute. By Z. SIDNEY SAMPSON.
11. EVOLUTION OF MORALS: How altruism grows out of egoism; the proper balance. By DR. LEWIS G. JONES.
12. PROOFS OF EVOLUTION: From geology, morphology, embryology, metamorphosis, rudimentary organs, geographical distribution, etc. By NELSON C. PARSHALL.
13. EVOLUTION AS RELATED TO RELIGIOUS THOUGHT: The Unknowable; design; miracle. By REV. JOHN W. CHADWICK.

Pamphlets, 34 numbers, 16 to 32 pages each, some of them illustrated.

Ten Cents Each.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Situation Wanted

By a young man 18 years old (graduate of Bryant & Stratton's) in some business where faithfulness and application will count for future advancement. Address H. A. E., Office Christian Register.

Spirit of the Press.

The papers are getting more and more roused on the subject of lynching. The Episcopal Recorder of Philadelphia says:—

The lynchings which have occurred in Illinois and Maryland are a disgrace to the whole country. It makes no difference where they occur, the whole body suffers. The only difference between North and South is that in the former section public sentiment and the press universally condemn anything like mob violence. This is a most important distinction at home, but will not be recognized abroad, where the whole country will be held responsible for the outrages against which every right-minded person protests.

The London Sunday-school Chronicle has the right idea of crowding out bad reading matter by furnishing the best literature at cheap prices:—

Mr. Stead is making a brave attempt to supply the million with the masterpieces of the great English poets, and has just issued his first pennyworth. Teachers and parents should endeavor to place these cheap and valuable publications in the hands of the children under their charge. If boys and girls could be induced to read these works, they would have little desire to peruse the offscourings of literature which are now exercising such a corrupt influence on the rising generation.

The Jewish Messenger has not a high opinion of undeserved titles:—

There has been a gratifying lull in the senseless practice on the part of most American colleges of showering learned titles upon brigadier-generals and obscure clergymen. This year, however, there has been a revival; and quite a number have been added to the enormous crowd of modest theologians who are neither prophets nor apostles, but doctors of divinity. So common is the title, however, that it carries little weight any more, as it is no guarantee of scholarship. One out-of-the-way Pennsylvania college gave the degree to half a dozen ministers. Another habit, equally objectionable, is for colleges to bestow such a degree as LL.D. on the younger members of their faculty. If this habit continues, the LL.D. will share the disrepute into which the Ph.D. and the D.D. have both fallen.

The American is ready to give full credit to the earnest work of women:—

To-day, in spite of the resistance of our older institutions, women in every part of the country, outside of Philadelphia, enjoy the same facilities for education that men do. And they are embracing these opportunities with an enthusiasm their brothers seem to have lost. They show this by carrying on their studies after graduation. They are now actually in charge of the intellectual interests of most of our American communities. They form the reading circles, control and fill the literary societies, conduct and participate in the University Extension work, establish and use the free libraries, subscribe for the magazines, and in all intellectual matters take the lead of men. The ruder sex gives itself up to making money and managing politics; but, unless it mends its ways, it will be confined to the former, and women will take politics also into their control. Political power is sure to gravitate to the sex which has the largest intelligence and the heartiest interest in social questions, whether or not it is the best fitted to exercise it.

Charities and Reforms.

A very hopeful report has been made by the British Commission on the Aged Poor. The commissioners found that the number of the aged poor is decreasing in the United Kingdom. They were dealing with paupers over sixty-five years of age, and it was found that three in ten of the total population of Great Britain are compelled to apply for parish relief. This may seem a large number to Americans, but it shows an actual decrease of pauperism in Great Britain.

The Handbook of Charities, compiled by John Visser, and issued with the indorsement of the Illinois Conference of Charities, contains authoritative data about all the philanthropic organizations of Chicago. It is a guide and directory, besides giving interesting information about methods and means that have been found available in that city. The Bureau of Labor and Transportation is carrying on the work begun a year ago, under the auspices of the Civic Federation, transplanting unemployed or poorly employed individuals and families from congested centres of population into agricultural districts. The work of compiling the handbook has been well done, and it was a work well worth doing.

THE SOUTH END VACATION SCHOOL.—The committee have deemed it best not to reopen this school, which has not been in session the past two years. Industrial schools are taking some of the older children, and the sand garden in the yard of the Wait School-house provides health and amusement for the younger ones. The kindergarten articles—sewing materials, slates, pencils, etc.—belonging to the vacation school the committee would gladly give to any school in need of them or to any individual desirous of starting a vacation school. If the friends who so generously aided in the support of the Wait Vacation School would kindly continue such aid for the benefit of the little ones in the Wait sand garden, their contributions would be gratefully received, acknowledged, and appropriated to that object by the former treasurer of the Wait Vacation School, Mrs. J. W. Andrews, 36 Rutland Square.

Personals.

At a meeting of the ministers of Salem, held for the purpose June 22, a committee, including both Protestant and Catholic clergymen, was appointed to draft a resolution with reference to the death of Rev. Edmund B. Willson. The following was prepared by the committee:—

“Resolved, That we give expression to our esteem and affection for one who, by his unflinching fidelity, courage, and charity, so well exemplified the true spirit of the Christian ministry, and did so much throughout his extended service to uplift and sweeten and bless the life of this community. May we all imbibe his gentle spirit, and be the better that he has lived among us!”

Mrs. Julia A. Carney wrote the jingle beginning, “Little drops of water, little grains of sand,” when a teacher in a Boston primary school, and while penning a simple article for her little ones on the value of moments.

KINDERGARTEN FOR THE BLIND.

The following additional contributions to the Kindergarten for the Blind have been received from date of April 20 to June 18, 1895:—

ENDOWMENT FUND.
A friend.....	$100.00
A friend to the little blind children.....	100.00
A friend through M. B.....	1.00
Allen, Mrs. Hannah.....	1.00
Anonymous.....	2.00
Appleton, Mrs. William.....	1,000.00
Baker, Mrs. Richard.....	50.00
Balfour, Miss Mary D.....	10.00
Ballou, Mrs. A. M., Detroit, Mich.....	5.00
Bigelow, Mrs. Harriet A., Melrose.....	50.00
Birch, Miss H. Alida, Providence, R.I.....	5.00
Brackett, Miss Nancy, Quincy.....	25.00
Brewster, Mrs. O.....	5.00
Brewster, William.....	5.00
Brown, E. R., Dover, N.H.....	50.00
Brown, Miss Harriet T.....	20.00
Chaplin, Mrs. Adaline M., Milford.....	5.00
Children of Herbert Street Kindergarten, Salem, through Miss E. W. Sheldon.....	5.00
Clark, Mrs. Henry, Worcester.....	400.00
Charles, Mrs. Mary C., Melrose.....	25.00
Cook, Mrs. Charles T., Detroit, Mich.....	25.00
Dewey, Mrs. Arthur W., Jamaica Plain.....	100.00
Dorr, Miss C., Roxbury.....	5.00
Ellis, Geo. H., Cambridge.....	75.00
Everett, Mrs. Emily.....	25.00
Ferris, Mrs. Mortimer C., Brookline.....	100.00
Ferris, Miss Mary E., Brookline.....	50.00
First Congregational Unitarian Society, New Bedford.....	50.00
Friend R.....	5.00
From friends in West Newton through Miss Caroline S. Burrage.....	25.00
Fuller, Mrs. Caroline A., West Hingham.....	20.00
Goodrich, John.....	25.00
Grew, Mrs. Henry E.....	10.00
Hatch, Fred. W., Reading.....	5.00
H. M.....	1.25
Howland, Mrs. O. O.....	5.00
Hyde, Miss Mary E.....	2.00
Isaiah, Miss Mary V.....	15.00
Jackson, Mrs. E. S.....	2.00
Jackson, Mrs. J. B. S.....	5.00
King's Daughters, Groton.....	25.00
Knapp, George B.....	50.00
Lansdown, Mrs. Catherine M.....	20.00
Lang, Mrs. B. J.....	20.00
Lea's Hand Club of little boys, Wollaston.....	5.00
Littell, Miss S. G., Brookline.....	10.00
Lyman, Mrs. George H.....	20.00
Mary Lowell Stone Fund.....	100.00
Meredith, Mrs. J. H.....	5.00
Miss Lou Blanchard's pennies, Belmont.....	2.63
Nevins, Mrs. Alta H., Jamaica Plain.....	2.00
Nickerson, Sereno.....	10.00
Ober, Louis P.....	10.00
Parkman, George F.....	500.00
Peabody, F. H.....	100.00
Peters, Edward D.....	20.00
Philbrick, Mrs. Edward S., Brookline.....	3.00
Pickman, Mrs. W. D.....	60.00
P. K.....	50.00
Proceeds of entertainments on Patriots' Day by pupils of Perkins Institution.....	84.90
Proceeds of lecture by Mr. Black.....	100.00
Richards, Miss Annie Louise.....	25.00
Rodocanachi, J. M.....	50.00
Ross, Miss Charlotte, West Newton.....	1.00
Rust, Mrs. W. A., Cambridge.....	5.00
Lang, Mrs. B. J.....	5.00
Sabine, Dr. G. K., Brookline.....	3.00
Sabine, Miss Catherine, Brookline.....	30.00
Sampson, George.....	91.43
Sunday-school of the First Church, Boston.....	5.00
Sunday-school class in Highland Church, Roxbury, Miss Carter's.....	5.00
Sunday-school of Immanuel Church, Roxbury, primary department.....	5.00
Sunday-school of Shepard Memorial Church, Cambridge.....	18.47
Sykes, Mrs. Charles L., Scotch Plains, N.J.....	1.00
Thompson, George.....	10.00
Thompson, George.....	20.00
Thompson, Miss Olga E. Gardner.....	1.00
Wetherbee, Miss Helen F.....	25.00
White, Mrs. C. T.....	5.00
White, Miss Eliza Orne, Brookline.....	5.00
W. Mrs. H. H. B.....	2.00
Young, Miss Agnes Hill.....	35.00
	$3,979.68

FOR THE NEW BUILDING.

A friend.....	$1,000.00
Bumstead, Mrs. Freeman J., Cambridge.....	50.00
Porter, Mrs. P. G., Cambridgeport.....	1.00
Sampson, George.....	10.00
	$1,061.00

P. T. JACKSON, Treasurer pro tem.,
53 State Street (Room 840).

Education.

The July meeting of the National Educational Association at Denver is sure to be a notable success. The preparations are on a most liberal scale.

Adelbert College of Western Reserve University is to begin at once the erection of a new library building, the gift of Mr. H. R. Hatch of Cleveland. It will have capacity for about one hundred and twenty-five thousand volumes, besides large spaces for reading and study rooms. It will be built of stone.

President Jordan of Leland Stanford University feels sure of keeping the university open through 1895, at least, in spite of the fact that the government has sued the Stanford estate for $15,000,000, and pending settlement all funds are locked up. It would be a great calamity if this noble young institution, with some seventy instructors and about one thousand students, should be even temporarily crippled.

A Calcutta paper, speaking of the overworking of students, especially at the time of graduation, says: “Last year we had the misfortune to see three of our most brilliant graduates carried off before they could receive their diplomas. The university examinations this year came to a close only three or four days ago, and we now hear of one or two rather serious cases among those who appeared at them. The number of those who will suffer from sleeplessness, headache, dyspepsia, and other ailments, for months together, will remain undetermined. Shall this state of things be allowed to continue, or shall we not rather set about remedying the evil at once?”

Send for our Catalogue of Rattan Furniture, 96 pages, enclosing three 2-cent stamps for postage.

Paine Furniture Co.,
48 Canal Street.

Social Topics.

Social Equilibrium, and Other Problems, Ethical and Religious. By Rev. GEORGE BATCHELOR. 286 pages. Cloth, $1.50.

The capacity for broad sight, the calmness of the judicial mind, the earnestness of the prophet, the sympathy of the humanitarian, ought certainly, when combined, to produce something of value in the way of the solution of tangled problems, whether social or religious. In this book we find manifested this broad sight, this calmness, this earnestness, and this sympathy; and in their product we are not disappointed, but inspired and helped.

SOME OF THE TOPICS:
Social Equilibrium; The Revolt of the Majority; The Future of the Minority; Religion its own Evidence; Righteousness its own Law; Free Thought; Heredity and Education; Heredity and Tradition in Morals; Ethics and Happiness; The Natural Meaning of the Word "Ought"; The Natural History of the Moral Ideal and the Law of Progress; Is it Religion vs. Righteousness?

Problems in American Society. By JOSEPH HENRY CROOKER. [Some Social Studies.] 294 pages. Cloth, $1.25.

I. The Student in American Life; II. Scientific Charity; III. The Root of the Temperance Problem; IV. The Political Conscience; V. Moral and Religious Instruction in our Public Schools; VI. The Religious Destitution of Villages.

“Out of all the confusion of current theory, fanatical bitterness and shallow arrogance, comes now and then a calm and considerate work, treating burning questions with catholic liberality, really helpful to the seeker for wisdom, and giving hint of the survival we shall find when all this clamor and fermentation is over. Such a work is ‘Problems in American Society.’”—Detroit Free Press.

Social Problems. By M. J. SAVAGE. 189 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

Preliminary: Religion for this World; The Social Dream; Social Beginnings; Social Achievement; Social Barriers; The Rise of the Individual; Socialism; Social Responsibility; What is at Present Possible? Common School Education; Poverty, Personal and National; The Diminution of Evils.

Man, Woman and Child. By M. J. SAVAGE. 200 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

CONTENTS: The Man; The Woman; The Evolution of Marriage; Marriage To-day; The Child; The Home; Society; Celibacy; Divorce; Woman's Sphere; Careers for our Daughters; The Transfiguration of Humanity.

The Duties of Women. A Course of Lectures. By FRANCES POWER COBBE. 193 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

“The profoundest, wisest, purest, noblest book in principle, aim, and tone yet written upon the true position of woman in society.”

How we made a Nine-cent Dinner. Explained in Full, with some other Economies. By Mrs. E. S. TURNER, the New Century Cooking School of Philadelphia. Paper, 10 cts.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

WIND CHAIRS.

Every Rattan manufacturer in this country issues a different catalogue of furniture. We take all these catalogues, and select the gems from each collection, having regard to the essential points of comfort, sound construction, and low cost.

Our stock is thus composed of the most popular pieces of the whole country. It is such a stock as cannot be found at any one or any three rattan warerooms, for it is chosen from many sources.

In some cases we are enabled through our extensive dealings to effect a valuable saving in the prices ordinarily charged. In no case is it ever possible to buy rattan furniture cheaper than the low prices at which we sell it.

In our large stock may be found the many odd and interesting uniques which are usually hard to find. We devote three times as much space to Rattan and Willow as any other furniture house.

Register Tract Series.

- No. 1. MY NEW NEIGHBOR. By Rev. W. H. Lyon. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 2. THE CONGREGATIONAL METHOD: How it is worked and how it ought to be worked. By Rev. Charles F. Dole. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 3. BEHOLD THE MAN. By Rev. W. P. Tilden. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 4. PRACTICAL CHRISTIANITY. By Rev. Charles A. Allen. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 5. AMERICAN UNITARIANISM: Its History and Development. By Rev. Edward Everett Hale. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 6. CHURCH ORGANIZATION. By Rev. William I. Lawrence. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 7. OF MAKING ONE'S SELF BEAUTIFUL. By Rev. William C. Gannett. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 8. THE JUDGMENT: The True Doctrine of the Judgment Individual and Universal. By Rev. William R. Alger. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 9. THE BREATH OF LIFE. By Rev. H. M. Simmons. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 10. WHAT DOES THE UNITARIANISM OF TO-DAY STAND FOR? By Rev. W. P. Tilden. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 11. LIBERAL CHRISTIANITY AS MOTIVE-POWER. By Rev. E. A. Horton. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 12. MORALITY IN THE SCHOOLS. By William T. Harris, LL.D. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 13. JOSEPH PRIESTLEY: The Old Unitarianism and the New. By Rev. O. C. Everett, D.D. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 14. WHAT O'CLOCK IS IT IN RELIGION? By Rev. M. J. Savage. $2.00 per hundred.
- No. 15. A SOUL WITH FOUR WINDOWS OPEN. By Rev. James Leonard Corning. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 16. SCIENTIFIC THEOLOGY THE GROUND OF ALL RELIGION. By Francis E. Abbot, Ph.D. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 17. REFORMS ABOUT WHICH GOOD MEN MIGHT AGREE. By William M. Salter. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 18. HOW WE HELPED OUR MINISTER TO WRITE GOOD SERMONS. By Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D. 50 cents per hundred.
- No. 19. FOUR SERMONS ON REVIVALS. By Rev. S. M. Crothers. $3.00 per hundred. Single copies, 6 cents.
- No. 20. THEODORE PARKER'S LETTER TO A YOUNG MAN. 50 cents per hundred.
- No. 21. THE THEOLOGY OF THE FUTURE. By Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D. 50 cents per hundred.
- No. 22. THE RESTRICTION OF VIVISECTION. By Albert Leffingwell, M.D. 50 cents per hundred.
- No. 23. A WORKING THEORY IN ETHICS. By Rev. J. H. Crooker. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 24. THE CHRISTIAN UNITARIAN POSITION, DOCTRINAL. By John Hamilton Thom. 60 cents per hundred.
- No. 25. THE NEW BIRTH AND THE NEW TYPE OF MAN. By Rev. Charles F. Dole. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 26. THE RESURRECTION OF JESUS. By Rev. W. H. Furness. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 27. SHORT AND LONG VIEWS. By Rev. Charles F. Dole. $1.00 per hundred.

Sent post paid on receipt of price by
CHRISTIAN REGISTER ASSOCIATION,
141 Franklin Street, Boston.

Theodore Parker to a Young Man.

This letter from Theodore Parker, to a young man just starting out in life, was first printed in the Christian Register in 1885, and afterwards in leaflet form. It has been some time out of print, and yet, from its straightforward, manly tone in relation to life, duty, wealth, study, religion, is still called for as a very available tract to be handed to boys and youth. It is now entered permanently in the Register Tract Series, and may be had at any time.

Single copy, 2 cts.; per hundred, 50 cts.

Address Christian Register Association,
141 Franklin Street, Boston.

Pleasantries.

"Bread may be the staff of life, but a saddle of mutton makes the journey easier."

"He is always in the best of spirits." "No wonder he is well preserved."—Detroit Tribune.

She: "Tell me, when you were in the army, were you cool in the hour of danger?" He: "Cool? I actually shivered!"—Boston Transcript.

First Boarder: "What's the star boarder making all that hubbub about over that berry pie?" Second Boarder: "I guess he found the berry."

Snoggs: "Was it not disgraceful the way in which Smiggs snored in church to-day?" Stuggs: "I should think it was. Why, he woke us all."

"Robbie," said the visitor, kindly, "have you any little brothers and sisters?" "No," replied Robbie, solemnly, "I'm all the children we've got."—Harlem Life.

"How do you stand in your classes, Tommy?" asked the stranger. "On my feet, sir," said Tommy, with a look of surprise that any one should ask so foolish a question.

"Well, Uncle Silas, your boy is home from college." "Yes, wuss luck." "Worse luck! Why?" "He's larned so much he can't plow up nothin' but my feelins, nor harrer nothin' but my soul."

Miss Beacon Street: "Then, you know, we have our Browning clubs." Miss Manhattan (contemptuously): "Oh, our cooking clubs go a little further than the proper coloring of baked beans."

An Arab, travelling across the desert with Mohammed one day, said, "I shall turn my camel loose to-night, and trust him to Allah." The wise prophet made answer, "Friend, first tie thy camel: then trust him to Allah."—Christian Citizen.

"Darling," she said to her husband, as they sat on the roll of parlor carpet in the hall of the house into which they had just moved, "I wish this roll of carpet was velvet." "Do you? Well, I don't." "What do you wish?" "That it was down."—Pittsburg Dispatch.

Man on horseback: "Hallo, old man! given up riding?" Man on foot: "Well, the fact is, my doctor says that I am getting too fat, and advises me to take short quick runs during the day. But I want some object to run for." Man on horseback: "Buy a straw hat."

Mr. Kelly: "An' how are ye this mornin', Mistriss Flynn? Is yer rheumatiz any better?" Mrs. Flynn: "Well, yis, I think it is, I thank ye kindly. The new doctor's treatment is doin' me a world av good, I believe. He advices me to take queen ann eternally, an' to rub anarchy on me joints. So I'm doin' it, an' I think it's helpin' me wonderfully."—Puck.

A parish clerk, during the abortive Irish insurrection of 1848, said in a poetic oration: "To-night's the day, I speak it with great sorrow, that we were to have been blown up to-morrow." Another, declaiming against the oppression of the times, exclaimed, with national fervor, "It's not the tenth part that these tyrants take from us, but the twentieth!"—Youth's Companion.

Gen. Grant, who was fond of children, was introduced to a little girl, four years old. She gazed at him with an expression half-incredulous. "Are you the Gen. Grant that fought in the battles?" she asked. "Yes, I was in a good many battles," said Grant. The little one looked at him in wondering silence, and then said, "Let's hear you holler!"—The Brooklyn Eagle.

A London journal says that a lively discussion once took place in a town council in the north of England. One thing led to another, till one of the disputants gave another the lie direct. The insulted party rushed forward, and the pair clinched. At that moment the first man exclaimed, "I reiterate that you are a liar!" To the astonishment of every one the aggrieved party let go his hold. "Oh, well," he said, "in that case I accept the apology. If a man says he reiterates, that is all any gentleman can ask."

Typography, often erratic, rarely reveals so delicious an accident of humor as that contained in the following paragraph from the New York Recorder of Monday, June 10: "men and women who went to Blackwell's Island yesterday to see a class of paupers confined in the faith of the Protestant Episcopal Church by Bishop Henry C. Potter. The sight was one to give a nervous person the horrors." That the victim of the blunder is a bishop of well-known Broad Church proclivities is perhaps the pith of its richness.—C. T. C.

Highest of all in Leavening Power.—Latest U. S. Gov't Report

Royal Baking Powder

ABSOLUTELY PURE

Buy the Genuine
1847 TRADE MARK ROGERS BROS.
Spoons, Forks, etc.
"1847" is the guarantee.

PALMER HAMMOCKS.
PALMER'S VALANCE HAMMOCK
PAT. MAY 21, '89

The merits of the Palmer Woven Patent Hammocks have never been equalled. Their superiority of material, construction, and design has made them the Standard since first introduced. While there is a continual effort by imitators and infringers to produce something similar, it has all been without success, and the "Palmer Patent Hammocks" still stand pre-eminently superior to any of the imitations. They are produced in larger quantities and infinitely more varieties than the combined production of all others.

Before purchasing, insist upon seeing the "Palmer Patent Hammocks." Remember, the name "Palmer" is a synonym for all that is best in Hammocks. If your dealer does not have them in stock, he can get them for you, but be sure that he does. I. E. Palmer, Middletown, Conn.

RAYMOND & WHITCOMB'S TOURS.

ALL TRAVELLING EXPENSES INCLUDED.

A party of limited numbers will leave Boston, Monday, September 2, for a Grand Tour
—TO—
JAPAN AND CHINA.

The westward voyage will be via Honolulu. The tour through Japan will be much more comprehensive than is usually made, and there will be longer sojourns at all the chief cities and points of interest. In China there will be visits to Hong Kong, Macao, and the great city of Canton.

In connection with the foregoing, and leaving Boston Wednesday, August 14, a tour through the HAWAIIAN ISLANDS,
with visits to Honolulu, Hilo, the Volcano of Kilauea, etc. July 2 and 16. Alaska and Yellowstone Park. July 15. Colorado, Utah, and Yellowstone Park. September 3. Yellowstone Park and return, also Yellowstone Park, the North-west, and California.

Throughout the Summer and Autumn numerous short tours to popular resorts.

Independent Railroad Tickets via the Boston & Albany and Other Principal Lines; also, Steamship Tickets to all points.

Send for descriptive book, mentioning tour desired.
RAYMOND & WHITCOMB,
296 Washington St., opposite School St., Boston.

NOTE.—Mr. LUTHER L. HOLDEN, who has travelled over the entire route, and arranged the details of the tour, thus becoming thoroughly familiar with all the places to be visited, can be consulted at Messrs. Raymond & Whitcomb's office daily, between the hours of 2 and 6 P.M., and will be glad to give any desired information.

THE JACKSON SANATORIUM DANVILLE,
New York

Established in 1858.

A delightful home for health and rest seekers. Personal care of experienced physicians. Main building fire-proof. For illustrated pamphlet address J. ARTHUR JACKSON, Sec., P.O. Box 1873.

CONTINENTAL.
Atlantic City, N. J.
Desirable location, best service, and moderate rates.
H. C. DURAR.

Get a Glass! Quick!!

There's lots of snap and vim in this HIRE'S ROOT-BEER. There's lots of pleasure and good health in it, too. A delicious drink, a temperance drink, a home-made drink, a drink that delights the old and young. Be sure and get the genuine

HIRE'S' Rootbeer

A 25 cent package makes 5 gallons. Sold everywhere.
The Chas. E. Hires Company, Philadelphia, Pa.

BROWN BROTHERS & CO.
50 State Street, Boston.

Travellers' Letters of Credit.
Sterling, French and German Exchange.
Brown, Shipley & Co., London.

NEW ENGLAND MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY.
POST-OFFICE SQUARE, BOSTON, MASS.

ASSETS, Dec. 31, 1894.....	$24,252,828.71
LIABILITIES.....	22,217,399.94
	$2,035,428.77

BENJ. F. STEVENS, President.
ALFRED D. FOSTER, Vice-Pres.
S. F. TRULL, Secretary.
WM. B. TURNER, Asst. Sec'y.

LIFE RATE ENDOWMENT policies are issued at the old life rate premium.—Annual Cash distributions are paid upon all policies.—Every policy has insured thereon the cash surrender and paid-up insurance values to which the insured is entitled by the Massachusetts Statute.—Pamphlets, rates, and values for any age sent on application to the Company's Office.

Ladies Travelling Alone to Boston
WILL FIND THE
HOTEL BELLEVUE
A quiet hotel, with a café of rare excellence. Located on Beacon Hill, near the State House, and convenient to all the large stores and places of amusement. Adjoining American Unitarian Association Building,
BEACON STREET, BOSTON,
EUROPEAN PLAN,
J. W. SMITH, Proprietor.

In connection with our wholesale business, we are accustomed to sell
CHURCH CARPETS
at manufacturers' prices.
John H. Pray, Sons & Co.,
Wholesale and Retail CARPETS and UPHOLSTERY,
658 Washington St. (opp. Boylston), Boston.
Correspondence Solicited.

Foundry established in 1790 by PAUL REVERE.
BELLS and CHIMES
of Copper and Tin.
BLAKE BELL CO.,
Boston, Mass.

JOSEPH GILLOTT'S STEEL PENS.
GOLD MEDAL, PARIS EXPOSITION, 1889, AND THE CHICAGO EXPOSITION AWARD.
THE MOST PERFECT OF PENS.

TO LET. The desirable house, 118 Highland Street, Roxbury; 11,000 feet of land; beautiful location; Norfolk House cars now run near. Two furnished cottages, West Falmouth. S. G. DAVIS, 113 Devonshire Street.

GEO. H. ELLIS,
Printer,
141 FRANKLIN ST.
BOSTON.

WITH extensive, light, and commodious rooms, large and fast Presses, embracing all the latest improvements, Type-setting Machines, new and modern material throughout, the Establishment ranks with the best in the City for the execution of Letterpress or Plate Printing.

- BOOKS
- PAMPHLETS
- NEWSPAPERS
- MAGAZINES
- SERMONS
- CATALOGUES
- REPORTS
- LAW WORK

AND EVERY VARIETY OF

Mercantile and Job Printing.
Excellence in Workmanship.
Promptness in Delivery.

The Pamphlet Bindery, included in the office, is furnished with every facility for rapid and good work.

The Christian Register

Liberty, Holiness, Love.

VOLUME LXXIV.

BOSTON, THURSDAY, JULY 11, 1895.

NUMBER 28.

The Christian Register.

TERMS: $3.00 per year. Single copies, 6 cents.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY THE
CHRISTIAN REGISTER ASSOCIATION,
141 Franklin Street, Boston, Mass.

Entered as second-class mail matter.

Contents.

EDITORIAL.	PAGE
Notes; A Metropolitan Centre,	433
Thomas Henry Huxley; A New Educational Outfit; The Place of Trifles,	434
The Japanese Mission,	435
BREVITIES,	435
PRO AND CON.
An Uncomfortable Faith; Card-boards needed; Literature for Children,	435
ORIGINAL AND SELECTED.
Rambles in England, III.; A Plea for Mr. Mil- cawber, by E. P. Powell,	436
Kidd's "Social Evolution"; Humble Helpers, by S. E. W.; Life in Armenia,	437
What Unitarians believe, by Rev. N. Hoagland; Gen. Grant's Childhood; Tiny Republics; American Unitarian Association; Women's Alliance,	438
The Japan Mission, II.,	441
Bryant's Marriage,	446
The Beauty of Stevenson's Character,	447
RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE,	438
SERMON GLEANINGS.
Accept Yourself, by Rev. Arthur M. Judy; The Risen Life, by Rev. Stopford A. Brooke, . .	440
SPIRITUAL LIFE,	442
LITERATURE.
Charles Francis Barnard; Other Book Notices, Miscellaneous; Literary Notes; Books Re- ceived,	442
THE HOME.
Outside the Barrier Gate, by A. D. G.; A Tramp Dog,	444
Be ye Thankful; A Boy of a Thousand; The First Printer,	445
POETRY.
Wishes,	436
Things Unseen, by Samuel C. Blackwell, . .	440
Lost June, by Elizabeth Hill,	444
Sabbatia,	445
SPIRIT OF THE PRESS,	446
PERSONALS,	446
SCIENCE,	446
EDUCATION,	447
CHARITIES AND REFORMS,	447
HERE AND THERE,	447
PLEASANTRIES,	448

Editorial.

MR. CHADWICK'S sketch of "Old Marblehead" in this month's New England Magazine brings up before the reader's mind a graphic and distinct picture of one of our old New England towns. All its memories and traditions are so dear to him that what he writes is a labor of love. But, aside from this, he has the gift. His capacious and retentive memory is a storehouse of old folk-lore, and he has the faculty of making his narrative fresh and picturesque. Marblehead, both old and new, under his versatile pen, is throbbing with life. In addition to the interest of the story, with its wealth of suggestion, the sketch will be valuable to the future historian for the lights and shadows which he has rescued and wrought into his charming mosaic.

THE great army of Christian Endeavorers have invaded Boston. They come from every nation and clime,—an army with banners, mottoes, song, and prayer, bent on making the world better. Before this issue reaches our readers, they will have nearly ended their campaign, and we shall speak more fully of this in our next issue. It is an encouraging sight to see such a company of earnest workers, full of the freshness, hope, and enthusiasm of youth.

To estimate the value and power of this organization, one must call to mind the fact that, though it has not existed twenty-five years, it has two and a half millions of members, and that they are working on the lines of the churches to which they belong. We have here a mighty moral force. Not only can the Church look to them with hope for the future of religion, but every well-wisher for the good of society will recognize them as able helpers. In all questions which bear on the public weal they will be found opposed to public corruption and in favor of honest government. Two millions and a half of votes representing the idea of Christian citizenship is a powerful safeguard to public order and a great quickener of the better elements which make for a higher civic life and vital religion.

IN connection with the great gathering of the Christian Endeavorers there will be about the same time in Boston the General Convention of the Young People's Christian Union, composed of delegates from the various Universalist churches in the country. Arrangements have been made to accommodate two thousand near the churches where the meetings are to be held. The workers in the Every Day Church are busy with the details. Among other subjects of interest will be the presence of Rev. I. Wallace Cate, the Universalist missionary from Japan. He is the head of the mission, and also occupies the chair of hermeneutics in the Universalist Theological School in Tokio. Many questions of practical importance will be dealt with. Among other features of interest will be a pilgrimage of the delegates to Gloucester to visit the places made sacred by the work and life of John Murray, the father of American Universalism. The house where he lived is still standing; and, as the visitors stand in the old home and recall the events of the early days and the fidelity and consecration of their honored leader, they will catch new inspiration to go on in the work given them to do. We look with unusual interest to the proceedings of this convention, and hope that it may have so marked a success as to lead to other conventions on broader than denominational lines.

"WHAT we need to do is to get the nineteenth century to look at Christianity as the first century looked at it." This remark of an English preacher the New York Tribune takes as a text for "A Lay Homily." The thing in itself is impossible. The first century looked with its own eyes: so do we. The Tribune puts this truly when it says: "The first-century Christians reached conclusions by methods that would be alien to the modern mind. We are the children of our age, and the age is one of questioning and doubt. That is the groove into which all modern thinking must inevitably run. The apostles heard the message of revelation; and their answer to it was the confession, 'I believe.' When the modern man hears the same message, his answer comes in the question, 'How shall I know that the message is true?' We would not imply that this age is faithless,—far from it. It has in it the capacity for the highest and best kind of belief. But it cannot find belief by just the same road that satisfied preceding ages. Its creed necessarily takes some of its coloring from the complex atmosphere of the age. Men to-day cannot, if they would, transport themselves back into the intellectual and spiritual atmosphere in which Saint Paul lived, any more than he could have projected himself forward into the spirit of our own age. Not in looking backward and wishing for the days of Christ, or in looking forward and sighing for the pearly gates of heaven, but in meeting life day by day in the spirit of Christ,—this is a type of Christianity that has within it the promise and potency of incalculable good to humanity."

IN the "Character Sketch" of a recent number of the Review of Reviews we have an interesting biography of Mr. James Stansfeld. In tracing the influences at work in the shaping of Mr. Stansfeld's character, Mr. Stead puts special stress on the fact that his father was a staunch Unitarian. "The Unitarians," he says, "among whom Mr. Stansfeld's lot was cast were a sect cultured, comparatively leisured, and well-to-do. There was among them no wild and fervent gospelling such as that which helped the primitive Methodists to evangelize the savages of the mine; but there was in its stead a healthy enthusiasm of humanity, making itself manifest in rigid regard for rightness of individual conduct and a keen sense of the obligations which were due to society and to the State. Most of the best of the New Englanders, from Emerson to Lowell and Holmes, were Unitarians of this type. It is a high type, with a morality not surcharged with emotion, but full of tenderness and aspiration, lacking, alas! only in that faculty of propagandism which alone secures the perpetuity of religions." We call special attention to the closing words. When Mr. Stead says that Unitarians are lacking in the faculty of propagandism, he probes their weakness to the quick, and also tells the truth when he adds that the faculty of propagandism alone secures the perpetuity of religions. A type of religion which does not inspire a missionary spirit and embody its spirit in an organized church, whatever other excellences it may have, is short-lived. All experience and history prove that only by the zeal of propagandism has any form of religion taken a permanent place in the world. It is a hopeful sign that the perception of this truth is dawning on the Unitarians of to-day.

THE picture of Oscar Wilde in prison is both sad and pitiable. He is described as sitting in a dazed condition, without wishing to see any one or desiring to hear from the outside world. After he had been confined a few days, he was ordered to the treadmill; but soon he fainted, and fell from exhaustion. His physician, on examination, declared he was not shamming, and for the present at least could not bear this test without serious, if not fatal, injury. He is obliged to conform to prison rules, and rises at a fixed hour, takes his meals at the prescribed time, and retires according to established rules. His moral lethargy keeps pace with his physical, and he seems to be wholly oblivious of having done any wrong. In an interview with the chaplain, when asked if he was repentant, he at once jumped out of his dazed silence, and in rage glared at his questioner, and exclaimed: "How dare you to insult me in this fashion! I am innocent of the crime of which I am accused." His career is an impressive lesson that we get from life both in quantity and quality what we give. No amount of wealth, no degree of social position or gifts of genius, can escape this great moral law. If a man prostitutes his gifts, wealth, or social position, and lives for low ends, the fruit of bitterness ripens. The sanctity of virtue demands this. Honor, truthfulness, devotion to high ideals, and noble aims bring their reward. We reap as we sow. Such is the fact which flashes out from history and life. It is true of all time and of all men.

THE first reports of the violence in East Boston on the Fourth of July were exaggerated. In truth, the affair can hardly be called a riot, but rather a disturbance. Whatever the future examination may prove the details to be, the saddest feature of the whole transaction is the symptom it reveals of an unhealthy condition of opinion. The thing happened because there exist in the community race and religious animosities which are liable to be fanned into bitter hatred and violent outbreaks. Explain as you will the causes of this event, it could not have happened if the animosities did not exist. If the existence of hostile feelings was not present in the minds of certain members of the committee of the carnival, they would not have thought of excluding the red school-house and its friends from their procession, nor would certain aldermen have refused to grant the application for the afternoon parade. On the other hand, the suspicion that the simple emblem of the school-house was a fling at the parochial system excited the ire of the supporters of the latter. The fact of the prevalence of these inflammable materials is the lesson of the hour, and demonstrates the need of softening our prejudices and toleration for each other's differences. The American idea is that each man and associations of men have a full right for the expression of their opinions, either by speech or parade, as long as they remain within the bounds of the law. It matters not whether it be the Ancient Order of Hibernians, the A. P. A., or any other organization. This needs to be stamped upon the minds of all, whether natives or new-comers. Opinions and beliefs have an equal chance before the law. The disposition to encroach upon this right, to rush into lawlessness and to foment religious bigotry, cannot be too severely deprecated. Freedom and law were the watchwords when the nation was born. It is the very corner-stone upon which our institutions rest. The readiness which so widely prevails, and which seems to be growing in strength, for individuals to take the law in their own hands and to outrage the rights of others through mob violence, is one of the most serious aspects of the time. It is all the same whether this be in South Carolina, Illinois, Ohio, or Massachusetts. It surely seems a striking illustration of unfitness to see a mass of angry men making an assault on a peaceful procession on the Fourth of July. It is a desecration of all for which this anniversary stands. Unless a roused public sentiment shall demand a halt in these exhibitions of lawlessness and violence, and the authorities and the courts visit the offenders with severe penalties, we shall cease to be a nation of law-abiding citizens.

A METROPOLITAN CENTRE.

THE growth of Chicago is one of the marvels of the century. Less than fourscore years ago only a log house and the remains of an old fort occupied the land on each side of the river which now bisects the city. Situated at the end of one of the great lakes, by an extensive system of railroads it has become an immense distributing-point, and reaches out its iron arms far and near. By means of canals it will in the future have a direct water communication to the ocean by the St. Lawrence and the Mississippi, and, like Manchester in England, will become a seaport as well as an inland city. From its custom-house goods will enter and depart from and to all parts of the world, and will reach their destination without breaking bulk. Already it is moving forward with rapid strides in its bold and ambitious efforts to become the first metropolis of the Western World. A glance at the map will show some of the natural causes of commercial prosperity. The same energy which has enabled it to achieve its brilliant results has also been turned toward those means of culture and influence which directly affect our best civilization. Chicago is noted not only for its towering warehouses, but also for its schools, its museums of art, its public parks and charities and churches. Its newspapers, by their wide range of thought in the treatment of subjects, their enterprise in gathering news, and their ability in the discussions of all the vital questions which directly touch on life and reach into the higher realms of literature, science, and religion, are equal to any in the country. Not content with giving its efforts and wealth to mere material results, it is now spending millions in building up great institutions of learning, which will in the future take place beside Harvard and Yale.

From this it will be seen that Chicago is already the chief of inland cities, and will in the future become a great metropolitan centre. The time is not far distant when that section washed by the Mississippi and its tributaries will have several populous inland cities, and become a powerful shaping force. Already its political influence is felt. Since the election of Lincoln in 1859, with the exception of Mr. Cleveland of New York, the Presidents chosen have come from Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois. The land washed by the Mississippi and its tributaries is one of the world's chief granaries; and, as this whole section increases in wealth, it will also increase in culture and refinement.

One of the chief and striking characteristics of the Chicagoan is his pride and loyalty to his city and his undoubted faith in its future. With a prodigal hand he pours out his wealth in aid of all public enterprises. The way in which the Exposition was designed and carried out has won the admiration of the world. It could have reached its signal success only by the action of public spirit and civic virtues.

With these facts in mind, we are not insensible to the grave defects in this city which has sprung into existence under the spur of such intense enterprise. The eager desire for wealth has been all-absorbing. Men have been bent on money-getting. Often the methods employed have been unscrupulous. Municipal corruption has been bold and vigorous. But truth requires us to add that, while men have been eager to get money, they also have spent it freely, not only for show and personal gratification, but also to help various public enterprises. The faith of its citizens in Chicago is unbounded, and they prove their faith by their works.

It almost goes without saying that Chicago is not only now a great metropolitan centre, but is destined to become still more so in the future. In considering the action of the higher forces of civilization, this fact must be kept in mind. Especially is this true of those efforts which are made toward religious organization. As the Christian Church in its earliest days first sought a foothold in the chief cities, and from them went forth the great transforming power of the new faith, so must it be now. Hence the importance of Chicago as well as other Western cities as a religious centre. The missionary organizations of the Central North-west must have their departure from this point. The fact is too evident to need further enlargement. It has its bearings on the organized efforts for the spread of Unitarian Christianity. The American Unitarian Association, if it is to make an advanced step, should make this city its headquarters, and, gathering round this centre its various Western forces, move forward toward larger achievements for the liberal faith.

THOMAS HENRY HUXLEY.

No other English-speaking man of science has, since the death of Darwin, been so representative of the ways of science for the popular imagination as Prof. Huxley. Two months ago he rounded out his threescore years and ten, but such was the immense vitality of his thought and style that no one thought of him as getting old; and his conformity to the Biblical standard of longevity—as if nothing in his life might so become him as his leaving it—must have been a surprise to many who had not informed themselves of the fact that he was born May 4, 1825. It was an interesting coincidence that he as well as Darwin should take an ocean voyage for a post-graduate course. His on the "Rattlesnake" was but four, while Darwin's on the "Beagle" was five years long; and his observations bore the fruit of no such magnificent generalization as Darwin's "Natural Selection." Nevertheless, they bore fruit after their kind, as did the life in general on shipboard. They spoiled him for a practising physician, and sealed him for an investigator and teacher of the truths of natural science. There is encouragement in his career for those who do not find the true path when they are first setting out. Moreover, he informs us that he began by writing carelessly and ill, and that for many years he was indifferent to literary form. This is exceeding strange, seeing that he developed a style so masterly; and it is difficult to believe that he was not to the manner born, however he improved himself by practice and devotion to an exigent ideal.

Huxley's name has been long associated with Darwin's as a protagonist of the latter's, early in the field, and with an enthusiasm and a frankness which have not been surpassed. Darwin's appreciation of his loyalty was all that Huxley could desire. That loyalty was as fearless as it was intelligent; and the history of the controversy furnishes no more dramatic incident than the retort of Huxley upon Samuel Wilberforce, then Bishop of Oxford, when that famous dignitary had flouted the Darwinian theory of human origins as something monstrous and absurd. But the name which has been oftenest paired with Huxley's is that of his friend, Prof. Tyndall; and it is interesting to know that, at the outset, they were companions in misfortune. They were candidates at the same time, Tyndall for the chair of physics, and Huxley for that of natural history, in the University of Toronto, Canada; and they fared equally ill. But here was the beginning of a friendship and collaboration second to few, if any, in the scientific annals of our time. Since Tyndall's death no one has written about him more heartily and pleasantly than Huxley, and it is superfluous to say that the depreciatory estimate of Tyndall which was current in his lifetime got from his friend no particle of justification or support. This depreciatory estimate was frequently and habitually expressed in terms of relative admiration and distrust, Huxley getting all the former and Tyndall all the latter. A successful analysis of this injurious comparison remains a desideratum to this day. It often went so far as to represent Tyndall as a brilliant charlatan, while it allowed that Huxley was a genuine man of science. Conservative and apologetic theologians lent themselves industriously to this manner of belief. Yet it would be difficult to fix a time when they were not as hard hit by Huxley as by his friend; and of late years the little finger of Huxley's anti-theological writing has been thicker than was ever Tyndall's thigh. From the standpoint of their ultimate biographer, it is probable that Tyndall's temper will be found the more purely scientific and at the same time as much more religious as it was more imaginative than Huxley's.

Prof. Huxley has not left us in any doubt as to the objects that he had in view in the pursuit of knowledge and its dissemination. He does not even name among them the successes of original investigation, so that his successes upon this line cannot have been less than he imagined them to be. They were—the objects of his life as named by him—the popularization of science; the development and organization of scientific education; the defence of evolution as an adequate solution of the riddle of the world; and last, but not least, "untiring opposition to that ecclesiastical spirit, that clericalism, which in England, as everywhere else, and to whatever denomination it may belong, is the deadly enemy of science." And it is not too much to say that in all these particulars he has done a great and very memorable work. That "popularization of science" which is practically falsification, and of which we have no end, found in his methods that "criticism by example" which is the most effective possible. The defence of evolution in its narrower (Darwinian) or wider (Spencerian) implications has found in him a representative at once cautious and alert, for its speedy triumph owes to him a quite incalculable debt. Equally indebted to him is the increasingly successful rivalry of the natural sciences with the classics in English schools and colleges, while the evident enrichment of his own thought and style from classic sources has interposed a timely barrier to those who would do away with classical studies altogether.

As for Huxley's "untiring opposition to the ecclesiastical spirit," it grew with his growth; but is it so sure that it strengthened with his strength? He often warned the theologians off from his scientific preserve, and told them, in words to that effect, to mind their own business. But the fable was for him as well as them, and he was not always clear concerning this.

He poached on their preserve as much as they on his. Often the game he bagged justified the adventure. So wide was his culture and so vivid his intelligence that he was often wiser than the theologians on their chosen ground; but the joy of battle often tempted him to conflicts in which his skill was far below his best, and the waste of gifts that might have been much better employed was sometimes tragical. But such occasional aberrations did not prevent the even tenor of his way from being splendid with the proofs of intellectual honesty and magnificent in its rebuke of the "orthodox lying for God," of which the scientists and the theologians furnished examples equally flagrant and deplorable.

Huxley's encouragement to shape one's words as absolutely as possible upon one's thought and to see things as nearly as may be as they are, was, perhaps, his most important contribution to contemporary morality. It is plain that the main region of his life was not intellectual or scientific, but ethical. "Veracity of thought and action" was the mark of his high calling, and to that he entreated others to lift up their hearts. But, in his "resolute facing of the world as it is when the garment of make-believe by which pious hands have hidden its uglier features is stripped off," may it not be there was a predilection for those "uglier features," a tendency to exaggerate their ugliness? Theology can hardly be accused of a disposition to make life more attractive than it is, in view of the Westminster Confession and that sort of thing. It is to be hoped that science has nothing more horrible to lay bare than the doctrines of election and eternal hell. It is to be hoped that her ultimate message will be something more cheerful than the expression to which it attained in Huxley's later writings, and especially in the celebrated "Romanes Lecture," where the doctrine was thoroughly dualistic, man on the one side and an anti-ethical cosmos on the other. For many and the most of us that doctrine is discouraging. But Huxley did not find it so. He expected the heroic energy of mankind to make a good fight with the anti-ethical cosmos, and in spite of it to bring in the better times. But the dualism of the "Romanes Lecture" has been subjected to a criticism that enables us to trust that things are not so bad as that.

It was Huxley as a man of letters that gave to Huxley as a man of science his free course, and glorified him with Tyndall in the affections of the reading world. Many have imagined themselves in love with his science when it was to his literature that they had given their hearts. His scientific knowledge might have been ten times as great; and, without his clear, strong, vivid, and incisive style, he would have made a very different impression, much narrower and much less agreeable. As a controversialist, his roughest manners were so frank and cordial that only those devoid of humor or sincerity could resent them bitterly. He has been a notable figure in the arena, and without him it is something tamer and less picturesque. But his life has gone into the structure of the times, and his career will long remain a subject of insatiable curiosity and of widely varying judgments as to its significance of use and good. J. W. C.

A NEW EDUCATIONAL OUTFIT.

The recent commencements all over the country have one prominent feature: they show what immense changes have been made both in the quality and scope of university instruction. The educational leaders have brought to the subject practical sagacity and a keen perception of the real needs of the times. In this they not only reveal their wisdom, but also administrative foresight. The forces at work have already wrought striking alterations in our ideas and in the structure of society. The introduction of machinery and steam has given rise to the great factory, and produced the proletariat. The individual worker thus becomes one of a class; and a radical change is made in the relations between capital and labor, the employer and the employed. The achievements of science, in revealing the powers hidden in the bosom of the earth, in tracing the origin of the species and the history of man, have opened profounder intellectual and religious questions. The wider uprising of the democratic spirit, and the unrest and struggles which it has generated and intensified, make necessary a new adjustment of social and political institutions. A graduate of to-day, as he leaves his Alma Mater with the design of becoming a minister or lawyer, or proposes either a public or business career, needs a larger and more varied outfit than ever before. The knowledge serviceable in the Middle Ages was chiefly locked up in Greek and Latin; and the student gave his chief attention to the gaining of a mastery of these languages, so as to possess himself of the world's intellectual treasures. But now, while the priceless wealth of the Greek and Roman mind may be still found in the original tongue, we have here only a small proportion of modern knowledge. Hence the need of a great enlargement of the college curriculum. Moreover, so great has been the increase of knowledge that he who wishes to master a single department must become a specialist, and make this the chief study of his life. These, with many other considerations, show that the present enlargement of the educational outfit is a necessary evolution in education.

In addition, the intense breeze of practical life has penetrated into the academic hall; and the student in the recitation-room and laboratory feels the stirrings which come from the real world. President Eliot, in his speech at the Harvard alumni dinner, emphasized this when he said, "We are not interested in producing here languid observers of the world and spectators at the game of life. We want to produce by the hundreds and thousands devoted workers in the world of to-day."

It is the source of great encouragement to know that those who have in charge the liberal instruction of our young men and women are thus working on the broader lines of education, and recognize the great changes which have taken place in society. Thus we see the difficult and very grave problems which the moderate graduate will be brought to face, and the perils which arise from the readjustments of social, scientific, intellectual, economic, and religious questions in an age of radical transformations. Hence is evident the need of this new educational outfit from year to year; and the truth is emphasized that the aim and end of a university course of instruction is to enlarge the scope of knowledge and train a generation of strong thinkers, inspired by lofty ideals and with the earnest "desire to be of service in the world."

THE PLACE OF TRIFLES.

We often talk about the tyranny of trifles, which intrude themselves into our days, seeming to hinder us in the duties of wider scope, which we are pleased perhaps to call our real work. So large a proportion of each day's experience is taken up with doing over the things that were done the day before and must be done again on the day after that it is no wonder we sometimes rebel, and dream of the splendid aims we might compass, were we not continually held back by the necessity of considering unimportant details. This is especially true of a woman's work; and it often happens that her courage fails sooner when she must look ahead to a monotonous round of little duties than if she could think of a great and difficult task to be begun, carried on, and finally completed, to leave room for something else. It is comparatively easy to talk of flinging ourselves into the work of the world and sustaining first-hand relations with the toilers; but, when our work is the eternal doing of little things that seem to leave us just where they found us, it is not so easy to feel the thrill of the larger vision or the conviction that our work really means anything, either to ourselves or to anybody else.

Trifles always hold the right of way. The minister's sermon must be laid aside unfinished just when he cares most for it, on account of some petty interruption that hinders his thought, ruffles his mind, and is not of the slightest consequence in itself to him, after all. The mother must adjust herself to a life full of breaks and interferences, sure only that she must take her opportunities on the wing if she means to make anything of them. We cannot even have a great joy or a great sorrow by itself. The heart may ache with unacknowledged pain; but dinner must be served at six o'clock, and we must be ready for it. Mark Twain's diary seems sometimes to represent the sum total of life for many of us, as the days go by undistinguished and almost unrecorded.

Yet there is often a real blessedness in the very insistence of the little things that claim our thoughts when we want to give ourselves to larger matters. How they hold us to our work and to our better selves in times of trouble by the incessant demands that cannot be ignored! They shake us out of the selfishness we might otherwise hardly discover. They make an overstrain of feeling seem melodramatic; and by the necessity of adjusting ourselves to them we acquire that saving sense of proportion which, even in the times of mental excitement, helps us keep our equilibrium and gain self-mastery, that best result of experience.

Habit thus developed rarely fails to assert its claims in a crisis. In Zangwill's recent novel, "The Master," the mother feels that she can stand the strain of her daily life no longer. It is not the thought of her children who would be left motherless that holds back the weak, nervous, distracted woman: she has no remembrance of the responsibilities that rest on her and on her alone. It is just the sight of Matt's bare feet that arrests her thought and claims her attention. She sees that, if Matt does not have his socks and shoes immediately, he will surely catch another cold. Her motherly instincts triumph, and the volcanic fires in her breast are soon extinguished.

The real corrective for the dominance of trifles in our lives is to dignify them all by a great purpose running through them. If the aim of the minister is something more than the preparation of fine sermons, he will learn not to be too impatient at the unavoidable interruptions which will surely come. A mother must learn to hold her golden thread of purpose clear and straight despite all the threatened knots and snarls of cross entanglements. There is no better use for a great passion or enthusiasm than just this of giving meaning to all the little things of life. If a great longing for education fills a boy's heart, he is glad to meet the disagreeable conditions which that longing may force upon him. Splitting wood or caring for a furnace may then mean opportunity to him instead of drudgery. Sometimes a great love so fills the heart that it seems to inspire every little thing done from morning till night, and nothing ever seems a trifle if we do it for the sake of one we love.

THE JAPANESE MISSION.

We trust that no one of our readers will fail to read the report of Mr. MacCauley, to be found in our present issue and that of last week. The extent and value of the work as thus outlined must commend itself, and should lead to a renewed interest in this mission. It has been carried on under the stress of discouragements which have arisen chiefly because there has been a lack of financial support, which has prevented our missionary from employing efficient collaborators. The field is waiting; and the workers are ready, and the harvest full of promise, if they could be financially sustained. While the work has been greatly enlarged, the working force has greatly diminished. The policy of the Unitarian mission differs from those of others. It aims to be a distributor of the best and highest ideas of the religion of Jesus, and, when these have taken root, to leave it for the natives to organize their churches according to their own wants. The wisdom of this course is enforced by the present condition of the mission of the American Board. The Congregationalist, in a carefully written article on this subject, says the friction between natives and foreigners has been such that the question has arisen "whether English and American missionaries should not withdraw, and leave Japan to work out alone her own salvation." The matter has assumed so great importance that it has been decided to send a deputation of prominent members to make a full investigation into the real state of affairs. It would seem, from what has been given to the public, that the result will be to allow the Japanese churches established by the mission of the American Board complete and independent control. This is practically following, in many respects, the policy of the Unitarian mission in Japan. Whether this be true or not, it is very clear that the Unitarian mission is successfully carrying on its work, and for its greater efficiency requires more aid from our churches. Mr. MacCauley's report ought to secure this, so that he may be strengthened, and go forward with renewed courage and faith.

Brevities.

Rev. Dr. Miner's last message from his death-bed to his brethren at the Monday Ministers' Meeting was characteristic: "Give my love to the brethren, and say to them, 'Be faithful!'"

Gen. Booth, who does not know what rest means, will again start on a trip round the world. He goes to spy out the land suitable for agricultural colonies and to take a survey of the general Salvation work.

Dean Farrar's successor at Westminster Abbey has twice during his ministerial career taken empty churches and filled them. He rides much every day, and generally prepares his sermons while in the saddle. They are described as very direct and forceful.

The French Chambers have voted in favor of making a treaty with the United States for the settlement of all disputes by arbitration. All hail! This is a long step toward peace. Glory to God in the highest, good will toward men, is dawning, though dimly as yet.

The North Carolina Christian Advocate is deservedly severe against ministers who advertise sensational subjects for their sermons, and thinks that there was some basis of philosophy in the old preacher's reply when, being asked the subject of his sermon, he said, "I never let the devil know."

The politicians are playing shy of the Manitoba school dispute, and the Dominion government have decided to refer the matter back to the local legislature. If this fails to settle the question, then it will be brought before Parliament at a special session in January. This course has made trouble, and may lead to a change in the ministry.

Rev. Thomas Van Ness preached a specially fit and impressive sermon at the Second Church, which was the last service for the year; and special mention was made of the duties of summer as well as those larger ones which relate to the public. He will preach the same sermon in our pulpit next week to an audience extending over the world and numbered by the thousands.

Lady Spencer has passed a rigid examination before the Naval English Board with first honors, and secured a license as captain with an official document certifying her capacity to fill the rank to the satisfaction of the admiralty. It is said she has no intention to apply for a war-vessel, but has taken the examination to be captain of her own yacht. The woman will be on deck all the same.

Ministers and teachers who are sometimes discouraged about the results of their labors should take encouragement at Senator Hoar's address at the commencement of Williams College, when he said that he had the honor to be present at a private dinner with President Garfield and Mark Hopkins at the White House, just before the former's death, and heard Garfield tell his noble teacher how much he owed to his influence.

The late Dr. W. G. Eliot of St. Louis, when his ministerial friends sought his advice about making a change, was wonted to reply, "Stick." Dr. Anderson, when called to the presidency of Brown University, was of the same opinion. When asked if he was going, he replied: "Go? No: I am going to stand by Rochester. Rochester invested in me when I was unknown and without value. If the investment has not proved a failure, Rochester deserves the profits."

The Pacific Theological Seminary, Milwaukee, says one of our exchanges, is now considerably excited over charges brought against some of the breweries of employing children under fourteen years of age, furnishing them an undue amount of beer to drink, and exposing them to demoralizing conversation. The charge is brought by Inspector Stewart of the United States Labor Bureau, and the owners of the breweries insist that its truth shall be proved.

The story is told that Dr. Henry M. Field once had Dr. Patton and Joseph H.

Choate to dinner, when the subject of evolution came up. "How," said Mr. Choate, "do you interpret the first chapter of Genesis?" "We look upon that," replied Dr. Patton, "as a sort of charcoal sketch of what might have been." The New York Tribune, in giving this, adds, "The phrase is a little unguarded, and, if uttered by Prof. Briggs, might have been considered as speaking lightly of sacred things; but Dr. Patton is a great master of dialectics, and can doubtless reconcile it with the most rigid Orthodoxy." He also gave a proof of this in his late address before the Presbyterian General Assembly.

The police commissioners of New York City begin to realize the extent and difficulty of the work they have in hand, and are resolute to use every possible means to execute the "Excise Law." The New York Evening Post thus sums up the result to date: "As tangible moral results of the board's unequivocal attitude, it can be recorded (1) that a large body of violators, both behind and before the saloon bars, are finally convinced that the police mean business this time; (2) that these persons have given up looking for a letting down in police vigilance; (3) that the police force believes it must do every Sunday what it has done for several weeks; and (4) that their opinions and convictions are right."

The glorious Fourth was universally observed throughout the country. The injunction of John Adams was thoroughly heeded by the roar of cannon, the blast of the horn, the waving of the flags, and public services. The noisy feature is a nuisance and a horror to weak nerves, and is very far from the ideal way of celebrating Independence. It may, however, have its uses, and help keep alive the sentiment of patriotism. At best, all this flash of gunpowder and night racket are endurable simply because it is inevitable in the present condition of the world. Still, with all this there are other features. The sermons, orations, and addresses, with all their spread-eagle phrases, contain gems of truth and inspiring words which have their influence. After the smoke has rolled away and the noise has ceased, there abides the great fact for which the day stands; and this is stamped more distinctly upon the popular mind by the celebrations. In the Old World the day was fitly observed by the American colonies, especially in Paris and London. In the latter place the gathering seems to have had unusual zeal and zest.

Pro and Con.

AN UNCOMFORTABLE FAITH.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

Here in this most orthodox of countries, where the traditions of Puritan ancestors are still held in reverence by the large majority, dwell a man and his wife of whose present situation I want to tell you. He has from early youth been a "bright and shining light" in the Baptist church. If not yet a deacon, he at least leads the prayer-meeting more often than any one else, and speaks, sings, and prays with an unction even the minister might envy. He professes to believe in all the dismal doctrines of Calvin, and yet is habitually cheerful, not to say hilarious. Believing in the terrible power and purpose of the devil, his existence yet seems a fit subject for jokes, when not in meeting.

He has been a kind husband for thirty-five years, has had family worship, etc., and would seem to have had every opportunity of impressing upon his wife the doctrines of his church, of which she, too, is a member. They are in comfortable circumstances, and have met with no especial trouble; and yet that wife is and has been for months in an intensely melancholy state of mind. She never smiles, takes no interest in anything, and groans and cries nearly the whole twenty-four hours. And what is it all about? She realizes the situation, if the things she has been taught are true; and the risk of death in an unprepared state drives a woman who has been living a kind, loving, Christian life for many years to the verge of insanity. Night after night she keeps her husband awake to explain to her "the way of salvation," all the ins and outs of which he knows as well as if he had been present when the arrangements were made.

Round and round the circle she goes, but, when he is tired out, still asks, "But how do I know I am willing to be saved?" If they try to talk of other things, she shrieks and cries, "How can I think of other things, when I might die to-night, and my soul not saved?" It seems a cruel wrong, when she wakes him from a five-minutes' nap with the question, "Do you think you are a Christian, and why?" He would think it wrong to soothe her with talk of the loving Father who cares for her, with rational words of hope and faith, unless she first feels "willing to be damned for the glory of God," for fear of soothing her to a "false peace."

It is, no doubt, a comfort to him to think she "met with a change" forty years ago. This is only one pathetic case out of many, and yet this is the latter part of the nineteenth century. Is there not need for a liberal, hopeful faith to be preached everywhere?

If Jesus were on earth to-day, many good men and women in our churches would hardly dare to trust his words of trust and hope, so deeply have the fears and doubts gone into their bones. A. G. B.

CARD-BOARDS NEEDED.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

May I through the columns of the Register appeal not for thousands of dollars, but for little pieces of card-board? Last year we had in some of the school-yards of Boston seventy thousand children. We bid fair to have more this summer. Each child wants to sew cards, and, holding up his clean fingers, begs for a design. But such cards, pricked with a simple design, the outlines of a flower or a cat or a penny trumpet, cost money to buy. The matrons of each of these summer playgrounds are too busy to prick but a few every other day, and the children want them. It is pathetic to see their eagerness and pride in owning a card which they have stitched in colored worsteds where it was pricked. It is the poorest of the poor who are sheltered in these playgrounds or at Charlesbank, where thousands more clamor for cards. These playgrounds are under the care of the Massachusetts Emergency and Hygiene Association, and were first started at Unitarian mission chapels. Now the school-yards have been given us. Miss Ellen M. Tower has always been their presiding genius. Would that each reader of the Register would prick a few cards, each card about four inches square, and send them to 20 Chestnut Street, from which place Miss Tower will distribute them among the children!

KATE GANNETT WELLS.

45 Commonwealth Avenue.

LITERATURE FOR CHILDREN.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

Pleasure derived from a perusal of the article on "Literature for Children" in the Christian Register of June 20 prompts me to send this word of thanks. I agree with the assertion that the day of light jingles and stories written for pictures is past. Our children are fast acquiring a taste for good literature, and the demand is keeping pretty even pace with the supply. Here in this city a school-teacher, just to test the taste of her scholars, began reading to them the first volume of "Tanglewood Tales," by Hawthorne. She was surprised at the great interest manifested by them, and did not have to go far to discover why. First, the language was so simple and withal so beautiful that the listener was thoroughly conversant with the subject in hand, and charmed at the same time. Second, the stories were invariably a true poet's fancy, and thoroughly consistent with the beautiful rhetoric they were written in. Other books by so-called authors for children failed to interest the scholars, and the teacher was always compelled to return to the beloved tales sooner or later. I have a theory that some children can appreciate a good, well-written story as well as a larger person; and I am not without foundation for it. I have seen them greedily devour Kipling's "Jungle Book" with all its difficult Indian names, and prefer good stories of the ancient Greeks to fairy tales. This is a good sign, and demonstrates the need of a distinct literature for children.

T. P.

Council Bluffs, Ia., July 2.

WISHES.

Oh to lie in the opening grass
That gracefully bends to the winds that pass,
And to look aloft the oak leaves through,
Into the sky so deep, so blue!

Oh to feel as utterly free
As the oriole swinging above on the tree,
Or the locusts piping their drowsy whirr,
Or the down that floats from the thistle burr!

Oh to float with the cloudy drifts,
Changing hue as the sunshine shifts,
Or hastening gayly into the west
To follow the blushing sun to rest!

Oh for the secret of Nature's power
To drain the joy of the present hour!
Oh to work and glow in the sun!
Oh to sleep when the day is done!

— William Roscoe Thayer.

RAMBLES IN ENGLAND.

SALISBURY AND STONEHENGE.

III.

[EDITORIAL CORRESPONDENCE.]

We have travelled through England, not in kangaroo leaps, but in a short-gaited way, hopping from bough to bough of the ancestral tree. We have spent twelve days in London. That may mean many different things to many different people. To some it meant a bird's-eye view of the great panorama of life, to others the National Gallery and the British Museum, to others a study of social institutions and the world of men. But we were all ready at any rate for a brief retreat, a spell of rest and quietude; and where better could we find it than in some little cathedral town? And so the three maids, who are also their own mistresses and who serve themselves and each other, sometimes in one capacity and sometimes in another, started on a career of place-hunting, which was crowned with eminent success. Would that the selfish place-hunters in our own land would follow the example of the maids, and go abroad to find a situation! If they were only as zealous for the public welfare, they would be welcome to stay at home.

"The Elysian Fields." I visited them once as a boy; and they will always be associated with pleasure gardens, cakes, and merry-go-rounds at Hoboken, N.J. But the "Elysian Villa" is not there. It is in the charming town of Salisbury, England; and we have taken a limited possession. The limitation does not refer to the house, but to the limited time we shall have to enjoy it. For a few days, at least, it is ours. The villa is on Churchfields. On the front the view is nothing to speak of, and it is too near the railroad; but, like the colleges at Cambridge, its unique feature is "the Backs,"—the cosey little garden behind and the river that separates it from the meadow beyond. The garden is divided into two terraces, the upper one with a grass plat and flowers, the lower one, extending to the river, devoted to the service of the kitchen. Here in this garden we have all the privacy that one could desire. Large and well-furnished bed-chambers, a parlor, and a dining-room complete the suite. Everything is pleasant and homelike. As a piece of movable furniture, we have hired the cook, with all her outfit; and Coriander has been installed in the responsible position of housekeeper, which is a guarantee that we fare well. It is interesting to see with what mock seriousness she takes this weight of responsibility, and gratifying to think that no results that are really serious have overtaken either her or us. But this may be because the cook prepares the meals, and Coriander has only to order them. All that is necessary is a daily visit to the butcher and green-grocer with a pocket-book and a cab. But it gives an assured feeling of domesticity to our living; and, if anybody has to be censured, it is easy to place the blame upon Coriander. Thus far we have had nothing to bestow but the most lavish applause.

The charm of this place, however, lies not in the dinner table, by which certain travellers are accustomed to gauge the merits of every abode, but in the blooming garden, the flowing river, and the beautifully proportioned spire of the Cathedral. Such a wealth of roses as luxuriate in this garden! The snow buds and blossoms in the pure, cool white. There are sunsets and dawns unfolded in exquisite petals, and deep blood-red from the heart of summer itself. There are masses of unforgettable forget-me-nots, and this level patch of green is just the place for a siesta. One almost fancies that he might find the lotus growing in this garden, and that we might share the fate of the lotus-eaters.

But we have not forgotten our country nor our countrymen. The lotus for us remains unplucked; and on the 17th of June, by way of reprisal for the victory won by the British at the battle of Bunker Hill, Mizippi plucked some British roses, white and red, and tied them up along with a few sprays of forget-me-not, making the trinity in unity of our American colors. The stars and stripes themselves were not lacking. We hung them from a pillar of the porch, and the British flag from another; and they waved in friendly unison in the same breeze. We had telegraphed the day before to the American Lyon, who has been fraternizing a few weeks with his English cousin, and gently roaring now and then at public meetings, to represent the American menagerie. He arrived by noon, and was duly decorated with the American colors. Mavilla has been crazy ever since we came here to entertain somebody; and who more entertaining or more entertainingable than our compatriot? As we could not easily drive to the Bunker Hill monument, we decided to visit another pile of stones more ancient, more curious, and more enigmatical. Everybody knows what the Bunker Hill monument means; but who can tell the meaning of Stonehenge? Not we. There is an exhilaration to one's curiosity in finding a monument to which nobody can fix a date, which is devoid of an inscription, but not devoid of a purpose. It is the fact that it must have meant something that piques your curiosity to know what it really did mean. But you are safely insured against the ostentatious learning of anybody else. No garrulous guide or monotonous verger can oppress you by unloading the whole weight of his memory upon your unprotected ignorance. If you are a Yankee and good at guessing, you may see this collection of stones with your own eyes, and guess what they mean if you can.

The ride from Salisbury on that beautiful June afternoon took us first through the quaint town, with its old English houses, the second story often projecting over the first just as the old houses in New England were built in the early days. The market place is an ancient agora, and on Saturday night one may get a lively impression of this usually quiet place. Here is the Gothic Poultry Cross and the old "Halle of John Halle," built in 1470, and since patched up and restored and used as a shop. In these same streets once walked Philip Massinger and Addison and Fielding, and it was here that "The Vicar of Wakefield" was issued from the press. As we pass out of the town, we see Old Sarum, the original site of Salisbury, which, like many other old towns, was first built on a hill and afterward descended to the valley. Opening before us is a beautiful view of Salisbury Plain, and the day does not pass without seeing the shepherd. This is pre-eminently an agricultural region. The chalk crops out frequently; but, barren as it seems in a quarry, it offers fine opportunities to the farmer, as the abundant hay crops testify. It is an open country, and we may see for miles around. The fertile fields, many of them dotted with haystacks, cut off as clean as a knife can cut them, offer a pleasing variety of color. Brilliant fields of poppies, in gay British red coats, are drawn up in line, with heavy platoons of grain behind them, as if martialled for review on this 17th of June.

We pass through Amesbury, a pretty little village with houses with thatched roofs hanging well over the mud walls below and protecting them from rain. The walls along the road are also of mud, and protected likewise by a thatched cover. There is a curious old church, and the curate shows us about with evident satisfaction. Old Roman bricks were utilized in the walls. No one knows just how old this venerable church is. It goes back centuries, and makes our old landmarks seem but yesterday affairs. It was here that Queen Guinevere came to die, and her diminutive head may be seen on a window sheltered and overshadowed by the Virgin. The burial fees for the sexton are posted up like a cabman's tariff, to prevent overcharging, and we read that a four-foot common grave and bell rung one hour costs three shillings and sixpence, the bell rung two hours costs six and sixpence. Circular clumps of imposing beeches stand in a kind of communal isolation on the plains, and the driver has no explanation to offer of this singular arrangement except that they were planted in imitation of Stonehenge. Each group is a round grove temple by itself.

From the pictures I had seen of Stonehenge I had obtained no adequate idea of the massiveness and imposing character of these enigmatical stones. One can easily retrace the outer circle they formed and reproduce the inner ellipse. Some say there were two circles and two ellipses. This is not a fortification or a house,—more likely a tomb or a sanctuary. It is not Greek nor Roman: it may be pure British. In its formation, its inner and outer circles, it looks more like the famous "pigs' puzzle" than anything else. These rude stones have been transported a long distance: they are not found in place here. Some are of sandstone, and some are granite. They have been rudely worked with tenons or bosses and sockets to fit the lintels on the piers. The blue stone in the centre is regarded as an altar, and recalls the altar stone in the centre of the circle of the old Greek theatre. The solitary stone standing out on the plain is said to show clearly the orientation of this temple, and experts can trace a sacred way. All around are barrows and tumuli, as if this were a central sanctuary in the midst of an ancient cemetery. We ride back partly over an old Roman road, and have a walk, too, over the downs, then follow a charming road pleasantly shaded, going through Dernford and Woodford, and seeing Lake House that looms up like a castle with bay windows and parapet. They are haying in the fields near by; and a woman's face shines under the enormous fork of hay which covers her head and shoulders,—a sort of rural bonnet, not unbecoming, though a little out of style for city folk. With such a head-dress this woman still walked like a rural queen. This 17th of June was not brought to its appropriate close until Mizippi and the writer had left the carriage, and by a flank movement over the downs had executed a march of three and a half miles on Salisbury, which surrendered its charms without bloodshed. If it was not a legal holiday here, there was nothing unlawful in our way of enjoying it; and not a word of protest was uttered by any one in authority from the queen down to the town policeman. But I suspect that, instead of taking England by surprise, we were completely captivated ourselves.

But I have left to the last the most exquisite element in our enjoyment of Salisbury,—the beautiful cathedral. I refuse now to treat it in any critical mood, or to indulge in invidious comparisons. It is an oratorio in stone; and one can enjoy an oratorio in stone, like an oratorio in music, without stopping to compare it with everything he has heard before. Nearly all of the English minsters and many of the smaller churches have some individual elements of historic interest or artistic beauty, and I find it easy to like a good many. Salisbury has two characteristics which heighten its charm. One is the perfection of its setting, the other the unity of its design and execution. Unlike so many of its rivals, its building time did not straggle over two or three centuries, exposing it to the influence of more than one style of architecture. It was finished within a period of forty years. Instead of a mixture of styles often interesting to the architectural analyst and grammarian who is fond of parsing the construction and translating the stone patois, we have one of the most beautiful and perfect examples of the pure English Gothic, thoroughly harmonious and uniform, without a single discordant note or any foreign element.

But a gem may be spoiled by a bad setting. There are cathedrals whose proportions are obscured by the meaner buildings which cluster around them, or they must be viewed in piecemeal from the narrow streets that engirt them. It is the charm of Salisbury that it stands on a lovely green, with nothing to interfere with the full display of its grace, symmetry, and harmony, or the realization of its perfect repose. The verdant tapestry of lawn, not cut up and slashed by gravel walks, seemed to have been unrolled as a carpet to soften the tread of the worshipper. In this close of Sarum no vehicles, no sheep or cattle or secular intrusions, are allowed. Superb elms and some of the noblest cedars I have seen shade the aisle leading to the west front.

The interior lacks the Doric strength of the Norman style and the warmth of cathedrals in which the light glows through much stained glass; but the unbroken unity of effect so characteristic of the exterior is reflected within, where its influence is even more needed. On Sunday I heard a sermon here which in its doctrine was certainly as mediæval as anything in the architecture of the building; but it could hardly be called a Gothic sermon, for it was not sufficiently pointed. This was the only thing that jarred, and nearly half the congregation protected themselves against any such impression by leaving just as the sermon was about to begin.

The cloisters and the chapter house have an eloquence of beauty which even the verger cannot spoil in telling you about them. The single pillar in the chapter house and the groined ceiling, the arcade, and the curious series of sculptures in the spandrels of the arches command the eye. From no point is the cathedral so imposing as from the north-east corner, where you have a view of nave, the two transepts, and spire, which is not equalled by any cathedral I have ever seen. The spire is the highest in England, four hundred feet from the pavement to the top. It was not a part of the original design or execution, but the work of the second architect some fifty years after. It is beautifully proportioned. It is only when one stands directly under it that he can have any idea of its great height. One of the finest views of it we had one day, as we took a boat and rowed up a branch of the river, and at a bend in the stream saw the church across the meadows, and the graceful spire rising in lofty beauty and perfectly reflected in the calm water. So well preserved is this beautiful edifice, so little spoiled either by time or restoration, that it is hard to realize that we are looking at a building which was begun in 1220,—six hundred and seventy-five years ago,—and, save the spire, completed within the space of forty years.

One revolving English picture will not easily fade from our memory. The pleasant domesticity of "Elysian Villa," the symphony of roses in the garden, the meadows and the winding river, the trout lying in the shade of the tree and eating the bread-crumbs we drop to them,—two of them four-and-a-half pounders, but with no fear of the frying-pan,—the monitory spire taking our thoughts from things below to those above, the broad greensward in the cathedral close, the villagers promenading on the lawn, the noble arcade of trees, the beauty of bishops' garden, cloisters, and chapter house, the ride over the hills, the walk over the downs, and, most perfect of all, the picture, from the north-east corner of the close, of a temple of worship which after six hundred and seventy-five years still seems almost as fresh and graceful, as grand and imposing, as when it was first dedicated to the worship of God.

S. J. B.

A PLEA FOR MR. MICAWBER.

BY E. P. POWELL.

It would be presumptuous to say that Micawber is the best drawn of all of Dickens's characters, but he certainly is one of the very finest and strongest. Many of Dickens's characters are too finely worked up, exhibited after dissection. Mr. Micawber is a bold, free sketch. His weaknesses are not on exhibition, although you perceive them: whereas Copperfield and Pickwick are satires on themselves. Copperfield is beautiful, loving, lovely, but fatally selfish. Pickwick is a good-natured old man, lacking in common sense. Aunt Jane and Micawber are the two for whom you feel at the parting most real admiration, and that sort of love which goes through the full gamut of life. What they do has brought tears to your eyes.

On his weakest side Mr. Micawber stands for a very large part of human beings. He is waiting for something to turn up: this is precisely what they are doing. Fortunately for some of them, things always are turning up in this world; but, unfortunately for others, things are also frequently turning down. This believing, trusting side of human nature Mr. Dickens was careful not to make either ridiculous or mean. Mr. Micawber is lovable, not hatable. We have a warm feeling for him, and are conscious that he has a warm feeling for us. There is no keen plotting to take advantage of us. He believes in nature: he believes in human nature. He is sure of the innate goodness of things. Uriah Heep is the opposite character. He has no faith. He plots and counterplots purely on the basis of selfishness. Such characters multiplied would prevent human society. It was the finest wit that brought them into antagonistic juxtaposition. Micawbers and Heeps naturally hate each other. One symbolizes sunshine; the other, darkness. Micawber is large; Heep is small. Micawber is apparently a failure; Heep apparently a success; but in the end the first has done a good life-work, and the latter is worse than a collapse.

Micawber stands for faith, slightly exaggerated; Heep, for works, slightly exaggerated. And, after a thorough acquaintance with the two, we are all far better convinced than by any sermon of the wonderful power of faith. Optimism, we learn to say, is, after all, the first great duty of a human being. Do things turn up always to a sincere believer? "Well," Mr. Micawber says, "not exactly the things we expect to see turn up; but something turns up, and to an honest heart something a good deal better than what the heart hoped for or asked for."

"My foot is on my native heath! My name's Micawber!" These are two superb facts that a pessimist is never sure of. He never realizes that the earth is his, is his native land, his beloved, blooming heather home. He is always in doubt where he is. He is always decrying the present, and looking out for a future. He, too, is waiting for something to turn up, but meanwhile fails to see that something wonderful has turned up. It is a curious fact that all great religions have dropped into pessimism. They cannot see any good about them. They take to cursing those who do. They call great national assemblies of Uriah Heeps together to forbid any one to believe in the to-days. Uriah goes by his book; and, though he would not steal from you your purse, he steals your future happiness. He plans that at some time he is to be enormously wealthy, and you are to be poor. His chief consolation is truckling for that proud day when he is to become great and rich. Mr. Micawber sees the glory of his native heath.

Then Mr. Micawber is proud of his name. He is Micawber. He is not somebody else. He is not asking somebody else to bear his sins and their penalties till he can have a new name in another world: he is Micawber now and forever. At the worst poor, and not having much of pelf or honors, he is on his native heath, and he is Micawber. When he meets a friend, a foe, or a critic or a judge, he strikes his breast bravely, and will not deny himself. Mr. Balfour would not know what to do with Mr. Micawber, because with Mr. Balfour the first thing of importance is that no one is of the least worth but is saved by the blood of an atoner. Mr. Martineau answers "that personal guilt and goodness are exchangeable qualities, that may be shifted by compact, like deficit and surplus between debtor and creditor, condenses into a small compass the maximum of contradiction to the very essence of morals." Heep is humble: he is nobody, less than nothing; he hopes for pardon only in some one's else goodness. Micawber squares himself to accept his own name and his own record.

Mr. Micawber is always ready to share his last meal. He does not stand for the sharply competitive phase of social life,—the crowding down and out. His great, big arms are not all elbows. They reach out to circle in and embrace the largest possible number. Not quite sound on production, he is thoroughly sound on the subject of distribution. He is a fairly good sample of our social reformers, all of whose theories are capital in the way of equalizing wealth, but rather feeble in the way of securing a maximum of productive labor. Indeed, it is likely that, if we had a surplus of Micawbers, we should all starve to death. Not a whit different would be the fate of five million Henry Georges. The charm of profit-sharing hangs on the amount of profits there are to be shared. Five cents among ten boys will not largely go to settle the problem of human misery. There is more profit-sharing in the slums than in the flats, more in the flats than in the cottages and villas.

Yes, we are compelled to see that my friend, Mr. Micawber, is not quite a "practical" man. He barely keeps soul and body together; but, then, his soul is a big one, and his body a big one. Uriah Heep's soul is growing smaller and smaller, and his body is getting weakened; but he has no sort of difficulty in keeping them together. Carlyle suggests that a preliminary to the problem of salvation is whether your mean little soul is worth saving. Uriah bent his whole power to making sure of being kept, not to being worthy of being kept. Micawber unconsciously was busy with making him worthy of salvation. We do not care to overlook this weakness. It was not practical. When he died, he could not look back, and say: "I have been a very practical man. I have built up a big business, have a huge house, a costly family, am a success; and now,—well, now I am going to die away from it all." This splendid success is not to be denied to many. It is the present business and social ideal. People who never wait for anything to turn up are dying every day with this proud record: they are able to leave a big heap behind them, and an obituary telling of it. Micawber failed in that, but he had a big soul; and we all love the big fellow,—and that's the end of it.

KIDD'S "SOCIAL EVOLUTION."

Hon. Theodore Roosevelt has an article in the North American Review for July which is characteristic of the writer. He deals with his subject with clearness, force, and directness. We give the following:—

RATIONAL SANCTION.

Mr. Kidd does not define what he means by "rational sanction." Indeed, one of his great troubles throughout is his failure to make proper definitions, and the extreme looseness with which he often uses the definitions he does make. Apparently, by "rational" he means merely selfish, and proceeds upon the assumption that "reason" must always dictate to every man to do that which will give him the greatest amount of individual gratification at the moment, no matter what the cost may be to others or to the community at large. This is not so. Side by side with the selfish development in life there has been almost from the beginning a certain amount of unselfishness developed, too; and in the evolution of humanity the unselfish side has, on the whole, tended steadily to increase at the expense of the selfish, notably in the progressive communities about whose future development Mr. Kidd is so ill at ease. A more supreme instance of unselfishness than is afforded by motherhood cannot be imagined; and, when Mr. Kidd implies, as he does very clearly, that there is no rational sanction for the unselfishness of motherhood, for the unselfishness of duty or loyalty, he merely misuses the word "rational."

SUPRA-NATURAL AND ULTRA-RATIONAL SANCTIONS.

Mr. Kidd's definitions of "supra-natural" and "ultra-rational" sanctions, the definitions upon which he insists so strongly and at such length, would apply quite as well to every crazy superstition of the most brutal savage as to the teachings of the New Testament. The trouble with his argument is that, when he insists upon the importance of this ultra-rational sanction, defining it as loosely as he does, he insists upon too much. He apparently denies that men can come to a certain state at which it will be rational for them to do right even to their own hurt. It is perfectly possible to build up a civilization which, by its surroundings and by its inheritances, working through long ages, shall make the bulk of the men and women develop such characteristics of unselfishness, as well as of wisdom, that it will be the rational thing for them as individuals to act in accordance with the highest dictates of honor and courage and morality. If the intellectual development of such a civilized community goes on at an equal pace with the ethical, it will persistently war against the individuals in whom the spirit of selfishness, which apparently Mr. Kidd considers the only rational spirit, shows itself strongly. They will weed out these individuals, and forbid them propagating, and therefore will steadily tend to produce a society in which the rational sanction for progress shall be identical in the individual and the State. This ideal has never yet been reached; but there have been long steps taken toward reaching it, and in most progressive civilizations it is reached to the extent that the sanction for progress is the same not only for the State, but for each one of the bulk of the individuals composing it. When this ceases to be the case, progress itself will generally cease, and the community ultimately disappear.

Mr. Kidd then defines religion as being "a form of belief providing an ultra-rational sanction for that large class of conduct in the individual where his interests and the interests of the social organism are antagonistic, and by which the former are rendered subordinate to the latter in the general interest of the evolution which the race is undergoing," and says that we have here the principle at the base of all religions. Of course, this is simply not true. All those religions which busy themselves exclusively with the future life, and which even Mr. Kidd could hardly deny to be religious, do not have this principle at their basis at all. They have nothing to do with the general interests of the evolution which the race is undergoing on this earth. They have to do only with the soul of the individual in the future life. They are not concerned with this world: they are concerned with the world to come. All religions and all forms of religions in which the principle of asceticism receives any marked development are positively antagonistic to the development of the social organism. They are against its interests. They do not tend in the least to subordinate the interests of the individual to the interests of the organism in the general interests of the evolution which the race is undergoing. A religion like that of the Shakers means the almost immediate extinction of the organism in which it develops. Such a religion distinctly subordinates the interests of the organism to the interests of the individual. The same is equally true of many of the more ascetic developments of Christianity and Islamism. There is strong probability that there was a Celtic population in Iceland before the arrival of the Norsemen, but these Celts belonged to the Culdee sect of Christians. They were anchorites, and professed a creed which completely subordinated the development of the race on this earth to the well-being of the individual in the next. In consequence they died out, and left no successors. There are creeds, such as most of the present day creeds of Christianity, both Protestant and Catholic, which do very noble work for the race, because they teach its individuals to subordinate their own interests to the interests of mankind; but it is idle to say this of every form of religious belief.

HUMBLE HELPERS.

BY S. E. W.

In a recent book review some editor sighed for a story which should deal with high-bred people instead of the wearisome sameness of sketches from low life, for conversation in books taken from the lips of the educated instead of the dialect of Negroes and mountaineers, and wondered if authors thought there was no romance in life in good society. He deprecated the craze for slumming, which was leaving its imprint even upon light literature. But there has been a revelation at the base of our revolution; and we are learning that the lives spent in factories may be as heroic as those in clubs, that a maiden with dyed-stained fingers may be more maidenly than Clara Vere de Vere, and that gentle hearts may as often beat beneath cheap calico as under linen lawn. A few illustrations may serve to correct the false view entertained by some who have not yet fallen under the charm of a noble life lived in very ignoble environments.

There is an "unvested sister" in this city who has been closely associated with life among the lowly for more than a dozen years. She had thought her gift might be the very useful but homely one of simple good cheer; and so she shared it in attics and cellars, going home at night with a great joy at her heart because some sick woman had blessed her "glad face" or some despondent man had been encouraged to try once more to win in the awful struggle against poverty. But last summer an overwhelming sorrow came into her own life, and the weeks usually spent in joyful home-going were like a cyclone of death and disaster.

She had shared all her joys with her poor; and she bravely resolved to spare them any knowledge of her suffering, and returned to them without the ordinary trappings of woe. One of her first meetings was with a hunchback dwarf to whom she had ministered through years of pain and bitterness of soul. His quick and sympathetic eyes read something in her face which he feared, yet longed to know. So he asked softly if all were well at home.

She answered that the mother who made it home had gone to heaven. Tears filled his dark eyes; and, touching her hand with but the tips of his trembling fingers, he responded,—

"Life is full of hard places, and they that are safely past them are happiest."

What poet could have rendered a psalm of immortality in more hopeful key? And this giver of comfort spends his days in a saddler's shop, doing the most monotonous of mechanical work, with only Sundays for books, and holidays to be dreaded because a day off the bench means loss of pay for a day's work. His is one of the loneliest souls in a great city. His kindred all gone, and his social relations under the blight of cruel deformity; yet he philosophizes on life and the hereafter in a quaint but happy fashion.

The next to note the grief she strove to hide was a grimy locksmith in a tiny shop,—a man whose sturdy piety makes his life one of strength and repose, even amid many hardships and distress. He asked, with keen but sidelong glance, which showed he was afraid of the ground he was treading, if life had been smooth with her during the summer. When told of the loss sustained, he dropped both file and key, his face contorted as if he were suffering physical pain; and then, as if that were not in accordance with his unshaken belief in the Father's goodness, he said:—

"Ah, miss! life would be a sorrowful journey but for help from up yonder"; and, looking heavenward, his face seemed momentarily illuminated as he added, "God grant ye have that in your hour of need!" From a little club of joyous working girls the shadow was kept until a few evenings since, when they began some eager questioning about the home-going this summer. She answered that there would be no more home-going until she should go to find her mother, who went to heaven almost a year ago. Their faces paled, and deep-drawn breaths showed the shock they suffered; but their comfort came in increased gentleness of manner, and not in speech. Perhaps the sweetest ministry was from a girl whose loaf of bread must be seen at a cooking-school exhibition. There were various exercises in different rooms, from one of which the visitor hurried with only one thought for the moment,—to get out of hearing of the young voices that were singing "Home, Sweet Home." She fled past the poor girl who presided over a table of bread and rolls, not stopping to praise them, but returned after half an hour under the sky with composure regained and a few words of apology to "Maggie," whose brown eyes brightened, as she said:—

"I'm glad you came back. I was going to speak to you when you passed; but I saw there were tears in your eyes, and so I didn't say anything."

Gentle Maggie! Such sweet silences help to check the tears.

And these are among the lowly people of whom the reviewer of novels is weary!

There is too little knowledge of the hearts of these people even among many who are in close sympathy with their lives. Too many of their visitors wear their rainy-day clothes when going among them, just as they withhold their best thoughts, under the mistaken impression that a woman with sodden hands must perforce carry a dull brain, or that a young girl in a carpet factory would be stirred with discontent at sight of a pretty gown. Worse than all, the notion that "trailing clouds of glory" never pass over courts and alleys as they do over avenues.

Those who have pearls to cast need have little fear of their falling among swine. Should the much dreaded swine be found, they would be like those of Circe's time, capable of retransformation, if one but carries the magic wand of fraternal love.

LIFE IN ARMENIA.

I have seen a very large number of Sassounians from all the villages that suffered during the massacre. I have eaten, drunk, travelled, and lived with them, studying their ways, their views, their desires, hopes, and fears; and I have no hesitation in saying with emphasis that a more quiet, peaceful, God-fearing people is not to be found in any part of the world. They are hardy, no doubt, sober, abstemious, and can live on an excuse for food which would kill a European in a week. Their piety does not entail that deep respect for truth which Westerners regard—in theory, at least—as one of the bases of all true religion. But, then, their condition is their best excuse. It is absolutely impossible to be veracious and to live in Armenia, as things are at present arranged. The wretched people have embodied this melancholy fact in one of their proverbs: "He who speaks the truth must have one foot in the stirrup."

A lordly Kurd may enter an Armenian house at any hour of the day or the night, and ask, "How many carpets, how many Turkish pounds, how many sheep do you possess?" And the higher the estimate, the greater the number that the defenceless man must give up then and there to the armed bully. Go to any Armenian shop in Erzeroum, Moosh, Van, Bitlis, Kherput, and ask the shop-keeper to narrate his experience of Turkish customers, be they simple folk or officers and officials. They inquire the price of an article, pay one-third, sometimes a half, and promise the remainder in a few days. And the vender never receives another piastre. This is done every day of the week. An Armenian in Erzeroum is suspected of having spoken with a European,—with myself, for example. He is charged with the crime,—perhaps he has actually committed it, without feeling any severe remorse of conscience. If he admits the fact, he is a ruined man. His trade will suffer, the police will have him boycotted, and a week or so later he may be in the typhoid section of the Erzeroum prison, where the inmates are dying like flies. Veracity is a delightful virtue; but it requires a certain soil to be properly cultivated, and the soil of Kurdistan lacks all the essential qualities needed. Even a liar may note and a hypocrite criticize the unveracity of the Armenian people; but, when the historian has explained the temptation, the moralist may feel disposed to palliate the defect.

The truth is that, with all their faults, which are mainly traceable to the serfdom in which they live, the Armenian population is the sole progressive element in Asiatic Turkey; and their potential influence for good, as a moral and intellectual leaven, should be measured less by the unattractive qualities which they have necessarily developed than by the latent germs which have never yet had an opportunity of blossoming into realities.—London Daily Telegraph Correspondence.

WHAT UNITARIANS BELIEVE.

BY REV. N. HOAGLAND.

We believe in being loyal to our own reason rather than to that of any other man or set of men, however good they may be. We believe that through reason and conscience comes the revelation of God of highest authority, and that to ignore and repudiate that which speaks to us in our own souls is to dishonor God and cheat ourselves of God's best help. While we do not believe that even reason and conscience are infallible, we do believe that they are to be trusted. We believe they are worthy of being trained and developed. We believe that in our own deepest reason and conscience God speaks to us more directly than through any reported message to another person. Consequently, we do not accept creed or Bible as final authority; for we do not believe that revelation stopped two thousand years ago, but that,

"Answering unto man's endeavor, Truth and right are still revealed."

As to the doctrine of the Trinity, which limits the manifestation of God to but three forms, we would say we believe not only in a God in Trinity, but in multiplicity. We believe that every form that hath power and life is a manifestation of God, and yet that there are not many Gods, but one God,—"One law, one life, one element."

Then, in regard to Jesus, we not only believe he was all he claimed to be in the most authentic Gospels, but we believe mankind is all he claimed for it. In the same sense that Jesus was God we are God. That is not saying any of us are as perfect as he, but it is saying that we may become like him; for did he not exhort his disciples to "become perfect even as the heavenly Father is perfect"? So, instead of believing in one Son of God, we believe in millions of them. And for my part I think there are just as God-like men walking the earth to-day on missions of peace and good will, whose hands and hearts are as busy doing good, as ever walked it in the days gone by. The moral government of the world would be a failure, were it otherwise. We believe that Jesus of Nazareth is the great religious teacher of our race, and we gladly acknowledge him as such. But we do not think that our best way of honoring him is to make claims for him he never made for himself. We do not think that our best way of showing respect to him is to beg him to grant us special favors through no merit of our own. We feel that the highest honor we can pay him is to know the truth about him, and to follow his teachings and cherish his spirit in our hearts. The greatest homage we can give him is to be like him.

To sum up, we believe in the moral nature of God and man.

We believe that, as man becomes more moral, more obedient to the law of justice and love, he will become more divine. We believe that God is not less kind and just than we are, but infinitely more merciful and righteous. We believe in a continuous and ever-growing revelation of God's will to man. All scriptures that inspire life with goodness are our Bibles. Punishment is a necessary result of evil-doing. The only way to escape it is to "cease to do evil." That one can do evil and escape its natural results is no part of our gospel. Punishment is God's schoolmaster to whip us into the higher life, if we will learn by no gentle teachers. The future life is not to be feared any more than the present. The life to come is an outgrowth of the life that now is. Heaven or hell begins here. "As a man soweth, that shall he also reap."

The teachings of Jesus as given in the Gospels we accept. He is to us a spiritual leader and guide. He is our teacher in the way of moral action and spiritual life. We prefer his simple teachings to the elaborate doctrines of many of the later creeds, baptized in his name, but which are only slightly touched with his spirit. But we accept not only one teacher as sent from God, but all who reveal to us the truth that makes for life eternal.

GEN. GRANT'S CHILDHOOD.

In the July Century are printed extracts from a rare and curious Japanese "Life of Grant." The following is from it:—

"From the time of his birth he was different from an ordinary baby. His body was large. He weighed 1 kwan, 292 me. As he grew, his thought became deeper accordingly. It was seen by the eye of every man. He showed no color of fear, however great the sound that came into his ear. When he was not fully two years old, his father, Jesshi Rumito Gurando, happened to carry him outside of his house; and some bad young men in the neighborhood, looking back at Gurando Kuen, said: 'We hear that this baby, as people say, has a brave heart, and never fears anything. We will try whether this is true or false.' And they went away and got a pistol, and gave it to the hand of Gurando Kuen, and pulled the trigger. Then came out a bullet like a thunderstorm. The baby was not afraid of it, and never changed the color of his face, but, pointing to the pistol, asked another shot. The father as well as the bad boys was astonished, and there was no one who did not roll his tongue."

TINY REPUBLICS.

A quaint little republic came to light only recently when the citizens of Andorra boldly threw off the yoke of tribute to the French. 'Tis true it was only the sum of $200 which they refused to pay; but their action was sufficient to recall from obscurity for a moment the Lilliputian realm nestling on the heights of the Pyrenees. The vale of Andorra measures less than eighteen miles in either direction; but it is the home of one of the oldest republics in the world, the constitution of which is four years older than England's Magna Charta. The Andorrese number in all but 10,000 souls, and these and their ancestors have lived for a hundred years in the heart of Europe without having written one word of its history.

But Andorra is only one of a score of tiny republics,—miniature nations, some of which are only to be found marked on navigators' charts. Tavarola, for instance, is the smallest republic on the face of the globe. It occupies an island off the north-east coast of Sardinia, and comprises fifty-five people. It enjoys, however, the distinction of equal suffrage. Then there are Goust, Franceville, and San Marino, all smaller than Andorra. Truly, one-half of the world knows not the other half.—Philadelphia Record.

AMERICAN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

The following letter has been sent to the secretary of the Western Conference and the various State and local conferences in the Middle West, according to a vote of the directors of the American Unitarian Association:—

At the last meeting of the Western Conference certain resolutions were adopted concerning a closer working union between the American Unitarian Association and the churches and conferences of the Middle West. These resolutions were duly reported to the Association, considered, so far as time permitted, by a majority of the directors, and will be presented to the various State and district conferences for consideration.

Recognizing the fact that a plan for missionary work, including so many details, should not hastily be adopted, recognizing also the Congregational independence of the various conferences whose approval is necessary, the directors of the Association, without coming to any definite conclusion as to its merits and defects, have instructed their secretary to address a letter to the conferences concerned, saying that, while they do not bind themselves to the acceptance of the plan proposed, they do heartily approve of the general purpose to be attained; namely, a more effective co-operation of the Unitarian churches of the West with one another and with the American Unitarian Association. They do not wish to anticipate the action of the several conferences. They do most heartily desire to come into closer working relations with them all. They ask, therefore, for a frank expression of opinion from all concerned as to the wisdom of adopting this plan with or without modification. If there should be general agreement in regard to this or any other plan of co-operation, the directors of the Association believe that, with mutual good feeling and a common desire to serve the cause represented by our Unitarian churches in the West, all the details of a sympathetic co-operation will be adjusted in such a way as to meet all legitimate demands.

With assurances of the heartiest sympathy and a desire to find continually new ways of mutual helpfulness, I am, in behalf of the directors of the American Unitarian Association,

Yours very truly,
GEORGE BATCHELOR.

WOMEN'S ALLIANCE.

The fourteenth annual meeting of Maine State Branches of Women's Alliance of Unitarian and Other Christian Women was held at the Unitarian church at Houlton on Wednesday, June 26, 1895. The meeting was opened by the president, Mrs. S. F. Hamilton of Saco, who in a few well-chosen words extended greeting to those present at this our fourteenth anniversary, and reviewed our progress as an Alliance from the first gathering in the gallery of Hollis Street Church, Boston, at one of our anniversary meetings, to the present time, and spoke of the help we have been able to give, not only to Indian and Negro schools, but also to solitary dwellers on farms and Western prairies through our Post-office Mission.

In the absence of our secretary-treasurer, Miss M. H. Kelley of Portland, Mrs. Barry, acting secretary, read the report of the previous meeting, also the treasurer's report, showing the receipts of the year to be $918.05, expenditures $881.82, leaving a balance of $36.23. Mrs. E. M. F. Bartlett of Waterville, our national director, reported the year's work to have been encouraging, bidding us go on with courage for the future. Miss M. E. Fox, Post-office Mission director, reported that the work throughout our State was growing, Castine having entered upon the work during the present year, and the other Branches increasing the number of correspondents. The churches of West Gouldsboro and Sullivan are direct outcomes of our Post-office Mission work.

Reports from the various Branches were read by Mrs. True of Augusta, Mrs. Wood of Bangor, Mrs. Alexander of Belfast, Mrs. Wadsworth of Eastport, Mrs. Hall of Kennebunk, Mrs. Perkins of Portland, Miss Mason of Saco, and Mrs. Jones of Waterville. Mrs. Hamilton reported that the Castine Branch was doing good work when she visited them in May; and Miss Lovering of Houlton, a student at the Castine Normal School, also spoke in regard to that Branch. No reports were heard from Yarmouth, Brunswick, Winter Harbor, Houlton, West Gouldsboro, and Sullivan. Mr. Ramsey reported that a Branch of the Alliance had just been started at Farmington, but no work done as yet.

In the enforced absence of Mrs. Jordan of Portland, who was to have read a paper, this was omitted; and the ladies listened to a very able paper by Mrs. Catlin of Eastport on the subject, "How can we best do Missionary Work?" followed by an exceedingly practical paper by Mrs. March of Saco, in which she recommended the appointment of a woman missionary in our State. These papers were discussed by Mrs. Sarah Hooper of Massachusetts, Mrs. Beach of Bangor, and others. Mrs. Beach thought the time had come to start a Unitarian church in Lewiston, and hoped the Unitarian women of the State would take the matter in hand this summer. Miss Fairfield of Saco moved that a committee be appointed to take this matter of missionary work in hand, which motion passed; and Miss Fairfield, Mrs. True of Augusta, and Mrs. Beach were appointed that committee. It was also voted that the conference be asked to appoint a committee to act with this committee.

The Nominating Committee brought in the following list of officers for the ensuing year, who were balloted for and elected: president, Mrs. Sarah F. Hamilton of Saco; vice-presidents, Mrs. J. L. Marsh, Saco, Miss Helen Bates, Waterville; secretary and treasurer, Miss Mary H. Kelley, Portland; Post-office Mission director, Miss M. E. Fox, Portland.

A rising vote of thanks was given to the ladies of the Houlton parish for their kind hospitality. Also a vote of regret and sympathy was extended to Miss E. C. Jordan and Miss M. H. Kelley for their enforced absence, after which the meeting adjourned. In the evening a Branch of the Alliance was formed among the Houlton ladies which we were very glad to welcome to our fellowship; and at a business meeting of the State Alliance held later it was voted to send Mrs. E. C. Jordan of Portland to Washington in October as our delegate, with all expenses paid, and also to pay the expenses of our president, Mrs. S. F. Hamilton, to this meeting.

F. W. BARRY, Sec'y pro tem.

Religious Intelligence.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be sent in by Saturday Morning; announcements of meetings which are to take place must be sent in before Tuesday Noon.]

THE following is the list of preachers at the Union Church of North-east Harbor, Me., for the summer of 1895: July 7, President William De W. Hyde of Bowdoin College; July 14, Rev. Samuel A. Eliot of Brooklyn, N. Y.; July 21, Prof. George Harris of Andover, Mass.; July 28, President L. Clark Seelye of Smith College; August 4, Professor Francis G. Peabody of Cambridge, Mass.; August 11, Rev. Daniel Merriman of Worcester, Mass.; August 18, Rev. Samuel M. Crothers of Cambridge, Mass.; August 25, Rev. Philip S. Moxom of Springfield, Mass.; September 1, Prof. Charles Carroll Everett of Cambridge, Mass.; September 8, Rev. Charles F. Dole of Jamaica Plain, Mass.

BATTLE CREEK, MICH.—At a meeting of the Independent Congregational Church of Battle Creek, held July 2, after hearing Rev. T. J. Horner two Sundays, it was voted unanimously on first ballot to extend him a call to become pastor of this church, at a salary of $2,000 per year. The congregation at Battle Creek is said to be the largest liberal congregation in the West outside of Chicago, the regular attendance being from three to five or six hundred.

BROOKLINE, MASS.—The ladies of the First Parish have given Mrs. Brown, before the family left for their summer home in Cataumet, a valuable silver tea-set and a diamond pin of exquisite workmanship in the form of a snowflake. These gifts were accompanied by the following letter, signed by one hundred and fifty-two ladies of the parish:—

"Dear Mrs. Brown,—We, the undersigned, take great pleasure in sending you these tokens of our love for you, and our appreciation and admiration of your unselfish character and your noble devotion to duty during the years that you have lived and worked among us. May the future bring to you, as you deserve, true though new friends, and may you still remember with affection those old and tried friends who part with you with real sorrow! Sincerely yours."

Mr. Brown will begin his work at King's Chapel the 1st of October, and will then take up his residence in Boston. He will preach no formal farewell sermon in Brookline, but expects to occupy the pulpit of the First Parish Church for the last time as settled minister of the church the last two Sundays in July.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.—The Unity Club of the Fourth Society recently gave a very successful dramatic entertainment. The play was well received, and the financial returns were unexpectedly large.

SHERBORN, MASS.—At the First Parish Church the usual afternoon service was given largely to singing by the choir, interspersed by a short address from the pastor and recitations by the children. The old church looked beautiful, adorned as it was by flowers and ferns.

SOUTH NATICK.—Children's Sunday at Eliot Church was a full day. The pastor in the morning gave a sermon upon "Child-dren and Flowers." At the close eleven little ones were christened. In the evening a special song service was given, the children taking part with recitations. The church was beautifully decorated.

TACOMA, WASH.—The First Free Church of this city has recently appointed the following honorary trustees: Octavius Brooks Frothingham, Boston, Mass.; Francis Ellingwood Abbot, Cambridge, Mass.; E. W. Meddaugh, Detroit, Mich.; Mrs. John C. Phillips, Boston, Mass.

JAPAN.—We have received the following as translated by Rev. Mr. MacCauley: "Invitation to Second Commencement of Senshin Gakuin, June 19, 1895. Meiji 28, 6th month, 19th day, 1895, Senshin Gakuin, Second Commencement Exercises: essay, 'Individualism,' graduate, Yohei Iitsuka; oration, 'Japanese Ancestor Worship,' graduate, Iwas Hasunuma; presentation of diplomas, President Clay MacCauley; address, 'Occidental and Oriental Ethics,' ex-President Hiroyuki Kato of Imperial University."

THE MAINE CONFERENCE.—The Unitarians of Maine have been on their annual pilgrimage, the thirty-first annual meeting of the Maine Conference having been held at Houlton June 25-27. The story is long, but we will recite it briefly. The first chapter is headed "Bangor." Rev. S. C. Beach extended an invitation to the delegates west of Bangor to remain Monday night as the guests of the Bangor parish. He expected twenty-five: eighty-five pilgrims on divine business bent sought his shelter. Bangor, however, was equal to the emergency. Rev. Mr. Beach gave a few words of welcome, and introduced as the president of the meeting Hon. I. K. Stetson. Mr. Stetson gave an admirable address "from a business man's standpoint." Brief speeches were then made by all the visiting clergymen and some laymen, the general topic being "What the Spirit saith to the Churches." Having rededicated this historic shrine to the living God and to the freedom of the soul, we slept like tired and faithful pilgrims, to awake early Tuesday morning for the long ride to Houlton. At noon we arrived at Houlton. What a reception! Houlton, like Bangor! They royally entertained one hundred and twenty-five. At four o'clock the visitors were tendered a reception in the church vestry, where the royal welcome was further emphasized and a fine collation spread.

The conference opened Tuesday evening at 7.30. The sermon was by Rev. S. C. Beach of Bangor. It was a clear and strong presentation of the value of the Church in history, and an earnest plea for its present support. The last part of the sermon dealt with the problem of giving religious instruction to the young.

Wednesday, at 9 A.M., a devotional service was conducted by Rev. Walter Lane of Presque Isle. The speaker dealt with the religious life. Many took part from the pews, and the service proved interesting and helpful to all. A business session was held at ten o'clock, Major P. M. Fogler of Augusta presiding. The principal item of interest was the report of the Missionary Committee by the chairman, Rev. J. L. Marsh. From the report we gather that the churches are in good condition. Yarmouth is the only vacant pulpit, Brunswick being closed for the present. Maine has seventeen churches, with movements at Standish, Sullivan, and West Gouldsboro. For this work we have fourteen regularly settled ministers. We have recently lost Rev. A. G. Pettengill to Hyde Park, Mass. If growing Boston's need is greater than that of Maine, we can but rejoice that Hyde Park has such a strong preacher and pastor. The woods of Maine are full of Unitarians. Thousands are undiscovered. Of organized, conscious Unitarians there are fifteen hundred families, or about six thousand persons, who know what they want and are bound to have it. Our church property is valued at $225,000, with an indebtedness of only $3,750. The aggregate seating capacity of our churches is 6,350; average attendance, 1,800; invested funds, $40,000. Six churches received aid last year from the American Unitarian Association. Farmington, which has been intermittently open for several years, is now open in earnest. Under the care of Rev. W. H. Ramsey, it seems destined to continue among the stronger societies of Maine. At eleven o'clock Rev. J. C. Perkins of Portland read a paper on "Church Organization." The paper was an able and a practical setting-forth of the growing need of organization, and this, too, along new and progressive lines. Hon. J. O. Bradbury of Saco opened the discussion of the subject, followed by many others.

The afternoon was devoted to the Women's Alliance. The president, Mrs. S. F. Hamilton of Saco, opened the meeting with Scripture and prayer, followed by an address of greeting embodying the story of the birth and growth of the Alliance. Mrs. M. F. Bartlett of Waterville, as national director, gave a few well-chosen words of good cheer. The report of the Post-office Mission, by Miss M. E. Fox, gave proof of the efficiency of this branch of our work. An interesting feature was the short reports from the several Branches, showing the good work being done. Mrs. H. D. Catlin of Eastport read an able paper, strong in its earnest appeal for larger and more sympathetic work by the Maine churches. Mrs. J. L. Marsh of Saco gave a paper on "Missionary Possibilities." The essay was direct in its word to the churches to do more effective work. Emphasis was laid on individual work in the churches. Mrs. Marsh outlined a missionary scheme, which was referred to the Missionary Committee. Interesting and hopeful remarks were made by Mrs. Hooper of Boston, who defended the much abused Unitarian man. Mrs. S. C. Beach of Bangor made an aggressive address on Maine missionary endeavor, presenting a plan for attempted work in Lewiston. Mrs. E. A. D. Burrington of Belfast read a paper dealing with the practical side of church life. As a result of the meeting, a Branch was formed at Houlton under promising auspices. At 7.30 a platform meeting was held, Hon. J. O. Bradbury presiding. Mr. Bradbury made an excellent address, setting forth the larger meaning of the church. Rev. D. M. Wilson spoke earnestly along the line of a greater religiousness in the churches. Rev. W. H. Ramsey followed with an address on "The Religion of Jesus as a Creed." The speaker saw here the only basis of union for divided Christendom. Rev. T. J. Volentine closed the meeting with an address on "The Transforming Power of Religion." Defining religion to be right relation to the universe, the speaker went on to show that in winning this relation man was transformed.

Thursday, 9 A.M., service of communion, conducted thoughtfully and helpfully by Rev. W. T. Phelan of Portland. 10 A.M., business session. Among the many items of business was a vote to continue the publication of the Church Exchange another year. This is a paper in the interests of the Maine churches, issued monthly. A Publication Committee was elected, consisting of Rev. J. C. Perkins, Rev. E. E. Newbert, and Mrs. R. W. Sawyer. Rev. D. M. Wilson made an address dealing with the missionary opportunity in Maine. Rev. E. E. Newbert read an exhaustive paper on "Unitarianism as a Philosophy and as a Mode of the Spiritual Life." Rev. H. D. Catlin opened an able discussion of the topic.

The afternoon was given up to pleasure, the Houlton friends taking the occasion to show their guests the beauties of the town. At 7.30 a platform meeting was held, Rev. E. E. Newbert presiding. Rev. Archibald MacDougall of St. John, N.B., spoke upon "The Basis of Authority in Religion." He argued to show that reason is always the court of last resort. Rev. L. D. Cochrane read a paper on "The Liberal Christian's Opportunity and Duty." He outlined our ideal position, and then asked what we are to do with it. The spiritual democracy is now building upon the civic democracy. We must remain the logical protestants. Rev. E. J. Prescott spoke of the practical bearing of the liberal faith. Let us, he said, have honest, candid thinking and a free democratic spirit. Rev. J. L. Marsh reviewed our pilgrimage, the heights to which we had attained. We will now go down from our mount of communion to the people. A thank-offering was made to the Presque Isle church, amounting to about $100. The conference closed with the benediction. The next annual meeting will be held with the church at Farmington. Following are the principal officers for the ensuing year: president, Hon. J. W. Symonds (Portland); vice-presidents, Gen. Selden Connor (Portland), Hon. W. P. Whitehouse (Augusta), Hon. J. O. Bradbury (Saco); secretary and treasurer, Rev. J. L. Marsh (Saco).

Forty-three miles north of Houlton is another shrine of the liberal faith. Friday morning many turned their faces homeward; but sixty live Unitarians, not content to return short of complete fullness, boarded the train for Presque Isle and our church of Northern Aroostook. It rained, but we were happy. We took the Presque Isle homes by storm. They seemed glad to be stormed. In the afternoon we gathered in the pretty little church for a love-feast. And we had it. In the evening a more formal meeting was held. Rev. J. C. Perkins opened the service, outlining the topic for the evening,—"Our Gospel." He was followed by Rev. Messrs. E. J. Prescott, E. E. Newbert, L. D. Cochrane, and J. L. Marsh. Rev. Walter Lane, the minister of the church, and Mr. Daggett, a leading layman, spoke words of welcome. For many, at least, these were the best meetings of the Aroostook series; while the minister and people were encouraged by our presence. Perhaps we have never had a better conference. Never was there a closer fellowship of our ministers and churches. Never has Maine Unitarianism been in fairer condition, with a larger readiness for real missionary endeavor. Yes, our conference felt the spirit of Jesus, the missionary zeal of Saint Paul, the logic of Calvin, the fervor of Wesley, the intellect of Channing, and the poetry of Emerson. Surely, the churches of Maine must be quickened as the result of this "Aroostocratic Conference!"

—The recent meeting of the Epworth League at Chattanooga was large and enthusiastic. The members one morning charged upon Lookout Mountain, and held a service there. The big gathering on one day was the largest in numbers ever held in the South. Many practical subjects were discussed, and the speakers and preachers emphasized the truth that the Church must deal with practical questions. Besides the purely evangelistic work and the future of Methodism, the convention discussed questions of a more general character and those which touch on secular themes: "What to Read," "How to Read," "Entertainments," "The Duty and Privilege of Giving," "Christian Citizenship." There was much plain speaking about political sinners, and the mayor of the city was commended for his honesty and clean administration of office. The nature and extent of the gathering illustrate the swiftness and force in popular organization among the Methodists. This league is strictly denominational. It began in May, 1890. Now it has fifteen thousand chapters with a membership of a million. In the future a much larger increase will doubtless be reached.

—The services of laying the corner-stone of the Westminster Cathedral was an imposing affair. The high dignitaries of the church were present in full force, and everything was conducted with ritual pomp and splendor. Eight thousand were in attendance. The tone of the addresses was hopeful in anticipation of great increase of the Catholic Church in England. In connection with this it was noticed that Cardinal Vaughn at the luncheon toasted the pope before the queen. This has caused a very animated discussion among the Anglicans, and given rise to a considerable feeling of disapproval for thus giving the pope the precedence of the queen.

—The Pan American Congress of Religion and Education will meet at Toronto, Can., from the 18th to the 25th of July. The range of subjects which will be discussed is very wide, and the topics are all of vital interest at the present time. The gentlemen who have been selected to address the congress upon these topics are among the ablest speakers and writers of the country, both clerical and lay; and they represent, in an unusually fair distribution, all creeds and schools of thought, from the most conservative to the most advanced. A glance at the titles of some of the subjects which will come before the congress for discussion will show that the issues are all live and timely ones. "Religious Congresses and their Responsibilities," "Christianity and Education," "The Debt America owes to Public Schools," "Municipal Reform," "The Rights and Duties of Labor," "The Adaptation of the Church to Modern Life," "Organization of Charity and the Catholic Church," "Recent Progress in Philanthropy," "Christianity and Labor," "The Outlook for Church Unity," are some of the topics set forth on the official programme.

—The Unitarian popular meetings on the Common continue to excite interest, and the success has been greater than the friends of the movement expected. Even the Sunday before last, though the day was stormy, there was a good attendance; and last Sunday, as the skies were propitious, a large congregation gathered to hear Dr. Fisk and Rev. Mr. Van Ness. The former gave a very able address on the development and progress of religious thought, while the latter spoke with earnestness and point on the duties incumbent on every citizen toward the highest welfare of the State and nation.

—Open-air services are held by the pastor of the Jefferson Park Presbyterian Church of Chicago. A Chicago correspondent of the New York Evangelist writes that experience is proving "that a magnificent evening congregation is a possibility, if one will waive the question as to which side of the wall it is gathered. Promptly at half-past seven, after a preliminary prayer-meeting, the people gathered 'at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation,' and the sound of the cornet, floating through the streets and across the park, announces that worship is about to begin. Hymn slips are distributed through the crowd, the choir are in their place, and the singing rises from many voices till it is heard afar. The throng is constantly swelling, and all is orderly and respectful and quiet. After the service of praise there is a brief Scripture reading, followed by a short earnest prayer. The anthem by the choir is not omitted, and its singing chains the people to the spot. After another congregational hymn a short sermon follows. While there is some loss of hearers during this time, it is slight, the main body standing devoutly right through to the benediction. All are then invited within doors, where the choir have already gone, and the lights are flashing and the great organ pealing out its joyful welcome. A large number respond, many of them being evident non-churchgoers; and the movement is helped by the personal invitations of the Christians as well as their example. A fifteen-minute bright but serious and pointed service follows; and at half-past eight both services are concluded, and the congregation disperses."

Business Notices.

The souvenir china with views of old Boston and the newer, imported by Jones, McDuffee & Stratton, including Faneuil Hall, the State House, and the Old State House, will interest many visitors. Their warehouse of seven floors is one of the interesting places to visit.

It saves One Dollar.—For many years the price of $5.50 has been considered as very low for a tubular iron bedstead of the latest approved pattern; but we notice that one house (the Paine Furniture Company, 48 Canal Street) has brought the price still lower, and announces a reduction to $4.50. This is certainly surprisingly cheap for these popular and dainty cottage bedsteads. They are just the thing for summer houses.

Dr. Lyon's Perfect Tooth Powder

Gives the most perfect satisfaction. It has a world wide reputation. Recommended by dentists.

Marriages.

In Sherborn, by Rev. Eugene De Normandie, James Francis Allison, of Dublin, N.H., and Emily B. Ware, of Sherborn.

In South Natick, 1st inst., at the Unitarian church, by Rev. J. P. Sheafe, assisted by Rev. L. R. Daniels, Harry N. Andrews, of Boston, and Anna L. Alger, of Natick, grand-daughter of the late Rev. Horatio Alger.

Deaths.

At North Brookfield, 28th ult., Mrs. Mary B. Jenks, aged 73 years.

Loyal through life, she carried that loyalty even to the grave.

At Albany, N.Y., 28th ult., Mrs. Rhoda Rice, aged 65 years.

The gentle life which has just come to an end was one of peculiar beauty. The serene, cheerful nature, the loving heart, the helpful hand, drew to her young and old alike. Her sympathies did not grow cold with years. To the end her response to all worthy appeals for help was ready and warm. She was an ardent Unitarian, uniting with Dr. Hale's church in Boston forty years ago, and afterward transferring her membership to the Unitarian church in Newton, Mass., where she resided eighteen years. She was actively interested in all work connected with the Unitarian Church. But, while in outside interests the practical hand and loving sympathy will be missed, it is in her home where the loss will be most profoundly felt. She was pre-eminently domestic, and the memory of her tender solicitude and watchful affection for those nearest and dearest to her will be at once their consolation and their grief.

In Cambridge, 1st inst., Mary Willard, daughter of the late Dr. Samuel Willard, in the 84th year of her age.

In the death of Miss Willard, her relatives and friends have lost one whose beautiful Christian life will always be a blessed memory. She was born in Deerfield, Mass., where she spent most of her life. The home of her childhood and youth was an ideal one, made so by the Christian spirit that pervaded it. She was fortunate in having parents who by precept and example gave her early instruction in the Unitarian faith, to which she was always loyal, and from which she received the strength and comfort the trials of her life demanded. No one could ever discover from any word she uttered that she had any suffering, either mental or physical, so completely did she conceal it by her cheerful submissive trust.

For many years she was an invalid, but no word of murmur or complaint escaped her lips. Her character was the union, in a remarkable degree, of many Christian virtues. She was patient and courageous, modest and unassuming, self-sacrificing and conscientious. In a word, her whole moral character had its root in a spiritual faith that hallowed and sanctified every motive, thought, and act. She could say with Paul, so entirely was her life hid with Christ in God, "I can do all things through Christ, who strengtheneth me."

She was beloved by the young as well as the old. In her they found a genial companion and a sincere friend. The wit and humor of her conversation had a charm for them. Her great interest in their work and pleasure made them forget her age.

Her intellect was clear and vigorous to the last, in spite of physical pain and infirmity. At the age of eighty she prepared and published the life of her sainted father. From time to time there came from her pen a poem or composition which breathed the spirit of her deep religious nature.

She loved the Latin classics, and within a few years had translated many of her favorite authors, especially Cicero, whose De Amicitia and De Senectute were a source of great pleasure to her.

Peacefully and calmly, as she had lived, she passed on. Her life was in the truest sense finished: it was complete in the beauty, dignity, and perfection of the Christian faith.

Truly she had a right to say at its close, with the apostle: "I have fought a good fight. I have finished my course. I have kept the faith. Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous judge, shall give me at that day, and not to me only, but unto all them also that love his appearing."

Religious Notices.

THE address of Rev. Carl G. Horst is Athol, Mass.

Situation Wanted

By a young man 18 years old (graduate of Bryant & Stratton's) in some business where faithfulness and application will count for future advancement. Address H. A. E., Office Christian Register.

ADVANCE AGENT WANTED

for high-grade entertainment. Good pay to a capable man. Address LOCK BOX 43, GARDNER, MASS.

A LADY with a pleasant home near Boston, and having the care of a young girl of thirteen, desires to communicate with parents or guardians who may be seeking a temporary or permanent home for one or more children. References exchanged. Address GUARDIAN, care Christian Register.

TO LET. The desirable house, 118 Highland Street, Roxbury; 11,000 feet of land; beautiful location; Norfolk House cars now run near. Two furnished cottages, West Falmouth. S. G. DAVIS, 113 Devonshire Street.

A SOPRANO SINGER of experience desires position in church choir. Highest references. Address H. M. W., care Christian Register.

For the Christian Register.

THINGS UNSEEN.

BY SAMUEL C. BLACKWELL.

What firm realities there are, but hidden to the human eye;
From sound and sight removed afar, and yet so intimately nigh.
Surprising structure and design, and beauty passing common thought
From realms beyond the vision's line within the scope of knowledge brought.
What firmaments beyond our ken pervade the awful depths of space!
What tiny life, unseen of men, the water and the air embrace!
The facts of sound and sight elude the narrow boundaries of sense.
The loves and hopes of earth are crude, and feeble our intelligence.
Yet now in each familiar face, and in the life and world we know
A primal thought we learn to trace, and growth discern in joy and woe.
What if in unimagined ways the hand divine shall guide us still
With warmer love and loftier praise, unfolding purpose to fulfil.
As dust to dust the body falls, so life to life the spirit lends;
And far beyond its crumbling walls the landscape of the soul extends.

Sermon Gleanings.

ACCEPT YOURSELF.

BY REV. ARTHUR M. JUDY.

Take first the matter of physical form and feature. A man must learn to accept his physical self faithfully and lovingly, or be forever barred from one of the highest felicities of religion. And I know that the issue at stake here is not small. Laugh as you may at the folly of sighing over one's looks, it is not a slight but a mighty folly. Some of the bitterest moments of rebellion that many souls pass through are the moments when they reject, revile, and hate their own looks. Where envying and strife is, says the good Saint James, there is not the wisdom that descendeth from above, but there is confusion and every evil work.

But, of all envying, what is more bitter, what leaves the heart more in confusion, than this which is involved in that moment when a man rebels against his ugly features or his insignificant person? Surely, here is practical impiety, for here is rejection and contempt for that part of the universe which comes nearest and counts most to the man; and, if there be one thing which that man must learn to do if he is ever to gain the peace of God, it is to learn to accept himself as he is, account it right and give thanks. Not an easy act of faith that, but one which the masters of the world achieved before they attained the felicity of true children of God. And as it is with looks, so is it with talents,—a man must accept what he has and be contented therewith if he would not lose one great opportunity for happiness. But this he cannot do, you may reply, because no man can be happy if he believes himself inferior. According to De Tocqueville, "the passion for equality in democratic communities is ardent, insatiable, insistent, invincible." And, I would add, it is not political equality alone that is thus ardently demanded, but intellectual equality as well,—moral equality,—that equality which will enable a man to feel himself the peer of any man. I would say not a word against this passion for equality. In it I see not only vast promise of incessant effort to improve, but I see also a stern rebuke to the thoughtlessness which ignores or underrates the point wherein equality does actually exist. Why should not every man look upon his own ability, and reverence and accept it with cheerfulness? But you exclaim, That is talking vaguely and in the air. Here we have, on the one hand, men who do telling work at every turn: here one who fails at whatever he tries. Is it possible for this latter to be content and accept himself with gratitude? I hope not. Occasion for discontent with himself every man has, as I said at the outset; and so long as a man sees that he is blundering he ought to have the grace to condemn himself vigorously. There is no other known way of increasing the sum total of talent in the world. But let the discipline be administered in faith and cheerfulness. Let him who recognizes his weakness not lose heart. Let him, like a true lover, take himself for better or for worse.

Suppose this self be poor in wit,—in talent to create or appreciate,—what then? This, I answer: accept it cheerfully, nothing doubting, as a skilful teacher accepts a backward pupil, saying to yourself, My work is to turn this dullard self into a wise and ready man. In "the sounding labor-house vast of being" my task is to transform my own folly into wisdom. And every man has that task set him, only it is not the same kind of folly—happily for the world—that each is given to transform. Here is the millionaire whose talent for accumulation needs little mending; here the great orator, poet, or philosopher, whose talents in their ways need no bettering. But, in other ways, what improvement those men are all called upon to make! what stupidity, in seeing a board, driving a horse, speaking to a child, treating a wife, do they exhibit! In the household even of their shining talents the poor, maimed, dull, ugly child has not been omitted. It is there to be cared for with exceeding care: it is there to be changed by love and patience and wisdom into a strong, alert, noble man. If they are to be truly thankful to God for their household of talents, they must be thankful for the defective as well as the perfect; accept the imperfect indeed as their grandest opportunity, their dearest blessing, since it enables them to be coworkers with God in the fashioning of that toward which all creation moves,—a pure, a perfect soul.

And I believe we ought to accept ourselves even in our wickedness in this same spirit. If we believe in the universe, if we believe in God, we must believe that there was some good reason for planting men in this world in their imperfect state. There prevails too largely the feeling, either implied or expressed, that the best thing God could have done, was to have planted here a world filled with perfect men and women. Why, the very conception of heaven as it used to be held, with its spotless saints and untamptable angels, was an unconscious arraignment of God for what he had made possible in this world. The only way we can possibly recall that unconscious accusation against God is to realize that not perfection reached, but perfection pursued, is the best possible state in which man or angel can exist. Once we enter unto this, which, I believe, to be the nobler theology, then we have ample reason for accepting ourselves with gladness, wicked though we be. If the truth should be forced upon us that there is a deep vein of cowardice, or deceit, or lust in our heart, shall we there-upon be utterly cast down and put out of all conceit and pride in ourself? I opine not. That wickedness reveals the essential work we put into this world to do. It shows us where our character yet remains to be made. It marks the point at which our ancestors left the task of soul-creating unfinished. It discovers the incomplete statue which God has handed on to us to chisel at. Why, then, shall we not receive this God-assigned task cheerfully? Why not accept this much-to-be-bettered self with gladness? Surely, God knew whether or not this was the best self to give us.

This does not mean to slacken for one instant the strain of conscience or of culture. The human self viewed in its broadest outlines includes, besides, the powerful impulses which lead to what is low, the incessant drawing which lifts to what is high. To accept this first part of one's self to the exclusion of the second part, and be content, is what makes a man a villain, rake, or hypocrite. But to know that one's nature is full of ignorance and wickedness against which culture and conscience must wage a ceaseless warfare, and to be content that it shall be so, that makes a man wise, happy, and devout. Believe me, there is a sense in which it is the height of presumption to be dissatisfied because you are in part ignorant and wicked. Jesus exclaimed, Why callest thou me good? There is none good but one, that is God. To rebel, then, against our wicked nature is to assert a claim to that which is the prerogative of the Almighty alone. I would like the earnest people who grow morbid over their faults to think of that fact. They ought to be a little more modest; they ought to be willing to be one of the great democracy of erring souls, not moan because they do not belong to an aristocracy of souls made perfect. In God's good time he will, we may dare believe, lift them by the great laws of conscience and culture nearer to that blessed rank; but in the present he has, we may doubt not, some splendid use which they are serving in their democratic incompleteness.

To use this doctrine to save ourselves from morbidness about our sinful state, to keep us back from the presumption of aspiring to the impossible, to give us the humility to praise God for the great gift of being, though there be dross mixed with its gold,—thus to use this doctrine seems to me the part of highest wisdom. Some way must be found by which the world of erring men can come to accept themselves lovingly and reverently, and this doctrine opens the way.

And it opens a way, too, by which they can come gladly to accept themselves in age and sickness. And, of all hard things, we know that to learn to grow old gracefully is one of the hardest. Hard, very hard is it to bear gracefully the failing of the senses, the bending of the back, the wrinkling of the face and the blurring of the eyes.

But, O men and women, this is what you and I must learn to accept, and accept graciously if we are indeed to accept ourselves. This is that awful inevitable which Epictetus tried so plainly to prepare us for.

Here our own will plays little part, or plays it only in a far-reaching way. Here our being passes largely from reign of the moral into the reign of natural law. Here vital, chemical, and physical processes take us in hand and make us not wholly, but largely, what we are. Here, therefore, is it primarily a question whether we can willingly accept ourselves as the laws of God fashion us?

To grow gray, that is your doom. To detect the hand become unsteady, to notice the memory fail, to discover an organ that is defective, or to find out the predisposition along which the fatal disease will creep,—that is to know yourself; and to accept the self so known with undaunted courage, to do your work in the world with steadfast faith in God's love,—that, methinks, is to attain the measure of the stalwart man. Emerson, in his address on the history of the town of Concord, declares that what chiefly interested him in the annals of early wars is the grandeur of spirit exhibited by a few Indian chiefs. One, in the midst of awful torture, being asked how he liked the war, replied, "I find it as sweet as sugar to Englishmen." There was a true hero; and there was shown the spirit which you and I must have when the tortures of age and disease come upon us, if we are to take our place among the sublime victors who have accepted every joy and every misery which pertains to the inevitable self, and find it sweet.

THE RISEN LIFE.

BY REV. STOPFORD A. BROOKE.

The true Christian life wears the common dress of humanity. "It makes all things kin," as has been said: "it does not stand out angular against any part of mankind." Its mark is that humble spirit which is, in the sight of God, of great price. It does not dogmatize, it does not exclude. It is meek and lowly of heart, and not only has rest within itself, but it brings rest to others. Its kingdom is not of this world, though its work is here; and therefore its servants do not fight. It does not strive nor cry, nor is its voice heard in the streets. It is content to grow like the violet, hidden from the eye, known only by its scent; universal as the daisy, giving like it a "sympathy which cares not should it be set at naught," in unexpected nooks among the rocks and fields of common life, in meekness, like that flower, fulfilling its "function apostolical." Read the Beatitudes: that is its charter. Read the chapter of Saint Paul on charity: that is its spirit and its activity. We have torn it away too much from practical life, we have hedged it round with rules and observances. So that, when men are asked to live the life of one who has risen with Christ, they answer, "It is impossible."

Let us make it a little plainer, though not less difficult; a little simpler, though not more comfortable.

Take public life. This is the sphere in which a Christian life is most often repudiated as impossible. But the Christian life is in the imitation of Christ for the love of his noble humanity, and that does not lead you away from the world: it only bids you rise above the spirit of the world. It is to have a high standard of righteousness and love,—Christ's standard,—and to live as close to it as you can, exerting all your strength. It forbids the tricks by which men enter Parliament; it forbids the corruption of others by any means whatever; it forbids the violation of conscience for the sake of party for the sake of a seat. It forbids the business man to use the money of others in chance speculation: it bids him keep his hands clean and his honor untainted, not only before the world, but before the tribunal of his own conscience. It tells him he has no right to go by the current standard of commercial morality,—a standard which seems to say, "Get all the money you can, by any means which will not bring you into the grasp of the law or under public shame." It tells you to believe men rather than to suspect, to give a courteous honor to an adversary rather than the dishonor of abuse, to have the justice which sees your own value and that of your opponent, and allots the fitting meed to both. These and many other things are a part of the Christian resurrection in public life.

Another side of public life is our life in society. The best way in which we may there in heart and mind rise with Christ is by the thoughtful watchfulness of love. Thoughtlessness of heart slides into insensibility of heart, and, if encouraged in youth, makes the cruel men and women of after life. How often do we ask ourselves before we speak whether our speech will do wrong or give unnecessary pain? We are proud sometimes of speaking daggers, and delight in the cleverness which makes another wince. It is a pride and pleasure which is base; for it is inhuman, and it is as far removed from the gentleness and sweetness of Christ as heaven is from hell. Then, again, there is that careless habit of "plain speaking," and the way we have of plunging ourselves upon it, till it passes with some into overbearingness and with others into acute disagreeability. We little think how much it jars upon persons more sensitive than ourselves, and how much suffering it gives. It is good to be plain spoken, but within the limits of charity. Still more mischievous is that looseness of tongue which proclaims everything that its owner has heard from another, without a thought whether the other may like what has been said in a moment of abandon to be proclaimed upon the housetops, which seems to think that nothing is sacred to feeling, and that no seal of confession, though not exacted, ought to be understood as laid upon the lips. That is abominable want of thought and love.

Much of what has been said about social life applies also to domestic life. That which most spoils it—when love is there—is petty quarrels. I do not speak of differences of opinion upon subjects worthy of

CHANDLER & CO.

Comfortable, Easy Summer Gloves.

During the warm summer days Kid gloves are distressing, and Silk gloves handsome and expensive, but not very serviceable.

We have always in stock

The Ideal Summer Glove.

Fits like a kid glove, and wears perfectly. Made of Silk and Lisle, with buttons, 75c., and without buttons, 60c. per pair.

Ask to see

THE IDEAL SUMMER GLOVE.

CHANDLER & CO.,

Winter St., Boston.

discussion. Plenty of those intellectual minds within the household keep its atmosphere fresh, enliven and stimulate the intellect, heart, and conscience of the family. But I speak of quarrels. Familiarity of life with one another gives room for unchecked development of temperament; and, when opposed temperaments do not care to play gently in and out among one another, ungracious disturbances ruffle the surface of our happy lake of life. Let them go on day by day, and these tempers, once so unfrequent, never let the waters rest. Love remains, but life is spoiled. Therefore let the music of these words enter into your spirit, and keep them with you till you learn how to make their meaning into daily act: "Learn of me; for I am meek and lowly of heart, and ye shall find rest to your souls."

THE JAPAN MISSION.

II.

One ill-disposed writer not long ago spoke of us as "the parasite of Christendom" because Unitarianism draws so many of its adherents from among those who had been nurtured orthodox Christians. The chief religious book of the year, written by a man once a leader in the orthodox fellowship, is decidedly rationalistic, and speaks of the future of religion in Japan as sure to be akin to Unitarianism. In our own public meetings we have no difficulty in procuring as speakers the very best scholars of the country. At the dedication of Senshin Gakuin last spring we had only representative men. In our special monthly lecture course during the winter past the lecturers have all been men of widely spread reputation as scholars and teachers. These lecturers are not all Unitarians in the sense of being members of any of our organizations; but they are open admirers of our principles, and are willing fellow-workers with us in these endeavors to get public opinion under the influence of the best knowledge and faith. I have been told privately of not a few who would assume our name, were there not political and social embarrassments which at present they cannot set aside. Moreover, I have been told scores of times in many parts of the country that the one form of religion which Japan can accept, and the only form where it is ready to accept any in place of the traditional faiths now passing away, is one which shall be free and rational. Most of those who have spoken to me have used the name "Unitarian." They meant, of course, Unitarianism as a method, not as a dogma.

Then, further, as you will see below, Mr. Kanda, the temporary secretary of our association, has received more than twenty-five hundred letters during the year past,—letters from inquirers seeking information about Unitarianism, and light on dark problems. The letters come from all sects, Buddhist as well as Christian. Mr. Kanda tells me that the Buddhists are especially interested in theistic inquiry and in the relation of Unitarianism to orthodox Christianity, and that the Christians wish particularly to know about our faith concerning the creation of the world, what we think of the Bible, and our belief concerning Christ. Here are samples of the questions:—

"If Unitarians do not believe in the Bible as divinely inspired verbally, how can they select truth from out the errors? If they select by the authority of private judgment, why, that often errs." "While Unitarians acknowledge mistakes in the Bible, they yet assert that it is the best religious book. Do they make this assertion because they know no other sacred book, or because they have studied all the Bibles in the world?" "Is Unitarianism a selection from the truths of all religions, or has it itself all truth? If it is truth, where is its Bible? If it is a selection, then is it not merely a patchwork?" "Does the Unitarian say that God cannot be explained by the human mind? Yet Unitarians say that God is good and all-powerful. Can God then be partially known? If so, who discovered this much about God?" "Is there any necessity for salvation if man is evolving from lower to higher life by means of his own nature? If moral sin or a low level of life is a stage necessary in order to reach a higher level, then is moral sin allowable? If man is not depraved, then his present state is good enough. There is no need of progress."

"If Unitarians believe in the immortality of the soul, do they believe that the soul had a beginning, but has no end? or had the soul neither beginning nor end?" "If the soul is everlasting, then after death where does it go?" "If there is compensation for right and wrong done, is it made in this life or after death?" "If man is evolving from a low to a higher life by his essential nature, where is the need of God's help? or why should we consider at all the divine existence?" "If God is omnipotent and omniscient, there is no necessity that he should create low beings that they may rise. Why does he not make all things perfect at once?" "Why did God make things perfect at the start, and not since then?" "If God created one race able to progress, and another to remain uncivilized, is he not a partial God? Is he sufficiently morally worthy to be called a moral God?" "Is life everlasting or infinite?" "If life did not exist in the far past, what is the cause of life?" "Why is one man prosperous and happy, and why are there born cripples, deaf-mutes, and other miserable beings?" "Has the universe no beginning and no end? If neither, then there is no need of a God. If God created the universe, whence came the material to work with?" The relations of spirit and matter, of religion and ethics, were the burden of many writers. "If ethical culture be extended, what need is there for religion, except for the forms of burial?" "Does religion bear only upon our destiny after death?"

These questions in a thousand forms come into our office constantly year by year. Is not your mission heavily charged in being made the minister to so many thousand minds concerning these inquiries of profoundest moment? Who can be equal to the responsibility thus laid upon us? Where, in your work, is there a duty of farther-reaching consequences than is imposed here? Still further, your representative has had a very close connection with the religious activity of this country, in the preparation, month by month, of a "Summary of the Religious Press" of the empire, published in the most widely read of our daily papers. For some months, on account of more imperative demands upon my time, this "Summary" has not been made. I hope to resume it before long. But I have reason to believe that it has been exceptionally helpful to the foreign community who are interested in Japan's religious progress, and has been generally welcomed.

In reference to the organized work of your mission there is this to say. We have so organized our three departments of church extension, publication, and education that very little of our energy is misdirected or wasted. Church extension is necessarily much limited. The First Unitarian Church is flourishing. But it is by no means a self-supporting body. Its minister is Mr. Laji, the superintendent of our newly reorganized Post-office Mission. He has quite a good hearing, from sixty to two hundred in the regular audience. Only lately have there been attempts at the collection of money from the members. A collection of twenty and a half yen was made last year. I have no doubt that more systematic work will be done in this direction hereafter. Church work, as you understand it, is yet very strange to this people. But the duty of taking care of their own work will be steadily kept before them. There are numerous out-stations where Unitarian organizations—organizations having that name—exist. They have no pastor, only lay leaders. We cannot supply them with ministers, having not yet the properly trained men to send to them; nor have we any funds with which to support ministers for them. There are ten or more such organizations. There could be hundreds of such organizations, with many thousands of members, were we ready to start them financially,—a work which we cannot and which we have not the desire to undertake. By and by it is our hope that, having received the influence of our literature and our school, the Japanese will of themselves organize for liberal religious work, and support their own organizations. We cannot and we do not wish to change our present policy. We are here as a distributor of ideas. As they take root, we must leave their nurture and the harvest to the care of the people to whom we give them. To this end our publication department is doing good service, I think. At present we are limiting the distribution of our literature almost wholly to special inquirers and in answer to direct requests. Our record for the year past is as follows:—

1. Books: Dr. Clarke's "Steps of Belief," 1894 published 750, distributed 37; Prof. Bixby's "Crisis in Morals," 1893 published 750, distributed (1894) 153; Mr. Kanamori's "Present and Future of Christianity in Japan," bought (1893) 500, distributed (1894) 89; Theodore Parker, Unity Series, published (1893) 2,500, distributed (1894) 740; William E. Channing, Unity Series, published (1893) 2,500, distributed (1894) 745.

Prior to 1894 we had published a "Service Book" for religious service, 1,000 copies. We have only about 350 copies of the book on hand, and are revising the volume for a new issue. This book was compiled for us by Rev. W. H. Hawkes, and is of especial excellence. The translation can be much improved. The Japan Unitarian Association has published two Year Books, the first one having an edition of 1,000 copies, the second 500 copies. Two Senshin Gakuin catalogues in English, of 1,000 copies each, have appeared. One catalogue in Japanese of 250 copies was published. In all, these extra publications have numbered 4,750 copies, and, except as above noted, have all been distributed.

2. Our magazine has been published as follows, since it was started four years ago: as Unitarian, 20 issues, amounting to 30,000 copies; as Shukyo, 41 issues, amounting to 41,000 copies. In all, 71,000 copies. We have bound nine volumes of the magazine into 550 copies, nearly all of which have been distributed.

Our tract publication has been quite large during the past four years: Rev. A. M. Knapp, "Unitarian Principles," 30,000; Rev. M. J. Savage, "God of Evolution," 20,000, "Man of Evolution," 5,000; Dr. H. W. Bellows, "Orthodoxy and Liberal Christianity," 5,000; Rev. Clay MacCauley, "Threefold Standard of Unitarianism," 10,000, "In what meaning is Unitarianism Christian," 10,000, "Fellowship of Religions," 10,000; Rev. W. H. Hawkes, "Jesus Christ," 10,000; Rev. W. C. Gannett, "Life of the Bible," 10,000.

In all, our tracts during the past four years amount to 110,000; but previously Mr. Knapp had published large editions of Dr. Clarke's "Discourse on the Bible," Parker's "Character and Mission of Jesus," Dr. Hedge's "Problem of Evil," and "The Influence of Liberal Christianity in America," by himself. Each edition was of 5,000 copies, I think. In all, 20,000.

At present we are about to publish second editions of Dr. Bellows's tract and Mr. Savage's "Man of Evolution." We are preparing for the press translations of my little book on "Christianity in History," and of the Unity pamphlets "James Martineau" and "Ralph Waldo Emerson."

During the year past we had comparatively few of our tracts left for distribution. Our work was especially taken up with the Senshin Gakuin and the completion of our new hall, Yuñtzukwan. In the coming year we hope to enlarge our publication list and to fill up some of the emptiest shelves of our store-room used for former publications. In all, however, we have sent out more than 200,000 missives bearing in some way the gospel of our faith and hope.

I wished to say much of our education department, operative in the Senshin Gakuin. This school is hardly yet known by our home folk as it is. The kind of building we occupy has been pretty well described in pamphlet and in our papers. But the school as a body of living teachers and students is, I fear, not yet well known to the churches from whom comes the small funds by which we live. Our students are not children, but are young men of from eighteen to twenty-seven years of age. They are at least high-school graduates, and they have a working knowledge of the English language. In mental acumen most of them are fully equal to American young men of their years. In intellectual acquirements most of them stand creditably high, a few of them exceptionally well onward.

Lying before me is a pile of essays recently received from my own classes. Here are some of the subjects: "What is Christianity, and what the Present State of Christian Thought and Life in Japan?" "Characteristics of Confucianism"; "Japanese Mythology and Doctrine of Creation"; "Shinto"; "Analysis of Doctrines of the Shingon Sect,"—criticism of Buddhism; "The Ideal Church in Doctrine and Practice"; "Scientific Study of Mind"; "Japanese Religious and Social Customs concerning Birth and Death"; "Biographies of Kobo Daishi, Shinran Shonin, and Nichiren,"—Japanese saints; "Ancient Doctrines in Japan concerning the Soul, Heaven, and Hell"; "Early History of Christianity in Japan." Some of the essays, with but little correction, would be interesting and instructive reading to our home friends. We have already had about forty students in our school. At present we have seventeen. Our examinations are thorough, and our exactions very strict. Our grade of scholarship steadily advances. The faculty is composed of seven persons, teachers of good standing. We have been crippled badly by the uncertainty of tenure hitherto the fact among our teachers. The return to America of Profs. Wigmore and Lawrance, and the death of Prof. Liscomb, were serious losses to us. Prof. Droppers is still here. Rev. Mr. Lloyd, an English missionary, has done a good part in helping us to carry on the work our lamented Prof. Liscomb had to give up. But so far there is no one to take the important chair vacated by Rev. Mr. Lawrance. How sorely we need a successor for him, words here cannot show. Our Japanese teachers are much to be praised for excellent scholarship and for painstaking care. Our churches are much indebted to them. Without them Senshin Gakuin would not be a possibility to-day. When the institution was established, there were five persons here representing the American Unitarian Association,—Messrs. Wigmore, Liscomb, Droppers, Lawrance, and myself. To-day, of these, Prof. Droppers and myself only remain. Indeed, of the seven persons who during the past four years have been connected with your mission, only the two just named are here; and almost at any time Prof. Droppers may go back to America. During these four years the mission's strength has thus been steadily diminishing, while its work and importance have been greatly enlarged and differentiated.

Only $4.50.

For quarter of a century man has wrestled with the problem of an inexpensive bedstead; and here is the fruit of his labors,—an Ivory-white, tubular iron, round-cornered, dainty Bed.

Lighter than wood; stronger than solid iron; absolutely clean; compact, convenient, durable, portable, and low-priced,—we believe there is not a bedstead virtue that is not included in this repertoire of excellences.

We finish the frame in Black Enamelled or Ivory White, as preferred. It is practically impossible for dust or dirt to lodge in the crevices of this frame, and it can be washed without injury.

Each bedstead is outfitted with woven wire mattress, all complete. We quote a lower price this year than ever before,—$4.50 and upwards, according to size.

PAINE FURNITURE CO.,

48 CANAL STREET.

May I not hope that the churches you represent will give the Japan work a serious and just consideration? The mission ought to be far better sustained than it has been hitherto. I do not mean financially. Yet any one can see that we have almost a pittance to use compared with the importance and extent of the work done. What I speak of most is moral support. The work is well worth doing; and now that it has been carried on so long, and has become, in many ways to the Japanese, an object of exceptional public attention, it ought to be done well. Our churches should be glad to pay its cost. In a measure, too, in this mission, it is not so much the Japanese people who are now undergoing test as the Unitarian churches of the United States. The Japanese people have been led to look upon the Unitarian mission as a serious attempt to help them. The mission no longer is obscure or an experiment. It must therefore be conducted until we can lay its work down, honorably done, or, if the work is suffered to languish, we who have placed the mission here and have bid the Japanese listen to our message must bear whatever consequences may follow our neglect. I earnestly ask, therefore, that the churches which the American Unitarian Association represents shall take the Japan mission under their willing care, and shall support it generously for a while yet, so that we can hasten the time when we can leave the cause we came here to advance, safely in the hands of the Japanese, and honorably return to our homes and to other duties.

Pardon me for this long and yet inadequate report. The field is far away, and there is much that you and our churches should know about it. I have tried to tell you much, but there is much more that ought to be told; and I believe that, long as the report is, it has not even yet so set forth the facts that those who read it will understand fully the appeal which the facts justify. I send the report, however, with the request that it be made well known to the people of our churches.

Respectfully submitted,

CLAY MACCAULEY,

Superintendent Japan Mission, A.U.A.

Tokyo, March 29.

Spiritual Life.

There was never a person who did anything worth doing that did not receive more than he gave.—H. W. Beecher.

The principal thing in life is not devotions, but duty; is not open utterance, but inward aspiration; is not formal requests, but earnest endeavors.—John C. Learned.

The endurance of love is no grim and stoical quality. It is a patience full of brightness. It is a fortitude the strength of which lies in the very depth of the heart's tenderness.—Philip Stafford Moxom.

Not a sound has ever ceased to vibrate through space; not a ripple has ever been lost upon the ocean. Much more is it true that not a true thought nor a pure resolve nor a loving act has ever gone forth in vain.—Robertson.

I have a very great confidence indeed in the kindness of God toward us. I do believe, if we shall find ourselves mistaken on either side in eternity, it will be in finding God more merciful than we expected.—Charles Loring Brace.

Love is not, when unguarded, all in all. It must be accompanied by the right reason of justice; for justice is the only element in which love can act without the danger of falling into weakness, favoritism, even folly. Indeed, justice is the other side of the shield of love.—Stopford A. Brooke.

Religion is erecting its altars, not to commemorate the supernatural, but the natural, as the greater and ever-present divine manifestation; not the exceptional authority of experience or history of one man or one nation, but that which is woven with the destiny of all.—John C. Learned.

Men feel and know that pain is a fact, although it is unseen. They need to learn that peace of mind is a fact, and comes by a well-ordered soul; that reverence is a fact, and brings us near to God; that elevated sentiment is a fact, and raises us into a higher society than earth; that sober faith is a fact, and gilds the horizon of our being with a heavenly glory.—Starr King.

Literature.

CHARLES FRANÇOIS BARNARD.*

Here is a book which can be read through in a summer afternoon, and no book published within the current year would better repay the setting aside of a summer afternoon for the reading of it. It has the same charm of style that marked Mr. Tiffany's biography of Dorothea Dix, the same quality of keen insight, expressed in pithy, quotable phrases. In this story of a strong, enthusiastic life lived among the beginnings of modern philanthropy what, for us, has become institutional, and to some extent mechanical, is closely personal, and has the fascination of personality, the interest of daring and patient individual experiment. The book is especially noteworthy and suggestive in these days, when the centre of moral and religious enthusiasm has shifted so decidedly to the sociological side. How marked, in this regard, the change has been in the last sixty or seventy years, is brought out admirably in the chapter on "Old Boston." So long as the population of Boston was "one of the most homogeneous in nationality, customs, and faith anywhere to be found," Puritanism, in this citadel of its faith, could not become conscious of its inherent limitations; but, "so soon as the miracle of foreign immigration began to show its proportions, it became clear that the machinery of the Church, as framed by Cotton, Ward, Newton, and the rest, was not adequate to the occasion. The Church, by that machinery, virtually proposed to any stranger who might arrive here with his family from Connaught or Bavaria or Genoa that he should purchase a piece of property called a pew, that he should lead his family there on Sunday at half past ten in the morning and at quarter past two in the afternoon. If he would do this, the Church, on the other hand, was ready to give him religious instruction. Such an offer, not made indeed with any urgency, was, of course, never accepted."

Dr. Tuckerman was the first to comprehend the drift of the new conditions, and his "ministry to the poor" was the first successful attempt to meet these conditions. Under him, as a master, Barnard caught the vision of the work to which his life was to be devoted. Dr. Channing preached the sermon at Barnard's ordination to this "ministry of the poor,"—the ministry at large. Mr. Chadwick, in his book on "Old and New Unitarian Belief," has shown us how far ahead of his time Channing often was in his theological insights and his religious sympathies. The remarkable passages quoted by Mr. Tiffany from this ordination sermon show that he was equally in advance of his generation regarding the spirit and the method of charitable work.

Charles Barnard, however, soon discovered that he was best fitted to do only one particular kind of this great work,—that which concerned the young people, the children. "Children never for an instant mistook his hearty human nature for the pious disguise of an atrabilious minister, surreptitiously bent on decoying them into a festival of dreary catechisms or spectral tracts."

At first he tried to do his work in co-operation with churches already established; but these churches had not sufficiently outgrown the Puritan tradition to be willing heartily to follow the lines of his genius, so there resulted the founding of the Children's Church, and finally the building of the Warren Street (now the Barnard Memorial) Chapel. Compare the story of the desires and the expectations in Charles Barnard's heart at the time this chapel was built with the desires and expectations of Arnold Toynbee two generations later, and you will find many points of resemblance. The idea of residence among the classes with which he worked; the idea of gathering in the rooms of his chapel as many as possible of the brightening and refining influences of the homes of the most cultivated people,—books, pictures, music, dancing, all sorts of innocent amusements and recreations; the idea of having these cultivated people themselves—merchants, doctors, lawyers, men and women of special gifts and high purpose—as his active fellow-workers; the idea of having his chapel the centre of

*CHARLES FRANÇOIS BARNARD. A Sketch of his Life and Work. By Francis Tiffany. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.

"activities, industrial, literary, mechanical, as well as religious,"—all this was included in Charles Barnard's as well as in Arnold Toynbee's plan; and much of it he worked out to completion.

Besides these, many other lines of work had an origin in Warren Street Chapel, which only recently have been incorporated in our public school system or in the public charitable work of our great cities,—the teaching of sewing and carpentering; the teaching of singing, which, strangely enough, was unknown in the public schools at the time Mr. Barnard adopted the practice in his Warren Street classes; the distribution of flowers to the sick; the giving of free rides and excursions into the country to the poor. It is surprising to learn, too, that Mr. Barnard inaugurated the custom of decorating the church pulpit with flowers; that before his daring innovation flowers were regarded as an impertinence in the sanctuary.

Indeed, no one can read the chapter on "Setting Object-lessons," in Mr. Tiffany's book, without confessing the truth of a remark once made by George Hillard to Mr. Barnard,—"You have made the chapel a university."

Necessarily, the force of Mr. Barnard's character made itself felt far beyond the distinct lines of his work among children. To cite one example of this wider, less frequently recognized influence, it seems true beyond a possibility of doubt that the establishment and development of the beautiful Public Garden in Boston was due primarily to his "foresight, indomitable persistence, and personal audacity."

At one time it was proposed to place his statue there in recognition of this fact. Unquestionably, Mr. Barnard himself would have cared very little for such a memorial. The continued existence of the chapel and the garden themselves would have seemed to him sufficient. But, if the tablet and the statue have any power to keep alive in each successive generation the nobility of the past,—and who that has visited Westminster Abbey would care to raise that question,—I know of no life which, for the good of the future, would better justify such commemoration than the life of Charles Francis Barnard. A. M. L.

THE AMERICAN CONGRESS. A History of National Legislation and Political Events, 1774-1895. By Joseph West Moore. New York: Harper & Brothers.—This great big octavo of 581 pages is interesting, if it is nothing else. But, besides being interesting, it is instructive. We cannot describe it better than in the words of the preface: "The first chapter is somewhat like a prologue, and serves to inform the reader in a rapid manner of the English settlement of the country and of the momentous events which led to the meeting of the first Continental Congress. Thereafter the history goes on in consecutive style to narrate the movement for independence, the doings of the Revolution, the making of the Constitution, the establishment of the constitutional government, and all the important legislative proceedings from the First Congress of the United States to the close of the Fifty-third Congress, the origin and growth of parties, the memorable actions of the Presidents, and innumerable other matters pertaining to the broad and diversified fields of American politics." A valuable trait, not mentioned here, is the description of leading statesmen, well, but not admirably done. There are also copious extracts from their speeches made on great occasions. As compared with Mr. Rhodes's history, the book lacks interest, partly because it is so much more condensed; but, then, it has the advantage over that of sweeping the whole field. The attitude of the writer is singularly disengaged in all the controversies which he describes. Take such things as the Cr dit Mobilier scandal and the charges against Blaine: he gives the facts in a plain, unvarnished way, and makes no attempt to fix the judgment of his readers one way or the other. This is, no doubt, the better way; but that it is the more interesting we are not so sure. The concise statements of such political movements as that for the annexation of Texas are admirably done. If one reads for entertainment, he will find abundance of it here; and, if he reads for instruction, there is plenty here to confirm other readings and many things elsewhere omitted, the personal equation in the choice of historical matter being something that is apparent in all histories.

A DAUGHTER OF THE SOIL. A Novel. By M. E. Francis. New York: Harper & Brothers.—This is a novel that has many turns and intricacies in its development. First we have a young girl giving her heart to a man far below her in character, if superior to her in station, and who is encumbered with one wife already. "Encumbered" is the right word; for she was a dead weight upon him, and a burden greater than he could bear. Discovering his former marriage, our heroine leaves him, but seeks him out when the first wife dies, only to find him on the verge of taking a third. He does so, and she dies; and then he seeks out number two, and wishes her to take charge of his child. She not only does this, but takes him into the bargain; and then all goes well. This skeleton of the story has a ridiculous appearance; but, as clothed by the author with the draperies of her thought and style, it appears very different. Whether the author means to suggest a social problem is not clear. Doubtless, many readers will find one in the book, and decide that the heroine should have held fast to the man who had deceived her, because he "loved much," and because he would have been transformed by her affection. But she did what she conceived to be her duty, and those who do that in these dreadful complications which so abound in literature and life will do better than those who let the stress of inclination have its way.

A FLORIDA SKETCH-BOOK. By Bradford Torrey. Boston and New York: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.—Bradford Torrey is well known by many lovers of nature as the author of several bright and interesting books on birds and flowers; and his old friends will welcome the "Florida Sketches," because we are introduced to new scenes and objects. The author gazes on nature with a quick and discerning mind. He makes the reader see what he would not if he himself travelled over the same ground, because his facts and descriptions are gathered at first hand; and this gives his pages a real value. No one can follow the author as he rambles in the "Flat Woods" or "Beside the Marsh," on the beach at Daytona, or along the Hills-

Souvenir China. Boston Views.

We have recently landed plaques, plates, pictures, trays, etc., having views of famous buildings of Old Boston and some of the newer, engraved from photos by Josiah Wedgwood & Sons of Staffordshire, and done under-glaze in their rich old blue borders. Among the views may be found

- Faneuil Hall.
- Old State House.
- New State House.
- Public Library.
- Adams Lean-to Houses, Quincy.
- Longfellow House, and
- Boston Common, 1836.

Also German Souvenir Trays, with pictures of Phillips Brooks, Trinity Church, Old South, Public Garden, etc., costing from 50 cents up. Also Parian Busto of Phillips, Lincoln, Grant, Sumner, Gov. Andrew, and Longfellow.

We invite attention also to our exhibit of Fine Pottery and Glass, gleaned by our buyers the present season at the source of production, in Staffordshire, France, Germany, Austria, and Japan, as well as the best products of American potteries and glasshouses.

Whether intending buyers, or those interested in seeing the finest products of modern pottery and glass, we invite inspection.

Never was our stock larger, more valuable and comprehensive than now; and never was pottery finer or at lower cost.

Visitors will find the

- Art Pottery Rooms, the
- Dinner Set Hall, the
- Glassware Department, the
- Lamp Department, and the
- Main Floor Display,

extensive exhibits in their line.

Wholesale and retail.

Largest variety to choose from and lowest values guaranteed.

Jones, McDuffee & Stratton,
China, Glass, and Lamp Merchants, (SEVEN FLOORS),
120 Franklin St., Corner Federal.

borough, or takes his trip on the Upper St. John, or in walks about Tallahassee, without being enriched with new knowledge and fresh impressions. We hear the notes of the new birds he meets, see their rich and brilliant plumage, or pause to admire the wealth and fragrance of the flowers, so vivid and accurate are his descriptions. The "Florida Sketches" give to the reader additional knowledge of the wealth and variety of the land of flowers and birds.

GOD'S LIGHT AS IT CAME TO ME. Boston: Roberts Brothers.—We have here one of many books that are the outcome of Christian Science and that sort of thing. As we read, we feel that here are elements of truth and soberness, but mixed up inextricably with what is unreal and absurd. Moreover, the writer seems to have a vocabulary of her own; and, however exact its denotations and connotations for herself, for her readers hardly do they exist at all. What we want, it seems, is "the clear understanding of the unconscious or spiritual mind." The words may convey an idea to the writer: they convey none to the reader. But we are on safe ground when she says, "Know all that is, and thou wilt know thyself." But again we lapse into obscurity, when, for an explanation of "that tired feeling," we have this: "The soul longs for freedom, while the mind, with its old habits, thinks and works on the physical plane; and so comes suffering." Possibly and probably, the writer is trying to say something that is good; but she is inarticulate. And, as compared with a diet of her phrases, what is described in the Bible as "filling the belly with the east wind" must be invigorating and satisfactory.

THE MASTER. By I. Zangwill. New York: Harper & Brothers.—Mr. Zangwill has been known chiefly as the masterly painter of Jewish life and customs and character, but this novel shows that he has equal power in a broader field. This book will undoubtedly be compared with "David Grieve," so closely akin are the general outlines of the two stories. The scenes of rough farm life in Nova Scotia through which Matt Strang passes are sketched with a strong hand, and form a vivid contrast to the artist life in London, with its disillusion, its mistakes, and its repentances. The final word of the book is that of "David Grieve," too. Even a mistaken marriage does not mean final disaster. Matt "had sorrowed and endured; he had sinned and suffered; he had known love,—the love of the soul and the love of the senses; he had known the heartache of baffled ambition and the dust and ashes of achievement." But out of all this travail of soul was born his art; and, like David Grieve, his life was not unhappy. The novel is very long, but it is well worth reading.

LITTLE KNIGHTS AND LADIES. Verses for Young People. By Margaret E. Sangster, author of "On the Home Road," etc. Illustrated. New York: Harper & Brothers.—There is a very genuine note in this volume of poems for children. Nothing is surer than that Mrs. Sangster is a lover of children, and that she has a very tender heart for their joys and sorrows. At the same time it must be said that her verses are very unequal, and that seldom do they attain to any literary value. There is something beautiful in this immolation of the author on the altar of her devotion to the children's joy; but it is certainly questionable whether she would not have done as well or better if she had been more exigent with her muse, and especially have curbed her predilection for the jingling kinds of metre. Moreover, we are of the opinion that the best verse written for children, except very little ones, is not that which is written down to the level of their taste and comprehension, but that which is written up to the level of some splendid heroism or some great event.

CHURCHES AND CASTLES OF MEDIEVAL FRANCE. By Walter Cranston Larned. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.—This record of a traveller's impressions of the great monuments of France does not study deeply into their history or the minute details of building, but shows love for their beauty and appreciation of the education and enjoyment they offer. The chapter on "Carcassonne" will reveal the amply sufficient reasons which certainly justified the longing of the old peasant to see the place, and will awaken the desire in others. There are two dozen or more illustrations that really illustrate. The literary style of the book is charming, and the reader will immediately wish to plan just such a tour for himself, though, in case that be not possible, the book itself is a substitute not to be scorned; and, in case one has already visited these cathedrals and châteaux, then nothing could be a more delightful reminder of them.

GOVERNMENT & CO., LIMITED. By Horatio W. Seymour. Chicago: A. C. McClurg & Co.—The author of this book bears a distinguished name and an additional "W." Whether his name indicates any blood relationship to Gov. Seymour we have no means of knowing. His political relationship is evident enough. He is a Democrat of the Democrats in his political theories, and he finds the sign of democracy in the absence of privilege. His book is "an examination of the tendencies of privilege in the United States." It is a very interesting one, a very searching one. We commend it heartily to those who believe in democracy, and are at the same time eager in their support of privilege of one sort and another. There is much more privilege in the United States than Mr. Seymour has indicated in his little book, and "that way danger lies."

THE BOOK OF THE FAIR. Auditorium Building, Chicago: The Bancroft Company. The fourteenth number of this great work has been received, and is occupied with the sketch and illustration of the "Fishery and Transportation Departments." We have very true pictures of the two buildings, and also minute details embracing a very wide variety of subjects. The text and the illustrations are finely done. In fact, the whole work will be a marvel; and "The Book of the Fair" will be of great value in itself, and keep alive the memory of the Exposition. No one who desires to have a permanent knowledge of the Exposition in all its details, put in the best form of book-making, should be without this work.

LIFE OF QUEEN VICTORIA. By Mill-cent Garrett Fawcett. Boston: Roberts Brothers.—It would have been impossible for Miss Fawcett to narrate in the compass of this book all the important events of the queen's long life and reign; but she has done something equally good by giving us a bright, connected account of its main features, dwelling on its formative influences in early life, and referring to the political and personal events of later years only so far as they illustrate the queen's character and her conception of her political functions. The result is readable and interesting. The book contains many anecdotes.

PATRIOTS' DAY. By George J. Varney. Lee & Shepard.—The purpose of this book is partly explained by the title. It tells the story of Lexington and Concord, beginning with the conditions prevailing in Massachusetts in April, 1775. Then comes the story of "Paul Revere's Ride," as he himself described it for the Historical Society in 1798; and successive chapters tell of the events of the day and the British retreat. Many stories and anecdotes are included, recording individual experiences; and there is also a collection of fourteen or fifteen poems brought out by the first celebration of Patriots' Day one year ago.

Miscellaneous.

"The Vicar of Wakefield" makes a double number in the Riverside Literature Series; and its convenient form and clear type offer excellent opportunity for the re-reading of this classic, written by the man whom Thackeray called "the most beloved of English writers."

Racine's "Athalie" is one of those classics which must be studied by every student of French; and the recent edition published by D. C. Heath & Co. of this city offers every advantage for study, even to the addition of a brief treatise on versification especially prepared for this book. It is evident that much care has been taken with the notes.

"Harold," a tragedy in five acts, written by Ernst von Wildenbruch, is published by Maynard & Merrill of New York for advanced students in German. The preface and notes are prepared by A. Voegelin, and supply only such information as is necessary. The old mistake of leaving nothing for the student to do is not often repeated in these days of more advanced methods.

A new edition of Thomas Hardy's novel, "Far from the Madding Crowd," appears from the press of Harper Brothers, and tempts to a rereading of the first book that brought Mr. Hardy not merely a name, but popularity. It was in these chapters that he first adopted the word "Wessex" from the pages of early English history,—a name soon taken up as a local designation. In the preface to this new edition Mr. Hardy courteously asks the reader to refuse steadfastly to believe in any inhabitants of a Victorian Wessex outside the pages of this volume and its companions.

Literary Notes.

Count Tolstoi's latest deliverance is a theological work entitled "The Four Gospels Harmonized and Translated," an English translation of which has just been issued.

The new books published in England during 1894 amounted to five thousand three hundred. Of these, four hundred and seventy-six were in the department of theology.

"The Story of the Plants," by Grant Allen, is to be the next volume in the helpful little series entitled "The Library of Useful Stories," published by D. Appleton & Co.

The Bookman states that Queen Victoria is planning to establish a "literary order of merit for the recognition of those who, as journalists and writers of books, have done good work."

"Beside the Bonnie Brier Bush," by Ian Maclaren, is claimed to have reached the largest sale of any work of fiction issued during the past six months. It met instant popularity.

The pleasant discovery has just been made at Galashiels, Scotland, of over a hundred letters written by Sir Walter Scott to Mr. Craig, the banker. The letters were discovered in a box filled with the archives of the old Leith Bank.

Edna Lyall has appropriated some of the profits of her literary work to the completion of the peal of bells at St. Saviour's, Eastbourne, England. She gave three fine bells, which were named after three of her leading characters,—Donovan, Erica, and Hugo.

Robert S. Peabody, the well-known Boston architect, will contribute a series of papers to the Atlantic Monthly during the summer months. The title of the series is "An Architect's Vacation," the first number of which treats of "Rural England."

The book of responsive readings, originally prepared for the chapel use of Harvard University by Henry Van Dyke, D.D., has been carefully revised and enlarged to more fully meet the requirements of chapel services in schools and colleges. It is published by Ginn & Co.

The "last will and testament" of Lord Byron was sold at auction in London recently for $15. At the same sale a characteristic letter of Carlyle to Mrs. Austin brought $20; and a letter of Byron to Colridge, $35. A letter of George Eliot, complaining of the literary criticism of certain persons, was sold for $25; a letter from Nelson to Sir William Hamilton, for $40; and a number of letters written by American Presidents and statesmen, for $125.

Books Received.

TO PUBLISHERS.—All books sent to the CHRISTIAN REGISTER will be promptly acknowledged under the head of "Books Received," with statement of publisher's address and price, if known. But we can guarantee no other return, as the rapid multiplication of new works compels us to limit the number selected for critical notice and review.

From Little & Co., Boston.
Littell's Living Age. Sixth Series. Vol. VI.
From Macmillan & Co., New York.
The Story of Bessie Costrell. By Mrs. Humphry Ward.
A Modern Man. By Ella Macmahon, author of "A New Note."
From the Irving Company, New York.
The Way Out. Exemplified Philosophy. By Moses Samelson.
From Philip Green, London.
Select Discourses and Essays. From the Works of William Ellery Channing. Edited with an Introduction by W. Copeland Howe.

Music Received.

From Oliver Ditson Company, Boston.
My Love's like a Red, Red Rose. Composed by J. F. Hadley.
I asked Three Little Maidens. Song. Words by Oliver Wendell Holmes. Music by L. N. Penfield.
Red Bird Caprice. For Pianoforte. By Helen Frances Lowe.
I love thee Tenderly. By Harold Leston.
A Brownie Song. Words and music by Annie Moore.
Hark! my Soul, it is the Lord. Sacred Song. By Louis R. Dressler.
I need thee, Precious Jesus. Arranged from Michael Watson. By George B. Nevin.
The Comforting Christ. Sacred Song. Words by Llewellyn A. Morrison. Music by Geo. B. Nevin.
Coriellie. By C. W. Bennet.
Graceful Dance in Shakespeare's Henry VIII. By Arthur Sullivan.

The House Beautiful.

By WILLIAM C. GANNETT,

Author of "A Year of Miracle," "Blessed be Drudgery," etc. Paper, ornamental, choice edition, price 15 cents. (In "Life-Studies" form, 6 cents; 10 copies for 30 cents.)

CONTENTS: The Building of the House; House-Furnishing; The Ideal of Beauty; Flower Furniture; Book Furniture; Our Guests; The "Dear Togetherness."

In the cheaper form the edition is neat and serviceable. The special edition, on rich, tinted paper, silk-stitched, with neat, illuminated cover, serves admirably as a dainty remembrance for a friend, and especially to "tuck in with wedding-gifts."

[From The New Unity, May 2, 1895.]

The selection we give in another column from "The House Beautiful"—one of Mr. Gannett's uplifting studies which James H. West has just published—was not made because it was the most inspiring word the pamphlet contains. Where all is so good perhaps there is no best, though to our mind the section on "The dear Togetherness" is fullest of strength, sweetness, and light. But this extract was selected simply because it was the shortest that could be made to stand by itself. By sending its publisher fifteen cents our readers can procure the little book for themselves; and if they want to be strengthened and lifted up, they will do so.

*Sent postpaid on receipt of price by

JAMES H. WEST, Publisher,
471 High Street, - - - Boston.

OLD AND NEW UNITARIAN BELIEF.

BY

JOHN WHITE CHADWICK.

Price, $1.50.

CONTENTS.—Historical Introduction, The Doctrine of Man, Concerning God, The Bible, Christianity, Concerning Jesus, The Future Life, The Great Salvation, Loss and Gain.

"A valuable as well as very readable treatise. . . The best popular history of Unitarian doctrine that has come to our notice. . . Mr. Chadwick has most interestingly set forth the rapid transformations of Unitarian belief."—The Nation.

"The best summary of Unitarian history and doctrinal development, and the most radical and optimistic outlook on the future which has yet been produced among us."—Pacific Unitarian.

"A weighty testimony to a notable religious movement from the religion of the letter to the religion of the spirit. . . His attitude not always that of the contemplative philosopher; . . . his pulse throbs strongly, and quickens that of the reader. There are some passages that belong to the anthology of prophetic literature."—CHAS. G. AMES, in the New World.

"We can here trace the growth of the New Unitarian gospel, see something of the great moulding influences that have shaped and changed it, note the dangers it has encountered, thrill with the warm light of its newly discovered hope, feel ourselves taken into comradeship with its noble army of workers and saints. . . Decidedly marking a clearer point of vision in the development of Unitarian thought."—The Unitarian.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

A College Town Pulpit.

MR. SUNDERLAND'S MONTHLY SERMONS.

50 Cents a Year. 5 Cents a Number. Reduced rates in quantities.

Series for 1894-95.

1. The Soul's Cry for God.
2. Jesus as Humanity's Ideal.
3. Sectarianism: Its Evils, Causes, and Cures.
4. The True Cross of Christ.
5. Was Jesus God? How he came to be worshipped.
6. Loyalty to Conviction.
7. Is Life a Blessing?
8. Robert Ingersoll's Treatment of the Bible.
9. A Religion for a Republic.
10. The Surest Way of Doing Good.

Order from Rev. J. T. SUNDERLAND, Ann Arbor, Mich.

Lectures and Sermons

BY

WILLIAM J. POTTER.

With a Biographical Sketch

BY

Francis Ellingwood Abbot, Ph.D.

This book is published in style of Mr. Potter's previous volume, "Twenty-five Sermons in Twenty-five Years." Gilt top, bevelled boards.

Price $2.00.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

MESSAGES OF

Faith, Hope and Love.

Selections for Every Day in the Year from the Writings of

JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE.

PRICE $1.00.

For sale by all Booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

The Home.

For the Christian Register.

LOST JUNE.

BY ELIZABETH HILL.

Where hast thou wandered,
O beautiful June?
Why has it faltered,
Thy ravishing tune?
Telling of roses
That never should blight,
Telling of ever
Undying delight.

What can have happened
To shadow my eyes?
Whence are those blurring
Great clouds on the skies?
Why do I notice
The petals' soft rain?
When did my heart
Cage the sad bird of pain?

Hark! 'tis a whisper
Comes wafting to me:
"Open thy heart,
That the bird may go free.
Then will he sing thee
A comforting strain,—
Sweet is the voice
Of an unprisoned pain.

"Though he may tell thee
Thy life is the rose,
Petal by petal
Its happiness goes.
Though he may tell thee
Thy life is the blue,
Shadow by shadow
Its sorrows pass through.

"Yet will he sing
That the roses of earth
Blossom again
With a heavenly birth,
Yet will he chant
Of a shadowless sky
Gladdening the June-tide
Of God's bye-and-bye."

For the Christian Register.

OUTSIDE THE BARRIER GATE.

GOING A-MAYING.

BY A. D. G.

The Barrier Gate closes at half-past nine; and on Friday nights, between ten and eleven or later, you might have seen a dog-cart drawn by a gray Somali pony slow up beside the choki (police station), where the Indian Sepoy paces on guard at the Gate. "Ifrah al bab, ifrah al bab" (open the gate), shouts the Padre Sahib, who is driving. The half of the Gate creaks slowly on its hinges. They are through, and outside the Barrier Gate. Now they, the Padre Sahib, the Padre Sahib's wife, and their dog, Nookta, turn the last corner of the last towering, bleak, rocky outpost,—it is all rocks inside the Barrier Gate,—the fresh wind from hundreds of miles of ocean strikes their faces with refreshing rudeness; another turn, and they follow the winding road,—originally a camel track,—over the sands, home.

The Padre Sahib lives outside the Barrier Gate; and the Padre Sahib's wife told me these things before the open grave in the little Christian cemetery out there in the sand was levelled. She had gone through the Barrier Gate a bride,—a "tired bride," she added,—and she had had her fancies about the home in the desert and work among the women. Sometime I may tell you of her home-coming, and the ideals and the work; but I would rather be silent a little longer, till I become more reconciled to the change. We did not speak often together; yet in a strange land, with many memories and few hopes, the heart finds rest and coolness beneath the smallest shadow, howe'er fleeting.

I thought I would tell you how they went "a-maying"; though it is true it came about in April, and not on the first, either.

The camels came, she said (the Padre Sahib's wife, I mean, of course), at about five o'clock in the morning, and gurgled and groaned after their custom before kneeling at the porch where the white jasmine grew.

They—that is, the Padre Sahib, the Padre Sahib's wife, and Nookta—had been inside the Barrier Gates, and dined at the hotel, the night before, as was their custom to do once a week. Consequently, they were in no mood for early rising. But, to ride to a certain belt of thorny acacia trees thirteen miles away, an early start must be made.

They knew a place there where the thorn-trees spread gnarled, curving limbs, inviting one to linger and lean and drowse away the time. Birds come there, unaffrighted by men; lizards slip along the branches; and, overhead, a green, green parasite clings, and weaves a shroud for the thorn-tree, but a pleasant shade for those beneath.

Once before they had rested there; and the "Mem-Sahib" (Madame Sahib) had marked a certain creeping plant, and coveted it. So on this day in April they started forth for a frolic under the trees, and a ride over the sand and jungle.

Abou Rās, father of a head ("with something in it," the Padre Sahib's wife used to say), the fastest and easiest camel in the village, was saddled with the native saddle. This resembles a padded saw-horse, with a back no one ever leans against, and two cross-pieces in front for the knees to grip.

Then the Padre's camel Abou—something or other, I don't recollect what he was father of—was saddled and cushioned. The saddle-bags were balanced with a due proportion of food, drinks, zambeels—native baskets—for the creeping plant, a tin box for beetles, etc.

Nookta rode in a box slung to the side of Abou Rās, whence she viewed with interest and concern the lizards slip across the path, and glide away among the clumps of grass and bushes.

The day was cloudy, the air sweet, and soon they were stepping swiftly out from the village, and past the last outpost of British protection into the country of the Sultan of "Al Hauta."

And now they see the sight that caused the Padre's wife to call the picnic "going a-maying" in April.

Their road is a winding camel track, made, in the first instance, by the will of the camel who first led the way from the villages beside the desert or the mountains beyond, journeying toward the Barrier Gate. Doubtless his master slept, as is the custom on long journeys, lying across the load in the sultry heat of day or the chill air of night. And, as that first camel trod, so will all others tread now and always.

The Padre Sahib's wife said that her "heart leapt up" when she beheld the white and yellow blossoms adorning the level places all along the path. Neither she nor the Padre in all the long years lived there had seen this sight before,—tiny white blossoms, scarce daring to open their eyes to the blinding glare of the blue sky, and here and there, all about and among them, flowers of a brilliant yellow, defying the sunlight while crouching low. And further joy awaited their unaccustomed eyes. Surely, can this be Araby's sands, this other glimpse of home, by which name, with infinite though perhaps unrecognized and unsuspected pathos, we exiles term the land of our birth, be we English, Scotch, or Yankee. For under a thorny bush—and, by the way, there is little that lives here, outside or inside the Barrier Gate, without its own particular thorn—was green grass. Delicate, graceful, freshly green, and full of sunlight, it smiled and swayed and stirred the heart. It grew where the shadows rested longest, under the thorns. Almost in silence these two pointed the sight to each other,—the miracle it seemed; and the Padre Sahib's wife couldn't speak, she said, for the tears that came to eyes and throat.

But Nookta pointed her eager ears, and watched a lizard there in the grass. Nookta had no memories of home other than hers outside the Barrier Gate, where she came to live when a helpless, blind, sprawly, ugly morsel of seven weeks.

I'll tell you more of Nookta when you come again, for you are fond of dogs; and so was the Padre Sahib's wife.

On they went, past Fiyooash (one of those villages bordering the desert), where Abou Rās never failed to suggest a rest by trying to take the path to the village. Abou Rās knew every path leading to the nearest village, and the home path; nor did he ever fail to make known his knowledge and wishes. Besides, once past Fiyooash, he thought there was no chance of a stop this side of Mijhaffa, five miles away. On they speed past a saint's tomb, half hidden in the bushy trees, where a dog always ran out, snarling and barking and lifting his heavy lips over his fierce white teeth. Nookta, of course, returned curse for curse, her white hairs stiffening and bristling down her back; and the camels quickened their pace, speeding softly on.

Now they are in the woods, or tree belt, and heads must be bent and limbs of trees dodged as the path turns and twists among the growing branches, ever on the alert to deal the unwary traveller a blow.

I remember just here how we were all sitting on the hotel veranda (the hotel is inside the Barrier Gates), newly equipped with green chics,—rattan shades for door or window,—when the Padre Sahib's wife began to tell me of their dodging the tree branches. The Padre Sahib was devouring the week's "Telegrams" (Reuter's), quite unconscious of all around him, at least it seemed so until, just here, he suddenly looked up, and said: "There was usually several inches' pace between Ajuza's head and the branches when she ducked. I always rode behind her. So I could see, you know." Then he returned to the "Telegrams" and Lord Rosebery's appointment to the premiership. Ajuza was the Arabic pet name the Padre Sahib had given his wife, or rather it was one of them.

Presently an open bit discovered two beautiful clumps of the very creeper so coveted. The camels are made to kneel, nothing loath; for the heat has grown with the day. Out jumps Nookta, away after a lizard before she has fairly landed on her feet. The Padre slips off his beast, helps his wife to slide down, and then on hands and knees they remove the loosely packed sand from the long tubers, whence come the long trailing lengths of polished, juicy leaves, tendrils, and stem, brimful of the rain that fell in such torrents scarce a month ago, when this fertile spot was desert waste to the eye.

It was just before that storm that they discovered the rock where they were now to seek flowers. They were reading when suddenly far off, faint, a rushing as of wind through pines or surf on a distant beach. A few drops of rain, a roar as of a mighty torrent, the sky is black, the winds sweep past in utter rout before the deluge of waters escape at last from their cloud prisons, which also are fleeing fast from their gathering upon the bleak mountain tops, twenty miles away.

The Padre seeks to shelter his party with the thick folded sutrunjee (Indian rug), but the rain bursts through all such covering. The Padre's wife with a joyful heart listens to the mighty symphony of wind and rain and sighing branches, while she struggles into her already wet riding boots. Nookta, trembling with fear, creeps beneath her skirts; and a scorpion takes refuge on her lap.

Near by, tied to bushes, the camels quiver and shiver, terror-stricken; but the soaked cushions are tied on, the soaked luggage hurried into the saddle-bags, the riders, also soaked, mount, and urge their huge beasts over the now flooded paths and quite hidden fields.

Meanwhile, or rather all the while, the Padre Sahib's wife has been shaking from head to foot, not, however, with fear, but with laughter. Who can describe the scene? Camels and dog the picture of misery and wet, a continual deluge from above, the fields turned to inland lakes, the track a rushing torrent, while the Padre Sahib, who leads now that difficulties have arisen, presents a large sun hat fringed with long, thin streamers of rain!

Truly, it is a strange spectacle; and one spectator's mouth ached from laughter.

An hour or more brings them home, soaked and happy,—for has not fresh, sweet water fallen fast and long on their upturned faces, and is it not three years since the Padre Sahib's wife felt fresh rain on her face? The clouds are already sweeping back to their mountain fastnesses, as is the custom of storms, whether of sand or rain, in Araby. . . .

And it is this same sweeping flood which, a month later, has called from their sleeping the gentle blossoms of white and yellow carpeting the barren sands, the tender grass-blades bending in the shadows, and filled the leaves of the creeper to the brim with juicy life. And where there were no blossoms nor grass, and but one creeper, on this May-day in April, the Padre and the Padre's wife, with Nookta, lizard-loving, found hundreds of creepers and a carpet of bloom.

They returned home laden with trophies of the springtide. But the Padre Sahib's wife told me she would have given all for a white violet growing she knew where.

I hope she has found some beyond the last Barrier Gate.

A TRAMP DOG.

Carlo was the handsomest dog in the United States. At least Jimmie Drummond, his young master, thought so; but Jimmie had to confess that he was also the vainest.

Carlo was also the most amiable dog in the world; but he was not the slightest use as a watch dog, for he would have been far too polite to bark at any burglar. In fact, he was rather ornamental than useful; but, then, he was so intelligent and so full of fun that Jim could forgive him everything except his running away.

The Drummonds lived in the country, and once in a while the monotony of life got to be too much for Carlo. He would run away to the nearest town, associate with all the common dogs there, and return scarred by the marks of many battles in which he was not always victorious.

He knew perfectly well that he ought not to run away; and, when he would make up his mind to come home at last, he would rush into the sitting-room in the most engaging way, lick Jim's face, insist upon getting into Mrs. Drummond's lap, great dog though he was, and would be so affectionate and generally agreeable that for a long time they did not have the heart to punish him.

But his absences grew more and more frequent, and longer and longer; and at last Mrs. Drummond said, "Jim, it must be stopped."

So the next time Carlo returned from a protracted spree, with his usual engaging grin and general air of just having been around the corner on an important errand, Jim, with a heavy heart, took him into the back yard, explained the situation to him, and gave him a thrashing. Jim was not much bigger than Carlo himself, and I don't think he hurt him very badly; but Carlo made a terrible uproar, and howled as if every bone in his body had been broken, and ran away that night and stayed a week!

Then Mrs. Drummond tried her hand at

A doctor's advice to the dyspeptic generally takes this turn, "Avoid greasy food." Avoid food prepared with lard would be better. Advise patients to the only substitute for lard, in the preparation of all food requiring shortening. COTTOLINE is pure and healthful, and the weakest stomachs can assimilate pastry and other food in which it is used.

USE COTTOLINE

The genuine is put up in one, three and five pound tins with trade mark—steer's head in cotton-plant wreath—on every tin.

THE N. K. FAIRBANK CO., CHICAGO.
224 State St., Boston. Portland, Me.

switching him, and so did the gardener. They tried coaxing and flattery. They tried starving him, they tried tying him up. At the very first opportunity off Carlo would go to town again, and in a few days be brought home by some little colored boy, who would demand any sum from twenty-five cents to two dollars for his pains.

At last a happy thought occurred to Jim. "Now, collie, you're nothing but a tramp dog," he said reproachfully. "And you are getting so bitten up, you are not even handsome any more."

Of course, Carlo understood every word his little master said to him, and it mortified him terribly to be told he was no longer handsome; but he did not quite understand what Jim meant to do with a dilapidated hat and an old coat and vest he brought out with him. He could hardly believe his senses when Jim put the vest on him, slipped his forelegs into the coat, and fastened it on his back, and tied the old felt hat around his handsome head with a green veil.

In vain Carlo coaxed and wagged his tail, and licked his master's face. Jim went right on fastening those dreadful clothes securely; and, when he was done, he said: "Go away now. You're nothing but a tramp dog, and you're dressed like a tramp dog, and you don't belong in this house any more. Go to town, and play with the other tramps."

Then it dawned on Carlo that his master was making fun of him. He sprang up and shook himself, and scratched and tore at the hateful clothes; but they would not come off.

Mrs. Drummond came into the room while he was struggling with them. "Dear me," she said, "here's a tramp dog in my sitting-room. Shoo! Get out! This is no place for tramps!"

Carlo felt as if he was having a bad dream. He hung his head, and slunk out into the kitchen. He was always sure of a warm welcome there; but, alas! when Mary saw him, she fairly screamed with laughter. Carlo gazed at her reproachfully with his great soft eyes from under the dirty, old felt hat; but the more he gazed, the more she laughed. So he stole mournfully out of the back door.

The kittens and the old black cat were sunning themselves there. They were always the best of friends with gentle Carlo. The kittens loved nothing better than to play with his tail. But now—and this was the hardest of all—Frisky and Whuzy uttered a horrified cry the moment they saw him, and fled in terror. Popka, the old black cat, stood her ground one moment, her back arched, her tail bristling, then she spit at him, and fled, too!

Carlo dropped right down where he was, and hid his head in his paws.

By and by the butcher came by, and stopped to laugh at him. Then Carlo got up, and went around to the other side of the house. All day he spent in wandering around the garden in a dispirited sort of manner, trying to get out of people's way, until Jim's heart ached for him.

At last, when night came, Jim said: "Well, collie, are you tired of being a tramp dog? Will you stay at home now if I take the old clothes off?"

And Carlo looked up, and said "Yes" as plainly as any dog ever did.

"Shake it off then," said Jim; and Carlo gave his little master his paw.

And from that day to this he has never run away again.—Bertha Watson, in Methodist Recorder.

BE YE THANKFUL.

"I feel so vexed and out of temper with Ben," cried Dick, "that I really must"—

"Do something in revenge?" inquired his cousin Cecilia.

"No: just look over my Book of Thanks."

"What's that?" said Cecilia, as she saw him turning over the leaves of a copy-book nearly full of writing in a round text hand.

"Here it is," said Dick, then read aloud: "March 8. Ben lent me his hat." Here again: "January 4. When I lost my shilling, Ben made it up to me kindly." Well, observed the boy, turning down the leaf, "Ben is a good boy, after all."

"What do you note down in that book?"

said Cecilia, looking over his shoulder with some curiosity.

"All the kindnesses that are ever shown me. You would wonder how many they are. I find a great deal of good from marking them down. I do not forget them, as I might do if I only trusted to my memory. So I hope that I am not often ungrateful; and, when I am cross or out of temper, I almost always feel good-humored again if I only look over my book."—United Presbyterian.

SABBATIA.

Upon the margin of a reedy pond,
Held in the hollow of low, rounded hills,
Where Silence, like a presence, broods and thrills,
I found Sabbatia. As a lover fond,
Flying, the mistress of his heart to greet,
Forgets the world in reading her sweet eyes,
And cries, "For me God makes a paradise!"
So, kneeling, happy, at Sabbatia's feet,
Bathed in the sunshine of her rosy smile,
I murmured, "Twas for me she grew so fair."
For answer, lightly glided here and there
A blue-winged dragon-fly; a bird the while Trilled one clear note; tall rushes stirred; and near
I caught the glisten of the sun-dew's tear.

—Emily Shaw Forman.

A BOY OF A THOUSAND.

Robert Bain recently prevented a serious accident in Public School No. 23, at Marion, near Jersey City. There were sounds of a panic from the room beneath his class-room, and no one can tell how many children might have been injured but for his cool head and quick thinking. He did what any bright American boy should have done, but what scarcely one boy in a thousand would have done.

Two lower floors of the Marion Public School are occupied by the classes of the primary department, and the top floor is occupied by the grammar department. The building is heated by steam. One of the radiator valves was broken off the other day. While waiting for a chance to repair the break, the janitor carefully turned off the steam at this radiator, and fitted a tight wooden plug in place of the broken valve.

Some very foolish person, either for the sake of a joke or from a habit of meddling with things without asking leave, turned on the steam. The radiator was in one of the class-rooms of the upper primary floor; that is, the middle floor of the building.

The wooden plug was shot out of the radiator with a report like a pistol shot at a quarter past ten in the morning. Every child in the room rushed screaming toward the sliding-door leading to the stairway. So fierce was the impetus of the crowd that the door was twisted off its tracks and turned half-way around.

Miss Agnes Carlen, the teacher, was unable to control the children; for they had swept past her before she really understood what had happened. She stood helpless, half fainting, fearing that the heavy sliding door would fall and crush her pupils. Meantime great clouds of steam came hissing from the radiators.

With a great clattering of many feet the frightened boys and girls swarmed down the stairway, looking for places of safety. Forty of them ran out into the school-yard; but forty more were kept indoor by Miss Searle, the principal of the primary department, and her aids.

At the moment of the explosion and panic the boys and girls of the grammar department on the top floor were almost panic-stricken. They heard the loud report beneath them, the hissing of steam, the screams, and the swift trampling feet. Every one was scrambling up from his desk, when Robert Bain jumped out into the aisle, and cried:—

"Keep your seats! There's no danger if you stay where you are!"

Those words stopped the rush like magic. Seeing Bain's coolness and courage, all the others were ashamed to show themselves cowards. It was not so much the words he uttered as his manner in saying them that swayed the crowd. His tone not only showed that he was not frightened, but the order rang out sharply and confidently, as if the boy knew he would be obeyed. A few moments later Miss Emma Johnson, the teacher in charge of the class, learned all about the accident on the floor below, and told the children of it. There was, of course, no possible danger of panic now.

What would have happened if young Bain had not spoken at the right moment? Very likely the children would have rushed out, like Miss Carlen's pupils, before they could be checked. A steep stairway lay before them; and probably many of them would have been badly hurt, if not killed, in the wild downward flight.

An accident somewhat like this, in the Greenwich Avenue Public School in New York, many years ago, had the most serious consequences.

Robert Bain is fourth sergeant in one of the two cadet companies of the Marion Public School. He was very happy, but also full of blushes, when Mr. Du Rie, the principal of the school, complimented him before all his friends. If every boy who reads of his brave act will make up his mind to keep cool in any panic near him, he will have paid the best possible compliment to Robert Bain.—Harper's Round Table.

THE FIRST PRINTER.

When Faustus had printed off, in 1460, a number of copies of the Bible, he undertook to sell them in Paris, where printing was then unknown. As he sold his copies for sixty crowns, while the scribes demanded five hundred for their manuscripts, he created universal astonishment; but, when he produced copies as fast as they wanted and lowered the price to thirty crowns, all Paris was in agitation.

The uniformity of the copies greatly increased the wonder. Information was given to the police against him as a magician, his lodgings being subsequently searched; and, a greater number of copies being found, they were seized.

The red ink with which they were embellished was supposed to be his blood, and it was seriously adjudged that he was in league with the devil; and it is presumed that, if he had not fled, he would have shared the fate of those whom superstitious judges in those days condemned for witchcraft.—Jewish Messenger.

"Too Hot * to Eat"

is a feeling that, if yielded to, has serious results. Strength should be maintained in order to overcome the debilitating effects of summer.

Bovinine

being the greatest concentration in small bulk of the vital elements of lean, raw meat, is pre-eminently the source from whence nourishment should be obtained, at a time when the least effort should be demanded of the digestive organs.

A. P. BUSH, 149 Pearl St.

Education.

The oldest high-class educational magazine in the country ($3 per year) is read by thoughtful people of all classes, as well as educators. It ought to be in every Library and Reading-room in the land. Is it in yours? From a new subscriber we will accept $2 for the first year. Send 12 cents (in stamps) for a sample copy.

Nova Scotia Tours. The associate editor of Education offers again this year several delightful personally conducted tours to Evangeline's land. Select companies of cultured people. No heat, romantic scenery. An ideal vacation. First party, June 25. Shad, salmon, and strawberries in their prime. Expenses low. Write for particulars.

KASSON & PALMER,
50 Bromfield Street, Boston, Mass.

"IT IS IGNORANCE THAT WASTES EFFORT." TRAINED SERVANTS USE

SAPOLIO

In connection with our wholesale business, we are accustomed to sell

CHURCH CARPETS

at manufacturers' prices.

John H. Pray, Sons & Co.,
Wholesale and Retail CARPETS and UPHOLSTERY,
658 Washington St. (opp. Boylston), Boston.
Correspondence Solicited.

Foundry established in 1790 by PAUL REVERE.

BELLS and CHIMES

of Copper and Tin.

BLAKE BELL CO.,
Boston, Mass.

JOSEPH GILLOTT'S STEEL PENS.

GOLD MEDAL, PARIS EXPOSITION, 1889,
AND THE CHICAGO EXPOSITION AWARD.
THE MOST PERFECT OF PENS.

NEWTON CENTRE, MASS.
SCHOOL FOR THE CORRECTION OF ALL SPEECH DEFECTS. For circular address
E. J. E. THORPE, Principal.

MISS KIMBALL'S SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,
Worcester, Mass.
Thorough preparation for College. Intermediate, Academic, and Special Courses. Send for Illustrated Circular.

MAGNOLIA TERRACE Springfield, Mass.
Home and Day School for Girls. JOHN McDUFFIE, PR.D.

Miss Gibbons' School for Girls.
Preparation for all colleges. 55 West 47th St., N.Y.
MRS. SARAH H. EMERSON, Principal. October 2.
A few boarding pupils taken.

HOME SCHOOL FOR BOYS
In the family of Rev. Eugene De Normandie, Danvers, Mass. Address
HENRY N. DE NORMANDIE.

THE MORGAN SCHOOL, PORTSMOUTH,
N.H. This Home and Day School for Girls will reopen September 25 for its second year under the new management. College, Preparatory, and Finishing Courses. Address for circular Miss GEORGIANA S. WOODBURY, Principal.

Mr. Knapp's Home School for Boys,
PLYMOUTH, MASS.
Powder Point School (DUXBURY, MASS.).
These schools have always had the same interests, and will now be united at Duxbury, the Plymouth school closing with the present term.

PROCTOR ACADEMY, Andover, N.H.
For both sexes. Healthful location. Liberal management. Expenses low. Prepares for college or for teaching, etc. For catalogue, address
JAMES F. MORTON, A.M., Principal.

PROSPECT HILL SCHOOL
FOR YOUNG LADIES, GREENFIELD, MASS.
Twenty-fifth Year. Reference, Rev. E. E. Hale, D.D.
REV. JAMES C. PARSONS, Principal.

West Newton English and Classical School.
ALLEN BROTHERS.
Family School. Both Sexes. Unsectarian. Prepares for College, Scientific Schools, Business, and for a useful life. Forty-third year begins Wednesday, September 13. Catalogue of
ALLEN BROTHERS, WEST NEWTON, MASS.

Mr. HALE'S SCHOOL 86 BEACON ST., BOSTON.
The 13th year will begin September 25. Preparation for Harvard College and the Institute of Technology. Full Classical and Scientific Courses. Primary department for young boys nine or ten years of age. Fine situation, directly opposite the Public Garden. Large, sunny, high-studded rooms, open fireplaces, gymnasium, extensive laboratories, covered fire-escape, lunch-room. Teachers: ALBERT HALE (Harv.), E. D. MARSH (Harv.), E. K. STEVENS (Harv.), C. S. STREET, Amherst. Address
ALBERT HALE.

THE HIGHLAND MILITARY ACADEMY.
WORCESTER, MASS. begins 40th year September 11. Classical, Scientific, Business, Preparatory Departments. Gymnasium. Athletics encouraged. Careful training. Home influences.
JOSEPH ALDEN SHAW, A.M., Head Master.

Boston, 10 Ashburton Place.
BOSTON UNIVERSITY Law School.
Fall term opens Wednesday, October 2. For circulars address
EDMUND H. BENNETT, Dean.

VACATION FOR BOYS.—Mr. and Mrs. John McDuffie receive at seashore home four boys between twelve and fifteen, July and August. Lessons in school studies, also in rowing, sailing, etc. if desired. JOHN McDUFFIE (Harv.), MAGNOLIA TERRACE SCHOOL, SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

BRYANT'S MARRIAGE.

IT WAS AN IDEAL UNION BETWEEN THE POET AND HIS WIFE.

Allusion has already been made to his marriage. None could have been happier, no union more nearly an ideal one. Miss Fanny Fairchild was a young lady whose parents had lived on the Seekonk, a stream tributary to the Green River, not far from Great Barrington. Early left an orphan, she made her home alternately with her married sisters in that place; and there it was that Bryant met her. Charming in person, sweet in disposition, lovely in character, she drew him to her through his sympathy with her orphanage, his admiration of her beauty, and his appreciation of her worth. For forty-five years she was the stay and blessing of his life. What that marriage was to him they knew best who knew him best. Reserved on the subject to the world at large, he allowed only those who were nearest him to know the wonderful depth and tenderness of his affection. Their sympathy was perfect, their dependence mutual.

He said at her death: "I never wrote a poem that I did not repeat it to her, and take her judgment upon it. I found its success with the public to be precisely in proportion to the impression it made upon her." A dear friend of them both has said: "The union between Mr. and Mrs. Bryant was a poem of the tenderest rhythm. Any of us who remember Mr. Bryant's voice when he said 'Frances' will join in his hope that she kept the same beloved name in heaven. I remember alluding to those exquisite lines, 'The Future Life,' to Mrs. Bryant, and her replying, 'Oh, my dear, I am always sorry for any one who sees me after reading those lines: they must be so disappointed.'" Beatrice and Laura have not received such tributes from their poets, for Mrs. Bryant's husband was her poet and lover at seventy as at seventeen.—"Bryant and the Berkshire Hills," by Arthur Lawrence, in the July Century.

Spirit of the Press.

The New York Observer takes the heretics in hand in the following:—

The Outlook believes that it is quite possible to state the Biblical doctrine of redemption wholly dissociated from the notion of a fall in Adam, and knows of no one so well qualified to make such a restatement as Prof. Drummond. The desire of the Outlook is to give a boost to the doctrine of evolution by showing that it is not antagonized by the Bible plan of redemption. Our contemporary knows of no way in which the Scotch professor could do so much to abate religious prejudice against the doctrine of evolution as by such a restatement of the Scripture doctrine of redemption. This would be very funny if it were not far too serious for humor. We are to have a Saviour, but no sinners, a redemption, but no redeemed ones, a salvation without any subjects needing to be saved, a healing with none to be healed. If Prof. Drummond and the Outlook can make a statement of Christ's redemption that shall not involve man's fall in Adam, they will certainly overcome a great deal of native prejudice, and numerous persons will be ready to accept such a religion as an ornament without any care for its utility. But the utility will be so small that it is hardly worth the while to worry about preserving the article. If the story of the fall is false, the Cross of Calvary was meaningless, if not altogether a mistake.

To this the Outlook thus replies:—

Then we should suppose that even the New York Observer would concede that the entire "plan of salvation" can be found in, or at least deduced from, the life and teachings of Jesus Christ. So general has been the opinion in the Church that the story of that life and those teachings embodies "a statement of Christ's redemption" that it has given to the four narratives the title par excellence of "The Gospels." But, according to the New York Observer, this is clearly a mistake. Since neither Christ nor any one of his four biographers ever refers, directly or indirectly, to Adam or his fall, the Gospels themselves cannot, according to the New York Observer, involve the doctrine that man is a sinner, nor the doctrine that Christ has come into the world to redeem man from sin. In other words, they are no Gospels. He who is led to believe that man has ascended from a lower animal order, and that the story of the first sin, as recorded in the third chapter of Genesis, is not history, but truth in the form of either myth or allegory, is not compelled to disbelieve in the awful fact of sin and the glorious fact of redemption. After the third chapter of Genesis Adam's sin is not mentioned in the Old Testament, except incidentally, and by way of allusion once in Job. It is never referred to by Christ, nor in the apostolic discourses, nor by Peter, James, Jude, or John, and by Paul only parenthetically. And Paul, in that chapter in which he deals most comprehensively with the nature and origin of sin,—the seventh chapter of Romans,—does not even remotely refer to Adam's fall, but attributes sin, as does the modern evolutionist, to the animal in man, and regards as sin the emergence of that animal and its mastery over the spiritual and the divine. To affirm that it is possible to state man's sinfulness or Christ's redeeming work without implying man's fall in Adam is to affirm that these doctrines of the spiritual life are not to be found in any of the Biblical writings except the book of Genesis, the book of Job, and certain of Paul's Epistles, and in the two latter only incidentally and indirectly. It is, in short, to expunge from the major part of the Bible, including the teachings of Jesus Christ himself, the two articles, sin and salvation, in which Christlieb sums up the whole evangelical faith of Christendom. We can hardly think that the New York Observer means to teach so destructive a heresy.

Personals.

Mrs. Paret, the wife of Bishop Paret of Maryland, is a friend of the birds. She is trying to form a society in Baltimore, the members of which will be pledged not to wear any feathers on their hats except ostrich feathers.

There are those still living who can recall when Emma Willard began the higher education of her sex by founding the Troy Seminary. She was told that she would be wanting to send the cows to school next, and the State of New York refused to spend a dollar in aiding her experiment.—American.

At a gathering of her people numbering about one hundred thousand the queen of Madagascar, against whose country the French were waging a war of aggression, made the announcement that, though a woman, she would herself lead her troops against the enemy, and would rather perish than survive the ruin and slavery of her people. Utterances worthy of a queen, indeed! This is the same queen who some years ago set her face strongly against the introduction of liquor traffic in the island, suggested by some civilized sons of Europe.

Science.

A London restaurant uses an electrically heated plate to keep one's food warm. So long as the current is turned on, one can dine in as leisurely a way as he likes. There is no danger of receiving a shock from touching the plate.

Great things are expected of the telautograph. The recent trial over one of the lines between Paris and London was in every respect successful. A speed of twenty-two words a minute, averaging five letters to the word, was obtained. The reproduction was to all appearances, except shading, an exact fac-simile of the sender's telautogram.

A transparent mirror glass, recently introduced in Germany, reflects light on one side, from which it is practically opaque, while from the other side it is transparent. It is proposed to use this type of glass for glazing windows in city residences; for, while it will not cut off light or vision from the interior, it will prevent outsiders from seeing into a room.

Worn Out,

both your silver and patience by a worthless silver polish and the silver shows it first.

SILVER

ELECTRO-SILICON POLISH

does the work easily and quickly, never wearing, always satisfying. It's unlike others.

Trial quantity for the asking. Box post-paid, 15 cts. in stamps. Your Grocer has it.

THE ELECTRO SILICON CO., 72 John St., New York.

Christian Registers WANTED.

Copies of The Christian Register for Feb. 15 and March 29, 1894, are wanted to complete files. Any one having copies of the paper for above dates which they do not care to preserve will confer a favor by sending them to the office of the Christian Register, 141 Franklin St., Boston.

Spare Pearlina, Spoil the Wash!

"Better use too much than too little." Too much Pearlina won't do any harm—too little may. Use too much, and you only waste it, that's all. But use too little, and it's only a bit better than none at all. You'll have to work harder, and you'll have to rub—and then the wear and tear begins.

It's this rubbing, and this wear, and this work that Pearlina, if properly used, takes away. Use it just as directed on every package, no more, no less, and you'll get the best results. You needn't try to improve upon it. You can't.

Send it Back Peddlers and some unscrupulous grocers will tell you "this is as good as" or "the same as Pearlina." IT'S FALSE—Pearlina is never peddled, and if your grocer sends you something in place of Pearlina, be honest—send it back. 365 JAMES PYLE, New York.

Important Works.

Uplifts of Heart and Will. Religious Aspirations in Prose and Verse. By JAMES H. WEST, author of "The Complete Life," etc. Second thousand, with additions. 106 pages. Cloth, 50 cents.

"Full of a happy sense of Nature's beauty and bounty. One unceasing aspiration towards the 'Moral Ideal,' the 'Blessed Best.'"—William C. Gannett, in Unity.

"One is very strongly impressed with the sincerity and reality of expression. Mr. West is a devout and earnest religious writer."—Boston Herald.

The Work of the Ministry. Lectures given to the Meadville Theological School. By Rev. W. P. TILDEN. 186 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

CONTENTS: The Ministry; Object of Preaching; Pastoral Work; Sunday Schools and Guilds; Pulpit Services; Usages and Duties; Personal Influence; Sealed Orders.

Written in a delightfully fresh style, free from pulpit tone and theological terminology, but serious, earnest, and up to the high plane of ministerial responsibility.—Independent (New York).

Kindling Thoughts. By ELIZABETH P. CHANNING. 315 pages. Cloth, $1.25.

Contains fifty-seven brief essays, such as Devotion upon the heart; The angel in the shadow; A disappointed life; Plain living and high thinking; The spiritual tangle; The charm of the old; Accepting ourselves as we are; etc., etc.

It is a long time since anything so brightly refreshing as these Kindling Thoughts has come to us. They are full of that best cheer which comes from the deepest, clearest springs of faith.—Unitarian.

Light on the Cloud; or, Hints of Comfort for Hours of Sorrow. By M. J. SAVAGE. 176 pages. Cloth, gilt edges, $1.25.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher, 141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

THE UNITARIAN

The "Unitarian" unites many opinions, many suggestions, many individual methods in one spirit, the spirit of Jesus, love to God and love to man.

CONTENTS FOR JULY.

The Water-lilies. Maud L. Cotton.
"Good News of God." Rev. Douglas Walmsley.
Man a Factor in Evolution. John M. Scott.
Resignation. Herbert H. Yeames.
A Confessional. I. Ursula Tannenforst.
Reasons for spreading Unitarianism. W. G. E.
The Anniversaries.
In the Pulpit.
The Pansy's Lesson. Clara K. Daly.
What Birthdays teach. J. T. Sunderland.
True Liberty. H. Hayes Robbins.
Types of the Spirit. W. M. Bicknell.
A Hymn. C. A. Rohrbacher.
What would You Do?
One Upward Look Each Day.
Editorial.

DEPARTMENTS:

American Unitarian Association, George Batchelor;
Sunday-schools, Edward A. Horton; National Alliance of Unitarian Women, Emily A. Fifield;
Guilds, B. R. Bulkeley; Temperance Work, C. R. Eliot; Literary Notes.
Children's Corner.
NEWS FROM THE FIELD.

* Terms, $1.00 a year. Sample copies free. Will be sent three months on trial for 10 cents.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher, 141 Franklin St., Boston

Spiritual Life.

A Year of Miracle: A Poem in Four Sermons. By Rev. WM. C. GANNETT. 106 pages. Cloth, limp, red edges, 50 cents. Fine edition, bevelled edges, full gilt, heavy paper, $1.00.

"A dainty little book, full of delicate fragrance. Love of nature is in it, and a longing to interpret that secret of nature's power over the soul which no man has yet understood. There is devotion in it, too, and neither clashes with the other."—Critic.

In Spirit and in Truth. Essays by Younger Ministers of the Unitarian Church. 163 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

CONTENTS: Introduction, by Rev. JAMES DE NORMAN-
DIE; The Philosophy of Religion, by Rev. GEORGE CROSWELL CRESSEY; The Revelation of God in Nature, by Rev. L. D. COCHRANE; The Bible as Literature and as Revelation, by Rev. W. W. FENN; The Thought of God in the Bible, by Rev. FRANCIS B. HORN BROOKE; The Revelation of God in Man, by Rev. S. M. CROTHERS; The Christ, by Rev. ALBERT WALKLEY; The Use of a Liturgy in Worship, by Rev. JOHN TUNIS.

The Insight of Faith. Brief Selected Paragraphs from the Writings of Rev. HENRY W. FOOTE. 115 pages. Flexible cloth, 50 cents. Morocco, full gilt, $1.50.

"Rarely does one find a little volume so full of helpful and precious words. Devotional in spirit and uplifting in aim."—Christian Inquirer.

Ecce Spiritus. A Statement of the Spiritual Principle of Jesus as the Law of Life. 238 pages. Cloth, $1.25.

"Nothing more remarkable has appeared since 'Ecce Homo.' It is as ingenious and original as that famous book, and far more subtle, inward, and spiritual."—St. Louis Spectator.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher, 141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Register Tract Series.

- No. 1. MY NEW NEIGHBOR. By Rev. W. H. Lyon. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 2. THE CONGREGATIONAL METHOD: How it is worked and how it ought to be worked. By Rev. Charles F. Dole. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 3. BEHOLD THE MAN. By Rev. W. P. Tilden. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 4. PRACTICAL CHRISTIANITY. By Rev. Charles A. Allen. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 5. AMERICAN UNITARIANISM: Its History and Development. By Rev. Edward Everett Hale. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 6. CHURCH ORGANIZATION. By Rev. William I. Lawrence. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 7. OF MAKING ONE'S SELF BEAUTIFUL. By Rev. William C. Gannett. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 8. THE JUDGMENT. The True Doctrine of the Judgment. Individual and Universal. By Rev. William R. Alger. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 9. THE BREATH OF LIFE. By Rev. H. M. Simons. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 10. WHAT DOES THE UNITARIANISM OF TO-DAY STAND FOR? By Rev. W. P. Tilden. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 11. LIBERAL CHRISTIANITY AS MOTIVE-POWER. By Rev. E. A. Horton. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 12. MORALITY IN THE SCHOOLS. By William T. Harris, LL.D. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 13. JOSEPH PRIESTLEY: The Old Unitarianism and the New. By Rev. C. O. Everett, D.D. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 14. WHAT O'CLOCK IS IT IN RELIGION? By Rev. M. J. Savage. $2.00 per hundred.
- No. 15. A SOUL WITH FOUR WINDOWS OPEN. By Rev. James Leonard Corning. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 16. SCIENTIFIC THEOLOGY THE GROUND OF ALL RELIGION. By Francis E. Abbot, Ph.D. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 17. REFORMS ABOUT WHICH GOOD MEN MIGHT AGREE. By William M. Salter. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 18. HOW WE HELPED OUR MINISTER TO WRITE GOOD SERMONS. By Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D. 50 cents per hundred.
- No. 19. FOUR SERMONS ON REVIVALS. By Rev. S. M. Crotthers. $3.00 per hundred. Single copies, 6 cents.
- No. 20. THEODORE PARKER'S LETTER TO A YOUNG MAN. 50 cents per hundred.
- No. 21. THE THEOLOGY OF THE FUTURE. By Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D. 50 cents per hundred.
- No. 22. THE RESTRICTION OF VIVISECTION. By Albert Leffingwell, M.D. 50 cents per hundred.
- No. 23. A WORKING THEORY IN ETHICS. By Rev. J. H. Crooker. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 24. THE CHRISTIAN UNITARIAN POSITION, DOCTRINAL. By John Hamilton Thom. 60 cents per hundred.
- No. 25. THE NEW BIRTH AND THE NEW TYPE OF MAN. By Rev. Charles F. Dole. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 26. THE RESURRECTION OF JESUS. By Rev. W. H. Furness. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 27. SHORT AND LONG VIEWS. By Rev. Charles F. Dole. $1.00 per hundred.

Sent post paid on receipt of price by

CHRISTIAN REGISTER ASSOCIATION. 141 Franklin Street, Boston.

THE BEAUTY OF STEVENSON'S CHARACTER.

It is impossible to deal, however lightly, with the personal qualities of Robert Louis Stevenson without dwelling on the extreme beauty of his character. In looking back over the twenty years in which I knew him, I feel that, since he was eminently human, I ought to recall his faults; but I protest that I can remember none. Perhaps the nearest approach to a fault was a certain want of discretion, always founded on a wish to make people understand each other, but not exactly according to wisdom. I recollect that he once embroiled me for a moment with John Addington Symonds in a manner altogether bloodthirsty and ridiculous, so that we both fell upon him and rended him. This little weakness is really the blackest crime I can lay to his charge. And, on the other side, what courage, what love, what an indomitable spirit, what a melting pity! He had none of the sordid errors of the man who writes,—no sick ambition, no envy of others, no exaggeration of the value of this ephemeral trick of scribbling. He was eager to help his fellows, ready to take a second place, offended with great difficulty, perfectly appeased by the least show of repentance. Stevenson was the most exquisite English writer of his generation, but those who lived close to him are apt to think less of that than of the fact that he was the most unselfish and the most lovable of human beings.—“Personal Memories of Stevenson,” by Edmund Gosse, in the July Century.

Education.

The Deseret Professorship of Geology in the University of Utah has been endowed, as we learn in a note from Dr. James E. Talmage, the incumbent of it, with sixty thousand dollars by the liberality of the Salt Lake Literary and Scientific Association, not by the city. The Literary and Scientific Association is a body incorporated for scientific pursuits which has existed for several years in Salt Lake City.—Popular Science.

The Old South Lectures for the summer of 1895 will begin Wednesday afternoon, July 17. The course will be upon “The Puritans in Old England,” the several lectures being as follows: July 17, “John Hooper, the First Puritan,” Edwin D. Mead; July 24, “Cambridge, the Puritan University,” William Everett; July 31, “Sir John Eliot and the House of Commons,” Prof. Albert B. Hart; August 7, “John Hampden and the Ship Money,” Rev. F. W. Gunsaulus; August 14, “John Pym and the Grand Remonstrance,” Rev. John Cuckson; August 21, “Oliver Cromwell and the Commonwealth,” Rev. Edward Everett Hale; August 28, “John Milton, the Puritan Poet,” John Fiske; September 4, “Sir Harry Vane in Old England and New England,” Prof. James K. Hosmer. Free tickets for the course are furnished to all young people under twenty applying in their own handwriting to the Directors of the Old South Work, Old South Meeting-house, Boston, with one-cent stamp enclosed. A limited number of tickets will be sold to adults for $1.50, and free tickets are furnished to teachers.

Charities and Reforms.

“Medical Declaration concerning Chastity” is an eight-page leaflet, just published, No. 29 of “The Philanthropist Series,” New York. It is signed by many leading and influential physicians, and is a timely, important medical testimony for the promotion of purity.

A protest has been raised in Belfast against the abuse of medical charities by the manner in which the doctors and nurses are occupied, especially on Saturdays and Sundays, attending to the accidents and injuries which are the result of drunkenness, the victims being for the most part workmen who are in receipt of good wages.

Australia has no orphan asylums. Every child who is not supported by parents becomes the ward of the State, and is paid a pension for support and placed in a private family, where board and clothes are provided until the fourteenth birthday. After that he may be able to go to work, in which case the pension is placed to his credit until the age of eighteen, when he becomes a citizen, with a balance due him from the State to begin life with. This inculcates a humane and charitable and responsible spirit in all residents, decreases the chance of pauperism, and places every young man on a fair and square footing with the world.—Self-culture.

Here and There.

The sale or exhibition of portraits of Mr. Gladstone and Prof. James Bryce in Constantinople has been prohibited by the sultan.

Women as well as men are employed to remove the snow from the streets of Paris. Groups of both sexes, armed with brooms, gather at certain points all over the city.

It is said that the wholesale dealers in eggs in New York and Brooklyn and vicinity have in one year transacted business to the amount of $25,000,000.

An exchange says that we are the only country indulging in the universal use of wrapping paper. In other countries newspapers, pages of old books, and green leaves take its place.

The crown jewels of Austria are of fabulous value, among them the most celebrated opal now known to exist; but, as the empress must give bonds for them whenever she wears them, and as her private jewel possessions are extensive and beautiful, she seldom brings the crown jewels from their seclusion.

With the stockings and socks made of paper, the latter to be sold at 3 cents a pair, the work of the darning and the laundry both are considerably diminished. Up to this time the expense of splitting, twisting, and preparing paper yarns for commercial use has been so high that manufacturers of fabrics have found little inducement to them in making textiles. Lately, however, a number of paper-pulp manufacturers have been at work on the problem of producing cheap pulp yarns, with the result that a new process has been formulated.—The American.

A discussion of salt (like salt itself) is always seasonable. We argue the merits of Bradley's the only salt which will not harden, and is free from lime and dirt. Price is right; quality cannot be better. See that your grocer supplies you—he can get it if you really want it. Sample bag mailed free—send your address on a postal.

“Yorkshire” Salt

We make all kinds and grades of salt. Whatever price you pay, see that you get Bradley's—it will be the best salt made for the money.

BRADLEY SALT CO.,

49 Jay St., New York. 4 Commercial St., Boston.

ARMSTRONG & McKELVY
ANCHOR, Pittsburgh
ATLANTIC, Cincinnati
BEYMER-BAUMAN, New York
BRADLEY, Pittsburgh
BROOKLYN, New York
COLLIER, St. Louis
CORNELL, Buffalo
DAVIS-CHAMBERS, Pittsburgh
ECKSTEIN, Cincinnati
FAHNESTOCK, Pittsburgh
JEWETT, New York
KENTUCKY, Louisville
JOHN T. LEWIS & BROS., Philadelphia
MORLEY, Cleveland
MISSOURI, St. Louis
RED SEAL, St. Louis
SALEM, Salem, Mass.
SHIPMAN, Chicago
SOUTHERN, St. Louis and Chicago
ULSTER, New York
UNION, “

Nothing Better

than Pure White Lead and pure Linseed Oil applied by practical painters. Avoid misleading or unknown brands of White Lead (see list of genuine brands), so-called substitutes for Linseed Oil, and irresponsible painters.

Tint White Lead with the National Lead Co.'s pure White Lead tinting colors, and avoid the difficulty of matching shades. They are the best and most permanent. Send for pamphlet and color-card—sent free.

NATIONAL LEAD CO.,

1 Broadway, New York.

Mozoomdar's Topics of To-day.

BOOKS.

The Spirit of God. By PROTAP CHUNDER MOZOOMDAR. 323 pages. Cloth, $1.50.

An idea of the work may be gained from the titles of the chapters: The Spirit, The Hindu Doctrine of the Spirit, Doctrine of the Spirit in Christianity, Sense of the Unseen, The Spirit in Nature, The Kinship in Nature, The Spiritual Power of the Senses, The Spirit in Life, The Spirit in the Spirit, The Spirit in Immortal Life, The Spirit in Reason, The Spirit in Love, The Spirit in Conscience, The Spirit in Christ, The Spirit in History, The Spirit in all Religions, Live in the Spirit.

Heart-Beats. A Book of Meditations. By PROTAP CHUNDER MOZOOMDAR. With Portrait and Biographical Sketch of the Author. Cloth, red edges, $1.50; white, full gilt, $2.00.

Its poetic title is suggestive of its contents. It is a collection of brief paragraphs, which are not so much the scintillations of the intellect as poems of the imagination and pulsations of the heart. It is an illustration of the lofty heights to which devotional sentiment may rise, free from all tinge of superstition.—Christian Register.

The Oriental Christ. By PROTAP CHUNDER MOZOOMDAR. New Edition. 193 pages. Cloth, $1.25.

The existence of this book is a phenomenon;—more than a curiosity; and rich as a new, fresh, and very suggestive study of the character and person of Christ.—Christian Union.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,

141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Essays and Lectures on Important Themes.

14. THE PHILOSOPHY OF EVOLUTION: Relation of the doctrine to prevailing philosophical systems. By STARR HOYT NICHOLS.
15. THE EFFECTS OF EVOLUTION ON THE COMING CIVILIZATION: Plans for social regeneration as tested by evolution. By REV. MINOT J. SAVAGE.
16. THE SCOPE AND PRINCIPLES OF THE EVOLUTION PHILOSOPHY: Agnosticism, materialism, idealism, practical problems. By DR. LEWIS G. JAMES.
17. THE MORAL AND RELIGIOUS ASPECTS OF HERBERT SPENCER'S PHILOSOPHY: The relation of religion to morality. By SYLVAN DREY.
18. THE RELATIVITY OF KNOWLEDGE: The nature of sense-perception; sight, sound, taste, smell, feeling; the doctrine of the Unknowable. By ROBERT G. ECOLES, M.D.
19. A STUDY OF MATTER AND MOTION: An excellent digest of a much vexed question, with quotations from many authorities. By Hon. A. N. ADAMS.
20. PRIMITIVE MAN: Pliocene, paleolithic and neolithic races; the ages of bronze and iron, cave-men and lake-dwellers; mound builders; primitive tools. By Z. SIDNEY SAMPSON.
21. GROWTH OF THE MARRIAGE RELATION: Its earlier forms; polygamy; polyandry; marriage by capture; monogamy; divorce and divorce laws. By C. STANILAND WAKE.

Pamphlets, 34 numbers, 16 to 32 pages each, some of them illustrated.

Ten Cents Each.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,

141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

RARE OPPORTUNITY

To Secure a Choice from our Large Stock of

SECOND-HAND BICYCLES

of different leading makes at a MERELY NOMINAL COST.

These bicycles have been accumulated by us during the current bicycle season in exchange for

LOVELL DIAMOND BICYCLES.

They are all in excellent condition, and WORTH MUCH MORE THAN WE ASK FOR THEM, but we must sacrifice them to make room for extensive improvements in our Broad St. store.

See the
'95 PATTERNS
LOVELL DIAMOND BICYCLES
For Ladies and Gentlemen
THEY LEAD THE World.

Thousands of them have been sold, and are in daily use. We have yet to hear from a dissatisfied rider.

BICYCLES
SOLD FOR CASH OR EASY TERMS.
A FULL LINE OF
BICYCLE SUNDRIES
At Lowest Prices.

SOLE AGENTS FOR THE Celebrated

Williams Typewriter.

CALL AND SEE IT.

Fourth of July Goods in great profusion. Fishermen's Supplies of every conceivable variety. Base Ball and Athletic Goods, Sportsmen's Outfits. Everything pertaining to sport to be found at our stores.

JOHN P. LOVELL ARMS CO.,

Dealers in Bicycles, Guns, Rifles, Revolvers, Yachting, Cannon, Razors, Cutlery, Carving Sets, Table Knives, Fishing Tackle, Base Ball and Athletic Goods and General Sporting Accessories.

147 Washington Street and 131 Broad Street, Boston.

Pleasantries.

"My dear, have you given fresh water to the goldfish?" "No, mamma; they haven't drunk what they've got already."

Brown: "I understand that Senator Green wanted you to act as his private secretary." Simmons: "He did; but I wouldn't accept the position, because I should have to sign everything Green, per Simmons."—Exchange.

The German professor of music to be met with in English drawing-rooms is an entertaining old gentleman. To him recently a lady said, when one of his compositions had just been rendered by one of the guests, "How did you like the rendering of your song, professor?" "Vas dot my song?" replied the professor. "I did not know him."—Selected.

According to the story, three French boys were studying a volume of Shakspeare in their own tongue, their task being to render portions of it into English. When they came to Hamlet's famous soliloquy, "To be or not to be," their respective translations were as follows: (1) "To was or not to am"; (2) "To were or is to not"; (3) "To should or not to will."—Harper's Young People.

A prominent clergyman gives this description of the life of a minister: "My experiences with churches make me think that ministers are like cats. When you first go to a new place, everybody says: 'Come, pussy! Come, pussy! Nice pussy!' And you come. Then they begin to rub your fur, and say, 'Poor pussy! Poor pussy!' And then they say, 'Scat!'"—The American.

A Minnesota hotel advertises, "Fine porcelain bath-tubs free to commercial men." This hotel deserves to live in history as the first establishment of its kind on earth which was ever known to give anything free to commercial travellers. It reminds us of what Gen. Sherman said about St. Louis hotels during the war: "Rates, $4 per day,—board and lodging extra."—The Commercial Traveller.

The tourist was in Milwaukee not long since, and was not feeling especially melancholy, when he noted the sign, "Knight & Day, Undertakers." He had already made a note of one nearly as unique in the same city, which reads, "Dadd & Son, Drug-gists." For a long time there was in the city of Buffalo an auction firm with this title: "English, Irish, French & Scot." This strange combination of surnames continued for many years, and even to-day the firm name doing the same auction business is "English & Irish."—Observer.

The late Francis Parkman, the historian, had the Mosaic idea of justice,—an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth. A friend met him one day walking along the street, leading a street boy with either hand. "What in the world are you doing, Parkman?" asked his friend. "I found that Johnny here had eaten all of the apple instead of dividing with his little brother. I am going to buy another for the younger boy, and make Johnny watch him while he eats it."—Youth's Companion.

A Valuable Help.—Teacher: "In what year was the battle of Waterloo fought?" Pupil: "I don't know." Teacher: "It's simple enough, if you only would learn how to cultivate artificial memory. Remember the twelve apostles. Add half their number to them. That's eighteen. Multiply by one hundred. That's 1800. Take the twelve apostles again. Add a quarter of their number to them. That's fifteen. Add to what you've got. That's 1815. That's the date. Quite simple, you see, to remember dates, if you will only adopt my system."—Travellers' Record.

JULIAN RALPH.

A writer in the Book Buyer gives some interesting incidents in the career of Julian Ralph, the well-known newspaper man of this city. One secret of his success is that everything is perennially interesting to him. "By Jove," he once said to an old New Yorker, "have you ever seen the City Hall? Have you? Well, I stumbled across it yesterday, and I'm proud to be in the same town with it." Although he must have travelled upward of one hundred thousand miles in different parts of the world, strangely enough, he has never been in Maine and Texas. Before he went to China, he prepared himself very carefully in pigeon English, which he had been told he would find useful, and, on discovering a Chinaman in his bedroom at a hotel in Shanghai, remarked: "Hello! What t'ing? What fashion man you b'long? What side you come?" To which the Chinaman replied: "This is Mr. Ralph, I presume. We have mutual friends who suggested my calling on you. Oh, that's all right. I spent eight years at school in Norwich, Conn." "Ah!" said Mr. Ralph, partially recovering his presence of mind, "vely well, vely well."

Highest of all in Leavening Power.—Latest U. S. Gov't Report

Royal Baking Powder

ABSOLUTELY PURE

The merits of the Palmer Woven Patent Hammocks have never been equalled. Their superiority of material, construction, and design has made them the standard since first introduced. While there is a continual effort by imitators and infringers to produce something similar, it has all been without success, and the "Palmer Patent Hammocks" still stand pre-eminently superior to any of the imitations. They are produced in larger quantities and infinitely more varieties than the combined production of all others.

Before purchasing, insist upon seeing the "Palmer Patent Hammocks." Remember, the name "Palmer" is a synonym for all that is best in Hammocks. If your dealer does not have them in stock, he can get them for you, but be sure that he does.

I. E. Palmer, Middletown, Conn.

GALLONS FOR 25¢

HIRE'S Rootbeer

THE CHAS. E. HIRE CO., Philadelphia.

... THE ...

Mayflower Portable Fireplace.

A PERFECT SUBSTITUTE for a Brick Fireplace at ONE-THIRD THE COST.

Has all the attractiveness of the open Fireplace or the more expensive fancy Coal Grate, with greater heating and ventilating capacity than either.

Is Made to last a Lifetime.

It can be used in any room, whether there is already a fireplace there or not, and requires only a joint of smoke-pipe to connect with the chimney. Can be fitted for burning coal if desired. Shipped safely to any part of the country. Three sizes.

Send for Special Circulars and Terms.

SMITH & ANTHONY COMPANY, Makers Hub Stoves and Ranges,
48 to 54 Union Street, Boston.

The MAGEE RANGES ARE THE BEST

Examine the patent OVEN THERMOMETER, Pronounced by ALL COOKS to be the GREATEST IMPROVEMENT of modern times.

No one can afford to keep house without a Magee Range and Furnace, because the saving in fuel and food will pay many times their cost over any others on the market.

The name MAGEE carries our Guarantee of PERFECT SATISFACTION with proper use.

Descriptive Circulars Free.

FOR SALE BY LEADING DEALERS EVERYWHERE.

MAGEE FURNACE COMPANY,
Boston. New York. Chicago.

DURKEE'S SPICES

THE WELL KNOWN "GAUNTLET BRAND"

EXCEL IN PURITY, STRENGTH & FLAVOR.

GEO. H. ELLIS,

Printer,

141 FRANKLIN ST.

BOSTON.

CHANNING BUILDING.

WITH extensive, light, and commodious rooms, large and fast Presses, embracing all the latest improvements, Type-setting Machines, new and modern material throughout, the Establishment ranks with the best in the City for the execution of Letterpress or Plate Printing.

BOOKS

PAMPHLETS

NEWSPAPERS

MAGAZINES

SERMONS

CATALOGUES

REPORTS

LAW WORK

AND EVERY VARIETY OF

Mercantile and Job Printing.

Excellence in Workmanship.

Promptness in Delivery.

The Pamphlet Bindery, included in the office, is furnished with every facility for rapid and good work.

The Christian Register

Liberty, Holiness, Love.

VOLUME LXXIV.

BOSTON, THURSDAY, JULY 18, 1895.

NUMBER 29.

The Christian Register.

TERMS: $3.00 per year. Single copies, 6 cents.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY THE
CHRISTIAN REGISTER ASSOCIATION,
141 Franklin Street, Boston, Mass.

Entered as second-class mail matter.

Contents.

EDITORIAL.	PAGE
Notes; The Protection of the Sabbath,	449
Christian Endeavorers; International Arbitration,	450
MUSINGS,	450
BREVITIES,	451
PRO AND CON.
Man's Limited Knowledge; The Need of Organization; The Oil of Joy for Mourning,	451
ORIGINAL AND SELECTED.
Another Year of the Ministry of Education in the South, by Rev. A. D. Mayo, M.A.,	452
The Japan Mission, by Rev. William I. Lawrence; Report of the Superintendent of Missions for the Central West; The Growth of Love, by Dr. J. E. Roberts,	453
Examinations in China; The Poor in Hot Weather; For Broader Fellowship,	454
George Whitefield Stone,	456
A Light in the Window,	463
SPIRITUAL LIFE,	454
THE SUNDAY-SCHOOL,	454
RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE,	454
THE PULPIT.
Citizen and Neighbor: Rights vs. Duties, by Rev. Thomas Van Ness,	456
SPIRIT OF THE PRESS,	457
LITERATURE.
Memoirs of Barras; Other Book Notices,	458
Miscellaneous; The Magazines; Literary Notes; Books Received,	459
THE HOME.
The Little Wanderer; Mrs. Pratt's Currant Jumbles; How Daisy helped,	460
The Egg Gatherer; Curiosities in Words; A Parrot at Breakfast,	461
POETRY.
Carpe Diem,	452
Nature gives the Holy Mood, by Mary Woodward Weatherbee,	456
A Brick Block,	460
Freedom,	461
Memorial, by Sarah E. Burton,	462
PERSONALS,	462
TEMPERANCE,	462
HERE AND THERE,	462
CHARITIES AND REFORMS,	463
EDUCATION,	463
SCIENCE,	463
PLEASANTRIES,	464

Editorial.

BISHOP POTTER, in deciding to live for a month in Stanton Street, New York City, has revealed alike his wisdom and devotion. The section he has chosen for his vacation work is described as one of the most thickly settled spots on the earth. The residents are chiefly foreign born, and a large portion recent comers. They are Roman Catholics and Jews, with a sprinkling of Protestants and a considerable class of non-church-goers. There cannot be anything specially inviting in the surroundings of his residence, and these are in striking contrast to the attractions of Newport. He goes to make a practical study of the work and to put himself into direct contact with slum life. No amount of reading or reports from others can give that knowledge which comes from personal observation. After a month's residence and preaching, with his ability and wise judgment, he will be better fitted to carry out practical plans for the improvement of this district. Besides, there will be a great gain alike to the bishop and these people. Both will learn more of each other's ways and needs, and a living sympathy will spring up between them. The act furthermore cannot fail to increase and intensify the spirit of consecration among both clergy and laity. For some time there has been a marked increase both in missionary and charitable work among the New York Episcopalians, and this will stimulate still greater activity. Bishop Potter thus proves himself a real overseer, and walks in the footsteps of Him who when on earth went about in the byways and among the poor and neglected doing good.

THE New York Sun is a sturdy champion of sound Orthodoxy. It advocates the old ideas of supernaturalism and Bible infallibility with a positive dogmatism equal to that of Mr. Moody, and is quite as free in its flings of infidel and sceptic toward Dr. Briggs and the higher criticism. In a recent editorial on "Japan and the Missionaries" our New York contemporary is inclined to approve the proposed putting of the missionary work into the hands of the Japanese on the ground that the growth would then be more natural and less artificial. No doubt, it is added, this growth would be affected by the "sceptical" spirit which prevails among the educated natives. They would maintain the standard of "Orthodoxy as well as it would be kept up by the graduates of sceptical seminaries whom the American Board is likely to send out as missionaries in the future. These schools are cultivating in their students a critical spirit similar to that which prevails among the Japanese. They are teaching them to distrust the authority of the Bible, and consequently of every doctrine and every dogma upon which Christian theology is founded."

THE summer school is now in full activity at the seashore and among the valleys and mountains of New England. In fact, it has open doors extending to the Pacific Coast. The subjects treated are of great variety and wide scope. Among its instructors and lecturers will be found many of the foremost thinkers as well as teachers of our high schools and universities. Evolution, ethics, political economy, the relations between capital and labor, good citizenship, how to read history, come within the scope of the curriculum. Perhaps, in its widest and fullest sense, it may be found in the Chautauqua gatherings. The root idea in each and all is to bring knowledge to the people who have not the means or leisure for extended study. The summer school is the people's college, and it is reaching a large class through its popular methods. In no way is it intended to take the place of the established institutions of learning, but does a special work of its own. It rather feeds instead of drawing from the high schools and universities, and is a quickener of intellectual activity. It is used in the service of religion, as seen in the Roman Catholic summer school and others which might be mentioned. Though to a large degree its instruction, from the nature of the case, is fragmentary, it is very suggestive and stimulating. Among the forces for good at work in this modern life let us recognize the summer school.

A CHURCH LABOR BUREAU has been established in the St. Bartholomew Parish House, New York City, which has an interest to all who are seeking the solution of economic questions. This bureau has now been in operation about a year and a half, and finds employment for about two hundred and fifty a month. It is not the design to find employment for "waste humanity" or to push the weak and incompetent into service. A careful examination is made of every applicant, and only after this has proved satisfactory is he recommended. Each applicant is required to pay twenty-five cents on registering and seventy-five cents when a place is secured. If the application fails, the twenty-five cents are refunded. Besides finding permanent places, the bureau has sent men for temporary relief at the expense of the parish to the wood-yard of the Charity Organization Society. The bureau makes a specialty of furnishing American girls as domestic servants, and this branch of work has proved very successful. The demands for American girls is three times greater than the supply. Still, they are growing more willing to go out at domestic service than formerly. The general idea on which the bureau acts is: "Give a man a chance to help himself, and he will maintain his self-respect; but the minute you make him a gift or a loan he begins to be degraded and pauperized. The bureau is doing very efficient work in obtaining employment for honorable men and women, who really prefer to pay for services rendered." As yet the bureau is not self-supporting, but it is hoped soon to make it. If this experiment can help a large class in need without making them paupers, it will render a very valuable service as an illustration of an important principle.

THE address of the colored men of South Carolina to the people of the United States cannot fail to awaken the sympathy of every generous mind. It declares that the rights and privileges of the Negro race have been trampled under foot by the dominant faction in South Carolina, and that this faction has further declared its purpose to perpetuate its power by amendments to the constitution which will forever bar the Negro the right of suffrage. They also declare that they have used all lawful means to secure their constitutional rights without avail; and therefore, as a last resort, they make an appeal to the people of the United States. But little can be done for the Negro in South Carolina beyond the expression of general sympathy. The immediate issue is confined to the State, and at present there is great uncertainty as to the immediate result. At first the leaders of the two great parties entered into an agreement to join their efforts in the approaching constitutional convention to secure the supremacy of the whites. Now we are told the party in power repudiate this agreement, and propose to elect delegates of their own and to carry out the policy of disenfranchising the Negro as far as is possible, but giving the franchise to all whites except criminals. Further, they intend to abolish the tax for the support of Negro schools, leaving them without any aid except such as the Negroes themselves pay in taxes. The leaders intend to use every means in their power to carry out their plans. Col. Dargan was driven out of Edgefield when he attempted to denounce this scheme, and was threatened with loss of life if he persisted; and this high-handed policy has been approved by a Democratic convention. Such a bold scheme has roused the wiser men of the State, and they see the danger ahead. They will make an effort when the convention meets to settle the suffrage question on a fairer basis than this one proposed. But the result is as yet uncertain. It is to be hoped, both for the good of the Negro and for the best welfare of the State, that the present scheme of the dominant party may be defeated, and that a juster plan will be adopted.

AN incident is related connected with the recent Oxford race between the Cornell and Oxford crews which shows how strongly aristocratic feeling still clings to the English college men. A number of the American students were eager to be present, and, being short of ready money, resolved to work their way as cattle-feeders on the steamers. But the Englishmen, we are told, stipulated that no member of the American crew should have ever engaged in manual work as a living. "This is a gentleman's race, don't you know; and no representative of the lower classes need expect to be allowed to compete simply because he happens to have saved up money enough to go to college." Whether this be a true version of the case or not, it is certain that the aristocratic feeling above indicated exists among English students and graduates. This is in striking contrast both to the American feeling and fact. True, there is a small class here who have inherited the wealth which their fathers gained by toil who assume airs of gentility and look down on those who engage in manual labor with the air of superiority and condescension. But these excite the smile of pity. With us lads of good breeding and education, in the spirit of manly independence, prefer to work their way by even "menial labor" than to depend upon the help of their rich relatives. This fact speaks well for American manhood.

DR. JOHN FISKE gave a very able lecture before the Congress at Greenacre on "The Everlasting Reality of Religion," in which he planted himself on the ground of spiritual theism. He gave a brief survey of religion from its earliest and crudest forms to its most refined shape, and found that all religions contain these three essentials: "first, belief in God as in some way either explicable or inexplicable, analogous to man; second, belief in an unseen world, in which human beings continue to exist after death; third, belief in an inseparable connection between this unseen world and the moral law." These three beliefs Mr. Fiske declared were essential to religion. Anything calling itself religion which undertook to omit any one of these essentials was not entitled to the name. He placed great emphasis upon the fact that coeval with the genesis of humanity and the ethical sense the religious sense also began to appear. Was this reaching out of humanity toward the unseen world the establishment of a relation in which the subjective term only is real and the objective term imaginary? If so, it was something without precedent in the whole history of evolution, an isolated fact in the universe; and this is enough to condemn the supposition. It may safely be affirmed that there are no isolated facts in the universe. The whole analogy of evolution bears us with resistless momentum to the conclusion that the religious cravings of mankind are correlated with an unseen world that really exists, and in which the process of ethical evolution is to find its fullest fruition and consummation.

THE PROTECTION OF THE SABBATH.

An organization called the New England Sabbath Protective League has recently been formed, the names of whose officers, taken together with its declared objects of work, warrant the hope that it will prove of much practical value. At the same time the task to which it devotes itself is by no means an easy one. The worst result of carrying a good custom to extremes is the difficulty of preventing the inevitable reaction from going to equal lengths in the other direction. They who now wish to preserve Sunday for the high uses it may serve as a day of rest from toil and for devotion to spiritual culture have no harder foe to fight than the memory of the Puritan Sabbath which lingers in the public mind. No matter how reasonable may be their demands, selfishness and greed are able to raise against them the cry that an attempt is being made to bring them back under the yoke of an ancient bondage. Dishonest as this charge may be, it is specious enough to cost the friends of the Sabbath the loss of many an adherent who ought to stand stoutly on their side.

It is well to reckon with this difficulty at the outset, and to understand that it constitutes a somewhat serious handicap. The promoters of this League should consider upon what type of mind they need to bring influence to bear, and upon what grounds they can best commend their cause to people whom they most need to convert or enlist. It may be assumed that all who are in close affiliation with churches can be counted upon to resist further encroachments of business and pleasure upon our day of rest. They who care little or nothing for church-going are the people who most require to be wrought upon, and nothing is likely to appeal to them less than mere reiteration of the Mosaic command.

This new Protective League, in its declaration of principles, "assumes that the Sabbath is a divine institution for rest from toil. This conviction is based upon the references to it in the sacred Scriptures of the Jewish and Christian churches, upon the example of Christ and his apostles, upon the general conduct of the Christian Church for eighteen centuries, and upon the acknowledged necessities, physical, mental, and moral, of the nature of man." This last clause undoubtedly furnishes the most fruitful text for public discussion, and it is on this part of the argument that most emphasis needs to be placed. The testimony of Scripture is not likely to weigh much, either with those who make or with those who enforce our laws. Indeed, there is a large class of minds which, disbelieving in what are commonly called the "divine sanctions" for the Sabbath, are very apt to refuse to support a movement for the preservation of the institution, so long as these sanctions are urged as the pretext for action.

These things being understood, it would seem to be the part of wisdom to make much of those grounds of common effort on which all classes of believers and non-believers can stand together; for we want the help of people outside churches to keep the day from being given over to worse and worse desecration. It is not possible to overestimate the blessing of Sunday merely as a day of rest from physical toil, and the tendency of modern life to lay upon us activities that are more and more intense continually enhances the value of this boon which the piety of the past has given us. But, when rest means only pleasure, then pleasure soon comes to mean business also. Half the world finds employment in helping the other half to its Sunday amusements. The door thus opened to gainful pursuits is pushed more widely open year after year; and, if present tendencies go unchecked, one does not see why the day of rest may not be lost entirely at last. Certainly, it is none too soon to call a halt to some of these tendencies, even if we are thinking only of the interests of those who toil so hard during six days of the week that they need the seventh for physical recuperation.

Again, the opportunities which the Sabbath affords to the masses of men for intellectual, moral, and spiritual culture are such that its preservation is a matter of the greatest consequence to our higher civilization. We, of course, maintain that the influence of the Sunday services in our churches throughout the land is of incalculable benefit, though there are many respects in which we should like to amend the teaching that comes from most of these pulpits. Unless the mind has been so warped by prejudice as to render it incapable of just views, it is hard to understand how any intelligent person can fail to set the highest value upon the ministrations of the church, taken as a whole. Then, as public libraries and art museums are coming to be opened at least during some part of Sunday, and with the leisure that the day brings to the common people to read with a mind freed from the heavy cares of the week, it seems as if every lover of his kind should fight hard rather than surrender the Sabbath back to those grasping, worldly interests from whose hard hand it has been won.

It is to be hoped that this new league will adopt no tone of meaning to revive and enforce an outworn type of Sabbatarianism. To insist, for example, that public reading-rooms should be closed and Sunday newspapers should cease to be published would be a great mistake. Churchmen may band together to keep the Sabbath as they please; but, when it becomes a question of procuring or enforcing legislation on the subject, and of winning the better element outside churches to help in saving the day from being utterly swallowed up in a tide of worldliness, the line of defence should be drawn where people who are looking only to the reasonable well-being of society will be willing to take their stand.

On the other hand, if any word of ours could reach those who are refusing to make any contest for the better use of the Sabbath because some one else believes in divine sanctions for the institution which they do not acknowledge, we should like to remonstrate with them on the folly of their proceeding. So long as the demands of the Sabbath Protective League are fair and reasonable, all reasonable men and women should help to enforce them. Whether the motive be to secure only what is plainly for the advantage of society at large or to obey what is regarded as an express divine command, while people can agree on the practical measures to be taken, and are confronted by strong forces which care neither for the will of God nor the good of man, their division on matters of theory is always an invitation to defeat.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVORERS.

The great gathering of Christian Endeavorers from all parts of the world in convention in Boston has been a marked event. In every way it was successful, and this powerful movement deserves a candid and careful study. That in fourteen years a single society, formed without any idea of the future before it, but bent on a local work, should increase to more than forty thousand, and spread world wide, embracing a membership of two and a half millions, and generate a high enthusiasm and consecration in Christian work, is a phenomenon not to be passed by with indifference or a sneer. What, then, is the spirit and purpose of this organization?

It is rooted in three features,—the taking of the pledge to be loyal to Christ and his Church, the consecration meeting, and a system of committees by which its practical service for Christ is performed. These cardinal principles are insisted upon. Efforts to form Endeavor Societies without these three features, we are told, have been short-lived. The work of the organization has been done by the voluntary service of members. Hence the outlay of money to keep the vast organization going is trifling. This removes at once the perils which come from a large class of paid officials, and the work is better done because it is inspired by consecrated service. Each society is connected with some church; but there is also great flexibility and adaptability to circumstances, doctrines, church polity, and ecclesiastical conditions in all lands, but in every case the three features above named are insisted on. "It is the proud boast," says President Clarke, of this society, "and it is no empty boast, that it is as loyal to its own church as any purely denominational society possibly can be." At the same time it claims not to represent a sect, but "the undivided evangelical young people of America." And the fellowship, we are assured, for the last year has been growing broader and more complete; "and this fellowship," adds President Clarke, "is necessary to future successes, as is proved by past victories. Thus it is declared that denominational loyalty and love are only more marked when we are bound together in an alliance offensive and defensive against the hosts of evil. It is true in Christian Endeavor ranks, as never before in the history of Christendom." The president closes one of his addresses with this exhortation: "Then let us enlarge our boundaries, Christian Endeavorers, not for the sake of the organization, but for the sake of the kingdom, because enlargement means a larger federation, a sweeter fellowship, a wider unity, a stronger army to fight against hoary and venerable wrongs. Let us enlarge our fellowship for no selfish motive, but because the God-given successes of the past show that enlargement means the spread of the intense devotional idea for which Christian Endeavor stands, because it means civic purity, missionary extension,—the world for Christ."

This breadth of fellowship, it is true, is limited to all "evangelical" Christians; but, in justice to truth, we should add that the Endeavorers represent a broad type of "evangelical" Christianity, and that they as a whole are more intent on making practical Christians than theological zealots.

The tone of the speaking during the late meetings was directed toward an improvement of the world we live in, so that here and now our lives may be purer and happier. While the importance of missions and distinct efforts for the conversion of men were urged with earnestness, great emphasis was also placed on the importance of still more aggressive efforts for the reform of existing evils. "Push things!" was the cry. Awaken, and keep awake righteous public sentiment! "The Endeavor Society is a quick and tender conscience in these matters among the young men of the community. It is an indignation meeting against misrule and corruption which never adjourns. Its true mission, as of every similar organization, is to awaken and to keep awake righteous public sentiment, until organized wickedness slinks away abashed and ashamed of itself. Not as an organized society, but as well-organized individuals, simply because we are followers of Christ, the righteous, let us stand everywhere for the right. Do not be content with overthrowing one Tammany in New York and another in Chicago. Do not be content until a Tammany in America is forever an impossibility. Do not be content until a corrupt political deal is impossible and intolerable as an open cesspool would be in your own parlor. Follow the flying foe. Push things. The sword of the Lord and of Christian Endeavor!"

A society of young people inspired by a lofty religious enthusiasm, planted in the very heart of thousands of churches bound together by a sacred pledge to work for the highest good of men, stirred by a Christ-like love for the sinful and suffering, and giving themselves by personal consecration to noble ends and with a sublime audacity of faith in the truth and power of the love of God to reconstruct the world,—a society with such a spirit and aim, though it may have clinging to it some of the errors of the old theology, is a mighty force in helping forward the fulfilment of the prayer of Jesus,—"Thy kingdom come, thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven."

INTERNATIONAL ARBITRATION.

A telegram from Paris informs us that the French Chambers have voted in favor of making a treaty with the United States in which arrangements are to be made for the settlement of all questions in dispute between the two nations by arbitration. No details beyond the brief telegram have as yet reached us. The movement itself is very important as an indication of what we hope in the future will be adopted by the great nations as an established policy. There are several reasons which make it probable that something of this kind will become a necessity. The very great improvement both in weapons and ammunition have already made war so expensive and destructive that no first-class nation can carry on for any length of time without ruinous exhaustion of men and money. Gen. Fitzhugh Lee, in a brief article in the Century, has very convincingly shown this. The changes made since the battle of Gettysburg have been so great that, if the rifle and present improved field guns had then been in use, they would probably have destroyed every man in the assaulting lines in Pickett's famous charge. There is no reason to suppose that we have reached the limit of improvements. The constant changes every year show that we are still making a rapid advance in the attainment of still greater destructive results. Already no exposed charge can be attempted against a well-fortified line without certain destruction of those who make it. Two armies in the open field can destroy each other with swift certainty, and even the one which holds the ground will gain the victory by an enormous sacrifice of life. In addition to the fearful destructiveness and cost of war is the loss which comes from the derangements of trade. The commercial relations between different nations are now so varied and extensive that a war would bring a wide-spread financial disaster, reaching from the home of the humble worker to the national treasury. It is this condition of affairs which makes rulers shrink from war. Formerly great nations engaged in wars of conquest to enlarge their dominions and increase their power: now these are not undertaken on the grand scale of olden times, but governments enter into a tacit agreement as to what territory each may acquire, and, when disputes arise, they try to settle them by diplomacy instead of an appeal to arms.

Notwithstanding all this, we are also confronted with the fact that the great European nations are bending their energies and pouring out their money in the organization of vast armies and in the invention of new and more destructive weapons. France and Germany are armed to the teeth, and, cherishing bitter memories of the past, like two angry lions are waiting and watching for the favorable opportunity to rush at each other. The war spirit is uppermost, and probably they will be in no mood to consider the question of international arbitration until after the exhaustion and ruin of another war. Looking at the world from this standpoint, it would seem that we are farther than ever from realizing the hope of a general peace among nations. Perhaps this is one of the ways by which we are at last to reach the establishment of international arbitration. Already Germany, Austria, and Italy have formed a triple alliance; and it is reported that Russia and France have done the same. May we not at least hope that this is the beginning of a policy which in its future development will embrace all nations?

There are other aspects of the question which point to this desired end. The intense industrialism and the higher influences of literature and Christianity are weakening the power of the war spirit, and the people are beginning to protest against a policy which makes such vast expenditures necessary. Already the people are taxed nearly to the point of endurance. Italy is on the verge of bankruptcy, and France and Germany are draining their resources. The rulers find it hard to get the needed military appropriations without earnest appeals to patriotism and national pride. From present indications legislatures will soon demand a halt. It seems almost certain that statesmen will be confronted with the question, How can we reduce our warlike expenditures? This will lead them seriously to consider whether this cannot best be done by establishing an International Court of Arbitration, backed by the united military force of the world to maintain its decisions. This would enable each nation largely to reduce its force, the ratio of reduction being mutually agreed upon. No one expects so radical a change will be adopted at once. The vote of the French Chambers is only the first step. But the considerations given above clearly point as the results of the evolution of history to the ultimate establishment of a court of international arbitration.

Musings.

THE universal language has not come yet. The universal alphabet is much nearer than the universal tongue. The universal alphabet was born in America. It came in when the lightning was taught to write with a pen three hundred or three thousand miles long. The lightning was illiterate. It could make all sorts of crow-tracks on the sky, as a boy may scribble aimlessly on his slate. But they did not mean anything, and they looked almost as jagged on the clouds as the angular system of penmanship which is still fashionable and ugly. But, when Morse invented the telegraph, he found it necessary to invent an alphabet which the lightning was capable of using. The common alphabet was out of the question with his instrument. So the combination of dots, dashes, and spaces known as the Morse alphabet was contrived, and became identified completely with that telegraphic system. Morse made it for the eye. He had no idea that it would soon be read by the ear more quickly than it could be read by the eye, that it would literally be taken "on tick." The writer was not ten years of age before this alphabet had become as familiar to eye and hand as the type in which this is printed. The Morse instrument soon made its way on the continent. Some alphabetical system of dots, dashes, and spaces was needed for its use; but I was not aware that just the same combination was used on the continent. I found it out, however, the other day in a very interesting way. I was in Dol, a little French town of Brittany, and wanted to send a telegram to London. Though my own writing is more legible to me than that of any editor I know of, the operator had doubt about the spelling of a proper name. I was standing close to the instrument, and immediately put my finger on the Morse telegraphic key and wrote the name. The young man listened with surprise; and his "Ah, oui," and "Je comprends," showed that he had read the message. We compared notes, and found that the alphabet was, as he said, le même. Yesterday morning I had occasion to send a message from a local post-office in Paris. The telegraph was behind the counter, where I could not get at it; but, after the girl had taken the message, instead of returning thanks verbally, I took out a latch-key from my pocket, and with the blade of my knife I clicked out merci. The girl's face brightened into a sunny laugh, and she recognized me at once as one of the fraternity of telegraphers which a common alphabet had brought into electric affinity.

THE Morse click is not the only American sound which has forced itself upon the ear of Europe in an alphabetical way. The typewriter has crossed the ocean, and has begun to add its American accent to the Babel of other sounds. The typewriter will write as easily in French as in English, as easily in Dutch as in French, and as easily in Italian as in Dutch. A card before me reads, "Vous n'avez plus le temps d'écrire à l'ancienne manière." The French have been prompt to take up this invention. More than one hundred and fifty Remingtons are now in use in the ministerial departments and two hundred among the railroad companies; and others are distributed in various departments of the government. I do not know how far our writing machines have found their way in the English government. But I suspect that it is more conservative in this respect. A few weeks ago I called on one of the most important members of the English cabinet, the Home Secretary. He kindly wished to commend me to one of the prison commissioners, who might give me more detailed information on the subject I was studying. I presumed he would take out his card and write a few words on it, or possibly call a secretary and dictate a note which he might sign. I was surprised to see him take a quill pen, and write an autographic note to the commissioner. The goose-quill seems to me an emblem of the last century; and I was surprised that a man burdened with such a great load of work, whose time seemed so precious that I hesitated to rob him of a single minute, should nevertheless take time to write a note of introduction with a quill pen to a gentleman in a subordinate department of the government. It was a good illustration of the conservatism of English courtesy, or of the Home Secretary's personal conception of the duties of a gentleman.

SUCH matters, after all, are matters of form and etiquette, and depend much upon conventional usage. The question when a man shall use a machine and when he shall use his own hand will in the future be decided with some reference to the saving of time and labor. I know no reason why a man should turn himself into a writing machine when he can get some machine to do the work for him and secure more time for something else. I hold, at any rate, that it is a mistaken courtesy for a man to write with his own hand a letter which the person addressed cannot read when he gets it. It seems more courteous for such people to use a typewriter or to dictate their letters to an amanuensis. How many books would be popular if the readers had to read them from the author's manuscript or from a fac-simile of their handwriting? It does not detract from, but greatly adds to, the pleasure of a reader to have the book in legible print. The author's signature at the beginning may be well enough. Likewise it adds greatly to an editor's pleasure in receiving an article if it is type-written, instead of a mystery of confusions and conundrums. And I hope the time is coming when it will be considered bad manners, as well as bad policy, to send an editor articles in any but good type-written characters. A lady who wrote a private letter by typewriter apologized at the end for writing a postscript in long hand. Her conception of etiquette was both sensible and kindly. There is an individuality in handwriting, I admit; but let it be reserved for signatures on bank checks, letters of credit, Christmas gifts, and other luxuries. It was a delightful surprise, on going into the cathedral of Boston, England, to find the names of John W. Chadwick and Charles F. Dole on the register in characters as familiar to my eye as are their faces themselves. They were written with a legibility and a self-respect which was becoming in this house of God. They were written to be read, unlike the names of bank presidents and secretaries of the treasury, which are written so as to prevent forgery. I could have sworn that Chadwick and Dole had crossed the ocean and written their names on that book with their own hands. But I may be mistaken; for I knew a member of Congress whose secretary could imitate his signature so exactly that he used to frank all of the senator's letters and gratify people who wanted his autograph. I hope this secretary is not to be held responsible for all the forgery he has committed with his chief's authorization.

Brevities.

The sermon of Rev. Mr. Van Ness is a word for the times. Read it one and all.

As an illustration of the spirit of the times is the fact noted by a lady who opened a charming mountain home for summer boarders. While applicants wrote inquiring about table, rooms, fishing, drives, amusements, drainage, and the like, not one asked about church privileges.

The Duchess of Teck, mother of the Duchess of York, has been slumming in the Whitechapel district. Royalty and poverty knelt before the common Father of all, and joined in prayer, followed by song and kindly words. Thus the rich and poor meet together.

Commissioner Roosevelt puts forth this statement: "All laws are to be enforced, but in the order of their importance. All crimes will be punished, but in the order of their seriousness; and those who think they can divert the labors of the board of police from putting out the conflagration by pointing to bonfires, are foes of good government, allies of the lawless, and are clamoring in vain."

One of the few Christian Endeavorers who visited Franklin Park on Sunday, as he looked around, is reported as exclaiming: "This pleasure ground strikes me as a magnificent illustration of Christianity. It is a humanitarian enterprise for the good of all the people. It must make the multitudes happier and better and safer for that reason. In its people's common and people's parks it is teaching our other cities a great patriotic and Christian duty."

An old Puritan custom has been revived in several towns in Iowa and Minnesota. Children of sixteen years and under are required to be at home when the town bell rings the hour of 9 P.M. Any one under the fixed age found in the streets without a written permit from parents or guardians, is liable to arrest. This is a return to the age of paternalism. Surely, the young who now roam in our streets at night need looking after; for the temptations are fearful.

Chinatown in Boston has also had its open-air meeting, and a native Chinese minister preached. It was a unique and picturesque scene to see the Celestials, with their almond eyes, gazing upon their fellow-countryman as he told the gospel story and set forth the Christian principles, showing that all that was best in the principles of Confucius and other Chinese sages were in keeping with the Bible and the doctrines of Christianity. This is said to be the first step toward organized religious efforts among the Chinese.

The Advertiser, in noting the story of the military officer who saw the parting of the waves of the Red Sea caused by a storm, says: "It is too bad to spoil such smug self-complacency; but in the interest of historical precision we are bound to remark that this explanation is exceedingly venerable, has long been familiar to all properly taught Sunday-school boys and girls, is a standard example of Christian 'apologetics,' and was thoroughly set forth in one of a series of lectures delivered in Boston under very orthodox auspices in the year 1872."

Lowell, Bryant, Holmes, and Longfellow—not to mention Whittier, whose Orthodoxy is on a plane with James Freeman

Clarke—are great favorites with the Christian Endeavorers. The Tennessee delegation visited Mount Auburn; and, as they came to the grave of Longfellow, they broke out in song. Others around the cemetery drew near, until they formed quite a gathering. Then it was proposed that they have a service. So one made a prayer, and several of the members repeated passages from the works of the poet; and words were spoken appreciating the value of his poetry and the high influence it has had in the world. It was a spontaneous and hearty tribute which they thus paid to the Unitarian poet.

The gathering of the Universalists in Boston was not overshadowed by the great mass of Christian Endeavorers. The meetings were full and enthusiastic. The question has been asked, Why did not the Universalists join with the larger gathering? The Universalists, it is said, some time ago asked to be allowed to join in the movement, while they retained at the same time their separate denominational existence. This was declined. So the Universalists organized among themselves, and, like Methodists in their Epworth League, worked in their own lines. The young Universalists are full of enthusiasm: they have faith in their own ideas, and are downright in earnest. The Young People's Christian Union has vigorous life, and their proceedings were varied and interesting. We shall give a fuller report of them next week.

Pro and Con.

MAN'S LIMITED KNOWLEDGE.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

What does man know of God's hidden life, or of the life he has infused into things on our planet? We are continually discovering more and more of the workings and power of his life, in vegetable, insect, animal, and man. Yet no age nor people have been able to understand the thousandth part of what exists in the forms of life around them.

A man must be the perfection of egotism and ignorance to think he knows more than a small fraction of what exists in his own mind and body. The more we study some of the simplest things we ever saw, the more complicated and inexplicable they become to us. And we may refer them to the wisest sages or scientists, and their report is, "We do not know," "We see through a glass darkly."

It would be a great blessing to mankind if all our teachers were as ready to acknowledge their ignorance as Paul was, and as fully conscious of the grand and glorious attainments to be reached by fighting against ignorance and sin. T. M. C.

THE NEED OF ORGANIZATION.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

The value of organization, the enthusiasm that comes from numbers, and the power of symbols in religious work has never been better illustrated than in the Christian Endeavor movement. In the past ten days Boston Unitarians have had before them an object lesson as to what can be done with young people. The Boston Advertiser well says in a late editorial, "What other one interest, mercantile, political, or educational, could organize within so few years a society having members in every country on the face of the globe, and bringing together fifty thousand delegates at an annual convention?" Deducting, as we may, for a number of persons who have simply come to Boston in order to have a good time or to spend the summer at New England resorts, deducting also a certain percentage for those who are not especially interested in the Endeavor movement, it still remains a fact that thousands have come to this convention of 1895 because they are sincerely and thoroughly in earnest and interested in religious topics. The question which we must ask ourselves is, What are we doing for and with our young people? Scattered here and there throughout the United States are a number of literary organizations, or Unity Clubs. New England is quite strong in religious guilds, which more or less add to the vitality of our Unitarian churches; but so far there has been no unified movement, no direct object of large importance to draw all these societies together and no single head or bureau to advise, suggest, create, and stimulate. During the May anniversaries a general feeling showed itself to unite in some more intimate way the guilds and the Unity Clubs. A joint committee looking to this end was appointed, and they have already had one satisfactory consultation. It is the desire of the presidents of the Unity Club Bureau and the National Guild to interest not only the ministers of our respective churches, but also the young people themselves, in this plan of one national Unitarian organization. We write this letter at the present time in order to call the attention of our ministers and leaders of young people's clubs to the subject, trusting that at our national Conference at Washington we may have an informal meeting of all interested for the discussion of a plan which shall unify our various interests, East and West, and give us such large objects and purposes as will arouse the enthusiasm of our young men and women everywhere.

THOMAS VAN NESS,
President of Unity Club Bureau.

LOREN B. MACDONALD,
President of Nat'l Guild Alliance.

THE OIL OF JOY FOR MOURNING.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

When our dear ones are taken from us, belief in an immortal life is the one consolation we can have. If we can think of them freed from all suffering, all infirmities of this flesh, young and joyous, going about their Master's work, our sorrowing hearts take courage again, and turn back to meet the cares of this daily life, rejoicing that those the dear God has taken from us are spared its vicissitudes.

We thank him for the blessing of their lives, their influence surrounds us, we remember and love to dwell on their virtues; and we strive as never before to live up to the examples of charity, honesty, and purity they gave us. We love to read the books they prized, we value every object they touched. The pictures they gazed on, the music they preferred, all become endeared to us. We enshrine them in the most sacred place of our memory, and our own lives receive a certain consecration from communicating with the gentle spirits that have preceded us to the other shore. How differently, alas, the chastening hand of death appears to those whose minds have never accepted the belief in a future life! Their dear ones are gone. The restless heart is still, the keen, bright intellect annihilated, the love, the sweet fragrance of a beautiful nature, all gone,—nothing left but a recollection, no hope of a reunion, no beatific vision of that beautiful soul winging its way to the heavenly mansions.

In hopeless anguish the crushed mourner turns away from the grave, infinite desolation in his soul. What words can comfort him? None. He is forced, perhaps, to live for others, to again take up the burden of life. There are people dependent on him, young children to care for; and so, if he have the strength, he gathers himself together, and puts his shoulder to the wheel. But all the while his heart in wild rebellion is crying out against the cruelty and uselessness of existence. Time will dull his sorrow and bring some alleviation: this is all he can look to until oblivion closes over him, and the grave ends his career.

In God's merciful providence it may or may not make any difference in the world of spirits what poor mortals in their blindness and ignorance think here. We do not see beyond the veil, and cannot know; but it does make an infinite difference to us and to all about us here whether we are uplifted by a divine hope or whether we are doggedly enduring existence.

We meet radiant faces, we come in contact with saintly lives, we see their beauty and their fragrance, we feel the blessings they carry with them, the outpouring of their hearts toward all God's creatures, their recognition of a kinship with all humanity; and we contrast these lives with those of many excellent, upright men and women, who, unilluminated by that Light which alone explains the mystery of our universe, are like ships without a rudder, tossed hither and thither, now drifting idly with the current, now scudding before the winds of adversity, now wrecked on the rock of despair, unhappy, at war with the world, rebellious against fate, and unable to do life's best work.

E. E. JEFFRIES.

CARPE DIEM.

O soul of mine, how few and short the years
Ere thou shalt go the way of all thy kind,
And here no more thy joy or sorrow find
At any fount of happiness or tears!
Yea, and how soon shall all that thee endears
To any heart that beats with love for thee
Be everywhere forgotten utterly,
With all thy loves and joys, and hopes and fears!
But, O my soul, because these things are so,
Be thou not cheated of to-day's delight.
When the night cometh, it may well be night.
Now it is day. See that no minute's glow
Of all the shining hours unheeded goes;
No fount of rightful joy by thee untasted flows.

—John W. Chadwick.

ANOTHER YEAR OF THE MINISTRY OF EDUCATION IN THE SOUTH.

BY REV. A. D. MAYO, M.A.

If the flight of time is the measure of excellence in any work, surely the way the months have flown since my last summer's talk with the readers of the Register should testify to the value of service rendered. Now, just recovered from the noise and confusion of the fifty thousand "Endeavorers," who have kindly combined the pious effort to evangelize Boston with the delights of a summer visit to the Hub, it may be somewhat restful to listen to the plain story of what one man is doing in a work that tries to combine things sacred and secular in that mighty word "Education," which never was freighted with such wondrous fulness and richness of meaning as in these years of our Lord.

I premise by saying that this Ministry of Education includes everything I am able to do from July 4th round to a new Independence Day. It is now fifteen years since I have enjoyed the parson's blessed privilege of a summer vacation. The literary work of the mission becomes more exacting every year, and is necessarily crowded into the four months of summer and autumn residence in Boston. The present summer, perhaps until December, will be filled with constant labor on my projected History of the American Common School, of which the publication will begin, by the National Bureau of Education, probably during the coming winter. It is my object in this, the most extended of all my educational writings, at least to offer to the educational public of the country such a readable, continuous history of this most characteristic American institution as will emphasize the absolute and indispensable relations of the common school to American civilization. In addition to this the preparation of nine new lectures before the Young Men's Christian Union on the general subject, "Our New Teachers," with the labor from which no man or combination of good people seems disposed to relieve me of getting together the moderate fund by which the work of the coming year shall be done, certainly offers small opportunity for rest or recreation. Providentially, my health and ability to labor, so far, have been adequate to the increasing demands of the new years.

After the usual labors of the summer and autumn, from July 1, 1894, to Thanksgiving Day, I transferred myself to Washington, D.C., which I made "headquarters" for field work in the neighboring States of Maryland and Delaware till the opening of spring. There is no part of the country where downright solid work, like the old-time "terrible toiling" of Horace Mann, is more needed than in the older portions of the Atlantic Southern States. Outside of a dozen large cities and towns, Delaware, half of Maryland, and all of Virginia east of the Blue Ridge of the Alleghanies are fair missionary ground for the educator.

The colored folk, indeed, in some respects can better afford to wait for this great uplift than the majority of their white neighbors, for the same reason that a child has more time before him than his father and mother to prepare for responsible life. The one disability of the Negro—which too often, unfortunately, he does not himself recognize—is the portentous fact that, while every European people of the humbler class has fought its way through the awful discipline of sword, pestilence, and famine, for a thousand years, toward such freedom as it now enjoys, and by this tremendous schooling is reasonably able to appreciate and use, our brother in black was held in the prolonged childhood of slave society up to the day of his emancipation by a revolution not of his own making, and to which he contributed in no considerable degree. Then, wisely or unwisely, he was shot up to the highest earthly position, republican American citizenship, of which the motive power is mental, moral, social, and industrial self-control. Until several millions of colored children and youth learn that most difficult of all lessons, to "paddle your own canoe," everything done for the race eight millions strong will expose it more and more to the rough collision with the lower ten million of white folk who are its natural rivals in the race of life.

It will be even more important, for the coming five-and-twenty years, that ten millions of uneducated, prejudiced, and provincialized white people of the sixteen Southern States shall be lifted out of their present ways of thinking and feeling than that the Negro shall be stimulated unduly with the expectation of a complete enjoyment of political and social equality. In everything, excepting these final and highest conditions of citizenship, the colored people of the South are to-day enjoying such opportunity for improvement in general intelligence, reliable character, self-supporting and varied industry, and a deliverance from their present home disabilities, and the half-pagan superstition of their church life, as justifies all that has been done, and much that may be hoped for their future. But, in his upward march, the Negro now confronts what may prove his most formidable obstacle to advancement,—the condition of more than ten millions of the lower strata of the Southern white people. South Carolina remains, as it has been for a century past, the barometer of the South. The present determination of the leaders of its dominant "people's party," to place the colored majority under a permanent political and educational disability, is the most dangerous peril that has confronted the race since the early days of reconstruction. We now realize what a calamity befell the South and the country through the defeat of the great measure for national aid to education. It was inevitable that the masses of the Southern white people, sooner or later, would come into that control of public affairs in these States once held by the slave-holding class. The real question twenty years ago was, When this inevitable change takes place, will ten millions of these white people, hitherto the humble followers of the most powerful and ambitious aristocratic class in Christendom, be ready, under their new leadership, to recognize the Negro in his new citizenship, and continue to grant him even such opportunities as he has enjoyed since 1870 under the political administration of his old masters? I repeat, this is to-day the "impending crisis" of this people. And the sooner all the great forces of our American civilization, in every practical way, are brought to bear upon the general uplift of three-fourths the white population of the Southern States, the better will it be, not only for our colored citizens, but for the future of the republic.

For this reason, and in view of the swift-coming years "when no man can work," I am more inclined than ever to concentrate my field work on those portions of the South where the common school is least developed and the unschooled white population most in need of what the common school can do. Our great educators of the North, in their wearisome controversies over the technicalities of the "New Education," the mysteries of "Correlation," and the wonders of a materialistic psychology are strangely forgetting that ninety per cent., even of white young America, is never found in any school after the age of twelve, and that the majority of our new American perils, North and South, are such as eight continuous years of a thoroughly good common school education, with moral and industrious training well stirred in, would cause to disappear in one generation. The condition of the American Negro, twenty years hence, depends far more on what the ten millions of Southern white people who form the strata next above him and the corresponding class of recent foreign extraction in the North may then think and feel about him than on anything that any political party can do for him in Congress, or all that even the superior education the Northern churches are now imparting to him can achieve. For every law enacted for his political protection will be ignored or defied; and, the more he knows and the more capable he becomes, the less will he be tolerated by the great brute labor-league interest of the North, that everywhere elbows him into the gutter, and the solid column, not of "poor white trash," but of well-enough meaning but narrow-minded Southern people, not yet half convinced that he has the common rights of American citizenship. Our good people who are still orating against the "Bourbons of the South" are simply barking on a worn-out last year's squirrel track, that has already "run up a tree." The old South of forty years ago, with all its merits and demerits, has passed into history, and outside an occasional reminiscence in Congress and the political machine in two or three States, as a public force, no longer exists. It is now this great uprising, unschooled Anglo-Saxon new South—the children of the Confederate soldiery, whose bravery, loyalty to their leadership, and miraculous endurance of all things for what they honestly believed the cause of freedom, home, and country we all admire—that now confronts us. Politically, this excellent and hopeful people is now in the hands of the most dangerous body of leaders ever known in the past century of the republic. Socially and religiously, it is in no condition to deal justly with the awful race problem that, like a threatening apparition, stands right across the highway of its advancement. The most hopeful thing about it is its steady improvement in industrial methods, its strong and self-sacrificing home and neighborhood life, and especially its great awakening, just now, to the need of a better education for its boys and girls.

Everywhere in my visits I find the great mass of these people demanding more and better common schools, thronging my lecture-rooms and the churches everywhere open to me, their young folk listening to the glorious gospel of our new American citizenship, and toiling for their own educational opportunity in a way that carries me back to my own boyhood among the hills of Northern Massachusetts. And it will be high time for the cultivated classes of New England and the West to denounce these people for their present attitude toward the multitude of colored folk with whom they are living, and of the shady side of whose life they are always kept in mind, when the educated Negro citizen, so often a true Christian lady or gentleman, is no longer looked at askance in our churches, told to "move on" at our hotels, compelled to live apart in our cities, and, with now and then a picturesque exception, ignored and practically suppressed.

So, with no lack of interest in all that is being done for the superior schooling of young "Afro-America," I more and more believe that the great need of the South of to-day is just the sort of revival of the common school that some of us remember half a century ago, under Horace Mann, when New England paid less per capita (less than $3 per annum) for the common schooling of its masses than Texas and Mississippi to-day, and the average wages of teachers ($12 for men and $6 for women per month) were less than is now paid to Southern Negro teachers, and as large a proportion of the "native American" children of Massachusetts were in no school as among the white population of Georgia and Alabama to-day. It is not by building new colleges in the South for common school children half so much as by waking up and informing the influential millions of the rising "Third Estate" of the South to demand and obtain more and better common schooling than the meagre four or five months—with all the drawbacks of sparse population, comparative poverty, and unskilled teaching, which is now the only educational heritage of their children—that this great Southern uplift must be achieved.

My own work during the past year remains to be briefly told. The highest point reached in the period given to Maryland and Delaware was a crowded week in Wilmington, the only considerable city in the latter State. I went at the call of the leading woman's club of that city, who had undertaken the prodigious task of lifting up the rural common schools of their State to real efficiency, and rescuing the children from the hideous nightmare of child labor, which is the barbaric side of the new manufacturing life of the entire South. Beginning with an address at an influential public meeting, presided over by the venerable chief justice of the State, the week was crowded with opportunities for talks to the school children and their teachers, with preaching the gospel according to education in the Unitarian, the Quaker, and the largest Protestant (Methodist) church in the city, all the while in a perpetual conference with the most influential men and women in the little commonwealth. Our closing lecture, "Upper Story Work for American Girls," was given to a congregation that filled Dr. Hurlbut's great Methodist church, with our good Brother Bowser, we believe for the first time, invited to a seat of honor in any evangelical pulpit in the place.

During a two months' spring tour in West Virginia and Kentucky, with a ten days' downward dip to Columbia, S.C., and Nashville, Tenn., I gave sixty public lectures in fifty days, with one exception preached every Sunday to overflowing congregations, travelled two thousand miles, and inspected every sort of school in every place visited. In this deeply interesting tour nothing is remembered with greater pleasure than ten days' lecturing in Berea College, closed by Decoration Day, when a hundred veterans of the 150,000 white soldiers from the South that helped save the Union once more marshalled their failing ranks, while the good captain that raised the first Union flag on Lookout Mountain once more waved the ragged old ensign and told the simple story, while 1,500 people responded, and at least a score of babies in arms were crying for the new education.

One of the most grateful of all the literary tasks connected with this ministry was a month given—at the request of Dr. Curry and United States Commissioner Harris, whose requests are commands—to the preparation of a paper in commemoration of Robert C. Winthrop, in his great service of almost a generation, as president of the Peabody Education Fund, regarded in all its relations and results as the most conspicuous example of educational statesmanship in American history. On the original delivery of this paper in Washington it was claimed for publication by the National Bureau of Education as a suitable testimonial to Mr. Winthrop, and the great work with which he was so honorably connected, and which he declared the most important service he had rendered his country. This paper will appear in the forthcoming Report of the National Bureau of Education. A lecture condensed from it, already delivered at various points in the South, can be offered during the coming months to any association, club, or school that desires to renew its interest in this magnificent philanthropy of George Peabody, and its marvelous results at the beginning of the great Southern movement for the establishment of the common school.

There is only space left to say that probably till December 1 I shall be detained in Boston with constant occupation in connection with my work. Outside of my own personal earnings, I should have on Thanksgiving Day $2,500 as the minimum outfit for the work of the present year. I do not complain that this money must be largely collected by personal letters and visits to old and tried friends of the ministry and such persons as I may try to enlist to take the places of those who every year pass on. But I am sure, if a hundred people who will read these words and whom I do not know could spend one week with me in any one of a hundred Southern villages to which I am called, I could be saved from this summer weariness of being a beggar for Christ's and the children's sake, and the time well given to the needed rest and recreation of which I have known so little for the past fifteen years that I have quite forgotten the old-time ministerial vacation. My post-office address is 25 Beacon Street, American Unitarian Association Rooms; and my residence is in the large upper chamber, 658 Massachusetts Avenue, which has been my Boston headquarters for the past dozen years. At either place I shall be happy to meet any of the friends of education during the coming five months.

THE JAPAN MISSION.

BY REV. WILLIAM I. LAWRENCE.

In common (I hope) with many others I have read Rev. Mr. MacCauley's report on the Japan mission. I have been promised an opportunity to speak for the mission at the approaching session of the National Conference, and defer till that time some things I am anxious to say. Meantime I wish to note one or two points.

First, the name of the minister of the First Unitarian Church of Tokyo (who is also superintendent of the Post-office Mission) is Saji, not Laji, as your printer makes it. Mr. Saji was educated by Buddhists as a young man of special promise, and set apart as a public "defender of the faith," the temples thus preparing and supporting him, in the hope that his eloquence might stay the advance of Christianity. But, while loyal to Buddhism, in defence of which he became an orator of national reputation, Mr. Saji perceived that Religion is greater than any form of faith, and began to urge his people to take wider views. Like many another reformer, he found his coreligionists unprepared for his new teachings, and, while holding a high position in the esteem of the people, fell into ecclesiastical disfavor. Disappointed by the unwillingness of Buddhists to look beyond their own narrow circle of thought, he despaired of ever realizing his dream of universal religion. This was his state of mind when our Unitarian mission appeared in Japan. He read our literature, heard our representations, and decided that in Unitarianism is to be found that union of free method with reverent faith which promised the realization of his dreams. He accordingly made public profession of adherence to our principles. Straightway a howl of denunciation echoed from one end of Japan to the other, hardly a magazine or newspaper in the land failing to comment upon his apostasy.

I had heard this story before going to Japan, and expected to find Mr. Saji among the workers. But he was not. He had apparently disappeared from public life, and there were those who said (and some exultantly) that he was not hero enough to brave the criticism his actions had called out. This opinion, as events proved, was most unjust to him. He was, at the time of his profession of Unitarianism, under contract with a publishing house in Tokyo to edit a series of text-books on scientific subjects,—a task of great importance, to which he felt obliged to devote his whole time. One day, while I was in Japan, he appeared at Mr. MacCauley's house, and said that he had on that morning sent to the printers the corrected proofs of the last volume in the series he was editing. "I am now ready," he said, in substance, "to show the sincerity of my former declarations. I am now wholly at the service of Unitarianism. Let me work in any way that I can be of use." From that day to this his loyalty has not wavered; and his usefulness to our cause—that of the largest faith—is incalculable. To have met the needs of such a man, and to have set free such an influence as his among the thinking people of Japan, goes far toward justifying our work in that country. It certainly deserves and should have our cordial and hearty support.

Again, Mr. MacCauley speaks of our many publications in Japanese. I expect to have a full set of those at the National Conference gathering at Washington, and imagine that many will be interested to look them over. They are printed in the strange hieroglyphics of Japan, but in paper, binding, etc., would be a credit to an American publishing house. The report also speaks of the many letters of inquiry received at the mission headquarters,—twenty-five hundred last year,—asking the deepest questions the human mind ever formulated. I have about a hundred of these letters in my possession,—quaint specimens both as to paper and chirography, and doubly interesting when it is remembered that under this strange writing are conveyed deep heart-yearnings after the truth we teach. I shall be glad to give these letters to Branch Alliances, guilds, clubs, or interested individuals. No price is asked; but, if the request is accompanied or followed by a gift toward the Tokyo library or the publishing fund of the mission, I shall be glad to forward it to Mr. MacCauley and acknowledge it through the Register.

REPORT OF THE SUPERINTENDENT OF MISSIONS FOR THE CENTRAL WEST.

To the Directors of the American Unitarian Association:

The record of the Central West for the current year must be "the short and simple annals of the poor." The business depression which has been so severe during the past two years was greatly augmented by the total or partial failure of crops in 1894 through nearly all the wide territory lying west of the Mississippi. Not a few churches have found it impossible to maintain a regular minister, while missionary effort has been greatly restricted through lack of funds for its vigorous prosecution. Endeavor has been directed to the sustenance of existing organizations rather than to the creation of new ones.

THE WORK OF THE ASSOCIATION.

The Association has directly assisted some forty churches in this district during the year, besides carrying on more or less missionary work at more than twenty-five other points. This work extends from Ohio to Utah and Montana, and from Lake Winnipeg to Oklahoma City. It includes cities like Cincinnati, Duluth, Des Moines, Minneapolis, Sioux Falls, St. Joseph, Wichita, Helena, and Salt Lake, as well as the university towns of Ann Arbor, Iowa City, Lawrence, and Madison. These aided churches and mission points are distributed as follows: Ohio, one; Michigan, six; Illinois, two; Wisconsin, nine; Minnesota, twelve; the Dakotas, eight; Iowa, five; Missouri, three; Kansas, six; Oklahoma, four; Nebraska, one; Colorado, three; Utah, one; Montana, two; Manitoba, seven.

The large majority of the older churches stand as they did a year ago. Changes in pastorates have been comparatively few. Some vacancies have been filled, and some fresh ones have unfortunately occurred. The eastward migration of Rev. S. M. Crothers is still mourned; but the advent of Rev. F. L. Hosmer at St. Louis, of Rev. B. R. Bulkeley at Chicago, of Rev. William R. Lord at St. Paul, of Rev. W. D. Simonds at Madison, Rev. Carlton F. Brown at St. Cloud, and Rev. V. E. Southworth at Janesville, gives cause of congratulation. There is prospect also that our few remaining vacancies will be satisfactorily filled by September.

CHURCH BUILDINGS.

Three new churches have been erected during the year: the beautiful People's Church at Kalamazoo, Mich.; the pretty and unique structure at Perry, Ia.; and, more recently, the neat village church at Cherokee, Ia. The first and last mentioned are wholly paid for, while that at Perry only owes a small sum to the Church Building Loan Fund. It is pleasant to mention in this connection that the church at Greeley, Col., has paid its last instalment to the Loan Fund, and joyously celebrated its freedom.

NEW ORGANIZATIONS.

Under the fostering care of the Illinois Conference the missionary movement at Sterling has taken organic shape, and settled Rev. Seward Baker as its minister. Cherokee, Ia., has also assumed church responsibility, and has invited Rev. B. A. Van Sluyters to its pastorate. Through the earnest efforts of Rev. C. E. Montague, the First Unitarian Church of Cañon City, Col., has been gathered, which, though small, is very much alive, and will thrive unless crushed under the financial pressure that is so severe in the Rocky Mountain region.

MISSIONARY WORK.

The Iowa Conference is still the banner missionary conference. Its energetic secretary, Rev. L. A. Harvey, reports new movements through the State, some of which may be only temporary, while others are full of promise of permanence. Centerville, West Liberty, Ames, Washta, receive frequent visitations; while Ida Grove is the latest and perhaps the most promising of all these mission points. At Burlington Rev. W. A. Pratt of Keokuk has begun evening services with fair promise. In Wisconsin Rev. T. G. Owen has conducted some encouraging work at Barker, Bert Valley, and Downing, on the line of the Wisconsin Central Railway; and he is earnestly desired in many other places. In Minnesota the chief missionary work is among the Scandinavians, although Rev. F. C. Davis of Winona has a very flourishing movement at Plainview. A country village that will give a week-day congregation of three hundred, with the temperature twenty below, has both zeal and endurance. Kristofer Jansen remaining in Norway, Rev. A. H. Norman has succeeded to his work in Minneapolis and Western Minnesota. While Nazareth Church has suffered somewhat by Mr. Jansen's departure, that at Madelia has been specially flourishing. A Scandinavian Free Church has been organized at Crookston, Minn. Rev. J. J. Brauti has preached and lectured as the Association's missionary up and down the Red River Valley, with headquarters at Grand Forks, where he holds regular Sunday services. Rev. Helen G. Putnam, the devoted secretary of the Minnesota Conference, has organized a church at Detroit, which she is quietly nursing into strength. In South Dakota Rev. J. L. Andrew is our missionary. Besides preaching three Sundays a month at Sioux Falls, he has held services in nine other cities and towns, including Pierre, the State capital, Worthing, Miner, Artesian, etc. In Southern Kansas Rev. W. S. Vail preaches in the morning at Wichita, in the afternoon at Valley Centre, and in the evening at Newton, meeting the wants of three localities each Sunday. Rev. C. H. Rogers, who went to Oklahoma City eighteen months since, has not only organized a church and secured a chapel in that city, but has formed a second society in Guthrie, to which he ministers Sunday evenings, and has some four or five mission posts for week-day visits. Rev. Stephen Peebles held a series of eighteen very satisfactory meetings in Carbondale, W. Col., during the winter and spring, and is earnestly urged to resume them next autumn. Reports from Montana show that Mr. Crooker and the Helena church are steadily growing in influence, and are an increasing power for good all through the State. Mr. Crooker has recently secured an efficient ally in Rev. J. D. Reid of Great Falls, whose church, while nominally independent, is heartily one with us in spirit and purpose. Mr. Crooker and Mr. Reid are planning a tour of evangelization through the State in the early autumn, which will arouse much interest, and from which excellent results are expected.

ICELANDIC MISSION.

As was foreshadowed in my last report, the death of Mr. Peterson necessitated the withdrawal of Rev. M. J. Skaptason from the northern settlements, and his establishment at Winnipeg. The Winnipeg mission has prospered under him. The congregations have increased, new interest has been awakened, debts have been paid, and the church is looking hopefully forward to better times. Meanwhile Mr. Skaptason, in old country fashion, makes three pastoral visits a year to his five northern churches, preaching, baptizing, confirming, marrying, and is welcomed with greater eagerness each recurring visit. A new Icelandic organization has been formed at Selkirk West, which is in charge of an earnest layman, although under Mr. Skaptason's direction and supervision.

One of our oldest and most faithful workers has during the year been called to the higher service,—Rev. Sylvan S. Hunting. Mr. Hunting's work in the West began in Detroit, Mich., before the war. He served as a chaplain in the Army of the Tennessee. Afterward he was minister at Quincy, at Indianapolis, at Davenport, and at Des Moines. He also served for some years as Western secretary of the Association. He was a genial friend, a conscientious counsellor, a courageous advocate of truth and right. He rests from his labors, and his works are his monument.

The field is wide, and in many parts is full of promise. The laborers also seem plentiful, and anxious to enter upon the work. When the time shall come that our means are equal to our opportunity, there will be abundant and glorious harvest.

T. B. FORBUSH,
Supt. for Central West.

THE GROWTH OF LOVE.

BY DR. J. E. ROBERTS.

The Church has urged it upon men for a great many generations that their duty is to love God. One might just as well have said their duty is to love classical music. I have seen a thousand people, I should think, from an audience of two thousand, leave the hall while Edward Remenyi was playing his violin. It was not music to them. They did not care to stay: they were sorry they came, and they went away. But to bring them back, and to say to them, "Thou shalt love this music," would be as rational as to say to a human soul, "Thou shalt love God." Not a single bound, but a slow process of growth, and sometimes marked by painful effort. With this always for an encouragement and sustenance,—that, wherever a human soul feels the throb and response of love for anything in God's universe that is beautiful or true or good, he is beginning to love God. I think that, when that poet said that he always felt like making an apology for treading upon a violet, or felt like taking off his hat in response to a bowing field of grain, that he was already entering into the presence of the everlasting, and feeling upon the shores of his life those waves that rise out of the immeasurable deep of feeling and passion that will some time meet and mingle upon the shores of the Infinite. This growth in the love of God ought not, because it is slow, to discourage one. I think we must confess, when we are frank about it, when we are honest and admit it without explanation or excuse, that there are a great many things about the Infinite's works that we do not love: we do not know how to love them. We do not love the winter that kills the fields and makes them sere and brown, and hides all the flowers for their long sleep; but we love the flowers when they come again, and the trees, when out of the silent mystery they put on their garments of beauty. And some time we shall love even the frost that kills and the winter that wraps the mantle of death about the earth. We love life now, with its enthusiasm and its joy; but we do not love death. We shrink from that,—nay, we hate it. But the time may come when even its face shall be kindly to us, for we shall see that it is part of God's plan. We love joy and gladness now, and our heart leaps up to meet them; but we shrink from the disappointment and murmur at tears. But the time may come when, looking back, we shall see that there were not only beauties in the universe which the darkness of the night alone revealed, but there were virtue and strength and powers within us which nothing could have matured unless they had been wrapped in the darkness or beaten by the storm and tempest of tears and grief. So that, if we love a little now anything of the world of God, let us believe that we are beginning to love—nay, that we are loving—the Infinite. If any person represents or illustrates to us qualities that evoke friendship and inspire love, let us believe that to us there is in the human way a revelation of God. So the human friendships, the human loves, are God's revealing. We cannot so love without loving the highest, without loving God himself. And there is, too, a certain responsibility involved in this. The responsibility is measured by the degree of moral growth or spiritual attainment. If we love God, then we owe him but one thing; and that is the only thing one ever had or ever can have to give in this world or in any world,—himself. If a man had it in his power to give all the world beside, I fancy it would weigh light when matched against himself. And never till we reach this view-point can we know how divine a thing religion and love and friendship are, until we get away from the idea that they can be measured or valued or represented by anything external to ourselves, until we know that there is nothing that we can give the Infinite or that the Infinite wants of us, who has all things, and that, when we come into his sacred presence of love, there is only one offering that we can bring,—ourselves. This much the humblest may give: the mightiest can give no more. And this religious service, these things we do,—this worship, this meeting, these prayers, this form,—are nothing,—nothing but the attempt of the unspeakable to syllable itself forth. The soul finds itself then at last in this conscious oneness with the Infinite, where it looks down on human life, and is itself law-giver, revealer, Bible, redeemer,—at once the giver and the gift. And our religion comes to be this when our love of God has attained those heights. Then the prattling tongue of controversy will cease; then casuistry will be dumb; then over vain and garrulous pride there will steal a respectful and becoming silence, and we shall know the ecstasy of a perfect love that casts out fear. Because love is linked with the Infinite, it must therefore be mysterious; because it is so high as to transcend our thought, it must therefore baffle our philosophy. I think, standing here in the face of all that is inexplicable, against which we cry out, that the very voicelessness of this Sphinx-like mystery of human life is a better pledge of the Infinite for life's complete fulfilment than any explanation or demonstration would be. I believe that I am honest when I say that I had rather walk out into the shadow that lies just beyond this visible, friendly, familiar life—walk out through that shadow and face the unknown, with no pledge but the eternal silence of God—than I would be with any demonstration that is possible to us. So this love of God carries with it its responsibilities of trust. It is idle, weak, futile, vain, to speculate. Who can understand it? But, over against that, who may not feel the ineffable throb of life's sympathy with God; who may not feel spirits, blest and beautiful, that hold up life lest it dash itself against a stone; who cannot see in the deepest dark of grief's concealing night those kindly, quenchless stars; and who may not know that it is the soul's divinest opportunity, its highest privilege, its crowning, consummate joy, to so love and trust as that, dashed and broken by a tempest or on life's halcyon sea, threading the darkness with bleeding, bruised feet or sitting among flowers and listening to the murmur of the waters of Paradise, living here or going into some other world than this, this life, fragment of the everlasting ray of uncreated light, is so closely bound and bonded to the Infinite there is for it no failure, no falling away, but eternal and endless fulfilment?

EXAMINATIONS IN CHINA.

The Chinaman does not sit at a desk for three hours and then go out again. Once he is in, whether he like it or not, he must stay there for three days. And, as he has to provide for his own wants during that time, he requires a great deal besides his writing materials. Some rice will be issued by the government on the second day, but probably not on the first and third; and, in any case, it will very possibly be of doubtful quality, so that he will do well not to trust to it. He therefore lays in a substantial stock of provisions,—cooked rice, biscuits, ham, hard-boiled eggs, anything that will keep and will not give trouble in preparing. Still, he generally takes a tiny stove and some charcoal, so that he can warm up anything if he desires to do so. His teapot and teacup and a stock of tea he will be quite certain to remember. The attendants will bring him hot water when wanted. Matches and candles should not be forgotten, nor his pipe and tobacco, if he be a smoker. Then, though the days may be hot, the nights will be cold. He must have extra clothing to put on in the evening, and a large, thickly wadded quilt, which, wrapped around him, will serve at once as a blanket and a quilt when he goes to sleep at night. Lastly, his cell is exposed to the rays of the sun if the sky be clear, or the rain may beat in if the weather be wet. He should therefore have a light screen and an oilskin sheet which he can hang up if required. All these things together form a load which will tax his strength pretty severely when he comes to carry them into the place. This probably he will have to do himself, as, wherever the rules are strictly observed, no servant or porter is allowed to pass through the portals.

The tests being distributed, the candidate is free to occupy himself with them as he likes. "He may work, sleep, or eat at whatever hours he pleases. He may chat with his neighbors if he finds any inclined for relaxation." But he has to make a home of his cell for two nights. On the third day he must deliver up his paper and depart before dark, and he may do so as early as he pleases. After one night's rest at home the candidates reappear for the second set of papers. After three days again comes a night's rest, and then the hall is entered for the last time. The length of stay is the same; and, when it is at an end, the contest is finished. "The examination," says Mr. Bullock, "is a pretty severe trial to any one of a weak constitution. A death in the enclosure is not a very rare thing; and sicknesses are often caused, either by the heat, if the weather be particularly fine and clear, or by the cold and damp, if it be wet and windy. Still, the delicate-looking Chinese scholars, men utterly unused to active exercise, support the inevitable hardship and discomfort better than the infinitely more vigorous and athletic young gentlemen of England could do."—The Schoolmaster (in Journal of Education.)

THE POOR IN HOT WEATHER.

It would be impossible to estimate the sufferings of the poor in the great cities during the unusually hot weather of the past week, huddled as they are more closely together in the tenement-houses than the law would permit the packing of cattle. One must see the conditions under which they live before he can believe that human beings would remain in such surroundings. The little closet-like rooms are so stifling that to remain in them would mean certain death. Consequently, the whole population of our East-side tenements seek the street. There in the early morning hours can be seen women whose haggard looks plainly show that they have had a sleepless night, walking up and down with infants in their arms, who, were it not for their feeble cry, you would think had already passed to the great beyond. We are told that this tenement-house property is the best kind of investment, that a higher percentage can be made on it than upon property in the best parts of the city. The law seems powerless to protect the poor in this instance, and the landlord is merciless.—The Nineteenth Century.

FOR BROADER FELLOWSHIP.

A circular has been issued by the committee appointed last year at the meeting at Athol extending a cordial and fraternal invitation to all Christian ministers, Catholic or Protestant, of whatever name, to meet on Tuesday, July 23, at the town hall of Ayer. The former circular thus described the object of the meeting: "This gathering is intended to bring together all ministers who may accept the invitation as fellow-workers, brothers, and neighbors. The purpose of the meeting is to testify to our mutual friendliness, to recognize such aims as we may have in common, and to raise the question whether there is anything we can do by co-operation more than we are now doing to promote the great object to which we should be devoted." This is another indication of the reaching after a broader fellowship and union among Christians.

Spiritual Life.

The essence of true nobility is neglect of self. Let the thought of self pass in, and the beauty of a great action is gone, like the bloom from a soiled flower.—Froude.

I think it must be somewhere written that the virtues of mothers shall occasionally be visited on their children as well as the sins of the fathers.—Charles Dickens.

There never did, and never will, exist anything permanently noble and excellent in the character which is a stranger to the exercise of resolute self-denial.—Walter Scott.

The really brave man is never cruel, for bravery is far more than physical courage: it is moral, and has in it a heart of womanly tenderness. Manliness and strength and bravery are most highly developed only in the soul that is fullest of love.—Philip St. Ford Moxom.

Take the little task, no matter how small it is, which is committed to your care, and put all the skill, the patience, the loving service in it that an angel could put in, and you have shown yourself an angel in doing it. That is all you need to worry about.—M. J. Savage.

To stand upon our own feet, to exercise a manly self-reliance, to maintain our own convictions, let the opposition be what it may, to cultivate the spirit of sympathy and helpfulness for our fellow-men, and, above all, to be steadfastly devoted to an ideal life-aim,—that is what we understand by living a spiritual life.—A. W. Martin.

Of course there is moral light in good deeds and in good words; but there is far more in good lives. Good words and deeds are flashes of light in darkness; but good lives are candles, torches, beacons, never-setting stars, that burn steadily and light our paths all the way through the journey of earth.—J. T. Sunderland.

The great duty of God's children is to love one another. This duty on earth takes the name and form of the law of humanity. We are to recognize all men as brethren, no matter where born or under what sky or institution or religion they may live. . . . The law of humanity must reign over the assertion of all human rights.—William Ellery Channing.

Grievous as the sins of our day are, there is a noble spirit of earnest thought, of universal inquiry, of manly independence, and heroic enterprise,—a spirit like that which brooded over the primeval chaos, or the soul of spring heaving under the dissolutions and melting snows of winter. This spirit is among the people, and it will stand by the man who trusts it.—C. H. McAnney.

Master of Life, you took your instrument, And, with your pity, on the living wall Of lives about you smote a message. Blent Of every surest sign earth's little ball Hath to speak God with, was your mighty call.

Your message was your life impressed on men.

Ah! lover, friend, and brother, this was all.

Your life was pity. Live forever, then!

—Hannah Parker Kimball.

The Sunday School.

The Benevolent Fraternity of Churches in the city of Boston is keeping its Sunday-schools open with hardly an exception during the summer. This is true of Parker Memorial (3 P.M.), Bulfinch Place Church (10.30 A.M.), Church of the Unity, South Boston, and New South Church (10.30 A.M.).

The inquiry is constantly made by our Sunday-school workers for a liberal commentary on the Bible, and it has been a source of lament that such a work does not exist. This deficiency is to be remedied,—in a short time, we trust. Dr. Orello Cone, so well known for his ability, and Prof. G. L. Cary, president of the Meadville Theological School, with associates, are preparing such a much needed help. The character of the authors guarantees a satisfactory result.

This is the time when churches and Sunday-schools are sending contributions to the Unitarian Sunday School Society, and will be even more actively doing this in the autumn. We state what can be done to help on this worthy organization. A contribution to the funds of this society by any Unitarian parish or Sunday-school connected therewith shall entitle such parish, either directly or by its Sunday-school, to appoint three persons who shall be members of this society for the term of one year, beginning with the first day of October next following the receipt of such contribution; and such persons shall be designated delegate members. All members constituted as above shall be entitled to vote and act at all meetings of the society. A payment of ten dollars at any one time shall constitute a person a member of this society for life. A church or Sunday-school can have life members made from their donations, if they are sufficiently large, by sending names with the contributions.

Those who are planning for autumn excursions should bear in mind the Unitarian National Conference, which will hold sessions at Washington, D.C., from October 21 to October 25. Among the meetings of importance at that time is the one which will occur Tuesday evening, October 22, in the interests of our young people. The speakers will be President G. Stanley Hall, Rev. Benjamin R. Bulkeley, Rev. Ida C. Hultin, Rev. Thomas R. Slicer, and Dr. Edward Everett Hale. They will treat topics which relate not only to the personal welfare of young men and young women, but also have reference to the denominational interests of our body. Our future is in the hands of the young people is something that we often say, but the realization of this great truth ought to show itself in a sturdier and more zealous treatment of the questions which belong to the religious and moral education of our young people.

The meeting on Tuesday evening will communicate, we trust, both information and inspiration.

Religious Intelligence.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be sent in by Saturday Morning; announcements of meetings which are to take place must be sent in before Tuesday Noon.]

BOSTON COMMON.—The services under the auspices of the Benevolent Fraternity of Churches in the city of Boston Sunday afternoons on Boston Common continue with success. The attendance is larger now than at the first, and the singing is better. The listeners remain throughout, and even on the outer edge there is very little moving to and fro. It has been found that a cornet, well played, is the best instrument for leading the congregational music. The clergymen who have spoken once seem desirous of addressing this out-of-door congregation again. Certainly, the experience is somewhat novel. It may be said that the results are highly satisfactory, viewed in any aspect. Last Sunday, though the service was begun under a threatening sky, it is estimated that there were at least eight hundred earnest listeners. Rev. William Key spoke on "Christ and Christianity." This, he said, was still living. The Christian Endeavor movement and the work of the Salvation Army prove this. The people who are at the head of these two great religious movements of our times are men who have been brought up in the spirit of Christ, and have imbibed the spirit and truth of the gospel of Christianity as we find it in the Sermon on the Mount. Rev. Mr. Crothers, who followed, spoke chiefly of the necessity for loyalty to two good things which had been gained, which were a free government and a free religion. The one thing that we have learned, he asserted, is that justice concerns every one of us; and it behooves everybody to show perfect loyalty to the institutions which are a result of justice. Christ taught a kind of religion so simple that it was exactly equal for every man. He said of the poor woman that she did the best she could. That was the great lesson for men to learn,—not to do the best that anybody else can do, but to do the best that he can do himself. Rev. Mary T. Whitney and Rev. C. F. Dole were announced as the speakers for next Sunday afternoon.

ATHOL, MASS.—Second Church: Every available space in the church was occupied Thursday afternoon, July 11, when Rev. Carl G. Horst was formally installed pastor of the Second Unitarian Society. The installation proper was by the congregation, represented by E. V. Wilson, Esq., who delivered an address which we give below. This part of the service was not an innovation, as some might think, but the old Congregational form, bequeathed to us by the fathers of our faith, and involving a principle dear to every loyal Unitarian Congregationalist. Rev. M. J. Savage gave a soul-stirring sermon on "The Functions of the Ministry in our Modern Life." Rev. W. W. Fenn gave the "Charge to the Pastor," which will be long remembered by those who were privileged to hear his noble plea that the minister should be the voice of the ideal. Rev. Mr. Green of Petersham offered the invocation; Rev. Mr. Parsons of Greenfield, the installing prayer; and Rev. D. H. Rogan of Athol, the closing prayer. Rev. Charles P. Lombard read carefully selected passages from Ecclesiasticus as Scripture lesson. Rev. S. W. Sutton of Athol extended the right hand of fellowship, and Rev. A. F. Bailey of Barre gave the address to the people:—

"Being a Unitarian society, we are a Congregational body; that is, we manage, control, and direct our own affairs. Our form of government is a pure democracy. Every member has an equal voice in the management of the society. We determine what officers shall be chosen, and we elect them; who shall be admitted to membership, and the manner in which they shall be admitted. We choose our pastor or minister, he holds that office during the pleasure of both parties, and then we dismiss him. And all these acts are subject to no revision or investigation by bishop, council, presbytery, convention, or synod. Our ministers are not sent to watch over us as theological policemen. The church has the same authority to ordain and install its ministers that it has to determine who they shall be. If the ceremony is performed by another minister, his authority so to do is wholly derived from the church for which he acts. Recognizing this, the ceremony of installation in Unitarian churches is frequently, if not usually, performed by a layman, a member of the society who is selected by the church to represent it for that purpose. You have been selected by the practically unanimous vote of this society to become its pastor, and you have accepted our call; and, by virtue of that acceptance and the authority of this society, I now install you as pastor of the Second Unitarian Church in Athol.

"There is something worth noting in the mutual agreement by which the relation of pastor and people is assumed. It is not simply a union of sentiment at the beginning of the relation, but it signifies that there should be the same union of sentiment during its continuance. The pew and the pulpit are to work together. There are certain duties that devolve on each; and each must perform its part if this church shall be all and do all that becomes a Christian church. We pledge you our earnest support, and will ask for no truer loyalty on your part than we show on our part. We ask you to subscribe to no creed, but we ask you to preach the faith. We recognize that, as one's knowledge broadens, his belief changes: what is miraculous to the child is commonplace to the man. But, while beliefs change, faith remains. The truth, so far as we know the truth, is our creed: and nothing that is true is heresy. We ask you to broaden our knowledge of the truth and to strengthen our faith. There are those of deep religious convictions in this congregation. To them the Unitarian faith should be presented in all its beauty and fulness. Many who are not Unitarians, and too many who claim that they are, think that the Unitarian creed is a denial of certain articles in the creeds of other churches. It is no doubt true that the Unitarian movement was a protest against a Christianity that was unchristian, a humanity that was inhuman; but it was not then, nor is it now, a denial of all belief. The Unitarian Church has a living, vital faith; and that faith we ask you to preach. Those truly religious souls who are the saving salt in every congregation are no more satisfied by preaching only the old denials than a famished man would be at a restaurant where the bill of fare, from top to bottom, is 'We have not any.' Preach to us the faith.

The pulpit in a Unitarian church is a rostrum from which the truth may be spoken without fear of the charge of heresy or dread of the ban of excommunication. Every question that touches the religious side of man, every problem that affects him intellectually, morally, or spiritually, may be looked squarely in the face and fairly discussed. It is a frequent complaint that the pews are empty, that many do not go to church; but the pulpit that has something to say will not have to talk to empty pews. The questions of the day are proper topics for the pulpit. We care little for the sin of the Adam that was, but we care much for the conduct of the Adam that is. The prophets of old discussed present topics; and the prophet of to-day, if he is a prophet, will discuss live issues. If he has a message, he will not lack for hearers. Our Emerson says,— but the nations in these closing days of the nineteenth century sit only at the feet of those prophets whose faces are set toward the dawn of the twentieth century. Preach to us the faith, the faith of to-day. Teach us the truth, the truth of to-day. In the pulpit and out of it, be thou our pastor; and in the church and out of it we will be thy people."

"Still at the prophet's feet the nations sit":

BAR HARBOR, ME.—The arrangement of services for the summer of 1895 of the Unitarian church is as follows: July 21, Rev. Francis G. Peabody, D.D., Professor of Christian Morals in Harvard University, Cambridge, Mass.; July 28, Rev. George Batchelor, secretary of American Unitarian Association, Boston, Mass.; August 4, Rev. S. M. Crothers, minister of the First Parish Church, Cambridge, Mass.; August 11, Rev. S. M. Crothers, minister of the First Parish Church, Cambridge, Mass.; August 18, Rev. Bradley Gilman, minister of the Third Congregational Society, Springfield, Mass.; August 25, Rev. F. B. Hornbrooke, minister of the Channing Religious Society, Newton, Mass.; September 1, Rev. Samuel A. Eliot, minister of the First Unitarian Congregational Society, Brooklyn, N.Y.; September 8, Rev. Francis G. Peabody, D.D., Professor of Christian Morals in Harvard University, Cambridge, Mass.

BATTLE CREEK, MICH.—The action of the Independent Congregational Church of Battle Creek, says a correspondent, is significant, as showing the unconscious progress of Unitarian thought. While still holding to the independent name and position, after hearing some of the best available candidates of liberal orthodox views, the call was finally extended to a life member of the American Unitarian Association, the vote being unanimous on first ballot. The people of Battle Creek say that they want positive, constructive thought based on good, sound philosophy. The period of negation has passed for them. While the fellowship of the church is on a purely ethical basis, the worshippers are devoutly religious. Last Sunday being Children's Day at the Independent Congregational Church, the platform and organ were transformed into a little floral paradise. "The morning sermon by Rev. Mr. Horner," says the Battle Creek Journal, "was one of marked ability and excellence, upon the spiritual unity of Father and child, the possibilities of our individual lives reaching a higher standard, refuting the pessimistic thought of to-day that the world is growing worse instead of better. The whole sermon was one of an elevating tone, and leading us to look upward and aim at the only perfect example,—that of Christ."

BERKELEY, CAL.—From the Pacific Unitarian we glean the following: "The church at Berkeley will remain open during the summer. On June 2 the pastor held simple and touching memorial services for the Colima victims, eulogizing Prof. Harold Whiting and his wife, who, with their charming children, were so identified with every interest of our church."

DENVER, COL.—After the regular morning service last Sunday the members of Unity Church held a called meeting, at which time it was decided by unanimous vote to grant their pastor, Rev. N. A. Haskell, a vacation during the months of July and August. Another vote, which also expressed the unanimity of the congregation, was one of thanks and appreciation of Mr. Haskell's work in Denver during the past two years as a minister and a man. During his short stay of two years seventy-five new members have been taken into the church. Were it not for his wife's serious and protracted illness at their home in California, Mr. Haskell would have continued the work so well begun; and it is with mutual regret that the relations between pastor and people are thus dissolved.

LOS ANGELES, CAL.—Four years ago Unity Church, which had been built during Dr. Fay's pastorate, was burned; and the sum of $8,000 was realized from the sale of the lot and insurance, after all debts had been paid. The congregation purchased their present edifice and lot from the Baptists for $25,000 three years ago, and spent $5,000 on repairs and enlargements. The church has cost $33,000, including the interest on the mortgage. This shows that the members of the church have raised $25,000 in three years, besides the current expenses. Last April the pastor, J. S. Thomson, asked the congregation to pay off the last $10,000 of the mortgage; and on July 3 the last cent of the debt on the church was paid. The church property has doubled in value since its purchase, owing to the erection of fine buildings within a stone's throw, costing millions of dollars. The people of Unity Church now own property worth $60,000, free of debt.

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH.—Our year's work has just come to a close. In many respects it has been an important year. We have held services in a centrally situated hall, of which we have had the exclusive rental. Outside of the Mormon Tabernacle congregation our services have been better attended than any other church of the city, averaging some two hundred every Sunday. Our sociables have been exceptionally successful, netting quite a substantial amount toward the defrayal of current expenses. There has been a large influx of young people during the past year. This is an element which we can ill afford to do without. Among the affiliated societies of our movement here are the Ladies' Unitarian Society, meeting weekly; Unity Club, also meeting weekly; and our Sunday-school. All these are in good condition, especially Unity Club, which, although only one year old, has been the most potent factor in our social life since its inception last autumn by Mr. Stanley Hunter. Mr. Hunter came to us last year fresh from the Meadville Theological School, bringing with him an originality of thought and personality which has been chiefly instrumental in the success which has attended our church during his stay with us. As Mr. Hunter's engagement with us drew to a close, several farewell parties were tendered him; and on his birthday a surprise party (which proved a real surprise) in his honor was got up by the young people of the society. On this occasion he was presented with a silver-mounted umbrella and two bound volumes of "The World's Parliament of Religions." Mr. Hunter leaves us for a lecture tour of the Pacific Coast, carrying with him our best wishes and assurances for the future. His successor here is Mr. Adelbert Hudson, late of Sioux City, where for many years he was a successful lawyer. For the past two years he has been studying at the Harvard Divinity School. He comes to us with much ability and a varied experience, inspiring us with the prospect of continued good work in this unique and difficult field of labor. Mr. Hudson gave his future parishioners the opportunity of hearing and meeting him on July 7, on his way to Yellowstone and the Pacific Coast. He will rejoin us in September, to begin regular work.

SAN DIEGO, CAL.—Rev. H. Digby Johnston preached his farewell sermon on June 9. At the close of the morning service the congregation held a session, and adopted a resolution of regret over the resignation of the pastor, and expressing kindly wishes for his future. It is stated that he will shortly go to England. The trustees extended an invitation to Rev. George H. Rice of Stockton to preach for us on June 23 and 30. It is hoped that Mr. Rice may be induced to remain and become the permanent minister of our society.—Pacific Unitarian.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.—First Church: Dr. Stebbins has been out of town for three Sundays, and Mr. Eliot has preached in the morning. On the 16th and 23d he spoke of the relation of the Unitarian church to the social and industrial problem,—two excellent discourses, calm and searching,—treating the subject with rare strength and moderation. Both scientific knowledge and brotherly love are required to solve the problem. Neither without the help of the other will suffice. Improved conditions must come gradually from evolution, and the thought and talk of revolution and catastrophe should be discountenanced.

SANTA ANA, CAL.—Sunday, June 23, Dr. Fay spent with Rev. Mr. Watson, in the morning making a short address suitable to the occasion. It was Children's Sunday; and, as a most interesting part of the exercises, Mr. Watson baptized sixteen children. Some half-dozen more were to have been baptized, but temporary causes prevented. The hall was very full, the impression good. In the evening, to a large congregation, Dr. Fay preached on "The Religious Trend of the Period." The interest was intense. Many were present who are not in the habit of attending our church, and a desire to hear more on the same subject was expressed by many.

SEATTLE, WASH.—Our Unitarian society has had great pleasure and inspiration from a few days' visit from Rev. Charles W. Wendte. A social reception and cordial greeting were given him and his venerable mother last Friday evening, which passed off delightfully, with music, flowers, and refreshments supplementing the sociability, and the impromptu address of welcome by Dr. J. H. Acton, pastor, followed by a spirited address from Mr. Wendte. On Sunday, prefacing his sermon with brief allusion to the recent death of Prof. Huxley, Mr. Wendte preached on "The Strength and Weakness of Unitarianism." It was so apt and comprehensive a treatment of the subject that all were highly edified. On Monday Mr. Wendte gave his interesting lecture on "Picturesque England," illustrated with one hundred fine stereopticon views, for the benefit of our church treasury. Ever welcome as Mr. Wendte is in his missionary visits, he never seemed in better health, spirits, and hopefulness,—yea, helpfulness.

FROM THE SOUTH.

We give below the following from the Southern Unitarian:—

Charleston Church: Our people, with few exceptions, have gone into summer quarters. Some have betaken themselves to Sullivan's Island, some to the mountains; and a few contemplate going abroad. We are made to realize by this general exodus that the hot days of the year are upon us. It is with languid attention that the sermon is heard by the small number who brave the glare of these disagreeable July days to attend the services of the church. After this month both Sunday-school and church will close for the summer, and everybody will take a rest. The minister will probably go to the mountains, to hunt and fish and get inspiration for another winter's work. The different societies of the church still hold their fortnightly meetings; but, of course, they do not manifest as much life and activity as they did in the winter. They are to be congratulated on meeting at all during these hot, sultry days. It shows that they are possessed of the grace of courage, even if they do accomplish but little.

Chattanooga, Tenn.: Rev. J. M. Seaton has been preaching here for the last five Sundays with much acceptance. He preached in Marietta, Ohio, the last two summers in June, and will go to his home in Ohio for the summer months. The friends in Chattanooga will hear several ministers before calling any. They expect to decide the important matter before them this summer, and to secure the continuous services of a new minister by September.

San Antonio, Tex.: Rev. N. Shultz writes: "I have been keeping up regular services, as the weather has not been so hot that people could not leave their homes at mid-day. So long as they continue to come, there is no reason why we should not keep up services. The weather has been exceptionally fine here, and everything points to a prosperous time."

"Unitarians," says the Western Mail, "are the smallest of Welsh denominations numerically; yet one is bound to admit that, with the exception of Calvinistic Methodism, their ancient Gorgon, they have left deeper traces on the national mind of Wales than any other. Some of those who have sat in the chair of Moses at the Presbyterian College, Carmarthen, were among the most accomplished and cultured men Wales has produced in any age; and their names shed a lustre on Welsh education for a century and a half. Nor is it only at that institution Unitarianism has served Wales.

Owing to the force of circumstances, Unitarian preachers were compelled to supplement their ministry by tuition. In this way during the last hundred years the denomination gave Wales a succession of excellent teachers. Welsh literature is deeply indebted to Unitarianism. It is most difficult to duly estimate the influence of Unitarians in the field of Welsh letters, especially in the counties of Glamorgan and Cardigan. Nor is the denomination devoid of intellect and literary ability even yet. There are giants in Welsh Unitarianism, but they are not just to themselves and to the Welsh people. Unfortunately for the interests of the denomination, many of their brightest intellects have crossed the border and serve the English people. However, we have still with us Rev. Thomas Thomas, the patriarch of the denomination; Rev. R. Jenkin Jones; Mr. Gwenogfryn Evans; Mr. William James; Dr. Griffiths, and others. And long may they live to minister to their country's welfare, though we beg to differ from them as to method and manner!"

We take the following from the Purity Servant of Lahore:—

"Babu Protap Chunder Mozoomdar came and stayed at Lahore for about three weeks. He had been invited by Sirdar Dayal Singh Majithia for consultation in organizing a Theistic Mission for the Punjab and several institutions in its connection. For the present it has been arranged to open an Orphanage and a Boarding-house at Lahore. Mr. Mozoomdar has gone to Simla, where he intends to spend the summer. He will be here in Lahore again in November, and will probably stay for a couple of months, at least. This time he remained busy in the work above alluded to, and could not deliver many lectures. He, however, held several friendly meetings at his residence, and conducted divine service in the Mandir on two Sundays that he was here. His service and sermon had attracted large audiences. The entreaties of friends induced him to deliver one lecture, and this was given in the Brahmo-Mandir on May 6. The subject of the lecture was, 'Will the Brahmo-Somaj Die?' It has created a great sensation, especially in a quarter the mission of whose life seems to be to efface the name even of the Brahmo-Somaj from this world. The lecture of Mr. Mozoomdar was so full of instruction and of sympathy toward all living churches that we had wished the leaders of different Somajes and societies had come and personally heard the catholic view of a distinguished leader of the Brahmo-Somaj. But who can move those who have resolved not to hear, and whose tolerance extends in misrepresenting and misinterpreting others? Counter-lectures have already been commenced. We do not desire to say anything in defence of the Brahmo-Somaj or the Purity Association. We can assure our brethren that, if we possess the germs of life, no insinuations, no amount of adverse criticism, vile abuses, or secret stabs, will take the life out of us. We will not abuse for abuse, we will not wilfully misrepresent them, but will offer prayers to God that the same light which has been vouchsafed unto us may be granted to them. What we call light may not be so in their view; but we cannot do better than ask for them the blessings which we have received, and which we value above everything else."

Business Notices.

Dr. Lyon's Perfect Tooth Powder

Gives the most perfect satisfaction. It has a world-wide reputation. Recommended by dentists.

Borrowed from the Turks.—One of the most useful pieces of furniture in any household is a small table, either low or high, but in either case taking little floor space. In almost every room two or three such tables may be placed to excellent advantage. The manner in which the Turks use low tables has given us many clever hints, and some of the most charming effects in our modern houses are dependent upon the free use of small tables. We venture to remind our readers that the place to buy such tables to the best advantage is at the Paine warerooms, on Canal Street, where very low prices are quoted for this one line of furniture.

Marriages.

In Boston, 5th Inst., by Rev. James De Normandie Alfred W. Davis and Mary Bancroft Nute.

Religious Notices.

THE address of Rev. Carl G. Horst is Athol, Mass.

Situation Wanted

By a young man 18 years old (graduate of Bryant & Stratton's), in some business where faithfulness and application will count for future advancement. Address H. A. E., Office Christian Register.

A LADY with a pleasant home near Boston, and having the care of a young girl of thirteen, desires to communicate with parents or guardians who may be seeking a temporary or permanent home for one or more children. References exchanged. Address GUARDIAN, care Christian Register.

A SOPRANO SINGER of experience desires position in church choir. Highest references. Address H. M. W., care Christian Register.

For the Christian Register.
NATURE GIVES THE HOLY MOOD.

BY MARY WOODWARD WEATHERBEE.

If the heart has gathered rust,
And God's holy image dust,
Grown his worship half profane
For the hearts' high altars' stain,
Just by turning to her shrine,
Nature makes us half divine.

Never are we so far away
From her presence, night or day,
But this holy rood so high,
Standing 'twixt the earth and sky,
Calls us to her worship sweet,
Where her woods and waters meet.

Where within this chancel rail
Drink we from the Holy Grail,
While her dawns' communion cup
Offers that the soul may sup,
And her morns' baptismal dew
Consecrates the heart anew.

To us, each and all, she speaks
Thundrous from her mountain peaks.
Awed, the very rocks repeat
From their high and awful seat,
Sermons from her holy hill,
Where her valleys splendrous fill.

Falls away the power of sin
For this Presence that's within
Every little growing thing;
Where a winged world's a-swing,
And the meadow brook all day
Sings our very souls away.

So she gives the holy mood,
Nature, to the soul that's stood
Reverent, questioning as a child,
Of her wonders undefiled;
Makes the soul seem half divine,
When we worship at her shrine

GEORGE WHITEFIELD STONE.

The election of George W. Stone by the American Unitarian Association to the office of treasurer, with additional duties, is a new departure. His entrance upon his office may be looked upon as the beginning of a more aggressive policy and a growth of an interest in denominational work. Mr. Stone has special fitness for the duties he will undertake. He is a man of ability and positive convictions, and is all alive with interest and enthusiasm for the progress of Unitarian Christianity as defined in the Saratoga platform. We look forward with confident expectation that his labors will meet with success, but this success will also depend largely upon the co-operation and help which he receives from individual Unitarians and churches.

George Whitefield Stone was born in Moravia, Cayuga County, N.Y. During his infancy his parents removed to Homer, in Cortland County, N.Y., in which village Mr. Stone spent his childhood and youth. He comes from Puritan stock. His ancestors removed to Central New York from the town of Brimfield, in Massachusetts, about the year 1795. The subject of our sketch was educated in Cortland Academy at Homer, and was engaged in the study of law when the war of the Rebellion broke out, and was admitted to the bar while in camp prior to his departure for the field. He was the first man to enlist in Cortland County, and was elected captain of his company. He subsequently entered the navy as acting assistant paymaster, and was soon made judge-advocate of the North Atlantic Squadron, serving on the staff of Admiral Lee, and afterward of Admiral Porter.

He married Miss Catherine Cushing Graupner in Boston in 1865, and soon after the close of the war removed to Wilmington, Del., and engaged in mercantile pursuits. He was appointed national bank examiner for Delaware, N.J., and part of New York State in 1889, and held that position until July 1 of this year, when he was elected treasurer of the American Unitarian Association, and removed to the city of Boston, where he now resides.

The last service held in the Unitarian church at Wilmington, Del., before the church closed for the summer, was conducted by Mr. George W. Stone, the minister, Rev. Alexander T. Bowser, having sailed for Europe, where he is to spend the summer. The congregation was a large one, many of Mr. Stone's friends from other congregations being present. When the services were concluded, Mr. Daniel W. Taylor, the treasurer of the church, and one of its most active and useful members, arose and entered the pulpit, requesting Mr. Stone to take his old place in his pew near the pulpit. Mr. Taylor, after a few very earnest and friendly words of mingled congratulation and regret, presented to Mr.

and Mrs. Stone a book which had been prepared for the occasion. The book is probably the only one of its kind in existence. It is twelve by six and one-half inches in size, and contains thirty leaves. The covers are of heavy leather, traced or engraved (sometimes called "poker work"). This is done in a very artistic manner. The paper used in the book is very heavy, and the typographical work is the perfection of the printer's art. On nearly every page is a selection from Emerson's writings, most of the quotations being from Mr. Stone's favorite essay, "Self-reliance."

The book contains a testimony from the board of trustees, of which Mr. Stone was chairman, and an address from the congregation to both Mr. and Mrs. Stone. This latter is signed on the pages of the book by the members of the congregation. The book also contains four beautiful pictures, one each of the exterior of the church, the interior, the interior of the church parlor, and of the house and grounds where Mr. Stone had lived for many years.

Mr. Stone was completely taken by sur-were the first to sing praises within its walls, and your interest kept pace with the growth of the society.

Of late years, Mr. Stone, you have broken for us most acceptably the bread of life from our pulpit, and proclaimed with the eloquence of conviction your faith in the doctrines of Unitarianism, which has grown to mean to you the religion of Jesus. With the larger opportunity which will come to you in the new work to which you have devoted yourself we can sympathize and rejoice; for some are ministers by profession, and some are born with the royal accolade laid upon them. And to this spiritual knighthood we feel that you belong; and, as your new work will broaden your field of usefulness, it will enable you to use the gift divinely bestowed to the various needs of a larger audience. As one of the trustees of our church, you will be sadly missed; and, as an earnest, faithful supporter of the society, your loss will be continually manifest.

While we as a congregation take pleasure in any gain that may come to you, at the same time we cannot but remember and regret that with this change we are losing two of our oldest and most valued members. Though regrets at times outweigh our congratulations, yet be sure our interest and prise, and did not attempt to reply. Words were not needed to bear testimony to the happy results of the twenty-eight years of striving together for the faith that makes faithful, for the ideals that adorn and beautify human lives. No separation ever seemed more natural, and the sadness at parting was tempered by the consciousness that it could not and would not be either complete or final. Mr. Stone left Wilmington the evening of that day, and on the first day of July assumed the duties of his new office at No. 25 Beacon Street.

GEORGE WHITEFIELD STONE.

We print below the resolutions passed by the members of the First Unitarian Church of Wilmington, Del., and its board of trustees, on receiving his letter of resignation of his official position as a member of the society and the board of trustees:—

THE CONGREGATION OF THE FIRST UNITARIAN CHURCH OF WILMINGTON, DEL.

To MR. AND MRS. G. W. STONE:

Dear Friends,—It is with mingled feelings that we accept the fact of your departure from our congregation and our city. Your twenty-eight years of residence has made it seem as though you belonged among us and were leaving your native place; and, while we recognize the gain to you, and offer our best wishes, our own loss hinders the full expression of them. We regret your loss to our city; but how much more will our church be the loser! With its dedication you were identified; and your voices affection follow you to your new home and into the new work.

With best wishes, we are always your good friends.

ACTION OF THE BOARD OF TRUSTEES.

The trustees of the First Unitarian Church of Wilmington, Del., in accepting the resignation of their valued associate, co-worker, and friend, George W. Stone, in consequence of his election and acceptance of the trusteeship of the American Unitarian Association, necessitating his removal from among us, feel it their duty as well as pleasure to give some expression of their sentiments of mingled regret and congratulation,—regret that our little church shall lose the benefit of his wise counsel and progressive spirit, and congratulations that he is advanced to a position of more extended usefulness.

We are conscious that the church as well as the community needs such men; and it is evident that the society has grown under these influences, and that Mr. Stone has also grown with it in the effort he has made for the advancement of all those things that go to make up a progressive and well-ordered community. And we consider that his new associates have cause for congratulation in the acquisition by them of one whom we esteem so well qualified to fill the new duties to which he is called.

Our good wishes will accompany him, and our memory will ever bear record of our genial and pleasant association in our church work during the many years we have been engaged therein.

LEA PUSEY.

On behalf of the Board of Trustees.

The Pulpit.

CITIZEN AND NEIGHBOR: RIGHTS vs. DUTIES.

BY REV. THOMAS VAN NESS.

"Watch ye, stand fast in the faith, quit you like men, be strong."—1 COR. xvi. 13.

Naturally during this past week our thoughts have been turned to the celebration of Independence Day. Orators, editorial writers, and special patriotic observances have stimulated in our minds the meaning of the action taken by our forefathers on that memorable Fourth of July, 1776. As far as can be judged by popular manifestations, the celebration of this year has been as pronounced and as intensely earnest as any in preceding years.

It is difficult for a traveller to rightly estimate the distance he has gone over without the aid of milestones. Equally difficult is it for a nation to thoroughly realize its rate of progress on the high road of civilization without some annual celebrations of historic events. Such national red-letter days bring back the thoughts and methods of those about whom time has placed a halo. By putting in sharp contrast the conditions under which they lived with our own, we are better able to determine in what ways we have progressed, and the value of the present civilization.

In imagination, therefore, let us place ourselves back in the Boston of a century ago. The common, or "people's park," gives it a familiar look; but, as soon as we leave this central spot, how differently do all things appear! We cannot make our way around the city by means of electric cars or even horse-cars; for, outside of a few irregular stage-lines running to suburban points, there is no method of public transportation in vogue. The sidewalks are indifferent. In many places there are none, the streets narrow and abominably paved. Few of the street names do we recognize; and, as for numbers on the houses to guide us to our destination, they are as yet not in existence. The houses are mean, inconvenient, mostly weather-beaten and unpainted; and, as night comes on, they are dimly lit by the light of home-made tallow candles. In winter they are cold and cheerless with their uncarpeted floors, except in the living-room, where a great fire of wood is kept burning. To pass through the streets at night is positively dangerous on account of the darkness and the wretched ruts and holes in the pavements. In summer there is no ice by which water from the town pump can be kept cool, or meats, butter, and milk be kept from spoiling. Fruits and vegetables are expensive. The tomato, cauliflower, and cantaloupe are as yet unknown; while bananas, pineapples, oranges, and lemons are the greatest of luxuries.

Information as to one's friends and neighbors who live even so short a distance away as New York is meagre. The larger streams must be forded or crossed in flat boats at great peril, and the mail stage coach at its best takes a week to go from city to city. Information is obtained from private letters or by gossip; for only a limited number of newspapers are published, and the best among these are hardly more than advertising sheets, what news they contain being from a week to six months old.

Think how infinitely better is the lot of the average workman and citizen of to-day! Hospitals, asylums, free dispensaries, and philanthropic institutions of all kinds, unknown a hundred years ago, now supply his wants in moments of distress, or when poverty, misfortune, and sickness are upon him. The economic bicycle or the cheap street-car makes it possible for him to travel miles and miles at a less expense than to go from Boston to Cambridge in 1795. Food from every quarter of the globe, of first quality and greatest variety, is easily purchasable. The school-house is free. So, too, in many States are the university, the public library, the art and scientific museums, and the popular people's concerts in the open air. Then information in regard to every country, political, religious, economic, is put at the disposal of any one for one cent. Books of the best authors can be purchased for five and ten cents. Gas and electric lights are everywhere. Streets that are well paved and guarded by police protection make it possible ble for the weakest woman or child to walk them at night as well as day. Water of purest quality is brought to each man's very door, even the North End quarter of Boston being now in better sanitary condition than the Court End quarter of the same city at the close of the eighteenth century.

We hear much said to-day of the wretched condition of the poor, the long hours of labor, the small pittance obtained for work, the unjust economic conditions prevailing; and yet, when we compare the longest hours of labor to-day with those of the average workman and farmer of a hundred years ago, we see that our forefathers worked more continuously and with less mechanical helps than even the poorest shoveller or farm hand in this year of 1895.

Whatever may be said to the contrary, we are vastly in advance over our forefathers in all those things which make for comfort, convenience, better food, better housing, and a more general diffusion of information. Those rights concerning which the Declaration of Independence spoke have been won and are possessed and can largely be enjoyed by the poorest as well as the wealthiest in the United States.

This fact being admitted,—and any one studying dispassionately the industrial history of the past one hundred years cannot deny it,—it behooves us to ask if we have equally advanced in other directions. We are told by labor agitators, by socialistic reformers, and others who have at heart the well-being of the masses that the kingdom of God, the ideal commonwealth, cannot be known on earth under present economic conditions. These industrial reformers assert that only when each man in the community has his proper rights can we hope to see justice and truth, love and peace, reign supreme.

When we try to find out from the lips or published writings of such economists just what they mean by "the people's rights," we find reference is made to but one thing,—the economic condition of wage earners. The people, it is said, are not obtaining their full share of the products of the earth. Wealth and industrial power more and more tend to consolidation in the hands of a few; and, while it is acknowledged that the average conditions for every man are vastly better than one hundred years ago, yet because in the distribution of the earth's goods some have taken by might, stealth, or right more than is supposed to be their share, therefore the others feel they have good cause to believe themselves injured, and consequently to be discontented.

Now, on the other hand, such careful thinkers and writers on economic affairs as Mr. Wells and Mr. Griffin declare that the average condition of the working classes has improved nearly one hundred per cent. in the past century. Certainly, we know nothing to-day of the awful conditions prevailing in England in 1798, when little children worked in factories and cotton mills from twelve to sixteen hours a day, and where women dragged heavy coal-carts and labored like beasts of burden. Whatever the rate of improvement, whether one hundred per cent., seventy-five per cent., or only fifty per cent., it is admitted that from highest to lowest here in America the nineteenth century has wrought a marvelous advance in all those things which make for comfort and physical satisfaction. The question, then, of utmost importance for us to answer is whether, if by some sudden economic change we could immediately raise the amount of wealth and comfort for every inhabitant,—say fifty per cent. over what is now possessed,—we could at the same time, as is also claimed, raise the whole moral, intellectual, and religious tone of the nation. In other words, Are people's morals, intelligence, and goodness of life so greatly dependent upon mere exterior things that, when these things change and fluctuate, their morality and religiousness change and fluctuate correspondingly?

Illustrations, I know, are given which would seem to carry yes for an answer; but let us look to the sober pages of history for our information. It being admitted that in these past one hundred years our industrial conditions have been improved, our style of living, our general comfort, and our means of intelligence and culture broadened, the question is: Have we advanced over our forefathers one hundred or even fifty per cent. in dignity of bearing, in modesty, in evenness of temperament, in love of truth, in God-fearing righteousness?

Are we more honest, more just, more forbearing? Are we twice as moral, twice as religious? Have we citizens that vastly tower over John Adams and Benjamin Franklin and Robert Morris and George Washington and Rev. James Freeman in patriotism, in integrity, in love of right, and in God-fearing regard for duty?

I tell you we are shamed, as we go back and read the chronicles of a hundred years ago, to see with what manliness, with what honesty, and with what a high degree of character men stamped themselves upon the community and the age in which they lived. 1895 can show no worthier specimens of manhood and womanhood than 1795. No: while exterior conditions do have their influence upon us all, yet I think we greatly overrate this influence, forgetting that hardship, poverty, and labor have developed many a one whom the world now delights to honor.

I want, then, to-day to turn away from this mere emphasis of rights, about which we have heard so much through the past week, and ask if over against rights there are not certain very pressing duties. Certainly, the laborer has a right to all of the earth's products that he can honestly earn; but, if at the present moment, either through unjust conditions or world-wide industrial changes or the power of certain other citizens in the community, he is not receiving absolutely and fully his just deserts, is that any legitimate reason why he cannot still be a man, why he shall lose energy and heart and become discontented?

After all, as has been truly said, the real value of every right rises or falls with the use to which the right is put; i.e., the dutiful way in which it is used. Let us note a few of the rights we all may thoroughly enjoy, and then ask, Do we dutifully use them for the general good,—even for our own good?

Take, first of all, our political rights. Each citizen in the United States has the right to cast a ballot which shall decide who are to be the executive officers of the nation, from President to the obscurest county constable. This being so, how many men translate this right into a feeling of obligation? how many give time and thought to the primaries, and feel it a duty to examine well into the characters of the respective candidates before voting for them? Large, indeed, with responsibility is this right of political sovereignty; and few there be who seem to fully realize it.

Again, every citizen in the United States has the fullest religious rights. He can worship as he will, uncoerced by fear of government, bishop, or centralized ecclesiastical authority insisting on uniformity in religious procedure.

Not in vain did our Pilgrim forefathers breast the dangers of the Atlantic and the terrors of a new and unknown land. Through their efforts we enter into the fullest religious rights. Yet of what good is the opportunity to religiously think and believe as we please and to worship as our conscience dictates, if, instead of availing ourselves of this right, we carelessly fail to worship at all and support no kind of church? Was it for such indifference to our spiritual duties—duties to self, to others, and to God—that so much hardship and agony on the part of Huguenot and Puritan and Netherlander was endured?

So, too, we are glibly told that every corporation or business firm has a right to all that it can make. Admitting the right, by implication does it not carry with it a duty? We read of certain mills in the eastern part of this land which during its years of prosperity earned twenty-two per cent. dividends, and at the same time the owners were paying many of their workmen but ninety cents a day. Does not the right to such large profits carry with it the duty of a more liberal financial remuneration to the mechanics who help make it?

"America," says Emerson, "is only another name for opportunity." Each one, according to the Declaration of Independence, has the right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, providing he does not infringe on the equal rights of his neighbor. Well, then, does it follow that he has a right to spend his money as he pleases? If by some fortunate chance, some lucky invention, some discovery of an oil-well or a gold mine, a man comes into the possession of millions, is he to lavishly and foolishly spend it without regard to the influence of such expenditure upon others, simply because he is free so to do and the law protects him in his right of free choice? Or, at the other end of the social scale, does not every workingman, because he has the right of an American sovereign, also owe a duty to the public which obligates him to be temperate and quiet in his actions, not to break the peace or lower the moral tone of the community, and, above all, not to add by his carelessness or wastefulness of public property to the unsanitary condition of his ward or to the city tax rate?

But all this that I am saying is the merest platitude, thoroughly well known to every one, I am told. Yes: I am aware of it. Strangely enough, it is these best known things that are so often ignored; and therefore they need restatement. As we look over the history of the United States for the past year, we find it stained by a lawlessness which tells more forcibly against the republic than all our arguments in favor of its splendid material progress. East and West, in Chicago as in Brooklyn, the military arm called in to enforce order plainly tells us that there has been an over-emphasis on personal rights and an ignoring of the complementary fact that, as the reverend orator said, "the citizen who would enjoy the blessings of liberty and the institutions of democratic life must be willing to help in the maintenance of that federation by fidelity to every public obligation which the State shall impose upon him."

I trust, then, these words of mine may be considered timely ones; for in a few days most of us will be widely scattered on our vacation journeys. Summer seems particularly the time when we lay aside our obligations. How often am I told by city people that they do not feel it incumbent upon them to attend church when they are off summering in mountain towns or at seaside villages! Again, when far from home Sundays are often passed in mere pleasures, when unconventional practices are indulged in which would not be attempted or even tolerated in the social circles of the city to which the tourist belongs. "I have a right to do as I please, when I'm away," must be translated into, "I ought to please to do that which is for the common best." No wonder a Maine townsman of sterling integrity said he hoped his village would never be cursed with the city boarders. They corrupt our youth by their example, which is largely one of large expenditure and extravagant dressing and living. By their indifference to Sunday observance they make it hard for us to get our sons and daughters to attend church or even to care for religious things.

It should be kept in mind that society is an organism. No one part of it can be deranged without all the other parts feeling the evil effects. More and more delicate is growing this interdependence between all classes and all communities. If, for our personal welfare and happiness, it is necessary that our brother man be pure, honest, trustworthy, and law-abiding, then it is equally necessary for his highest welfare that we possess those same virtues.

If the inner qualities of mind and heart which govern him have really more to do with the making or marring of my personal happiness than all the outward things with which I can surround myself, then surely the reverse proposition is equally true, and his happiness and success are dependent upon my right qualities of soul and mind. One's rights are individual. They extend no whit further than the circle of his personality. One's duties are to society. They extend even to the confines of the earth. He who only thinks of his own rights, or at most simply cares for the welfare of his family and takes little interest in the general weal, is not a true Christian, nor is he a good citizen. The duty of the citizen is more and harder than this. Love of country first means love of one's fellow-men.

Liberty is now ours, and individual rights. Unity is what we now want and a sense of personal obligation. These combined, and we shall indeed have the ideal land,—the glorious republic of the sons of God. In the name of the Church, by all the sacred symbols of religion, I call each man to his duty.

A new political year is upon us. Pray God we may make it a religious year in which our hearts shall flame with a joyous willingness to serve our fellow-man and the State, a year in which we shall consecrate ourselves to our duties, and, looking to the Author and Finisher of our salvation, press forward unto the mark of his high calling, until we all come unto the perfect man, unto the measure of the fulness of the stature of Christ.

Spirit of the Press.

Dr. Dorchester, in writing to the Advance on "The Improvement in Public Affairs," says:—

There is less infidelity and scoffing among public men than from fifty to one hundred years ago. Then a large percentage of the leading statesmen were outspoken sceptics. Chancellor Kent said there were few professional men of that period that were not infidels. A writer in the Index in 1870 said, "All the great men who took part with Mr. Paine in laying the foundations of the government of the United States, with very few exceptions, were of the same theological sentiment." Churches, clergymen, and the religious people generally were freely and foully assailed in public places and on public occasions. In Hartford, Conn., one of the centres of Puritanism, that eminent minister, Rev. Dr. Nathan Strong, could not pass along the street without being grossly assailed, until, in self-defence, his effective wit was so vigorously aroused as to compel the respect of his assailants. Gen. Dearborn, an officer of the general government, riding in the public stage in Connecticut, denounced the churches as "painted nuisances." In Western and newer sections it was even worse, until such men as Rev. Peter Cartwright in Illinois and Rev. M. Stubbleworth in Georgia won respect by inflicting physical drubbings upon their assailants.

The New York Observer, in an editorial on Huxley, deprecates the influence of the great scientist on religion:—

The influence of Prof. Huxley has been and, we fear, will continue to be very pernicious to the cause of religion. Because he was an acknowledged authority in his own branch of physics, and because he wrote in a fluent and vivacious way, many were induced to accept his opinions on a subject which he had never sufficiently studied and upon which he was wholly unfitted to dogmatize. This was increased by the fact that he took pleasure in shocking men's prejudices, and in pronouncing his opinions in the most confident and offensive way. Men forget that there is a wide difference between the methods proper to physical investigation and those appropriate to the weighing of moral evidence, and leap to the conclusion that one eminent and trustworthy in the former must needs be the same in the latter. The case is made worse by the fact that the question involved does not touch any minor or unessential point, but affects the very existence of religion on the earth. For, if there be no God, or if we are unable to determine whether there is one, the bottom falls out of every form of faith now existing in the world, sin and guilt cease to exist, immortality becomes a dream, redemption is an empty name, and the gospel of the grace of God is a phrase without significance. It is a shallow philosophy and a false application of science that leads to such results as these, and no glamour of a distinguished name should mislead any to make shipwreck of their faith by giving heed to so manifest a delusion.

CHANDLER & CO.

Comfortable, Easy Summer Gloves.

During the warm summer days Kid gloves are distressing, and Silk gloves handsome and expensive, but not very serviceable.

We have always in stock

The Ideal Summer Glove.

Fits like a kid glove, and wears perfectly Made of Silk and Lisle, with buttons, 75c., and without buttons, 60c. per pair.

Ask to see

THE IDEAL SUMMER GLOVE.

CHANDLER & CO.,

Winter St., Boston.

The Outlook has the following on "Irrational Rationalism":—

Mr. Norman Pearson contributes to the Nineteenth Century an article on "True and False Notions of Prayer," from which we clip the following curious paragraph: "The same objections to prayer for divine interference with the order of things external to ourselves apply with equal force to prayer for the modification of our own characters. 'Make me a clean heart, O God,' is as naked an appeal for miraculous interference as a prayer for rain. Each alike, if granted, would be a disturbance of natural causation, seeing that human character, no less than the weather, is a product of natural causes." On no subject except theology would a reputable thinker offer or a reputable review publish such a paragraph as this; but, in arguing on theology, all the ordinary rules of reason seem to be abolished by a certain class of writers, both orthodox and heretical. Mr. Pearson's argument in this paragraph would be as efficacious to prove that communication between man and man is impossible as to prove that communication is impossible between man and God. If it is not possible for the divine Spirit to exercise a purifying, elevating, and enlightening influence on human experience without a disturbance of natural causation, neither is it possible for one human spirit to exercise such influence on another human spirit. If Mr. Pearson's argument is sound, children should cease to expect benign influences from their parents, pupils should cease to go to school for instruction, clients should cease to apply to lawyers for counsel, patients should cease to ask doctors for advice, and friends should cease to seek help from friends in time of trouble. It is true that this argument, with just these applications, is sometimes to be found in the writings of the fatalist; but it is also true that humanity pays no attention to it.

Literature.

MEMOIRS OF BARRAS.*

We have here a document of great importance, both as concerning the French Revolution and the career of Napoleon, about which it would appear that at this present time we cannot have too much. But it is a document which would have had a wide, if not so general, an interest if there had been no Napoleonic revival in possession of the book-makers and the magazines. Its appearance at this time is apparently a mere coincidence with this revival, though a disposition to make hay while the sun shines may have spurred the editorial flank. M. George Duruy, the editor, is an enthusiastic admirer of Napoleon,—a fact which makes his position as the editor of memoirs which are from beginning to end a systematic depreciation of Napoleon a peculiar one, to say the least. It is easy to conceive that his sentiments might have attracted him to a course that would have been extremely prejudicial to his performance. For what could have been more natural than for him to have checked Barras in a running commentary of notes that would have made a constant friction for the reader's mind, and prevented the memoirs from delivering their proper force upon him? But from such a course his abstinence is well nigh absolute; while in a preface to the first and another to the second volume he puts in a deliberate demurrer, and shows good reasons why the statements of Barras concerning Napoleon should not be taken at their face value.

In his general introduction M. Duruy gives a history of the "Memoirs" and accounts for their tardy publication. It is a history which detracts not a little from the value of the "Memoirs" as immediate impressions of the events with which they deal, seeing that it discloses the fact that we are generally at two removes from those events. It was not until 1819 that Barras projected his "Memoirs"; and, as presented to us, they reflect at every stage the after-thoughts of a soured and disappointed man. Even where we are advised that we are dealing with the notes which he made immediately after the meetings of the Directory, we have not infrequently "a trout in the milk," palpable evidence of a point of view subsequent to Napoleon's decline and fall. This first remove is probably more serious than the second,—that of the editor, M. de Saint-Albin, who, taking the notes and manuscripts of Barras, has made them over into what he considered a better literary form. M. Duruy is of the opinion that he has not added to their interest by this treatment, and that he has deducted something from their value; but we have no reason to believe that he has distorted the documents in any radical way or to a degree approximating that in which Barras's own malicious afterthought distorted the impressions which he originally received.

Such being the situation, it is evident that we have here a very serviceable body of memoirs, but one that must be used with the greatest caution. Nothing could be more absurd than for any one to imagine that we have here a veritable history of the Revolution from 1789 until 1796, with a true account of the actions and the motives of Barras himself, Napoleon, Carnot, and a multitude of others who crowd the tragical and sanguinary stage. For one thing we have the falsification of omission. What notion would an unprejudiced reader get of Napoleon's campaign in Italy from these meagre and grudging general indications? But the falsification is not all omission. Unquestionably, a glory was reflected back upon the earlier events of Napoleon's career from the height of his renown. But, though his part at Toulon and on the 13th Vendémiaire, when the first Royalist reaction got its quietus, may not have been so important as heretofore traditionally conceived, it was probably much more important than Barras is willing to allow, especially in the second matter. In trying to write Napoleon down, Barras writes down himself either a knave or a fool, or both in one, if Napoleon was so unimportant as he represents him up to his Italian campaign. For it was Barras who was most influential in making Napoleon commander-in-chief of the army in Italy. From the standpoint of his previous history, as here set down, such an appointment would have been utterly monstrous and absurd. We have a similar contradiction when we come to the appointment of Talleyrand as foreign minister by the Directory. Either Barras did not think so meanly of him as he writes or his support of him was singularly lacking in that "conscience" to which he makes a fulsome and reiterative claim.

This claim does not extend to matters of personal conduct. On the contrary, Barras is prouder of nothing than of his immoral relations with various women. His "Memoirs" are scandalous in this regard, and involve many reputations, but none that was not badly smirched before. Josephine fares worst of all, and probably even worse than she deserves, though "the consensus of the competent" has been increasingly damaging to her character with the lapse of time. But, when Barras would have us to believe that Napoleon made her his wife, knowing her to be the merest courtesan, and immediately after his marriage turned her over to Barras for the continuance of an old liaison, he is presuming too much upon our gullibility and our ignorance of the letters which Napoleon wrote to her from the scenes of his Italian victories.

Nothing in these memoirs is so grim as the sang froid with which the writer moves from one incident of horror to another. We are brought into a strangely realizing touch with the events of the Revolution, all of which Barras saw, and in some of which he was magna pars. Both of the 9th Thermidor, when Robespierre fell, and of the 13th Vendémiaire he was the leading spirit; and these volumes stop just short of the 18th Fructidor, when again his rôle was that of the chief actor, unconscious that he was a puppet obedient to Napoleon's dictatorial hand. That he could pass through so many vicissitudes is eloquent for his shrewdness, but also for his ability. Neither in nor between the lines is there any evidence in these volumes that he was not consistently republican in his sentiments. An admirer of Danton, he has been made to share the odium of Danton's imaginary desire to establish the house of Orleans on the throne. Evidently, if he had had to choose between the Orleanists and the Bourbons, he would have chosen the former, but only when obliged by circumstances to despair of the republic. The well-known split in the Directory, continually three to two, is such an oft-told tale in Barras's minutes of the Directory meetings that it gets to be very wearisome. As one of the two, Carnot is the object of Barras's continual reprehension as one of the three. Here, again, there is a notable suppressio veri. No one would ever imagine the real Carnot, with his genius for military administration, from the picture of this irritable recalcitrant. But there are matters here which the discreet historian of the future will have to reckon with.

Barras would have us to believe that from the first he found in Napoleon a remarkable resemblance to Marat, and in Talleyrand a remarkable resemblance to Robespierre. That in both of these particulars we have not the malicious inventions of his after-thinking, we are by no means well assured. Certainly, Napoleon and Talleyrand were very different from Marat and Robespierre in one particular: they had much less sincerity. Barras holds to the idea that Robespierre endeavored to commit suicide on the 9th Thermidor. M. Duruy furnishes a fac-simile of the Commune's call to arms which is opposed to this interpretation. Four of the leaders of the Commune had signed their names, and Robespierre had written "Ro" when somebody shot him, breaking his jaw and splashing the paper with his blood. That he should have written "Ro" and there have stopped and shot himself does not seem probable. What is much more so is that Barras did not join the party against Robespierre until he was convinced that Robespierre had marked him for destruction, his endeavors to conciliate him having been in vain.

We are truly sorry for any one who attempts to read these "Memoirs" without considerable previous knowledge of the persons implicated and the order of events. Those who have read Prof. Sloane's Life of Napoleon in the Century to date may consider themselves fortunate so far as preparation for these memoirs are concerned, while they suggest a doubt of the soundness of his opinion concerning the conduct of Barras in various particulars. J. W. C.

RACE AND LANGUAGE. By André Lefèvre, Professor of the Anthropological School, Paris. New York: D. Appleton & Co.—This is a profoundly learned and extremely valuable book; but it is one that appeals to scholars and students of the higher grades much more than to the class for which the "International Series" was originally devised by Prof. Youmans, with whom it originated. We doubt very much whether he would have thought it well to add this volume to a series which already contained Prof. Whitney's admirable volume on the same subject. The doctrine of the opening chapter is that the consonant is the substructure and foundation of language. "Man alone possesses it, and it is the greatest and most fruitful of his conquests. This treasure is composed of but six letters, K, G, T, D, P, B,—the gutturals, dentals, and labials." A chapter on "The Embryology of Language" follows. Its results are as follows: "Animals possess two of the important elements of language: the spontaneous reflex cry of emotion or need; the voluntary cry of warning, threat, or summons. From these two sorts of utterance, man, endowed already with a richer vocal apparatus and a more developed brain, evolved numerous varieties by means of stress, reduplication, intonation. The warning, or summoning, cry, the germ of the demonstrative roots, is the parent of the names of numbers, sex, and distance. The emotional cry, of which our simple interjections are but the relics in combination with the demonstratives, prepares the outlines of the sentence, and already represents the verb and the names of states and actions." A chapter on "The Formation of Words" completes Part I.; and in Part II, we have eight chapters on "The Geographical Distribution of Languages and Races," embracing the idea which, once strange, is now one of the commonplaces of philology,—that the widest variety of race may be consistent with a unity of speech. Chapters on the Semitic and Indo-European languages conclude the second book; and Book III. is devoted entirely to the organism of the Indo-European language, which, for Prof. Lefèvre, is the language richest in significance of all human speech, the medium of civilization and progress to an extent of which Bossuet knew nothing when he exalted Hebrew to the highest seat,—the language in which God spoke to men.

THE ODES OF HORACE. Translated into English by W. E. Gladstone. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.—The proverb, "Traduttore, traditore," the translator is a traitor, can as easily be made good with Horace as with any classic poet; also the proverb that a translated poem is a boiled strawberry. Both have been made good by his translators many times. Nor is it to be expected that, when so many have failed, Mr. Gladstone would succeed perfectly. In some instances he has improved upon his predecessors, in others he has fallen short of them. The wonder is that, with so many irons in the fire, this one has been so little burned, and that it has been hammered into so good a shape. There is great felicity in many phrases, a noble music in many of the odes,—to say in all would not be much of an exaggeration. The measures are mainly classic English measures, and they are adapted to the variety of the originals without any attempt to reproduce their special forms. One of the most obvious defects comes from the endeavor to attain condensation through elision,—especially the elision of articles, a common artifice, and always fatal to the quality of English verse. And, if, after reading pleasantly for a while, we take up our Horace and begin to make comparisons, we find that, however magnificent Mr. Gladstone's translation, it is not Horace. Its music is not his music. It is heavy where he is light. Here the touch is careful: there it is deft and magical. Those ignorant of the originals may take much pleasure here, but they must not delude themselves with the idea that they have got the real thing. Meantime the rusty Horatian will do well to compare Mr. Gladstone's translations with the originals, and ask himself where and how he could improve upon them. A heightened appreciation of Mr. Gladstone's workmanship would undoubtedly ensue.

SUPPRESSED CHAPTERS, AND OTHER BOOKISHNESS. By Robert Bridges. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.—Whether brevity is or is not the soul of wit, it is quite inseparable from Mr. Bridges's particular variety. Whether it would have been so under any circumstances we do not know. It may be that he would have been more expansive if he had not been the literary editor of Life, but that, being this, he has been subdued to what he worked in, like the dyer's hand. Short articles were in requisition, and short articles he has written. Those who have read them in Life will be glad to read them again in this attractive book. The best do not come first, but certain "Suppressed Chapters" from "Trilby" and other novels. The imaginary letters that come next are better, and still not the best. These are the reviews of "Novels that Everybody reads." Their brevity is sometimes a serious limitation. For example, in the review of "David Balfour" there is not a word about Bertha Grant, one of the most charming creatures ever created by a novelist. "The Prisoner of Zenda" is taken somewhat too seriously. We have always supposed it was intended for a burlesque. In "The Literary Partition of Scotland" Mr. Bridges deals too tenderly for us with the melodramatic ending of "The Little Minister"; and why, oh, why, is there not a word of Crockett's "Stickit Minister," the best of all his books? In "Friends in Arcady" Marion Crawford's account of his own life is extremely interesting. We had hoped that the "Plea for Diana"—Meredith's "Diana of the Crossways"—would clear up her silliest performances, her blabbing of a state secret confided to her by her lover; but it leaves that blot on her immortal loveliness as indelible as ever.

THE ARTHURIAN EPIC. By S. Humphreys Gurteen, M.A., LL.B., graduate of the University of Cambridge. New York and London: G. P. Putnam's Sons.—The general reader who has read Stoddard Brooke's study of Tennyson can afford to let this volume pass without much attention. For appreciation of Tennyson's "Idyls" it is much inferior to Mr. Brooke's delightful book; and the learning of the comparative study of the Cambrian, Breton, and Anglo-Norman versions of the story has been weighed in the balance by those who are skilful in such things, and found wanting. Not only is Mr. Gurteen's acquaintance with the materials for such a comparison inadequate, but he does not

Sunlight

Soap

is made in a twin bar (as shown above) for the sake of convenience; it is made of pure materials for the sake of quality; it is made by our peculiar processes for the sake of effectiveness (doing its work easily); it is made at the largest soap works in the world for the sake of supplying the largest demand in the world. it is used everywhere for the sake of

Less Labor
Greater Comfort

Lever Bros., Ltd., Hudson & Harrison Sts., N.Y.

* Memoirs of Barras, Member of the Directorate. Edited with a general introduction. Prefaces and appendices by George Duruy. In four volumes. Vols. I, II. New York: Harper & Brothers.

make the most of what he has in hand. Of misinterpretations and anachronisms he has not a few. A writer must not be expected to be omniscient, but he must be judged somewhat with reference to the pretensions that he makes; and, when we find Mr. Gurteen quoting "The Faerie Queen" as an old anonymous poem, our confidence in his erudition is not a little shaken. In his comparisons of Tennyson's "Idyls" with the older forms, Mr. Gurteen is generally a lenient critic; but he deals very sternly with him in the matter of Vivien, who is no such evil character, it seems, in the old poems, traditions, and romances as he has represented her. But, seeing that by this arrangement we have all the old forms intact and something entirely new, full of "novel lights and darks undreamed of," it does not seem that he has any just ground for complaint.

AMONG THE NORTHERN HILLS. By W. C. Prime, LL.D. New York: Harper & Brothers.—Dr. Prime sees nature and life at first hand, and learns their secrets with his own eyes. He enters into sports with the zeal of the genuine angler, loves the trees in the primeval forests as personal companions, and delights to draw the trout from the mountain brook. He also sees far into the real import of common, every-day life, and interprets its meaning and moral beauty. Taking as a suggestion some scene or event in the northern hills of New Hampshire,—such as "A Thursday Evening Meeting," "An Easter Long Ago," "An Old-time Thanksgiving," "A Northern Sleigh-ride," "Life seen through a Window,"—we have a series of charming sketches full of varied interest, vivid description of character, touched with fine sentiment. These have the breath of nature and the real spirit of rural New England life. They are marked by breadth of thought and a healthful moral tone. The author in this book shows how much a rich, keen, and observant mind can see in the most common scenes, and also how much he can make his readers see. This is thoroughly a wholesome book, and will prove an especially welcome companion during the summer, either at the seashore or the mountains.

COLONEL NORTON. A Novel. By Florence Montgomery. New York and London: Longmans, Green & Co.—Browning's idea that the development of a soul is the only subject worth dwelling on finds an echo in the conception of this novel. Moreover, the development is in Browning's way,—that of revolution, and not evolution. A giddy girl is transformed by the impact of an heroic deed upon her consciousness. Her apparently worthless life is saved by a splendid fellow, and she is put upon her honor to make good his loss to his children and the world at large. The construction of the story is unfortunate, introducing, as it does, this incident in an explanatory way long after its occurrence. The book is worked out through the conversation of the dramatis personæ to a considerable extent, and the conversation is well managed. Col. Norton, who names the book, is clearly a secondary character; but he has his own course of love, and the reader follows it with interest.

ANNALS OF THE PARISH AND THE Ayrshire LEGATEES. By John Galt. Illustrated by Charles E. Brock. With an Introduction by Alfred Ainger. New York: Macmillan & Co.—It is a delight to have these charming books accessible to the general public instead of stored away in private libraries among one's peculiar treasures. When we realize that these charming books were written before the Waverley novels, and with the ambition to do for Scotland what Goldsmith had done for England in "The Vicar of Wakefield," we can better appreciate how great must be that merit which makes it desirable to reprint them after a lapse of seventy-five years from the time of their original publication. A great treat is in store for those of the present generation who can appreciate the consummate humor and pathos of the Scotch characters drawn by Galt's gifted pen and the truth and beauty of the simple life which he describes.

THE TRIAL AND DEATH OF JESUS CHRIST. A Devotional History of our Lord's Passion. By James Stalker, D.D. New York: A. C. Armstrong & Son.—Dr. Stalker takes up the New Testament story at the arrest of Jesus, and ends it with his burial. The few verses of the Gospels are expanded into three hundred and seventeen pages; but the earlier form will, we trust, be preferred by the majority of those who read the book. Notwithstanding many fruitful thoughts, its average tone does not impress us as healthy and invigorating. We can easily conceive, however, that those who make much of Passion Week in the way of public services will find it a quarry from which they can get much material to build up into their discourses when their own invention fails. For ourselves, we do not know when we have found so much of that treatment of Jesus which Emerson deprecated as "noxious exaggeration."

LIFE AND THE CONDITIONS OF SURVIVAL. Popular Lectures and Discussions before the Brooklyn Ethical Association. Chicago: Charles H. Kerr & Co. $2.—The aim of this book is to carry evolutionary principles into the field of individual life and character, showing their practical application to the problems of hygiene, sociology, religion, and applied ethics. The writers are well known, and their words on topics such as these are sure to be of interest to intelligent and thoughtful readers. Among others, Dr. Lewis G. Janes writes of "Cosmic Evolution as related to Ethics"; the subject of Rev. John W. Chadwick is "Habit"; Rev. John C. Kimball contributes an essay on "From Natural to Christian Selection"; and Rev. Edward P. Powell closes the series of fourteen papers by considering "Religion as a Factor in Social Evolution."

PRINCETON STORIES. By Jesse Lynch Williams. Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.—The stories of this collection average better than most books about college life, written from the student's point of view. They are varied in theme, while the fun is not rowdyish, nor is the pathos absurd. Of course, they are boyish, or they would not be in touch with the life they are meant to describe; and, although they may be chiefly interesting to one who has already a personal knowledge of Princeton, yet there is more than one story among them well worth reading for its own sake.

THE DOCTOR, HIS WIFE, AND THE CLOCK. By Anna Katharine Green. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons.—The plot of this detective story is neither agreeable nor original. Neither is there much detective skill shown in tracing the blind murderer, who himself confesses his crime. The story has an element of excitement, as have all the books by this author; but it is not without a touch of melodrama.

THOMAS BOOBIG. By Luther Marshall. Boston: Lee & Shepard.—This is the story of a boy who grew and grew until he was seventy-five miles high, and had acquired the power "to extend his body at will, like a human telescope." The book shows a desperate straining after some unusual effect, but succeeds neither in being interesting nor remarkable.

Miscellaneous.

The new bound volume of the Century Magazine is sufficiently attractive to make it a temptation for anybody who ought to do other things than read its fascinating stories and numerous articles of interest. Only when examined in this compact form does one realize the amount of good literature obtainable by a year's subscription to such a magazine as this.

The Transcript has published a series of articles, describing different trips that may be taken to the various suburbs of Boston, chiefly by means of the electric cars. They have attracted a good deal of attention, and are now printed together in a convenient pamphlet, which ought to have the result of making many people better acquainted with their opportunities to visit interesting and beautiful places at small cost.

The new hymnal, prepared under the authority of a committee of the Universalist General Convention, contains 708 hymns and 513 tunes, with three orders of service and accompanying chants, and is issued by the Universalist Publishing House. This is not a revised or enlarged edition of the work hitherto in use among Universalists; and there is much more extent and variety, especially in its musical selections. The compilers have been careful to have all the melodies within the range of average voices. We notice hymns by many of our favorite Unitarian hymn-writers.

The Magazines.

The New England Kitchen for July contains an article entitled "Some Early Mushrooms" which ought to help the housekeeper in her search for wholesome and appetizing food products. "The Relation of Woman to Hygiene and Sanitation" is a thoughtful paper, written by Dr. Mary E. Green, and read at the National Council of Women. The magazine contains the usual number of recipes and much good advice, notably an article by Mrs. E. M. H. Merrill on "Summer Beverages."

Literary Notes.

Count Tolstoi refused a large sum offered him by an American publisher for his last story. The Neva, a Russian illustrated weekly, then offered him $500 a page for the exclusive right to publish it as a serial. This, too, he refused, and made a free gift of the manuscript to the Severny Vestnik, a Russian monthly magazine.

The Open Court during July will contain a rejoinder to Mr. Carnegie's and Senator Lodge's articles in a late number of the Forum on "The Annexation of Canada," by Prof. J. Clark Murray of McGill University, Montreal.

A new serial story by Brander Matthews will be published in Harper's Weekly, beginning in the first number that will appear in July and continuing for three months. The title of this story is "His Father's Son," and its scene is laid in the city of New York.

Rebecca Harding Davis returns to periodical literature after an absence extending over more than a decade. Since she last published a novel, her gifted son, Richard Harding Davis, has made a phenomenal success in the field which witnessed her triumphs. The title of Mrs. Davis's novel, which is to be published serially in Harper's Bazar, is "Doctor Warrick's Daughters."

Books Received.

TO PUBLISHERS.—All books sent to the CHRISTIAN REGISTER will be promptly acknowledged under the head of "Books Received," with statement of publisher's address and price, if known. But we can guarantee no other return, as the rapid multiplication of new works compels us to limit the number selected for critical notice and review.

From Copeland & Day, Boston. Meadow-grass. Tales of New England Life. By Alice Brown. Price $1.50.

From James H. Earle, Boston. Ships by Day. A Novel. By Edwin A. Wyman. Price $1.50.

From G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York. Cause and Effect. By Elinor Meirion.

From Thomas Y. Crowell & Co., New York. How Tommy saved the Barn. By James Otis. Old Man Savarin, and Other Stories. By Edward William Thompson. Price $1.00.

From Macmillan & Co., New York. The Adventures of Hajji Baba of Ispahan. By James Morier. Illustrated by H. R. Millar. Price $1.25.

From the Open Court Publishing Company, Chicago. The Gospel of Buddha according to Old Records. Told by Paul Carus. Price 35 cents.

Music Received.

From Oliver Ditson Company, Boston.

My Darling Emeline. Song and Dance. By J. Ed. Lakeman.

The Patter of the Rain. By W. F. Stubbs.

The Flower of an Hour. A Japanese Poem. Composed by John Cox Dear.

Cosmopolitan. Caprice Dance. By Jos. Marks.

With Fingers Weary and Worn; or, The Song of the Shirt. Words by Thomas Hood. Music by J. C. Bartlett.

Juliet Mazurka. Guitar Solo. By H. F. Keefe.

Queen of the Roses. Waltz. Two Banjos. H. F. Keefe.

Dance of the Wood Nymphs. Morceau. By J. J. Galaher.

"I love, and the World is mine." Music by Henry Burdett Willis. Words by Florence Earle Coates.

The Bonnie Banks o' Loch Lomond. For Pianoforte. By Edward Hoffman.

Brownie Dance. Frolic Schottische. Mischief Polka Mazurka. Guitar Music.

Baby has left her Honey Boy. Song. By Percy Grant.

The Shepherd's Pipe. For Pianoforte. By L. Gregh.

"A Great Good Man."

Charles Francis Barnard.

A Sketch of his Life and Work by FRANCIS TIFFANY. With a Portrait and a View of Warren Street Chapel. 12mo, gilt top, $1.25.

The Rev. Francis Tiffany, who wrought well as the biographer of Dorothea Dix, has quite doubled his claim upon public gratitude by producing a sketch of the Life and Work of Charles Francis Barnard. . . . The Warren Street Chapel, opened in 1836, and now aptly known, in honor of its founder, as the Barnard Memorial, was the offspring of his passionate zeal for exposed and neglected children, to thousands of whom he became a good genius and a guardian angel, as many old chapel boys, scattered over New England and the West, survive to testify. His big heart and fertile brain produced also the seeds which have grown up into many accepted agencies of education and charity; for Boston is indebted to him for the beginnings of sewing schools, evening schools, vacation schools, infant schools, day nurseries, music in schools, free libraries and reading-rooms, free art exhibits, rides for invalids, and the methods by which our Associated Charities and "settlements" seek to bring the prosperous into sympathetic relations with the unfortunate and the poor. . . . Into this little volume is compacted the story of a life of enlightened, practical, saintly philanthropy, which is not dimmed by comparison with that of John Howard, Florence Nightingale, or Vincent de Paul.—Boston Gazette.

He left behind him a name and a work with which nothing in Boston is to be compared except Father Taylor's. Mr. Tiffany's book is one of very great and rare interest.—The Independent (New York).

Sold by all booksellers. Sent, postpaid, by

HOUGHTON, MIFFLIN & CO., BOSTON.

SUMMER READING.

A Child of Nature.

By MARION D. SHUTTER, D.D.

Cloth, red edges, neatly stamped, 50 Cents.
Special gift edition, full gilt, $1.00.

Philadelphia To-day.—One of the most charming little collections of essays that have recently come under notice. Written with lovely simplicity of diction, taking us into a happy apprehension of Nature, and withal habited in the happiest thoughts and conceits. Altogether delightful.

Minneapolis Journal.—Dr. Shutter has a keen zest for Nature, and a mind to receive lasting impressions from her manifold moods in sky, water, cloud, leaf, grass, and flowers. He makes some charming applications and analogies in this volume, which will be prized by all who love homilies in stones and running brooks.

Toronto Week.—The ideas are so simply and so strikingly expressed that it is a pleasure to read it from cover to cover. The author strikes us as having eyes to see.

For sale by booksellers, or sent postpaid, on receipt of price by

JAMES H. WEST, Publisher,
174 High Street, - - - Boston.

OLD AND NEW UNITARIAN BELIEF.

BY

JOHN WHITE CHADWICK.

Price, $1.50.

CONTENTS.—Historical Introduction, The Doctrine of Man, Concerning God, The Bible, Christianity, Concerning Jesus, The Future Life, The Great Salvation, Loss and Gain.

"A valuable as well as very readable treatise. . . . The best popular history of Unitarian doctrine that has come to our notice. . . . Mr. Chadwick has most interestingly set forth the rapid transformations of Unitarian belief."—The Nation.

"The best summary of Unitarian history and doctrinal development, and the most radical and optimistic outlook on the future which has yet been produced among us."—Pacific Unitarian.

"A weighty testimony to a notable religious movement from the religion of the letter to the religion of the spirit. . . . His attitude not always that of the contemplative philosopher; . . . his pulse throbs strongly, and quickens that of the reader. There are some passages that belong to the anthology of prophetic literature."—CHAS. G. AMES, in the New World.

"We can here trace the growth of the New Unitarian gospel, see something of the great moulding influences that have shaped and changed it, note the dangers it has encountered, thrill with the warm light of its newly discovered hope, feel ourselves taken into comradeship with its noble army of workers and saints. . . . Decidedly marking a clearer point of vision in the development of Unitarian thought."—The Unitarian.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Important Works.

Phillips Brooks in Boston. Five Years' Editorial Estimates. By M. C. AYRES, Editor of the Boston Daily Advertiser. With an Introduction by Rev. W. J. TUCKER, D.D., President of Dartmouth College. 120 pages. Cloth, 50 cents.

"One of the most valuable of monographs upon the late Bishop Phillips Brooks. No editorial pen in Boston has done such discriminating and appreciative work along religious, ethical, and literary lines as that of Mr. Ayres in the Advertiser. The publisher has done well to gather these five years' estimates."—Journal of Education.

Members of One Body. Six Sermons by Rev. S. M. CROTHERS. 132 pages. Cloth, 75 cents; paper, 50 cents.

CONTENTS: I. Roman Catholicism; II. Calvinism; III. Methodism; IV. Rationalism; V. Mysticism; VI. The Unity of Christendom.

In the whole list of Liberal Religious books, past and present, it would be hard to find any series of utterances freer with the true freedom—more ingenious, more appreciative, more prophetic of the unity that is to be, more religiously "satisfying"—than Mr. Crothers gives us in these six discourses. The outline alone, which each chapter contains, of the stronger, more helpful points in the various schemes of religious thought and life discussed, renders the book invaluable.

Afterglow. By FREDERIC A. HINCKLEY. 81 pages. Cloth, 50 cents.

There are few who, reading it, will not be strongly attracted to this little book. It is written out of life,—out of the struggling, perplexing, troubled, hopeful, aspiring life we all know and dread and delight in. And grow in it. And this is how the book is to help us.

CONTENTS: I. Voices out of the Silence; II. They had all Things Common; III. Spiritual Awakening; IV. "The Star! The Star!"

"Afterglow," like Gannett's "Wrestling and Blessing," is a book which one would like to keep in stock, to be given to the stricken, the troubled, the perplexed, the struggling, and the discouraged."—Christian Register.

Gems of the Orient. Selections from Eastern Wit and Wisdom. By Rev. C. D. B. MILLS. 238 pages. Cloth, full gilt, $1.50.

"The choicest gems of thought and expression from the literatures of the ages; the really fresh and living utterances of truth and the law of excellence, scattered along the different centuries of human history." "Full of invigorating and uplifting power."

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

The Home.

A BRICK BLOCK.

Eight small brick houses standing side by side;
Eight flights of steps, narrow and long and steep;
Different dimensions: all nineteen feet wide;
Some forty-two, some forty-three feet deep:
Each with a curved bow-window and a dome;
So much alike that children in their doubt Must count, poor things, to know which house is home!

Commonplace people walking in and out,—
A curious thing to write a poem about!

And yet inside are men as wise as we,
And happy, though with little cause for mirth:
To each his nineteen feet by forty-three
Seems the important corner of the earth.
Each has his secret tears, his open jest:
Each has his pride in the brick cell he calls
His home, and somehow knows it from the rest.
Those narrow rooms are his ancestral halls,
His little universe within four walls.

These men give plays, lifelike beyond belief,
Whose actors really live and really die,
So full of nonsense and so full of grief
One scarcely knows whether to laugh or cry.
Here some Antonio mourns his unpaid debt;
There a real Shylock counts his darling hoards;
Here a real Romeo sighs for Juliet.
Think what great sights this little block affords:
Eight first-class Shakspeare's plays are on the boards!

The lover cannot see. His dancing eyes
Detect no fault, no ugliness, no sin:
His sweetheart's house seems fair as Paradise
Because he knows his sweetheart is within.
I, too, am growing blind. I cannot see
The ugly house-front or the narrow stair:
Those unknown friends are very dear to me;
And, as I gaze across the dingy square,
Eight homes of those I love are standing there.
—Robert Beverly Hale, in Youth's Companion.

For the Christian Register.

THE LITTLE WANDERER.

Mamma stood at the gate, waving her hands for a good-by to her two little girls as they trotted off down the hill to the kindergarten. Little brother Thorie was winding himself up in her big kitchen apron, nearly upsetting her when he reached his last and tightest twist. He wanted to go with his sisters, but he was too young for so long a walk. He was but two years old; and the town was not so near as it seemed, looking down from the top of the hill.

Mamma stopped a moment, before shutting the gate, to admire the beauty of the scene before her eyes. There lay the lovely San Diego Bay, with a long purple hill beyond, and the light-house showing dimly through the haze. And nearer at hand was a brushy hillside sloping down to a flat, where stood a dozen or more Indian huts. These huts were not very pretty. They looked best when you saw them from a distance. They were made of old quilts, old bits of matting, old grain bags, and such things, which the Indians had begged from the townspeople. These articles were spread over a framework of sticks, so as to shed the rain. But I am afraid the huts were pretty leaky, after all.

Mamma was going to be very busy that day. So she gave Thorie the towel, and told him he might dig a well under the big fig-tree in the back yard. He thought that was fine fun for a little while.

By and by mamma thought, "Why, how still Thorie is!" So she went to see how he was getting on with his well.

There was no Thorie there. Neither was he in the front yard, nor at the carriage-house, nor with his papa in the study. Mamma told papa about it; and both of them began to rush here and there over the yard, calling, "Thorie! Thorie!"

Then they went out at the gate, and separated. Mamma started toward town, while papa went farther up the hill in an opposite direction. And both of them kept calling, "Thorie! Thorie!" A great lump seemed to come into mamma's throat when no Thorie answered. She searched the path for his little tracks, but the ground was too hard for footprints. She ran hither and thither across the hillside, scanning the bushes in hopes to find him wandering among them.

Finally, she heard a shout in the direction of the Indian camp, and then saw one of the Indian women start toward her, beckoning and waving a corner of her red shawl in a strange manner as if to attract attention. The camp was more than a quarter of a mile away, but mamma could see that a crowd of Indian women and children had gathered about some object in front of the huts.

That object was a very small, bareheaded boy in a dress of navy blue flannel. When his mamma came up, pale and almost breathless, she found Thorie standing in the midst of the crowd, having the best kind of a time.

The Indians were much pleased with their little visitor, and were offering him various trinkets to amuse him. He received their attentions with great satisfaction. Indeed, when his mamma took him by the hand to lead him home, he pulled back with vigor, and said "he wanted to stay at the kintygatten."

MRS. PRATT'S CURRANT JUMBLES.

"Now, Martha Ann, you be sure to behave the best you know how."

"Yes'm."

"And don't act like you hadn't had anything to eat for a week."

"No'm."

"And be sure to come home 'fore dark. Mis' Pratt will tell you what time it is if you can't get to see a clock."

"Yes'm."

Little Martha Ann walked slowly and primly down the wide, gravelled walk leading to the front gate, followed by the watchful eyes of her grandmother.

"You throw yourself back more, Martha Ann. You'll be all round-shouldered if you stoop over like that."

Martha Ann heard the house door close, and she turned around and looked back. One of the front windows of the sitting-room was open, and a little girl of about Martha Ann's own age was looking out. She was Esther Cray, Martha Ann's cousin; and she had been shut up in the house for two weeks with the measles. She was almost well now; but her grandmother didn't think it prudent to let her go out of doors, and so only Martha Ann had been allowed to accept Mrs. Pratt's invitation to tea.

Mrs. Pratt was an old lady who lived at the other end of the village; and once a year she invited half a dozen little girls to tea, following a custom which her mother had begun many years before. Old Mrs. Hobbs was dead now, but her daughter remembered to do the things she had liked.

"I do wish you could go, Essie," said Martha Ann, wistfully.

"Yes, I wish so, too," replied Esther.

"But you can tell me all about it. And, if she has lemon jelly as she had last year, you can put some in your pocket for me." And Esther laughed.

Martha Ann laughed, too, then turned around toward the gate again, and went out into the wide, shady road. She walked along on the grass, so as not to get her shoes dusty; and she held up her pink gingham skirt with one hand. She was conscious that she looked well. She had on the white lawn apron which her grandmother had given her at Christmas. This was the first time she had worn it, and it was now June. It had been kept locked up in the cedar chest in the upper hall. Grandmother Cray had taken it out of the drawer in the old-fashioned bureau which was in the room occupied by the two little girls, and put it away. She thought Martha Ann looked at it too often, and that it might become soiled before a time came to wear it. It had been in the cedar chest four months, and Martha Ann was delighted to have it in her possession once more.

Mrs. Pratt's house stood back from the street, and the front yard was full of roses. Little Martha Ann stopped a moment to smell a pink one which bloomed on a big bush near the box-bordered walk.

"That's a beauty, isn't it?" said Mrs. Pratt, appearing on the front porch, a big white apron covering the entire front of her black dress. "Come in, Martha Ann. All the rest are here."

There were four little girls sitting on the long haircloth sofa in the hall. They all wore fresh gingham dresses and stiffly starched white aprons; but Martha Ann's apron was the only one which had embroidered straps over the shoulders. She noticed this at once.

"Why didn't Esther come?" asked Mrs. Pratt; and Martha Ann explained, adding that Esther had been "very sorry."

"Yes, I guess it was a disappointment," said Mrs. Pratt. "But things will happen that way sometimes. Now all you children talk to each other while I see if supper is ready."

The four little girls made room for Martha Ann on the sofa; and she sat down, taking care not to rumple her dress. They all knew each other very well; but they felt rather stiff and formal on this occasion, and they were all glad when Mrs. Pratt came back and called them into the dining-room.

On the table was a large platter of cold chicken, flanked on one side by a plate of hot biscuit and on the other by a dish of stewed potatoes. There were several kinds of preserves, custard-pie, a glass dish of apple jelly, and a white china basket of currant jumbles. Mrs. Pratt prided herself on her currant jumbles. She always made them whenever she had company.

The basket stood on a corner of the table close to Martha Ann's right hand. It was full up to the handle.

"Now, children, eat all you want to," said Mrs. Pratt. "I do love to see you get enough."

Martha Ann liked the currant jumbles better than anything else on the table. She knew she never could make Esther understand how nice they tasted.

After supper the little girls went out in the front yard. All except Martha Ann played "Puss in the Corner" among the trees and rose-bushes. Martha Ann sat in a low rocker on the front porch, and looked on; but she did not seem to be enjoying it. She sat very still, and did not smile once. She asked the time as soon as Mrs. Pratt came out on the porch after washing and putting away the tea dishes, and, when she learned it was seven o'clock, said she thought she had better go, as her grandmother had told her to come home early.

"Very well," said Mrs. Pratt; "and I will put some of those currant jumbles up for you to take to Esther. You tell her to think of me when she eats 'em, and next time I invite her to tea she mustn't have the measles."

Martha Ann smiled faintly, and said, "Thank you, ma'am" in a very low voice, and with her soft blue eyes cast down, when she took the paper bag containing the jumbles.

She walked to the gate without looking around at all. When her hand was on the latch, she remembered that she had not told Mrs. Pratt that she had had a pleasant time. But she didn't go back. After hesitating a moment, she unlatched the gate and went out into the road. She walked with her head bent, forgetting all about what her grandmother had said about throwing her shoulders back.

About a quarter of a mile down the road she came to a big stone which lay close to the fence. She sat down on it, the bag of jumbles in her lap. Her face was very sober; and after a few minutes she began to cry softly, wiping away her tears with the skirt of her apron. Presently she put her hand in her pocket, and drew out her handkerchief, folded neatly, just as she had taken it from her bureau drawer. Then slowly, one by one, she brought out four currant jumbles! She cried harder than ever as she looked at them.

While at the table she had slipped them into her pocket when she thought no one was looking, and they had laid a heavy burden on her tender little conscience ever since. She knew she ought to go back and tell Mrs. Pratt what she had done, but it seemed as if it would break her heart to do it.

"I can't! I can't!" she sobbed, her little face all puckered up with weeping.

But she did.

Mrs. Pratt was rocking on the porch and knitting on a blue yarn stocking when little Martha Ann came humbly in at the gate again. All the little girls who had been playing "Puss in the Corner" had gone home.

"Well! What on earth brought you back, Martha Ann?" asked Mrs. Pratt. "Did you leave anything?"

Martha Ann burst out crying. She took the four currant jumbles from her pocket, and held them out to Mrs. Pratt.

"I took 'em," she sobbed. "I took 'em when you wasn't lookin' at me. I was goin' to take 'em home to Essie."

Martha Ann's eyes were so full of tears that she couldn't see the expression of Mrs. Pratt's face, but she felt the currant jumbles taken from her hand.

"Shall—shall I give—you—these—in the bag—too?" she sobbed.

"No: you keep 'em. Take 'em to Essie, like I told you. I ain't mad at you, Martha Ann. I felt pretty sure you'd come back. I was just sittin' out here to see. I saw you take those jumbles; but of course I couldn't say a word. An' I knew why you was sittin' out here so solemn after supper, an' didn't want to play. But I guess you're all right now. You needn't cry any more. Come in and let me wash your face: it's all smouched up."

It was almost dark when Martha Ann reached home, and her grandmother scolded her. So she had to tell why she stayed so late. She cried again when she saw how the story shocked her grandmother.

"It does beat all how children will act!" said the old lady. "I'm mortified 'most to death, Martha Ann. But you did right to go back and tell, though I don't guess Mrs. Pratt will ever ask you to her house again."

But she did. When Esther was able to go out, another invitation came for both little girls. And this time, when Martha Ann left Mrs. Pratt's house after tea, there was nothing in her pocket except her handkerchief.—Florence H. Hoyt, in the Independent.

HOW DAISY HELPED.

"Ah! there's lots of trouble in the world!" the cook said, as the grocer's boy passed out of the door.

Daisy, resting in the wide, cool porch, turned her blue eyes toward the speaker. "Who has lots of trouble, cook?" she asked.

"Lots of people," said the cook, shortly.

Daisy pondered awhile, her chin resting on her plump little hand. Then she said suddenly, "Do you, cook?"

"I should think so! There's that boy didn't bring half the things I ordered. He says the children are all sick and the grocer's worried, so he forgets things. And he can't come back till he's delivered what he's got with him; and Kathie is in the garden gathering peas, and I can't leave these cakes even to call her."

"I'll go," Daisy said, jumping up and tying her white sunbonnet. "I can clear off that much of the trouble."

PILLSBURY'S BEST IS TODAY, AS FOR TWENTY-FIVE YEARS PAST, THE STANDARD FLOUR OF THE WORLD.

PILLSBURY'S BEST IS ALWAYS THE BEST FLOUR THAT MONEY CAN BUY.

PILLSBURY'S BEST IS ALWAYS THE BEST FLOUR THAT MONEY CAN BUY.

PILLSBURY'S BEST IS ALWAYS THE BEST FLOUR THAT MONEY CAN BUY.

PILLSBURY'S

BEST

Makes

FAULTLESS Bread;

sweet as the wheat; light and fine and white; honest bread that may be honestly called the staff of life. No bread-maker, no bread-lover, will take any other kind after one trial of PILLSBURY'S BEST.

NOW, while the price is low, is your time to buy it.

PILLSBURY'S BEST IS TODAY, AS FOR TWENTY-FIVE YEARS PAST, THE STANDARD FLOUR OF THE WORLD.

PILLSBURY'S BEST IS ALWAYS THE BEST FLOUR THAT MONEY CAN BUY.

PILLSBURY'S BEST IS ALWAYS THE BEST FLOUR THAT MONEY CAN BUY.

PILLSBURY'S BEST IS ALWAYS THE BEST FLOUR THAT MONEY CAN BUY.

As she ran across the lawn, a group of children—summer boarders like herself—called to her to join them. But she shook her head gayly, and hurried down between the long rows of pea-vines.

"To go to the grocer's, is it?" said Kathie, despairingly. "And how'll I ever get peas enough for dinner then?"

"I'll pick till you come back," said Daisy, encouragingly. "Make haste, Kathie."

The nimble little fingers pulled the plump, green pods swiftly; and, when Kathie returned, hot and breathless, the big basket was nearly full. Then Daisy sat in the porch again, and helped to shell them while she rested.

"I don't see how we'd have got along without you," the cook said, looking quite pleasant, as Daisy threw down the last shell.

Daisy laughed. "It's nice,—helping people," she said. "I'm going to find some more trouble to clear off."

She ran down the steps, and paused, glancing at an open window above. A low, wailing cry sounded within, and a sweet, faint voice singing a cradle song.

"I'll help Mrs. Verne take care of the baby," she thought; and she ran toward the hall door. A playful breeze followed her; and, just as she crossed the threshold, a lot of closely written sheets of paper fluttered to her feet.

"Oh, dear!" some one said. And Daisy looked up to see a gray-haired man at a desk near the door. He looked very pale and tired, and one of his feet was bandaged and resting on a cushion.

Daisy said nothing until she had secured all the fluttering sheets, and placed them on the desk. Then she took a large shell from the hall table. "Will this do for a paper-weight?" she asked timidly.

"Very nicely, my dear," said the gentleman. "It was so still this morning that I forgot to ask for one, and I have sprained my ankle so badly that I can't move without assistance. Thank you, my dear. I shall have no trouble now."

Daisy ran upstairs with a happy song on her lips. The young mother's pale, sad face brightened when she saw her.

"O Daisy, dear, you are like the sunshine!" she said. "Baby has been ill all night, and I am worn out for want of sleep. Would you sit by his crib for a minute or two, while I bathe my head?"

"And then we'll take him out of doors," said Daisy, eagerly. "Under the big trees it is lovely and cool. And I'll hold him while you rest in the hammock."

Ten minutes later Daisy sat rocking slowly under the trees, while the baby slept quietly in her lap. The tired mother in the hammock close by had forgotten her troubles, and was sleeping the deep, dreamless sleep of exhaustion.

The voices of the gay pleasure-seekers on the lawn grew querulous and ill-natured as the heat of the day increased; but Daisy was very happy, as she sang softly in the shade.

"O Daisy, I never can thank you enough," Mrs. Verne said, when she awoke, rested and refreshed. "How much better baby looks! And I feel so much better able to take care of him. I have been so worried!" she added confidentially.

"You see it costs so much for us to stay here; and I was afraid the money was all thrown away. Baby was no better, and I was growing sick, too."

"There's the dinner-bell!" said Daisy.

"Let me take care of baby while you are eating."

"No, dear, thank you," the young mother said, coloring a little. "I'd have to dress first, and I'd rather not go now."

Daisy was an observant little girl, and she had noticed how Mrs. Verne in her worn dress shrank from observation. She did not press the point, but ran off to the kitchen.

"There's lots of trouble in the world," she said demurely, as the cook looked up and smiled.

"Who's in trouble now?" asked the cook, laughing.

"Mrs. Verne's baby's sick, and she doesn't want to go to the dining-room. But I just know she could eat a nice lunch under the trees." For answer the cook loaded a tray with roast lamb and green peas and raspberry tarts, and gave to Daisy. What a delightful "picnic" dinner they had under the trees! Daisy's mamma was away for the day, and no one came to look for the little girl. So she and Mrs. Verne ate at their leisure, and then the young mother lay down in the hammock with her baby on her arm. Daisy waited until they both slept again; and then she ran back with the tray, and told the cook how much Mrs. Verne had enjoyed her dinner.

A little boy came to the door, crying because one of his marbles had rolled under the porch. Daisy found it, and played games with him until his nurse came for him. Then she went to the hall door to watch for mamma.

The children were coming in from the lawn, tired and fretful. The gentleman who had been writing had finished his work, and was lying on the lounge. He smiled when he saw Daisy's bright face.

"You don't look tired," he said. "What have you been doing all day?"

"Helping people," said Daisy. "Clearing away trouble."

The gentleman laughed. "I should think that was pretty hard work," he said.

"But it isn't," said Daisy, earnestly: "it's lovely,—ever so much nicer than play. Ah, there's mamma! I must carry her parcels upstairs!" And the little helper ran away.—Alice J. Leland, in the Weekly Welcome.

FREEDOM.

The captive bird must pine and die,
Or beat its bars with fruitless rage;
It cannot cleave the azure sky,
Its life is bounded by its cage.

And such a thing, O God, am I,
When held by passion, sin, or wrong;
I know no free, encircling sky,
Nor can I raise triumphal song.

Yet freedom is within my reach,
The bonds that bind will always yield,
If no ill deed or thought or speech
Their soul-enslaving power wield.

The bars self-forged that keep me in
Will melt before a purer will;
And fullest freedom I shall win
When love and truth my being fill.

—Charles A. Muddock, in the Pacific Unitarian.

THE EGG GATHERER.

Miss Eliza S. Quincy, the daughter of the venerable president of Harvard College, in the reminiscences written solely for the use of her own family, tells an anecdote of the Revolutionary War which had never before, we believe, been published.

Col. Tallmadge commanded a detachment of dragoons in 1777, and was stationed half-way between Philadelphia, Lord Howe's winter quarters, and Valley Forge, where Washington with his ragged, half-starved army was encamped.

He received orders one day to go to a little tavern just outside of the British lines, where a young girl who had been in the enemy's camp would meet him and give him valuable papers.

Col. Tallmadge, with a few men, rode to the tavern. He alighted, and, going up on to the porch, was met by a smiling, pretty little country girl of fifteen, in a sunbonnet, carrying a basket of eggs, which she offered to him for sale. He saw the papers beneath the eggs, and, pretending to joke and chaffer with her, managed to secure them unseen. At that moment one of his men dashed into the house, shouting:—

"The British! The British!"

Tallmadge ran out to see a large body of light-horse of the enemy coming at full speed. He leaped upon his horse, calling to his men to fly, when the poor little spy fell upon her knees, crying:—

"They will kill me! They know I did it! Don't leave me!"

"They will kill me if I stay here," cried Tallmadge. But he held his horse motionless a moment. "Can you ride?" he said.

"Yes: an ox,—anything, to get away," she replied.

"Jump up behind me, then. Hold by my sword-belt."

She scrambled up, and he put spurs to his horse and followed his men. The British gained on them, and fired volley after volley, which Tallmadge and his troop would return, wheeling and firing, and then resuming their flight. The bullets whizzed around the little egg-gatherer, who clung closer to the sword-belt, gasping out:—

"Don't mind me! Fire again!"

She escaped unhurt. Tallmadge rode with her that day to Germantown, and left her in her own home. She afterward married; but her name is not found on the list of the heroines of the Revolution, where it surely should have had a place.—Youth's Companion.

CURIOSITIES IN WORDS.

Some words have had curious experiences; and not a few, it is sad to say, have fallen into disgrace. Thus the word "dunce" was at first a proper name, like John or George.

We can understand how the names of persons came to be applied to things, because we do the same thing ourselves, as when we call a Derringer pistol a "derringer" or when we speak of riding in the "Pullman." In this way the "sandwich" is said to have got its name because it was a favorite dish with the Earl of Sandwich, and the "guillotine" because the use of such an instrument was first proposed by Dr. Guillotin. The name of a person is also given very often to a class of other persons. If we see a very queerly dressed person, we are tempted to call him a "guy." Children in England understand how the name "Guy" has come to be used in this way. On every "Guy Fawkes's Day"—November 5—they have great fun with an effigy of Guy, which is not at all flattering to the bad hero of the "Gunpowder Plot." The name "dunce" takes us back to another epoch in history. In the revival of learning following the darkness of the Middle Ages the reformers had little patience with those who still clung to the old ideas, and especially little with their leader, Duns (or Dunce) Scotus. He was a man of great learning; but his name was so often spoken with contempt that it became a by-word, and any one who was slow and stupid was called a "Duns man" or a "dunce."

A still less complimentary term, "idiot," is taken with little change from a Greek word, which meant a private person, one who took no part in public duties. The Greeks believed that service in public life was a necessary part of true education, that without such interests no one could be well informed. So the use of this word was extended to all in whom the mental powers were untrained, and finally to those in whom they were wanting. Now, the original meaning has fallen out of use, and is wholly forgotten. If you were to call a friend an idiot, he would hardly feel satisfied to be told that you were merely speaking of him as a private citizen.—Zion's Herald.

A PARROT AT BREAKFAST.

A funny parrot lives in Brooklyn, and is very fond of the lady she lives with. When the breakfast bell rings in the morning, she will push open the door of her cage with her bill, fly down to the breakfast table, take her own chair, which she always knows and occupies at each meal, and wait until the family assemble. If they should not gather as quickly as she thinks they ought, she will call out, "Hurry up, folks, hurry up," and at the same time hop over to the oatmeal dish, and attempt to lift the cover; for she is very fond of oatmeal, and will make her entire breakfast of it. She would not touch the oatmeal, even if able to lift the cover; for she is a very good Polly. After finishing her breakfast, she flies right back to her cage.—Exchange.

NONE SUCH

NONE SUCH MINCE MEAT is particularly valuable in the summer because it is always fresh and sweet.

It is unexcelled for the home, the camp, seaside or mountains.

Sold everywhere.

Merrell-Soule Co., Syracuse, N. Y.

Heat

★ Prostration

causes every organ in the body to temporarily suspend operations. Unless they are made to resume their natural functions, death ensues.

Bovinine

is invaluable in such cases. A few drops introduced into the system promotes vitality, without an increase of heat, such as follows the use of stimulants.

A. P. BUSH, 149 Pearl St.

Education.

The oldest high-class educational magazine in the country ($3 per year) is read by thoughtful people of all classes, as well as educators. It ought to be in every library and reading-room in the land. Is it in yours? From a new subscriber we will accept $2 for the first year. Send 12 cents (in stamps) for a sample copy.

Nova Scotia Tours. The associate editor of Education offers again this year several delightful personally conducted tours to Evangeline's land. Select companies of cultured people. No heat, romantic scenery. An ideal vacation. First party, June 25. Shad, salmon, and strawberries in their prime. Expenses low. Write for particulars.

KASSON & PALMER,
50 Bromfield Street, Boston, Mass.

NEWTON CENTRE, MASS.
SCHOOL FOR THE CORRECTION OF ALL SPEECH DEFECTS. For circular address
E. J. E. THORPE, Principal.

MISS KIMBALL'S SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,
Worcester, Mass.
Thorough preparation for College. Intermediate, Academic, and Special Courses. Send for Illustrated Circular.

MAGNOLIA TERRACE Springfield, Mass.
Home and Day School for Girls. JOHN McDUFFIE, Ph.D.

Miss Gibbons' School for Girls.
Preparation for all colleges. 55 West 47th St., N.Y. Mrs. SARAH H. EMERSON, Principal. October 2. A few boarding pupils taken.

HOME SCHOOL FOR BOYS
in the family of Rev. Eugene De Normandie, Danvers, Mass. Address
HENRY N. DE NORMANDIE.

PROCTOR ACADEMY, Andover, N.H.
Coeducational. Prepares for College and Scientific Schools. For information address
JAMES F. MORTON, A.M., Principal.

THE MORGAN SCHOOL, PORTSMOUTH, N.H. This Home and Day School for Girls will reopen September 25 for its second year under the new management. College, Preparatory, and Finishing Courses. Address for circular Miss GEORGINA S. WOODBURY, Principal.

Mr. Knapp's Home School for Boys,
PLYMOUTH, MASS.

Powder Point School (DUXBURY, MASS.)
These schools have always had the same interests, and will now be united at Duxbury, the Plymouth school closing with the present term.

PROSPECT HILL SCHOOL
FOR YOUNG LADIES, GREENFIELD, MASS.
Twenty-fifth Year. Reference, Rev. E. E. Hale, D.D.
REV. JAMES C. PARSONS, Principal.

West Newton English and Classical School.
ALLEN BROTHERS.
Family School. Both Sexes. Unsectarian. Prepares for College, Scientific Schools, Business, and for a useful life. Forty-third year begins Wednesday, September 18. Catalogue of
ALLEN BROTHERS, WEST NEWTON, MASS.

Mr. HALE'S SCHOOL 86 BEACON ST., BOSTON.
The 13th year will begin September 25. Preparation for Harvard College and the Institute of Technology. Full Classical and Scientific Courses. Primary department for young boys nine or ten years of age. Fine situation, directly opposite the Public Garden. Large, sunny, high-studded rooms, open fireplaces, gymnasium, extensive laboratories, covered fire-escape, lunch-room. Teachers: ALBERT HALE (Harv.), E. D. MARSH (Harv.), E. K. STEVENS (Harv.), C. S. STREET, Amherst. Address
ALBERT HALE.

THE HIGHLAND MILITARY ACADEMY.
WORCESTER, MASS., begins 40th year September 11. Classical, Scientific, Business, Preparatory Departments. Gymnasium. Athletics encouraged. Careful training. Home influences.
JOSEPH ALDEN SHAW, A.M., Head Master.
Boston, 10 Ashburton Place.

BOSTON UNIVERSITY Law School.
Fall term opens Wednesday, October 2. For circulars address
EDMUND H. BENNETT, Dean.

TWO OR THREE CHILDREN
given home and personal instruction in a private family in the suburbs; modern methods; large house and grounds; permanent or summer arrangement. Address
M. R. W., Christian Register.

VACATION FOR BOYS.—Mr. and Mrs. John McDuffie receive at seashore home four boys between twelve and fifteen, July and August. Lessons in school studies, also in rowing, sailing, etc., if desired. JOHN McDUFFIE (Harv.), MAGNOLIA TERRACE SCHOOL, SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

"HE THAT WORKS EASILY, WORKS SUCCESSFULLY." CLEAN HOUSE WITH

SAPOLIO

For the Christian Register.

MEMORIAL.

ABBIE M. GANNETT.

BY SARAH E. BURTON.

My heart holds solemn festival
Beside the summer sea,
Where wind and wave, accordant, chant
Their rhythmic threnody.

A presence like the breath of flowers,
A stir, almost a sigh,
Attends, and thrills, and doth persuade
That thou art really by.

How else could all this beauty live
In earth and sky and sea
If thou, most beautiful, were not Eternally to be?

Thou of the ever-searching mind,
The serious violet eyes
That God's great universe didst scan
With grateful, glad surprise,

Unconscious that its loveliness
Was mirrored from thine own,
Though owning that its grandeur has
Within the soul its throne.

Thou who, accepting all life's cares
In sweet humility, Found, with the poet, "In His will
Is our tranquillity."

O perfect woman! mind and heart
From every taint removed!
A benediction rests on them
Whom thou hast known and loved.

Long years ago on wave-wrought sands
Our blended hearts became
The mystic, ever-living shrine
Of friendship's holy flame.

With tears I now renew the bond
Beside the summer sea,
And, rev'rent, join the wind and wave
In loving threnody.

Perry Beach, Me.

Personals.

The expenses of Queen Victoria's household are estimated at £172,000 a year. Nearly every shop in High Street and Castle Street, Windsor, has an account with the queen, who is lavish in her orders, but very particular in their execution.

A topaz seal set in gold, bearing the arms and motto of Viscount Barrington, was recently found on the field of Waterloo. The seal belonged to Ensign Barrington, who was killed at Quatre Bras on the memorable June 16, 1815, nearly eighty years ago.

What is without doubt the greatest scholastic honor yet conferred upon a colored man in America by any institution worthy of the name is the degree of Ph.D., which was bestowed upon Mr. W. E. B. DuBois by Harvard at the late Commencement. Mr. DuBois has already an A.B. and an A.M. from that institution, and has studied two years in the University of Berlin.—Boston Courant.

The American Messenger tells of a lady who, on a school-teacher's salary of a thousand a year, lives on five hundred dollars, and supports a substitute for five hundred dollars in China, from whom she receives weekly letters. A friend has said of her that she practically lives the life of the angels who serve God day and night, for at the antipodes her substitute missionary is working while she sleeps.

Good Americans will be glad to know that Miss Minnie Kellogg, a young American lady, is bringing credit to her country. Galvani's Messenger says of her: "Miss Kellogg has scored another success in Paris, at a concert held in the large Salle des Fêtes du Trocadéro, which holds an audience of six thousand persons. Her voice filled it with ease." Miss Kellogg is the daughter of Mr. Charles E. Kellogg of New York, well known for his admirable work in organized charity.

When the wife of Sir Bartle Frere had to meet him at the railway station, she took with her a servant who had never seen his master. "You must go and look for Sir Bartle," she ordered. "But," answered the nonplussed servant, "how shall I know him?" "Oh," said Lady Frere, "look for a tall gentleman helping somebody." The description was sufficient for the quick-witted man. He went and found Sir Bartle Frere helping an old lady out of a railway carriage, and knew him at once by the description.

The statue to Emma Willard to be erected by her old pupils on the grounds of the seminary that bears her name, in Troy, will be unveiled May 16. Work is to be begun this week on the foundation. The sculptor has represented Mrs. Willard as she was in 1821, when, at the age of thirty-four, she founded the celebrated school. Singularly enough, the attire of the figure in the mode of seventy years ago is not much unlike the present revived styles of woman's dress. The wide sleeves and full skirts are almost exactly similar.

Temperance.

A bill has passed the Alabama House prohibiting the sale of liquor anywhere throughout the State outside of incorporated towns.

An Anti-tobacco League has been organized in the Baltimore Polytechnic Institute, students from all the classes except the Senior enrolling as members.

The conversion of Sir William Vernon Harcourt to temperance views is said to be largely due to the influence of his wife. Lady Harcourt is the daughter of the American historian, John Lothrop Motley.

"The London County Council has given its aid to the temperance cause by discontinuing the use of stimulants in asylums under their control, and forbidding the sale of drinks in the auditorium of places of amusement.

Scholarship has so deteriorated in the schools in Allentown, Pa., on account of cigarette smoking that the school board has taken the matter in hand, and given notice through the newspapers to dealers in tobacco not to sell to boys under sixteen years, or they would be prosecuted.

Of the four thousand criminals who have passed through the Elmira Reformatory, 38.7 per cent. were the children of drunken parents, with the probability of 11.1 per cent. to be added, making 49.8 per cent. of the criminals who had been prisoners there the victims of hereditary alcoholism.

According to a recent return from the Statistical Department of the Custom House in 1893, the consumption of liquor per head in this country stood at almost exactly the same figure as in 1865. Beer was a trifle less, wines and spirits a trifle more. Reduced to terms of alcoholic strength, they would be as nearly as possible identical.

Here and There.

The Duke of Bedford has imported two thousand frogs from America to free the ponds on his estate from destructive insects.

The ancient city of Kyoto, Japan, celebrated on the 30th ult. the anniversary of its erection as the capital of the country eleven hundred years ago.

An English epitaph:—
"Beneath these stones repose the bones
Of Theodosius Grimm.
He took his beer from year to year,
And then the bier took him."

A missionary affirms, "I could walk from Canton to Shanghai, over eight hundred miles, not walking more than twenty miles a day, and could sleep every night in a village or town that has a little Christian community."

From researches on the effect of heat and pressure as applied to a cooling orb, Mr. Clarence King, the well-known American geologist, concludes that the age of the world does not exceed some twenty-four million years.

The first work printed on shorthand writing was by Dr. Timothy Bright of Cambridge, in 1598, who dedicated it to Queen Elizabeth, under the title of "An Act of Short, Swift, and Secret Writing by Character."—American.

Some little time ago a minister was arrested in New York City for killing robins, under the law against killing song-birds. He was recently from the South,—Virginia—and he was surprised to learn that the robin was a song-bird.—Exchange.

At Hampton Court in England is a grapevine which has been bearing grapes for nearly a century. It is estimated that during the vine's existence there at least one hundred and twenty thousand pounds of ripe grapes have been gathered from it.

There was one block in New York City every house upon which was decorated with the stars and stripes on Flag Day last week, and there was another upon which not a single flag was seen. The former was in the Jewish quarter, and the latter was in the most fashionable part of Fifth Avenue.

Women Win

praise when successful housekeepers. One element of that success is

SILVER

ELECTRO-SILICON

PC '24

It imparts a brilliancy to silverware, easily and quickly, that will satisfy the most ambitious housekeeper. Never wearing or scratching.

Trial quantity for the asking. Box post-paid, 15 cents. It's sold everywhere.

THE ELECTRO SILICON CO., 72 John St., New York

BUFFALO LITHIA WATER

Spring No. 2

In the Preparation of Artificial Food for Infants.

Value of this Water in Diseases Incident to Teething.

Hunter McGuire, M. D., LL. D., President and Professor of Clinical Surgery, University College of Medicine, Richmond, Va., says:

"For some time I have been using BUFFALO LITHIA WATER in the preparation of artificial food for infants. Cow's milk is the substitute usually resorted to when the mother is not able to suckle her child and it is impossible to get a wet nurse. One serious objection, along with many others, to cow's milk, is its acidity. Human milk is always alkaline, but cow's milk, except when the animal is fed entirely upon grass, is almost always acid. This is the principal reason why the milk of cows disagrees with many babies, and lime water is often added to this milk to correct the acidity. I believe the long-continued use of lime water is hurtful to digestion, and last summer, when I was feeding two of my own children on cow's milk, and found the nurse adding lime water to prevent colic and intestinal derangement, which the food otherwise produced, I directed her to use No. 2 BUFFALO LITHIA WATER in preparing the food, with immediate and continued good results. The water was added until the milk lost its acidity and was neutral or alkaline."

Dr. John H. Tucker, Henderson, N. C., President of the State Medical Society of North Carolina, referring to Spring No. 1:

"I have observed marked beneficial results from BUFFALO LITHIA WATER in the disorders of Teething Infants. I have sent many patients of this class to the Springs for the use of this water and, without exception, they have returned to me cured or greatly benefited."

This water is for sale by druggists generally, or in cases of one dozen half gallon bottles $5.00 f.o.b. at the Springs. Descriptive pamphlets sent to any address.

Thomas F. Goode, Proprietor, Buffalo Lithia Springs, Va.

The Essential Man.

Register Tract Series.

A Monograph on Personal Immortality in the Light of Reason.

BY

George Crosswell Cressey, Ph.D.

CONTENTS: Preface; I. The Conditions of the Problem; II. The Nature of Man; III. The Persistence of Mind or Soul; IV. The Nature of the Universe; V. Personal Belief; VI. Conditional Immortality; VII. Conclusion.

Price 75 Cents.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher, 141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

The Deeper Meanings.

BY

FREDERIC A. HINCKLEY.

CONTENTS:

The Cost of the Divine Spark; The Poet-vision; Looking at Life through New Eyes; Rejoice, we Conquer!

Price 50 Cents.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher, 141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

MESSAGES OF

Faith, Hope and Love.

Selections for Every Day in the Year from the Writings of

JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE.

PRICE $1.00.

For sale by all Booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher, 141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Scrap of Travel.

BY

MINOT J. SAVAGE.

Under this title Mr. Savage's letters written to the Commonwealth during his last trip abroad have been printed. Although not regularly published, copies in pamphlet form, at 50 cents, may be obtained of

GEO. H. ELLIS, 141 Franklin St., Boston.

Sent post paid on receipt of price by

CHRISTIAN REGISTER ASSOCIATION. 141 Franklin Street, Boston.

Theodore Parker to a Young Man.

This letter from Theodore Parker, to a young man just starting out in life, was first printed in the Christian Register in 1885, and afterwards in leaflet form. It has been some time out of print, and yet, from its straightforward, manly tone in relation to life, duty, wealth, study, religion, is still called for as a very available tract to be handed to boys and youth. It is now entered permanently in the Register Tract Series, and may be had at any time.

Single copy, 2 cts.; per hundred, 50 cts.

Address Christian Register Association, 141 Franklin Street, Boston.

Christian Registers WANTED.

Copies of The Christian Register for Feb. 15 and March 29, 1894, are wanted to complete files. Any one having copies of the paper for above dates which they do not care to preserve will confer a favor by sending them to the office of the Christian Register, 141 Franklin St., Boston.

TO LET. The desirable house, 118 Highland Street, Roxbury; 11,000 feet of land; beautiful location; Norfolk House cars now run near. Two furnished cottages, West Falmouth. S. G. DAVIS, 113 Devonshire Street.

A LIGHT IN THE WINDOW.

Off the coast of one of the Orkney Islands, and right opposite the harbor, stood a lonely rock, against which on stormy nights the boats of returning fishermen often struck and were lost.

Fifty years ago there lived on this island a young girl in a cottage with her father, and they loved each other very tenderly. One stormy night the father was away on the sea in a fisherman's boat; and, though his daughter watched for him in much fear and trouble, he did not come home. Sad to tell, in the morning his dead body was found washed upon the beach. His boat, as he sought the harbor, had struck against the Lonely Rock and gone down.

In her deep sorrow this fisherman's orphan did not think of herself alone. She was scarcely more than a child, humble, poor, and weak; but she said in her heart that, while she lived, no more boats should be lost on the "Lonely Rock," if a light shining through her window would guide them safely into the harbor. And so, after watching by the body of her father, according to the custom of her people, until it was buried, she lay down and slept through the day, but, when night fell, arose and lighted the candle, placed it in the window of her cottage, so that it might be seen by any fisherman coming in from sea and guide him safely into the harbor. She sat by the candle all night, and trimmed it and spun; but, when the day dawned, she went to bed and slept.

As many hanks as she had spun before for her daily bread she spun still, and one over, to buy her nightly candle. And from that time to this, for fifty years, through youth, maturity, and old age, she has turned night into day; and in the snow-storms of winter, through driving mists, deceptive moonlight, and solemn darkness, that northern harbor has never once been without the light of her candle.

How many lives she saved by this candle, and how many meals she won by it for the starving families of the boatmen, it is impossible to say. How many dark nights the fishermen, depending upon it, have gone forth, cannot now be told. There it stood, regular as a lighthouse, steadily as constant care could make it. Always brighter when daylight waned, the fishermen had only to keep it constantly in view, and were safe.

There was but one thing to intercept it, and that was the rock. However far they might have gone out to sea, they had only to bear down for that lighted window, and they were sure of a safe entrance to the harbor.

But what do the boatmen and boatmen's wives think of this? Do they pay the poor woman? No: they are very poor. But, poor or rich, they know better than that. Do they thank her? No. Perhaps they think that thanks of theirs would be inadequate to express their gratitude, or perhaps long years have made the lighted casement so familiar that they look upon it as a matter of course, and forget for the time the patient watcher within.—Jean Ingelow.

Charities and Reforms.

A practical method of cleaning the slums is about to be undertaken in Manchester, England. An overcrowded and unhealthy space of five acres in the centre of the city will be taken, the buildings torn down, and new model workmen's dwellings erected in their stead, with large areas for playgrounds and trees and flowers planted in the open spaces. The town council has appropriated $1,250,000 to this sanitary reform.

Several things have been demonstrated by the Chicago Bureau of Labor and Transportation which carries on the work of sending unemployed individuals and families from congested centres to agricultural districts, that there is a demand in the country for the surplus labor of the city, that a considerable percentage of the unemployed are willing to turn their backs on the allurements of city life and accept work on farms, that the railroad corporations are willing to aid in such transplanting, and that such work can be successfully prosecuted at a small per capita cost.

The Woman's Hospital of Philadelphia has found it needful to erect an additional building, which will add much to its usefulness. This hospital has grown in a comparatively brief period from the treatment of eighty patients in 1862 to the treatment of nearly nine hundred patients in the year past. Incidentally, it has done much to advance the knowledge of women who enter the medical profession as a means of livelihood. The hospital has therefore accomplished the twofold purpose of ministering capably to the needs of the sick and injured of the community and of raising the standard of medical learning and of nursing among women.

Education.

Richard Norton, son of Charles Eliot Norton, has been appointed lecturer on archaeology, and Florence Bascom, Ph.D., reader in geology, at Bryn Mawr College.

Drury College has received from the King of Siam the gift of the new edition of the writings of Buddha, in forty volumes, printed in the Siamese language. Only twelve other sets are to come to this country.

The code which will control the schools of England for the next school year makes some radical changes in the conduct of the schools. The most important is the regulation by which inspectors may substitute surprise visits for the previous formal inspection and examination. Another important provision is that which makes "object lessons and suitable occupations" compulsory class subjects for grades one to three. The extension of the provisional certificate for assistant teachers, and the recognition of cottage-gardening as a specific grant-earning subject, will be welcome in rural schools.

Two reforms are sorely needed in the American public school system,—complete separation of the management of the schools from politics, and a clear and definite recognition of teaching as a profession of very high rank, with provision for permanency, for advancement and increase of salary as a result of work accomplished, and some form of provision for aged or disabled teachers. Teachers in our public schools are altogether too much at the mercy of politicians who have no clearer ideas of education than they have of public duties and interests. They are, as a class, underpaid; their tenure of position is insecure; they lack the stimulus of steady and intelligent promotion. They must be liberated from the control of the politician; and they must be stimulated by generous recognition of their services, both in the matter of pay and of position. It is impossible to attach too much honor to the profession of teaching, to guard it too carefully, or to reward those who practise it nobly with too liberal a hand. We have much to learn in this country, not only regarding methods of teaching, but respecting the development of the teacher.—Outlook.

Science.

Edward Atkinson says that the time will come when the fibre in the cotton-stalk will be utilized, and there are important elements for tanning and dyeing in the root.

A German has invented a chemical torch which ignites when wet. It is to be used on life buoys. When one is thrown to a man overboard at night, he can thus see the light and find the buoy.

The London Times mentions an invention in Germany that looks to the direct production of electric energy from coal. The device is a "gas battery," working with carbonic oxide, air, and chloride of copper. It has been received with some enthusiasm in the country of its inventor, but in England its practical utility is still in question.

A Washington company claims to have an automatic telegraphic transmitter capable of sending two hundred words a minute without an error. The highest speed attained by the press associations in sending news matter from the capitol is thirty-three words a minute; and that, too, only when meteorological conditions are favorable. The owners of the new invention say that by it messages forty words long could be sent from Chicago to New York for ten cents.

Walter Baker & Co. Limited,

The Largest Manufacturers of
PURE, HIGH GRADE
COCOAS and CHOCOLATES

On this Continent, have received
HIGHEST AWARDS
from the great

Industrial and Food
EXPOSITIONS
IN EUROPE AND AMERICA.

Caution: In view of the many imitations of the labels and wrappers on our goods, consumers should make sure that our place of manufacture, namely, Dorchester, Mass. is printed on each package.

SOLD BY GROCERS EVERYWHERE.
WALTER BAKER & CO. LTD. DORCHESTER, MASS.

PAINE FURNITURE CO.,
48 CANAL STREET.

The Great Church LIGHT.
PRINK'S Patent Reflectors give the Most Powerful, the Softest, Cheapest and the Best Light known for Churches, Stores, Show Windows, Parlors, Banks, Offices, Picture Galleries, Theatres, Depots, etc. New and elegant designs. Send size of room. Get circular and estimate. A liberal discount to churches and the trade. C. L. PRINK, 651 Pearl Street, N. Y.

Mozoomdar's
BOOKS.

The Spirit of God. By PROTAP CHUNDER MOZOOMDAR. 323 pages. Cloth, $1.50.

An idea of the work may be gained from the titles of the chapters: The Spirit, The Hindu Doctrine of the Spirit, Doctrine of the Spirit in Christianity, Sense of the Unseen, The Spirit in Nature, The Kinship in Nature, The Spiritual Power of the Senses, The Spirit in Life, The Spirit in the Spirit, The Spirit in Immortal Life, The Spirit in Reason, The Spirit in Love, The Spirit in Conscience, The Spirit in Christ, The Spirit in History, The Spirit in all Religions, Live in the Spirit.

Heart-Beats. A Book of Meditations. By PROTAP CHUNDER MOZOOMDAR. With Portrait and Biographical Sketch of the Author. Cloth, red edges, $1.50; white, full gilt, $2.00.

Its poetic title is suggestive of its contents. It is a collection of brief paragraphs, which are not so much the scintillations of the intellect as poems of the imagination and pulsations of the heart. It is an illustration of the lofty heights to which devotional sentiment may rise, free from all tinge of superstition.—Christian Register.

The Oriental Christ. By PROTAP CHUNDER MOZOOMDAR. New Edition. 193 pages. Cloth, $1.25.

The existence of this book is a phenomenon;—more than a curiosity; and rich as a new, fresh, and very suggestive study of the character and person of Christ.—Christian Union.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Spiritual Life.

A Year of Miracle: A Poem in Four Sermons. By Rev. WM. C. GANNETT. 106 pages. Cloth, limp, red edges, 50 cents. Fine edition, bevelled edges, full gilt, heavy paper, $1.00.

"A dainty little book, full of delicate fragrance. Love of nature is in it, and a longing to interpret that secret of nature's power over the soul which no man has yet understood. There is devotion in it, too, and neither clashes with the other."—Critic.

In Spirit and in Truth. Essays by Younger Ministers of the Unitarian Church. 163 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

CONTENTS: Introduction, by Rev. JAMES DE NORMAN-DIE; The Philosophy of Religion, by Rev. GEORGE CROSWELL CRESSEY; The Revelation of God in Nature, by Rev. L. D. COCHRANE; The Bible as Literature and as Revelation, by Rev. W. W. FENN; The Thought of God in the Bible, by Rev. FRANCIS B. HORN BROOK; The Revelation of God in Man, by Rev. S. M. CROTHERS; The Christ, by Rev. ALBERT WALKLEY; The Use of a Liturgy in Worship, by Rev. JOHN TUNIS.

The Insight of Faith. Brief Selected Paragraphs from the Writings of Rev. HENRY W. FOOTE. 115 pages. Flexible cloth, 50 cents. Morocco, full gilt, $1.50.

"Rarely does one find a little volume so full of helpful and precious words. Devotional in spirit and uplifting in aim."—Christian Inquirer.

Ecce Spiritus. A Statement of the Spiritual Principle of Jesus as the Law of Life. 238 pages. Cloth, $1.25.

"Nothing more remarkable has appeared since 'Ecce Homo.' It is as ingenious and original as that famous book, and far more subtle, inward, and spiritual."—St. Louis Spectator.

Pebbles, Pearls, and Gems of the Orient. Selections from Eastern Wit and Wisdom. By Rev. C. D. B. MILLS. 238 pages. Cloth, full gilt, $1.50.

The Religious Life. By M. J. SAVAGE. 212 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

SMALL TABLES.

There is an old maxim that the goods which please are already half sold; and it is certainly true, for, with no effort whatever on our part to introduce or advertise them, we are having an unprecedented demand for our small tables.

One reason for this is undoubtedly the fact of low cost. We sell all our tables at from 10 to 30 per cent. under the usual market prices.

Another cause is our immense assortment. It is no small advantage in buying a table to have your choice from 235 different patterns.

THE UNITARIAN

The "Unitarian" unites many opinions, many suggestions, many individual methods in one spirit, the spirit of Jesus, love to God and love to man.

CONTENTS FOR JULY.

The Water-lilies. Maud L. Cotton.
"Good News of God." Rev. Douglas Walmsley.
Man a Factor in Evolution. John M. Scott.
Resignation. Herbert H. Yeames.
A Confessional. I. Ursula Tannenforst.
Reasons for spreading Unitarianism. W. G. E.
American Unitarian Association.
The Anniversaries.
In the Pulpit.
The Pansy's Lesson. Clara K. Daly.
What Birthdays teach. J. T. Sunderland.
True Liberty. H. Hayes Robbins.
Types of the Spirit. W. M. Bicknell.
A Hymn. C. A. Rohrabacher.
What would You Do?
One Upward Look Each Day.
Editorial.
DEPARTMENTS:
American Unitarian Association, George Batchelor;
Sunday-schools, Edward A. Horton; National Alliance of Unitarian Women, Emily A. Fifield; Guilds, B. R. Bulkeley; Temperance Work, C. R. Elliot; Literary Notes.
Children's Corner.
NEWS FROM THE FIELD.

. Terms, $1.00 a year. Sample copies free. Will be sent three months on trial for 10 cents.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher, 141 Franklin St., Boston.

Topics of To-day.

Essays and Lectures on Important Themes.

22. EVOLUTION OF THE STATE: The growth of political institutions; family tribe, clan, city; the State's final form. By JOHN A. TAYLOR.
23. EVOLUTION OF LAW: How law begins; statute law and judge-made law; the conversion of customs into law. By PROF. RUFUS SHEDDEN.
24. EVOLUTION OF MEDICAL SCIENCE: Supernatural ideas of disease; the beginnings of medical science; modern sanitary science. By ROBERT G. ECCLES, M.D.
25. EVOLUTION OF ARMS AND ARMOR: The struggle for existence; Nature's methods; individualism and co-operation; final universal peace. By JOHN C. KIMBALL.
26. EVOLUTION OF THE MECHANIC ARTS: Development of the human hand; earliest use of implements and tools; inventions; the laboring classes. By JAMES A. SKILTON.
27. EVOLUTION OF THE WAGES SYSTEM. The definition of wages; economic characteristics of the wages system; wages the outgrowth of slavery; development of the system. By PROF. GEORGE GUNTON.
28. EDUCATION AS A FACTOR IN CIVILIZATION: Early methods in Egypt, Persia, China, Greece, and Rome; early Christian ideas of education; Catholic and Protestant views; the common-school system. By MISS CAROLINE B. LE ROW.

Pamphlets, 34 numbers, 16 to 32 pages each, some of them illustrated.

Ten Cents Each.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Pleasantries.

Patron: "This set of teeth you made me is too big." Dentist: "Yes, sir. Sit down in the chair, and I will enlarge your mouth a little."—Exchange.

A man who was arrested the other day for stealing an umbrella tried to get off by saying he was laying something by for a rainy day.—Exchange.

Uncle George: "How do you like arithmetic?" Little Dick: "Pretty well, so far; but the teacher says next week we are to begin learning how to extract roots. I guess he thinks we're all going to be dentists."—Exchange.

First Lesson in Physiology: Dialogue in a bath-tub between a couple of Detroit youngsters. "Say, Fweddy, is we sewed or pasted together?" "Sewed, of course, Tom. If we was pasted, we'd come apart in the water, just like my scrap-book did."—Exchange.

"Why, Mary," said Mrs. Wilson to her little girl, "you and your visitors are doing nothing but sit about and look miserable. Why don't you play something?" "We are playing." "Playing what?" "We're playing that we are growed-up."—Exchange.

A good baby story is of a neighbor meeting a little one on the street, and saying. "Good-morning, my little dear. I never can tell you and your sister apart. Which of the twins are you?" And the little dear made answer, "I'm the one what's out walkin'."—Exchange.

Walter's mamma was very sick with rheumatism, and he was rubbing her arms, when she said, "Walter, it is too bad that mamma is such a trouble to you." Walter replied cheerfully, "Never mind, mamma, if you are only just alive, we don't care how much you suffer."—Youth's Companion.

A questionable blessing, says the Scottish Guardian, was pronounced on a kind donor of coal the other week in Dublin. An old woman, to whom some bags had been sent, invoked upon the benefactor: "Well, the Lord bless ye, and may ye never want a fire yerself in this world or the next."

It is well always for boys to learn how to spell, as the experience of a little lad in England recently proved. He tried to write a verse to his teacher; and, in using the word "bouny" to describe her face, he wrote, "and, oh, your bony face." The teacher did not like having her face referred to as bony, and the poor little fellow was kept in for an hour after the rest of the boys had gone home.—Harper's.

"Well, Frank," said the teacher, "do you know your lesson to day?" "Yes, ma'am," he answered. "The answer to the first question is 'South,' and the next is 'Africa,' and the next is 'South America,' and the next is 'Peninsula.'" "But, Frank, that isn't the way to learn a lesson. You must skip about. That's the way I shall do in asking questions." Frank's countenance fell. His great discovery was of no use. "But, Miss Gray," he said, "I might not skip round the same way you do!"—Youth's Companion.

The death of Dr. Julius H. Seelye recalls an incident at a meeting of the American Board, when Dr. Mark Hopkins was in the chair. Dr. Seelye preached the opening sermon, at the conclusion of which the customary resolution of thanks was offered. In rising to put the resolution, Dr. Hopkins said, "It is moved that a vote of thanks be tendered to Dr. Julius H. Caesar for his able"—He got no further, for a shout of laughter by the entire assembly showed Dr. Hopkins his mistake. The lapsus was at once corrected; but Dr. Hopkins was himself as much amused as any one at his mistake, and frequently took occasion to refer to it.—Christian Work.

RAMSAY'S REBUFF.

Ramsay's patroness, Susanna, Countess of Eglintoun, to whom he dedicated his "Gentle Shepherd," once sent him a basket of fruit. No poet of the last century could let such a circumstance go unsung. Accordingly, honest Allan composed the following epigram, which he returned in his note of acknowledgment to the countess:—

"Now, Priam's son, ye may be mute;
For I can bauldly brag wi' thee;
Thou to the fairest gave the fruit:
The fairest gave the fruit to me."

Not content with sending this to the person to whom it was addressed, he enclosed a copy to his friend Budgell, who immediately sent him back the following comment upon it:—

"As Juno fair, as Venus kind,
She may have been who gave the fruit;
But, had she had Minerva's mind,
She'd ne'er have sent to such a brute."

Highest of all in Leavening Power.—Latest U. S. Gov't Report

Royal Baking Powder

ABSOLUTELY PURE

THE JACKSON SANATORIUM

DANVILLE, New York

Established in 1858.

A delightful home for health and rest seekers. Personal care of experienced physicians. Main building fire-proof. For illustrated pamphlet address J. ARTHUR JACKSON, Sec., P.O. Box 1873.

BROWN BROTHERS & CO.

50 State Street, Boston.

Travellers' Letters of Credit.

Sterling, French and German Exchange.

Brown, Shipley & Co., London.

NEW ENGLAND MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY.

POST-OFFICE SQUARE, BOSTON, MASS.

ASSETS, Dec. 31, 1894.....$24,252,828.71

LIABILITIES.....22,217,399.94

$2,035,428.77

BENJ. F. STEVENS, President.

ALFRED D. FOSTER, Vice-Pres.

S. F. TRULL, Secretary.

WM. B. TURNER, Asst. Sec'y.

LIFE RATE ENDOWMENT policies are issued at the old life rate premium.—Annual Cash distributions are paid upon all policies.—Every policy has insured thereon the cash surrender and paid-up insurance values to which the insured is entitled by the Massachusetts Statute.—Pamphlets, rates, and values for any age sent on application to the Company's Office.

Ladies Travelling Alone to Boston

WILL FIND THE

HOTEL BELLEVUE

A quiet hotel, with a café of rare excellence. Located on Beacon Hill, near the State House, and convenient to all the large stores and places of amusement. Adjoining American Unitarian Association Building, BEACON STREET, BOSTON.

EUROPEAN PLAN,

J. W. SMITH, Proprietor.

JOSEPH GILLOTT'S STEEL PENS.

GOLD MEDAL, PARIS EXPOSITION, 1889, AND THE CHICAGO EXPOSITION AWARD.

THE MOST PERFECT OF PENS.

Foundry established in 1790 by PAUL REVERE.

BELLS and CHIMES

of Copper and Tin.

BLAKE BELL CO., Boston, Mass.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Printer,

141 FRANKLIN ST. BOSTON.

WITH extensive, light, and commodious rooms, large and fast Presses, embracing all the latest improvements, Type-setting Machines, new and modern material throughout, the Establishment ranks with the best in the City for the execution of Letterpress or Plate Printing.

BOOKS

PAMPHLETS

NEWSPAPERS

MAGAZINES

SERMONS

CATALOGUES

REPORTS

LAW WORK

The Pamphlet Bindery, included in the office, is furnished with every facility for rapid and good work.

A RARE OPPORTUNITY

To Secure a Choice from our Large Stock of

SECOND-HAND BICYCLES

of different leading makes at a MERELY NOMINAL COST.

See the

'95 PATTERNS

LOVELL DIAMOND BICYCLES

For Ladies and Gentlemen

THEY LEAD THE World.

Thousands of them have been sold, and are in daily use. We have yet to hear from a dissatisfied rider.

JOHN P. LOVELL ARMS CO.,

Dealers in Bicycles, Guns, Rifles, Revolvers, Yachting, Cannon, Razors, Cutlery, Carving Sets, Table Knives, Fishing Tackle, Base Ball and Athletic Goods and General Sporting Accessories.

147 Washington Street and 131 Broad Street, Boston.

BICYCLES

SOLD FOR CASH OR EASY TERMS.

A FULL LINE OF

BICYCLE SUNDRIES

At Lowest Prices.

SOLE AGENTS FOR THE Celebrated Williams Typewriter.

CALL AND SEE IT.

Fourth of July Goods in great profusion. Fishermen's Supplies of every conceivable variety. Base Ball and Athletic Goods, Sportsmen's Outfits. Everything pertaining to sport to be found at our stores.

The Christian Register

Liberty, Holiness, Love.

VOLUME LXXIV.

BOSTON, THURSDAY, JULY 25, 1895.

NUMBER 30.

The Christian Register.

TERMS: $3.00 per year. Single copies, 6 cents.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY THE
CHRISTIAN REGISTER ASSOCIATION,
141 Franklin Street, Boston, Mass.

Entered as second-class mail matter.

Contents.

EDITORIAL.	PAGE
Notes; Bible Study,	465
Child Life in Cities; Born Anew; Organization,	466
Christian Comment on Huxley,	467
BREVITIES.	467
PRO AND CON.
A Lecture List; Learn the Lesson; A Visit to Buttinch Chapel,	467
ORIGINAL AND SELECTED.
Human Love for God, by Rev. Henry A. Miles, D.D.; The Christian Union Convention, by Rev. George W. Cooke; The Funeral of Prof. Huxley, by Rev. William H. Lyon,	468
Leo XIII.; Report of the Superintendent of Missions for the South,	469
The Liquor Question in France; Calvin and Servetus; Huxley; Tolstoi; Handel's Ex- pressive Pathos; Military Drill,	470
American Unitarian Association,	471
The Love of Home; An African Fable,	478
Edith Thomas,	479
THE SUNDAY-SCHOOL,	471
RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE,	471
THE PULPIT.
In the Garden a Sepulchre, by Rev. C. S. Locke,	472
SERMON GLEANINGS.
The Friendship of Religions, by Rev. John W. Chadwick,	473
SPIRITUAL LIFE,	473
SPIRIT OF THE PRESS,	473
LITERATURE.
Story of the Life of Jesus for the Young, told from an Ethical Standpoint; Other Book Notices,	474
Miscellaneous; Literary Notes; Books Re- ceived,	475
THE HOME.
The Visitor in Pink Silk; Mrs. Tabby and her Kitten; One Hundred Happy Birds,	476
Dot's Tame Crow; Bunnie Black; The Spar- rows' Guardian; Its Name; Spiders in His- tory; Children's Burdens,	477
POETRY.
In Memoriam: Henry A. Miles, D.D., by Emma E. Brown,	468
Thomas à Kempis,	472
The Weed's Translation, by A. R. MacAlpine,	476
The Little Elves,	477
Blindfold,	478
CHARITIES AND REFORMS,	478
TEMPERANCE,	478
SCIENCE,	478
PERSONALS,	479
EDUCATION,	479
HERE AND THERE,	479
PLEASANTRIES,	480

Editorial.

THE Chautauqua season is now in full progress in various parts of the country. The one at South Framingham began this week. The one thing peculiar about this movement is that the annual meetings do not represent all the work that is done. These annual gatherings are rallying occasions. The work is carried on through the year by groups who pursue courses of study and reading under competent leaders, and are examined as to their proficiency. This examination must be satisfactory before the degrees are confirmed. From this it will be seen how far-reaching the influence is and what wide-spread results are obtained.

THE Young People's Baptist Union have had their red-letter day in Baltimore, and their services have come to an end. There were many features in this gathering in common with that of the Convention of Christian Endeavorers in Boston. There was great earnestness and enthusiasm. The people of Baltimore met them with an open and cordial hospitality; and there was the same open fire of big guns against the saloons and dens of infamy, especially those in cities. The moral sense of society cannot fail of being quickened by such stirring appeals to work for righteousness.

DR. ABBOTT'S address before the graduating class of the North-western University does not please the Methodists. The Zion's Herald thinks it a new thing to have a pronounced liberalist holding Methodist doctrines up to ridicule and treating the most sacred beliefs of the Methodist as absurd and obsolete superstitions. The Methodist Church, it says, will stand reasonable discussions of all disputed points, even to the question of the errancy of the Scriptures; but there are a few things which she regards as settled. The degeneracy of human nature through sin, necessitating regeneration by the Holy Spirit, is not an open question. Neither is redemption through the sacrifice of Jesus Christ. The sufficiency of the Scriptures as a safe and infallible guide in life and duty is something not to be subjected to ridicule.

THE Pan-American Congress now in session at Toronto is well deserving a notice, both for the value and importance of the topics discussed as well as the character of those who composed it. One of the marked speeches was that of Rev. T. J. Conaty, who said that if religion be left out of the schools, it will not be long before it is left out of the house and out of the churches. He claimed that parochial schools such as those under the direction of the Christian Brothers were of a high order. The gathering of representative Catholics like Bishop Ireland and Rabbi Gottheil, the Jew, and well-known Protestants of various denominations, to discuss the leading questions in a broad and able manner, is not now regarded as novel; and yet such a congress could not have met ten years ago. This fact illustrates the great drift which is moving onward toward a wider co-operation in religious as well as in other matters. After the Roman Catholic bishop, the Jewish rabbi, and Protestant ministers come into direct personal contact, they learn to appreciate the good points in each other's character and position, and to be more cordial and just in their judgments of each other. It is on this basis and in this way that a real progress is made toward a deeper religious unity and a wider fellowship.

COMMISSIONER ROOSEVELT meets the charge that intemperance has increased in New York since the enforcement of the excise law by a flat denial, which he backs up from the police reports. In addition, the surgeons of various hospitals report that the number of people brought in with broken heads because of drunken rows has fallen off greatly when the saloons have been closed. The surgeon in the hospital on Howard Street, which has the larger part of the Italian quarter to cover, states that Sunday before last there were only two calls for the ambulances, which is something unprecedented. At Gouverneur Hospital, where the surgeons are usually kept busy Saturday nights and Sundays patching up the wounds of men and women who have been hurt in drunken brawls, the house surgeon reports that Sunday before last, with the exception of a few men who got hurt in the manufacturing stores where work is done on Sunday, not a case was brought in. A similar report was made at the Harlem Hospital, where there has been a sudden stoppage in the Sunday cases coincident with the closing of the saloons; and the superintendent declares that the action of the Police Board in enforcing the Sunday closing law has been a great boon to the people. These reports go to confirm Commissioner Roosevelt's statements as to the diminution of crime resulting from the action of the Police Board.

THE murder of M. Stambuloff has created a profound sensation, not only in the East, but throughout Europe, both for the tragic circumstances connected with the assassination and its influence on the Eastern question. The life and career of the ex-premier are so closely connected with the recent development of Bulgaria that important consequences may be the result. Both by his personal character and wise statesmanship he fought the intrigues of Russia, and with a bold hand held in check the disturbing elements in his own country. He was a man of great force of character, bold and fearless in carrying out his policy, and with an indomitable will. In his administration of affairs he must be placed among the foremost statesmen of his time,—such as Cavour, Crispi, and Bismarck. It was through his efforts that Ferdinand was placed and kept on his throne. But the latter, for some reason, recently changed his attitude toward Russia; and the result was a change of cabinet. A strong nature like Stambuloff, who carried things with a high hand, made bitter enemies, which led to this great crime. It is not yet fully determined whether the murder was prompted by personal feeling or political considerations. The wife of the ex-premier is confident that Ferdinand had something to do with it. At the time of writing this question is in doubt. It is no uncommon thing in Bulgaria to assassinate a public man, either from personal hatred or for political ends. This event will doubtless reopen the Eastern question, and awaken a wide-spread feeling of uncertainty as to the future. But one thing is sure,—by the death of Stambuloff Bulgaria has lost one of her best and most loyal friends and Europe one of her foremost statesmen.

REV. R. A. ARMSTRONG, in the Liverpool pulpit, sounds, says the London Inquirer, "A Call to the New Puritanism." After showing how the great nations of the past fell through inbred corruptions of the heart and life, he warns his countrymen that they are threatened by a disease pointing to like destruction. He cites evidence of the laxity and license that have marked some forms of literature and art of late, and thus challenges those who shrink from doing battle with the evil. As the word is equally needful for us, we give the following:—

On these matters we have been bred to a wholesome reticence, and good men and women do not willingly turn thought or speech upon them. But, if all reticence and restraint be thrown away by the ministers of evil, then we, too, if we would save the generation that comes after us, must put aside our reticence, and speak one strong, clear word. When evil arises with impudent front and mouths its blasphemies across the world's stage, then good must open her lips, that the young be not led astray. You must take sides, every one of you. You cannot be neutral. You cannot shrink back into silence, flattering yourselves that your voice of protest is not called for by God. If you sit aside and are silent, you strengthen the sinister forces which are making assault on all that is good in our civilization. You are called to the high courage of a new and wiser Puritanism,—a Puritanism which shall put the ban on no innocent amusement, which shall know that the laughter of little children is music in the ear of God, that young men and maidens require mirth as much as their necessaries food, which yet—nay, all the more—shall set its face as flint against all that can corrupt or defile, and make war to the death against such as would rob our homes of their sweetness and preach a devil's gospel in the ears of the young men and women of our country.

THE New York Times recently printed an article on "Wealthy Negro Citizens of New York," which doubtless will surprise many who can only think of the Negro population as made up of whitewashers, bootblacks, barbers, and porters. The writer of this article assures us that in New York and neighboring cities are men as well intellectually equipped as was Frederick Douglass; that many own brown-stone dwellings in fashionable sections, which they rent to white tenants; that many employ white servants, ride in their own carriages, driven by liveried coachmen. To prove the truth of these general assertions, a list of names is given of those who have acquired wealth from $100,000 to $500,000. They carry on business, and hold responsible positions. Chief Engineer Thomas W. Bohanna is an expert electrician. He was born in Virginia, and came to New York, made himself proficient in electricity, had charge of the first isolated electric plant started by the Edison General Electric Company, and afterward ran the first storage battery put up by President E. H. Johnson. Then mention is made of a Negro woman art teacher, another woman as a physician, who graduated from the Long Island Hospital. Many other like cases are cited. One of these representative men said to a Times reporter: "We are not to be judged by the street loungers and drunkards of our race. It would be just as sensible to judge the white race by its criminal classes. If we can get fair treatment, we will ask no more, but will demonstrate our right to proper recognition. We only want a chance. Give the young black men opportunities to learn a business. The trades are closed to them. The trades-unions are against them. They cannot obtain situations or apprenticeships at the ordinary trades on account of the prejudice against their color. The consequence is that, instead of becoming trained carpenters and mechanics at the age when they are best adapted to learn such trades, they are shut out, and have to take to menial occupations to earn their living. In this way the growth and development of the entire race are retarded. The white race must overcome its prejudice, and give the Negro race more liberal opportunities to fulfil its real mission in the world. That the Negro man will take advantage of such opportunities is proven by the self-evident fact that he does take advantage of all such as are offered to him. Negro men are not spendthrifts, but they are exceedingly thrifty when they have a chance to earn and save money; and, as compared with the white race, the Negro race can show a very fair percentage of wealthy and well-to-do persons."

BIBLE STUDY.

In his address before the great Christian Endeavor Convention, recently held in Boston, Mr. Moody gave some excellent advice with regard to the study of the Bible. If only he had urged the most intelligent study by the best means at present available, his remarks would have been still more to the point. But we fear there can be no doubt that this was not at all in his mind. The kind of study he appears to prefer is one which leaves recent discoveries in Biblical research quite out of notice.

Neither Mr. Moody nor any one else can make too strong a statement of the unique position which the Bible holds in the world's literature. It is, indeed, the Book of books; and they who go to it for the quality of life contained in it can find rewards which the study of no other writings will yield. It was the portion of Mr. Moody's address which implied that the words of the Bible, taken into the heart, would prove the seeds of a new and higher life that we should wish to commend most heartily. Whether or not this book may be properly called the "revealed word of God" is rather a fruitless controversy. For practical purposes, at least, this is no exaggeration. Whatever it may contain, the measure of its power and usefulness among men will be what they can get out of it; and, unquestionably, there is wisdom to be found in its pages as valuable to the world as if it were the direct and immediate utterance of Deity.

But to assume that any unintelligent reading of the Bible, however faithfully persisted in, will bring to light this hidden wisdom of the ages, is taking too much for granted. Perhaps no earnest perusal will go wholly unrewarded. But, surely, it is better to have a bucket at the end of a pole which one lowers into a well, hoping to bring up some refreshing draught; and in this case the bucket must be a discerning, well-taught mind. Mr. Moody confesses that there is much in the Bible which he does not understand. At the same time he permits himself to use expressions which, if they have any application, are probably meant to disparage the labors of those who are doing most at the present time to make these dark places plain.

The great audience listening to Mr. Moody was solemnly warned by him against those who are trying "to pick the word of God to pieces." No names were spoken; but one must suppose that this was aimed at scholars who, like Dr. Briggs, by most careful and conscientious study of these ancient writings have arrived at truths about them in conflict with some traditions and ignorant conjectures. He could not have meant the Ingersoll class of critics, because he spoke of them as "Christian workers." We do not understand that Mr. Moody assumes to be a learned man, and it is not remarkable that he should be poorly informed as to the results of the most advanced Biblical study. But it is remarkable that editors of religious journals throughout the land, who do presumably know how reverent and faithful the labors of these Bible students have been, should not speak out in their defence against mere ignorant prejudice.

One who knows nothing of modern scholarship as applied to sacred writings, but takes it upon himself to speak slightly of those who have given their lives to its advancement, is like a common farm laborer sneering at the great geologist, beside whose store of knowledge his own slender stock of information about the earth which he tills is no more than the first step out of dense barbaric ignorance. We are more than ready to give to Mr. Moody all the honor that belongs to him as an honest and earnest evangelist; but it is simply ridiculous for him to sit in judgment upon what has now grown to be a science of Biblical criticism, having proofs for its assertions which no intelligent mind can ignore. "Picking the Bible to pieces" is not the right way to speak of the labors of men whose only fault is that, having searched the Scriptures longer and deeper than others, they have learned more of what the Bible truly is and of what it contains than is yet known to the majority of Christians. But the spread of this new knowledge throughout the Church is inevitable. It is as certain to displace whatever theories conflict with it as any other discovery is sure to make its way against the errors and half-truths that oppose it. The leaders of popular religious thought would now much better signify their wisdom if, instead of trying to silence these new authorities, they were to try to propose for and ease whatever shock it may cost the believing heart to discover that some of its cherished ideas must be given up and laid aside. It may be said that to the practical, every-day Christian the new facts which Bible study has yielded are not in themselves of great consequence one way or the other. This is probably true. But why, then, are good and true men being tried for heresy simply because, these facts having been brought to their notice, they cannot honestly pretend to believe traditional statements in opposition to them? The truth is that, however little the interests of practical religion may seem to be at stake, the most fundamental questions as to the proper method and attitude of Christian thought are up for settlement. Now, as so many times before our day, it is to be determined how much power an ignorant majority has to restrain investigation and conclusion from going beyond what it is pleased to consider the final limit of knowledge. Now, as heretofore, it has to be settled whether Christianity has ceased to be capable of intellectual and spiritual growth, or is still receptive to the new light out of which such growth must spring. There is really no uncertainty as to the issue of this contest, and they who are trying to bind or bribe scholarship to advocacy of inadequate opinions are making for themselves a record whereat the next generation will look with some amusement and disdain.

CHILD LIFE IN CITIES.

During the torrid week in early June those who could not flee from the fiery furnace of the metropolis saw heart-rending sights as they took their way through the crowded poor quarters of the city, where pale, languid little ones, too listless to play or even to move, sat gasping for breath in doorways and on the stone curbing neighboring the malodorous gutter. At night every roof and fire-escape in the tenement district was crowded with fainting, perspiring human beings; and in various instances sleeping children rolled from these giddy, unprotected heights, and were dashed to death or hopelessly maimed.

Distracted mothers, with stricken babies in their arms, wandered in the treeless streets, seeking a breath of air, or camped in the small parks, of which there are all too few. The babies, with pale, pinched features, livid lips, sunken eyes, too feeble to cry, the little clawlike hands relaxing their limp hold on life, were a sickening sight to see. The older ones, with some physical stamina, were often covered with prickly heat and half poisoned by bad air. All night long bands of tired men and women, with their sleepy, exhausted children, tramped the streets, or lay down upon the pavements when nature refused the power of motion. The suffering endured by tenement children in a single week of weather permanent among the nineties cannot be estimated. Had the heat lasted a few days longer, death's harvest among the cribs and cradles would have been frightful to contemplate.

This unrecorded suffering, this mother anguish, these dumb lives that expire for air to breathe, lay a terrible charge at the door of our civilization,—the charge of criminal neglect and indifference to human suffering. In a city like New York, a vast, solid, compact wedge of living, breathing, struggling humanity, with a great East Side in portions one-half more densely inhabited than any, even the vilest, most crowded cities of Europe, there are such glaring anomalies that public attention cannot too often be drawn to the terrible facts. The waste of child life in great cities is a squandering of human seed-corn. If the slums are to increase, the precious hope of the world's redemption must decrease. If the children must die by the thousand, literally choked and poisoned for lack of air, playgrounds, purifying water, green shade, and sunlight, degeneracy is sure to follow. The future of our cities lies, to a great degree, in the tenements, especially in a city like New York, where the tenement population so vastly overtops all other classes. How to preserve the little ones, to give them a chance for moral and physical development, is not so much a problem of humanity as of sociology. Society rests upon these poor homes. Its roots are in the tenement quarter rather than in Fifth Avenue. And the first demand is for the simplest elements of life,—light, air, room for exercise. These, even more than wholesome food and cleanliness, are called for with an imperative voice. The metropolis has been shamefully slow in awaking to the cry of the children,—the feeble wail of puny infants and little helpless toddlers, the pathetically dumb class that has no language but a cry. Multitudes have been stifled, and have gasped out their little lives who might have been saved, had public pillagers and corrupt officials had a proper degree of conscience, a sympathetic perception of what is needed to save the little ones. It is a murder of the innocents as judicial as Herod's.

We could partially forgive them the plundering of the public treasury, had they given the children parks and playgrounds convenient to their cheerless homes, public baths in sufficient numbers to provide for general cleanliness, and kindergartens where those of tender years could be saved from the dangers and corruptions of the streets. The great school buildings are mainly empty and useless during the heated summer months. A few vacation schools have been opened,—less in all than half a dozen,—whereas every school building in the metropolis should be given up to the children, under proper supervision, for gymnastic exercise and recreation. Although a large class of mothers in the tenements are among the tenderest and most devoted to be found, there are many who through the hardening effect of poverty and evil habits are callous to their children's sufferings. The childish diseases of the tenements are in considerable measure due to their criminal neglect or ignorance. The education of poor mothers needs an organized and systematic effort such as has as yet scarcely been imagined. Sudden natures cannot be awakened, and are hopeless. They have a less tender feeling for their offspring than the cow has for its calf, or the sheep for its lamb. The tenement streets are dotted with children, lame, halt, suffering from sore eyes and various forms of skin disease, that might be cured if taken in time. The district physician, the district nurse, the charitable societies, the fresh air societies do what they can. Still there is a vast sweltering mass, an impenetrable core of child wretchedness and need in our cities, remaining untouched, and which can only be reached by improved sanitation in streets and houses, by more enlightened motherhood, by breathing-places, baths, and places of rest and refreshment near the homes of the poor. The tenement laws recently passed by the legislature at Albany bid fair to do something for the children as well as the adults of the working population; but it requires an awakened and vigorous public sentiment to execute laws effectively, and it must be acknowledged that the rich of our cities who board up their front doors and hermetically seal their city windows as soon as the hot weather comes, and they have made ready to depart, each to his own country paradise, are as blind to the needs of the helpless little ones as are their inhospitable-looking houses. They carry with them no thought of cholera infantum, the black death that stalks through Hester Street and Avenue B, while they are fanned by the sea breeze or soft gales from the mountains.

The city problem is to the greatest extent a child problem. There are large classes that cannot be permanently redeemed: other classes can only rise by a slow evolutionary process. But immediate returns may be expected in health, joy, moral fibre, all that makes humanity of worth, by giving the children in our cities a better chance. The simple gift of a living supply of fresh air would alone save hundreds yearly. Physical degeneracy brings in that demon in the fibre that develops into the tough, the burglar, the criminal, the jail-bird of every description. The numerous victims of a degraded civilization must be heard. Their weak cry goes up to God in the silences; and, unless they are satisfied with the great common blessings, a curse will come upon our people of ever growing shame, of ever more crowded prisons, of larger insane asylums, of more numerous inebriate hospitals, more crowded work-houses, and a frightfully enlarged area of poverty. We must awake to the need of sowing our seed-corn, of basing a worthy future in the bodies and souls of the children who with dumb and suffering lips demand their rights.

BORN ANEW!

"For a single cradle," says mighty Nature, "I would give every one of my graves."

When Nicodemus sought out Jesus of Nazareth to discuss with him the new philosophy, after we know not how much friendly discourse, Jesus suddenly sums up the whole issue in that striking dictum, "You must be born anew!"

It is easy to see how Nicodemus was perplexed. While he was studying the theory and probably trying to ascertain from the new teacher how more clearly to apprehend eternal verities, Jesus united experience and inspiration, vision and practice, and proclaimed an eternal verity!

Nicodemus was still seeking data, but Jesus was already alive with facts!

Simply to be receptive to the ceaselessness of God's streams of activity, as they flow about us, was to Jesus continual new birth. When we open our eyes intelligently, how beautiful the world appears! When we receive a new truth sympathetically, "it confesses us," as Howells says: it makes us own it, we become so much more on its account. And Browning says:

"In man's self arise
August anticipations, symbols, types
Of a dim splendor ever on before
In that eternal circle life pursues;
For men begin to pass their nature's bound,
And find new hopes and joys which fast supplant
Their griefs and cares.

They grow too great
For narrow creeds, which fade
Before the unmeasured thirst for good; and peace
Rises within them ever more and more."

And Paul says: "To be continually transformed by the renewing of the mind is to be able to prove what is good, to understand what is acceptable, according to the purpose and will of God." This continual transformation comes, perhaps, in some living word, in a moving example of patient heroism, in a tale told tremblingly, in a glimpse of another life, in the murmur of a passing soul, in the touch of a friendly hand!

Robert Burns, stamping, roughly booted, over the red soil in the plough-field furrow, sees the commonest of grass-land flowers turned under beneath the ploughshare; but at the sight his soul is born into a new sympathy with all weak and tender things.

Vassilli Andreitch, the rich, bargaining merchant in Tolstoi's "Master and Man," while insisting upon driving through a snow-storm in order to get beforehand in a business transaction, sees his despised manservant, ill-clad, ill-fed, freezing to death; and the rich man's heart is born anew into emotions of human sympathy and brotherly love, so that he even sacrifices his life and saves that of his servant.

There never was a day upon which one could not be born anew; and every day there is fresh birth possible,—birth that never was possible before. Can we be content to remain only what we are already? No: we want new birth, grander thoughts, deeper emotions, clearer sight, sweeter fancies! Every new opportunity encourages us to grow equal to it. As to Napoleon, with all his faults, the indomitable achiever, a new difficulty was only spur to new endeavor. When his marshal, Masséna, was shut up by the victorious Austrian army in Genoa, and with his brave soldiers was starving there, Napoleon was on the other side of the Alps,—those craggy steeps where no wheel had ever rolled; yet his only answer to the engineers, who reported the impossibility of crossing that snowy range of glittering pinnacles, was to cry: "Forward! Forward! There shall be no Alps!" And presently the glittering bayonets shone in rivalry above the untrodden snow.

So there need be no Alps, no impossible pass to bar back any soul from being born anew!

"God's spirit falls on me as dewdrop on the rose,
If I but, like the rose, my heart to him unclose."

ORGANIZATION.

Boston has surely had an object-lesson this month in organization. The Unitarians that were in town have had something to think about. Between fifty and sixty thousand people, from all parts of the United States and the Canadas, and some "from over the water," came down upon the city, singly and in groups of various sizes, from a carriage-load to a train-load, clad in garments grave and gay, but all bearing the colors of the two organizations they represented,—red and white and blue and white,—the former numbering about twelve to the latter's one. It is not likely that any other motive than that of religion would have been strong enough to furnish, not only the numbers, but the enthusiasm that was displayed at these meetings. There were some peculiarities about this gathering that deserve more than a passing notice,—some things that were conspicuous by their absence, and others that were conspicuous because of the fact that they took and more than filled the places of the absent things. For example, the subjects which aroused the most interest, which attracted the most attention, were those which had to do with modern social life,—good citizenship, temperance, moral reform,—in short, the subjects upon which Jesus laid the emphasis of his teachings. The religion which most inspired the meetings was the religion of Jesus rather than the religion of John Calvin, Jonathan Edwards, or Martin Luther. Theological questions, as such, were not much referred to, except by a few of the older ministers, who seemed to be somewhat frightened lest the young people, in their enthusiasm for a religion that would be suitable for present use,—by which I mean the religion of the Sermon on the Mount,—should forget the catechisms and the creeds, and, taking Jesus as their leader, and not the theologians, should somehow smuggle in the kingdom of God before the dogmatic inspectors should have a chance to bring it in through the regular theological custom-houses. On the whole, these meetings furnished a very striking illustration of the large advance that has been made by the masses of the earnest workers in the orthodox churches in the direction in which the Unitarian denomination had already marked out its course by its Saratoga declaration. Is it unreasonable to hope that all the best religious thought and all the earnest efforts of the devout people of this land will finally rally together under this same inspiring declaration?—not because we as Unitarians have made it, but because it is true. This grand movement called "Christian Endeavor" demonstrates that the work of Christianity can be performed without interfering in the least with existing religious organizations. The only remnant of the unchristian spirit that remains in this otherwise noble movement is its unwarranted and unjust exclusion of what it usurps the right to characterize as the "unevangelical denominations." The consequences of this exclusion are not likely to affect in any way the numbers or the success of this movement from a strictly material point of view; but the violation of any principle of right or justice carries with it a penalty, and this is as true of large as of small organizations. The assumption on the part of certain denominations that they have a monopoly of Christianity in the world may stand a few years longer; but the spirit of Jesus the Christ is against such an assumption, and it cannot long stand. The young people of this generation show no disposition to encourage any spirit of dogmatism, and it is evident that the proscriptive spirit manifested by some of the older leaders of organizations like the societies of Christian Endeavor will not be shared by their successors. Perhaps some day the phrase used by President Clarke, "the world for Christ," will be extended a little to read "the world for those having the Christ spirit." When this time comes, personal opinions about theological questions will be classified where they belong,—among the "non-essentials,"—and the armies of religion will move forward to certain victory. Then we shall have perfect liberty, individual and denominational; and each one will be able to do its best work. We shall then have unity in essentials; and in non-essentials, diversity; and in all that healthy freedom which alone can produce the highest spiritual development.

Perhaps it may occur to some of our good Unitarians to ask why we should not have a general organization of our guilds, Unity Clubs, and other young people's societies,—such a one as was suggested in last week's Register by the two presidents of Unity Club Bureau and National Guild Alliance. Could not the Women's Alliance help in such a work? I am sure that every Unitarian interested in the spread of our faith and in the work for which we stand will not only be glad to see such an organization, but will work to bring it about. What says our veteran saint, Dr. Hale, about this matter?

CHRISTIAN COMMENT ON HUXLEY.

No one fact testifies to the immense influence of Prof. Huxley more than the widespread notices from the religious press. The Springfield Republican has a pertinent editorial on this subject:—

"A significant feature," says our contemporary, "of these comments from Christian sources is the recognition of Huxley's enthusiasm for the truth, and his high ethical ideas; and there is here and there an acknowledgment of the service he has done religion itself, in driving into the background and out of acceptance numerous false and imperfect notions of the universe and of the relation of scientific facts to theological dogmas and to religious truth, which stood squarely in the way of the largest usefulness of the Christian Church. That some good has come from his attacks on institutionalism in religion, and upon some of the forms in which the Church had set its doctrines, and that, to some extent, he was right in holding that the sanction of the Church has occasionally been given to unworthy and untrue moral ideals, because those ideals are apparently set forth in the Bible, is also conceded. There can be no question about the debt of the Christian Church to thinkers of the Huxley type in this respect. Huxley demanded that only that which was at least consistent with the highest humanitarianism should be held to by an institution which professed to be the visible kingdom of God on earth; and it is admitted that there is less superstition and bigotry in the Church because of his work.

"Huxley's crowning service, indeed, was as a stimulator and teacher of clear thinking. Every reader of his writings inevitably gets an insight and an impulse that forever after makes it harder for him to confound things that are unlike or hold to things that contradict or disagree with other things known to be true. He has implanted in multitudes of minds, in the Church as well as out of it, the habit of proving all things by comparison with an accepted standard of truth, which may or may not be the accepted one of creed or Bible. The influence of the adoption of this scientific habit by theologians is seen to-day everywhere. It is the basis of the higher criticism and the new scholarship, and will underlie the new theology which is to come out of modern study, thought, and research.

"It may be true that Huxley was a sufferer from the atrophy of his religious instincts, and that he lacked the ability to see those truths which can only be spiritually discerned. It may be, too, that he was bitter and sometimes unjust in his attacks on matters and opinions which he believed to be hindrances to progress and false in themselves. These are all familiar criticisms of Huxley, and can be allowed to stand for what they are worth, be it much or little; but the clear-sighted among the children of the Christian Church realize and acknowledge that this is not all that must stand if justice is to be done to this sturdy champion of the truth as he saw it, an uncompromising foe of humbug and dishonesty as well as of foggy thinking.

"His was essentially a fight for the things for which the Church stands; and, so far as that fight was won, the Church is as great a gainer, if not greater, than the world outside."

Brevities.

Rev. Minot J. Savage will spend a few weeks at New Boar's Head Hotel, Hampton Beach, N. H.

President George L. Cary and Prof. H. H. Barber of Meadville Theological School sailed for Europe on July 24.

Late telegrams report that the Armenian question is likely soon to be settled, the Porte granting most of the reforms demanded by Great Britain, Germany, and Russia. This is a consummation devoutly to be desired.

Hon. Alexander H. Rice, who died within a few days, was one of the best known public men of Massachusetts. He held many important offices, was a graceful speaker, and was highly esteemed for his many private virtues.

Commissioner Roosevelt put on duty last Sunday his whole police force, and it was almost absolutely "a dry day." The selling of beer and liquors was generally stopped. The bars in the big hotels were closed, and the thirsty were driven to the soda-fountains on the streets and in drug-stores. As these were not interfered with, they did a big business.

The colored women come next on the stage. During the last of the month a conference of their clubs will meet at Berkeley Hall, Boston, to discuss the needs of national organization, higher education, industrial training, and the moral, mental, physical, and financial growth of the American colored woman. A special session will be given to a social purity pledge. It is expected that from twenty-five to thirty clubs will be represented.

Rev. A. D. Mayo has been honored with the degree of LL.D. from Berea College, Kentucky. The act was very fitting, as coming from a college which represents more than any institution in the South the whole American system of education, including in its six hundred students a large number from the mountain regions of the South, with a growing attendance from the West and an excellent element of the superior colored youth. The college is coeducational, and contains a vigorous department both for normal and industrial training.

The conferring of this degree on Dr. Mayo is a deserving recognition of his labors in the same direction.

It is said that Tolstoi, dressed like a peasant, in search of a publisher, entered an office; but the publisher, in reply to him, said: "I really cannot be bothered. It is no use for me to examine your sketch. We have hundreds of such things on hand, even though you were in a position to guarantee the cost, which I very much doubt." Upon this Tolstoi made himself known. The publisher, mortified and humbled by his mistake, was profuse with apologies. But Tolstoi could not be moved, and, as he departed out of the door, said, "I must find a publisher who has more time and does not exact a guarantee."

The organization of the United States Religious Association at Ayer, Mass., notice of which will be found in another column, is one of the most promising movements for a larger union which has yet taken place. Both Catholics and Protestants prayed together as they began their proceedings. It was agreed that all could work with one heart in all practical efforts for good government, temperance, and the reforms of social evils. While there was this fraternity of feeling, the fact of theological differences was distinctly kept in view; and it was also affirmed in the speeches that there was a place for Catholicism as well as Protestantism. Father McKenna, who at one time was received with cheers, said that before coming to the meeting he consulted his spiritual adviser, Vicar-General Byrne of Boston, in the absence of the archbishop; and he willingly gave his permission. Thus it will be seen that this movement has the indorsement of high officials of the Roman Catholic Church.

Pro and Con.

A LECTURE LIST.

To the Editor of the Christian Register:—

We wish to state through the columns of the Register that, at a regular meeting of the Ministers' League held last April at 25 Beacon Street, it was voted to prepare a lecture list, the object being to provide our weaker and smaller churches with lectures at a small expense. This list has been made, and contains the names of some thirty ministers, members of the league. It will soon be printed and placed in the American Unitarian Association Rooms, and, most likely, with the Unity Club and Guild headquarters, where it can be found by those wishing it.

LEVERETT R. DANIELS,
For the Committee and League.

LEARN THE LESSON.

To the Editor of the Christian Register:—

Few persons can have read the reports of the mammoth convention which has just been held in Boston, fewer still can have attended any of the more important meetings, without being convinced that the Christian Endeavor Society is exerting a great power for good. It would be easy to criticize many things that were said and done; but, when all due allowance has been made, the claim of one of the leading speakers that the society exists "to translate sentiment into life" seems amply justified. Especially significant were the presentation of a banner to the local society which had done most for the promotion of good citizenship, and the emphasis placed upon the fact that the young man who was killed in Troy while trying to protect the purity of the ballot-box a year or two ago was a member of the Christian Endeavor organization and a martyr to its principles. If the statements made as to the part taken by the society in the recent uprising in New York and Chicago are well founded, it is evident that in its rapid growth lies one of our chief hopes of deliverance from the evils of political indifference and corruption.

One great secret of the society's success seems to be its method of cultivating in each of its members a sense of individual responsibility. It gives them all a definite duty to perform, and insists that that duty shall be faithfully and regularly done. In one way or another it is constantly saying, in the words of President Clark: "Make of your religion the first thing in all your lives. Place it before your business, before your social pleasures, before your school, before your amusements. There is one supreme thing in the world, and that is the service of the Master."

Is not this the word which we all, old and young alike, need to hear uttered more frequently and with greater power? How many lives there are which are simply drifting along in the direction of the least resistance, without any high aim or noble endeavor, without the least sense of loyalty or obligation toward the Power which brought us here and on which we so entirely depend. If, as Mr. Van Ness and Mr. Macdonald suggest in the last Christian Register, we can learn the lesson which this Endeavor movement has for us; if we can desire and adopt some method by which a kindred influence can be more effectively brought to bear upon the lives of our young people; if we can succeed in reaching those among them whom our existing organizations fail to interest,—shall we not be doing more to promote the practical "religion of Jesus," which we have declared to be "summed up in love to God and love to man" than we are likely to do in any other way? Is there any topic which is more worthy of earnest attention at the Washington Conference?

WILLIAM H. FISH, JR.

A VISIT TO BULFINCH CHAPEL.

To the Editor of the Christian Register:—

Looking over the list of summer services of the Boston Unitarian churches yesterday, I noticed that the Bulfinch Place Chapel would be open mornings for Sunday-school during July and August, and shortly wended my way thither over the sun-scorched sidewalks of Beacon Hill, arriving, to my sorrow, rather late, a modest placard at the door announcing the appointed hour as 10.30 instead of 11, as the printer had typed it. However, I was in season for far more than the closing benediction,—in truth, for many good words. Instead of the hum of many children in classes reciting to a number of different teachers, I listened to one pleasant voice, that of the leader, giving a familiar talk—interesting, instructive, appreciative—on the composer Mendelssohn. The Scripture lesson which had preceded, I incidentally learned, was the parable of the talents; and the speaker showed Mendelssohn as one who, though possessed of sufficient means to live in luxurious ease, had he been so inclined, yet labored diligently from a sense of duty, as one who had been intrusted with talents, and also from devotion to his art, expressing himself in music as the highest and truest form of language, putting a bit of himself into every one of his beautiful "Songs without Words" and his grand oratorios, "Elijah" and "St. Paul," writing no requiems, voicing not the anguish of a sorrow-stricken world, but singing always cheery, uplifting strains, full of the joy of faithful living; in family and social relations, tender and true, generous and helpful, happy dispenser of sunshine of the soul. Some of his music was played on the piano, brief extracts from his letters were read; and the thought was pressed home to us all that it is good to live and to labor and to love, to be cheerful and to help make other hearts glad in pure and simple living. The poet Whittier was named as the subject for next Sunday. The room was airy and cool. A hymn was sung, the common prayer voiced together, greetings exchanged by friends and neighbors; and I came away feeling that it was good to have been there.

A thought expressed in an old English novel, that I read many years ago and have never read since, came to my mind. A friendly library having given me a chance to verify my references, I beg to give it here:—

"I often think and feel," said Dr. Beauchamp, "that there's more real piety in being happy than in any other act in life."

"I don't know whether you could call being happy an act, Doctor."

"I know," answered Dr. B., "that being miserable is often a voluntary act. There are people who will be miserable, and to will is an active verb; and therefore I suppose that to be happy may also be a voluntary act, and a Christian duty also, as often as circumstances will permit."

I should like to write further of helps and hindrances to cheerfulness, but judge the suggestion, Stop now and write again, to be the happier thought and wiser way.

M. H. G.

Boston, July 22.

For the Christian Register.

IN MEMORIAM:

HENRY A. MILES, D.D.

BY EMMA E. BROWN.

When pass away, beyond our mortal sight,
The good, the great, whose presence blessed us here,
So much seems lost from out our earthly sphere
'Tis like the change of day to sombre night!
And yet, though in the valley's shade no light
Is seen, the dawn of hope draws near!
For even now upon the hills appear
Gleams of a Day with endless radiance bright;
And, as in clearer air the sky-larks rise
Higher and higher in their heavenward flight, Till—singing, singing still—we lose them in the skies,
Yet hear their song, though they have flown from sight,
So fall upon the listening ear alway
The benisons of great souls passed away.

HUMAN LOVE FOR GOD.

BY REV. HENRY A. MILES, D.D.

It may be thought that there is an impassable distance between what is implied in the last word of this title and what is implied in its first word. Hardly do we at first climb up to any idea of God. How, then, can we at once reach him by our love? It is not easy to see how we can love one whose existence is not put beyond all doubt, of whose personality we only dimly conceive, with whom we have no visible communication except through intermediate agencies, and whose infinite grandeur, if really felt, must annihilate us. Even when these and other conditions are met, we do not readily yield our affections to one who imperatively says, "Thou shalt love me." Love follows some other law than that of authority.

There may be those who wrongfully blame themselves for their coldness of heart. It may not be useless to try to show what love for God really means, and how it is within our capabilities and duty.

When we talk about the distance between God and man, there may be some survival of the childish conception that God is a venerable and omnipotent Ruler, seated on a far-off throne, surrounded by myriads of angels, and superintending this wonderful universe.

There may be shadows from an earlier perspective. During long ages it has been believed that nature is something not yet subdued to God's dominion, that it is at war with him, that it is the realm of demons, sending to us our disappointments and sufferings. This is the Old Testament doctrine, and it clouds much of the New Testament.

If science has banished the evil spirits, there may be an inheritance of the influence of this ancient superstition. With such persons anything that is according to nature is at once pushed aside as unworthy of further thought. It makes no appeal to wonder and reverence. A wall is built up between nature and God.

Modern thought rejects this supposed distance. It believes that God is immanent in nature. He moves the planets in their orbits and paints the tints of the humblest flower. "Whither shall I go from thy Spirit? Whither shall I flee from thy presence?" That the ancient writers here quoted had foregleams of the grandest spiritual truth is a better proof of their divine insight than all the arguments of Biblical critics. The early religions could not have been altogether ridiculous and debasing if they were here and there illuminated by such lofty and prophetic words.

Are perplexities about God's personality any greater than perplexities about our own personality? Who has ever seen his own soul? Our spirit is as much a mystery as is the Spirit of God. Man's spirit acts through his kind deeds and his loving and noble life. And is not God cognizable by every adjustment for our good, by every happy hour we enjoy, even by the evils we meet, designed as parts of a needed discipline? The darkness which clouds the personality of our friend is not sufficient to lead us to think we can never love him, or to prevent our grateful thought upon the tokens of his care and affection. Why should it be sufficient in the case of God?

Indeed, in all outward objects there is something too deep for us to fathom. As to matter itself, do we know anything except as it affects our senses? Can any one tell us what is light, electricity, life, and countless other things? We are perpetually put to school to teach us the limits of our knowledge; but do these limits lead us to deny the existence of something back of the phenomena? If "an undevout astronomer is mad," does not study in any one line of investigation bring us nearer to the order, wisdom, and benignity of God, and assure us that we have in our souls intimations of something infinitely beyond?

If any one be troubled by the command to love God, it may be well to try to form some just idea of the mode in which it was given.

No one supposes that distinct words were uttered. God has not our linguistic organs. What need has he of any of our human dialects? The phrases, "God spake these words and said," "The Lord spake these words," were used by those who believed that God impressed upon their minds the things reported. But they were free to utter them in their own way. "The spirit of the prophet was subject to the prophet," not he to it. A duty he set forth by the words "Thou shalt"; a restraint, by the words, "Thou shalt not." The diction was according to the fashion of a primitive age.

It was laid aside in advanced stages of culture. Who can imagine Jesus as saying, Thou shalt be pure in heart, thou shalt be meek and merciful? He never taught in that way. But, looking to the commandment which first appeared as early as the book of Deuteronomy, it is indeed wonderful that some, even then, subordinated all ceremonies, rites, sacrificial gifts, and creeds to that great commandment. The doctrine is one thing: its form of statement partook of the rudeness of an early people.

And what does the doctrine really mean? The word "love" is a translation from a Hebrew term which places the stress on other things than mere affections. Even in our common version it is often rendered by the word "fear"; for it includes reverence, obedience, a steadfast looking to God, a humble and sincere breathing for him. This last appears to be the root idea. All these shades of meaning are covered by the word "love."

So in our language we say we should love our child, should love a flower, should love our country, should love a wise and beneficent ruler. It does not follow there should be no discrimination. Love is graduated according to the object. Who can love God with the vivacious tenderness felt for the dearest friend? The affection the Bible enjoins is an habitual reverence, wanting, as some may think, in occasional fervor, but really more enduring, more obedient to reason, and with more control over life.

It was a sensible comment of the renowned Church Father, Saint Augustine, on the words, "Thou shalt love God with all thy heart, mind, and might," that true religion has a claim on our whole nature,—not on our love alone, but upon our understanding, our will, our force of character. To bring the chief stress to bear on our emotions is to obey only a part of our duty, and what all history proves is the easiest part.

Reverence for God,—is that impossible? Does not the spectacle of the world and the course of our own life lead us to that? In the vision of him we find our origin, our duty, our pathway of progress, and our assured continuity of existence.

THE CHRISTIAN UNION CONVENTION.

BY REV. GEORGE W. COOKE.

The convention of the Young People's Christian Union held in Boston July 10-14 was quite overshadowed by that of the Young People's Christian Endeavor; but, in its own way, it was quite as significant. When the Christian Endeavor organization was started, the Universalists tried to join it, but were coldly received or crowded out. Then they began to organize a society of their own, which has grown with astonishing rapidity. It now numbers about sixteen thousand members, has about four hundred local unions, publishes a weekly paper in Boston, has a paid organizer or missionary, and during the past year raised over $11,000.

There were present at the meeting just held in Boston about five hundred and fifty delegates and two thousand five hundred members of the organization. Large delegations came from the Western States, and most of the States were represented. The meetings were held in the Church of the Unity, which was well filled at all the sessions. An overflow meeting was held in the Every-day Church every evening. In proportion to the whole membership of the two organizations, the attendance at the Christian Union was much larger than that at the Christian Endeavor Convention.

I attended most of the sessions of the Young People's Christian Union. The meetings were all of great interest to me. I found them inspiring and enthusiastic. They were liberal in tone, broad in spirit, and catholic in aim. Although of necessity denominational in character, they were not sectarian or bigoted. The attitude toward evangelical Christians was friendly and appreciative, while that toward Unitarians was most cordial and sympathetic. On the first evening Rev. M. J. Savage was one of the speakers, and his words of appeal for closer union between the two denominations were enthusiastically received. I was invited to speak at one of the sessions, as the representative of the Unitarian young people's organizations; and what I said elicited a most hearty response. I found myself throughout the four days of the convention in closest sympathy with the aims and methods of the convention, and quite as much at home as if the meetings had been conducted under Unitarian auspices.

It was quite evident to me that the Young People's Christian Union has become a great power in the Universalist denomination. It has brought together in organic union the younger people and those who look toward the future, of whatever age. The number of older persons present was large enough to give judgment and wisdom to the convention; but an earnest missionary spirit and great enthusiasm prevailed. It was quite evident that the Union has taken fast hold of the hearts and convictions of its members. The enthusiasm rose to a high point when the place for the next meeting was discussed, when the election of officers occurred, and when the adoption of a new constitution and by-laws was under consideration. That the organization has gained the loyalty and devotion of the members was shown throughout the meetings in many ways. The enthusiasm was unmistakable, so contagious and inspiring was it. It was a sober and controllable enthusiasm, however, and with a strong foundation of good sense and wise judgment.

I was much impressed by the harmony which prevailed between the younger and the older members of the convention. Without doubt the Young People's Christian Union contains the young life of the Universalist denomination. The officers of the Union are young people, the president and secretary being about thirty years of age, the treasurer about twenty. The delegates were largely of the youth of the denomination. Few old persons were in attendance or among the speakers. Yet there was a considerable proportion of delegates of middle age, and a majority of the speakers were of that class. So far as I could see, no jealousy existed, but rather a cordial spirit of co-operation between all present. I was surprised at the large number of the leaders of the body who were not only present as delegates, but active in the deliberations and work of the convention. This is as it should be, for it insured to the meetings that the enthusiasm was directed to wise results.

Much of the time of the convention was devoted to its business interests. Among the topics considered were the publication of Onward, the weekly organ of the society; the work of the secretary, who is the national organizer; the support of the Japan and other missions; the pushing of post-office work, which is carried on among Universalists of the Young People's Christian Union. This missionary feature of the meetings was one that gave purpose and definiteness to the work of the organization. It has built a church at Harriman, Tenn., and supports a missionary there. It proposes to open up other missionary posts in this country, as well as to aid in the support of the mission in Japan. The success of the Japan mission has inspired the forward-looking members of the denomination with the idea of making the whole world their field of labor.

Other practical topics were also up for consideration. Much attention was given to the education of the young for good citizenship. This feature of the work of the Young People's Christian Union is made a prominent one, and the papers and addresses showed that it is capable of yielding efficient results. Careful consideration was also given to the perfection of the organization itself, and the convention was largely a school of methods. Addresses were made on the best methods of conducting the meetings of local Unions, how to attract and hold the young people, and on the relations of the Church to the young. The attention given to these papers and addresses showed that the delegates were really interested in the topics discussed, and that their loyalty to the Union is strong and vigorous. It showed that, while they thoroughly enjoyed the convention as a holiday, they had a deeper purpose, and one of large meaning to them.

The interest in all the meetings of the convention was unmistakable. It showed itself in many ways. Something of the spirit of the Endeavor movement has been caught up by the Young People's Christian Union, without doubt, as shown in their use of banners, badges, and songs. I was not impressed, however, with any excess or exaggeration in this feature of the convention, but rather with its attitude of youthful hope and courage. So far as I could judge, there was nothing in the tone and temper of the convention to which a Unitarian could object. So far as any doctrinal teaching found expression, it was of a most progressive and rational kind. The denominational feeling was in no degree stronger than at our own Saratoga Conference of last autumn. From first to last the meetings were such as we ought to have among our own young people. We can learn very much from our Universalist neighbors in this regard, and we shall be wise if we all allow them to teach us the lesson we so greatly need. If we mingle with them cordially, we shall find that they are one with us in belief, in ideals, and in present rational aims.

THE FUNERAL OF PROF. HUXLEY.

BY REV. WILLIAM H. LYON.

One would have supposed that the funeral of Huxley would be largely attended; for, not only was he a great scientist, one of the leaders in the rapid intellectual changes of the past half-century, but he was well known to the ordinary reading public as one who had made great matters plain to its understanding. But, as the train stopped at the little station of East Finchley, the number of passengers who alighted, though unusual, was by no means great. This was partly due to a wrong announcement of both time and place, which had not been corrected till that morning's papers, and even then only as to time. As we came away, we met some eager persons hurrying up the narrow lane, too late for the event they had left London to see. The cemetery of St. Marylebone is a very pretty one, we had time to notice, looking much like the best of our later American burial-places, except in the preponderance of crosses for gravestones. There are no iron fences or stone curbing to break the sweet green sward, and there is an abundance of flowers. The land is high and the air clear, and to the left the heath rolls up to break in billows of trees around the spires of Hampstead.

As we were waiting in front of the neat stone chapel, an obliging young chemist pointed out to me various distinguished men. One who had especially attracted my attention by his very tall and slender form, and striking though rather loosely hanging face, fringed with a thin brown beard and crowned with a hat set well back, he told me, to my great delight, was Lecky. Sir Joseph Lister, Sir Joseph Hooker, the great botanist, and Prof. Gladstone were among the waiters. An old, pleasant-faced man who alighted from his carriage at the gate, and walked somewhat feebly up the path, was Sir James Paget, the famous physician; while the still vigorous man who drove up to the door was Lord Kelvin, better known as Sir William Thomson of "prayer-gauge" notoriety, but a very "orthodox" man, and president of the Royal Society. Herbert Spencer was too much an invalid to come, and Lubbock and Wallace were also looked for in vain. There were a few women, among them Mrs. Kingdon Clifford; but almost all the company were men, and a distinguished-looking company it was.

The coffin was carried into the chapel and placed on very high black trestles, seeming doubly high and obtrusive in the small room. It was then that disappointment began. If any one had hoped that the burial of so pronounced a writer on religious subjects would have something to distinguish it from the funeral of the common parishioner of the Church of England, his hopes soon ended. A clergyman in the conventional robes ascended the pulpit, the undertaker stationed himself at the clerk's desk below, and the two shared a service that seemed doubly formal and empty by comparison with the utterances of those firm lips that lay mute in the lifted coffin. A little gleam of consolation came from the knowledge that the clergyman was Rev. J. Llewellyn Davies, a friend of Huxley, and himself a writer upon matters of science. But the company took no part whatever in the service, the undertaker representing them in the few responses. One thought of those words of Emerson about the preacher who was spectral and the snow-storm without the church which was the only reality. There was indeed nothing to show that the preacher or the dead had ever really lived, "had bought and sold, been cheated or in love," or anything else but an attendant of the Anglican Church. None of his gray-haired contemporaries told of the battles which they and he had fought with superstition, nor did any of the younger men speak of what the keen mind had done for them in light and leading. The service droned its way through truth and error, through Paul's faith in the life to come and his hasty prophecy that the trump would sound before his hearers should all "sleep"; and the dead man made no remonstrance or criticism. The strained imagination might fancy him grimly consoling himself by the thought that his favorite word, "agnostic," had been suggested to him by this same Paul, in his speech to the Athenians.

Then we all went out to the grave through the realities of the beautiful day, and the priest and the undertaker resumed their dialogue there. Then we filed again through the green lane to the station, and were rolled back to London. Not a tear had been shed by any of the company, except by the family; and the general feeling seemed to be a sense of relief that an artificial but necessary function had been performed. Doubtless we shall have eulogies and criticisms enough for a while in the reviews, but one wondered whether something might not have been said there where the mortal was to be ended of the work and worth of one of the foremost thinkers and writers of the age. "When Bradlaugh was buried," said an indignant fellow-passenger, "no word was said and no service was held; but we stood and looked on silently, and came away so. And I tell you there were tears enough then." An unalterable liturgy has its advantages often, but there are times when something a little more human would be better.

As we walked along the lane, two rustics stood watching the throng of black coats and silk hats go by; and one of them said to the other, "What did the man do?" Such is fame, but it is a question that no one can yet answer. That he defended, expounded, and developed the Darwinian theory, and that he brought to this work a mind as keen and cold as steel, a wit as sharp as a sword, and a literary style which had had no superior in his time for clearness and firmness, we all know. We have all to thank him that he looked upon science not as a thing for the laboratory only, but as truth to be proclaimed and used wherever there was error to be overthrown. He did not hesitate to set it squarely face to face with the cosmogony of the Bible, and went on to criticise by its light many other things in the sacred writings which seemed to him not only untrue, but mischievous. He was severe with the Churchmen. His famous reply to Bishop Wilberforce's sneer at evolution betrayed his feeling toward the bishop's type of mind and method of reasoning. The bishop, it may be remembered, asked him, after Huxley had been giving his views upon the matter, whether it was upon his grandfather's or his grandmother's side that he descended from the apes. Those who remember how the mouth of Dr. Hedge used to shut upon some grim retort or criticism can picture to themselves how the thin, firm lips of Huxley snapped as he replied that, if he had to choose his ancestor between a decent ape and a bishop who had only a sneer for great truths, he would take the ape every time. When I last saw him, he was lecturing upon snakes at Kew Gardens; and, as he handled the horrid creatures, one might recall the passage in which he had written that "extinct theologians lie around the birthplace of modern science as the serpents were scattered around the cradle of the infant Hercules."

On the other hand, it must be said that Huxley found little cheer in or to give from his science. The endless warfare and rivalry of natural forces and forms seemed to him to show little sign of love or hope for man. Nature was "no sentimentalist" to him, and was rather to be resisted or borne bravely than trusted for any good intention she might have for man's welfare. It was not, therefore, because he had fresh good news to give in place of the old gospel that he spoke, but because he believed, as he said, that "the truth is the best remedy for the manifold miseries of mankind." But is not this, after all, the deepest faith that any man can hold,—that the universe is, at bottom and in its reality, kind to man? Huxley was a Hiram of Tyre who furnished timber and stone out of the primeval forests and rock. The Solomons who are to build the temple of the new faith have not yet been born.

LEO XIII.

Now to those to whom the privilege of conversing with Leo XIII. has been extended; to those who look below the surface of things, and realize that everything the pope says, does, thinks, or writes, is the outcome of deep and earnest thought, exercised by one of the most powerful minds of our day, a dim adumbration of this influence and its consequences reveals itself.

The frequenter of the Vatican instinctively learns that no one within those walls differs with that wonderful old man; that the mind lingering in that frail tenement of flesh and blood is keen, alert, and self-reliant; that to the pope assertion of unlimited authority is no effort, that it is part and parcel of his nature, enabling him to set aside a pompous cardinal more easily than the archbishop of Canterbury can a beadle. For this pope is a great power,—a far greater potentate than the king who sits in his palace on the other side of the Tiber; and, if the supposed visitor be a Catholic, to him a divine personage, divinely inspired, borne up in his counsels by the Almighty God of the universe, and guarded from error by Omniscience. To him the delicate life hanging by a thread in the attenuated frame is nothing but a miracle, as indeed it is to others who only take a material view of the fact, while that the mind of this aged man is still capable of bearing the strain of incessant labor fills many with amazement. This is no fancy portrait of Leo XIII. That his life is being miraculously prolonged is now very generally accepted by the faithful; and, even by medical men, it is looked on as phenomenal that so light a spark should not have been extinguished at least twelve or fifteen years ago.

It is patent to any one reading the daily papers that the Vatican is becoming more and more a factor in European politics, not alone in matters of general policy, but in all social and religious questions; that it has a hand in the making and unmaking of governments; that it influences elections (in some countries and certain localities to the extent of controlling them altogether); that it takes its part in the burning question of the education of the people; and, lastly, that in the New Worlds that are being brought under colonizing influences, such as Central Africa, it is destined to play a by no means insignificant rôle.

And who but Leo XIII. guides and directs this policy?

Reason as we may, blink facts as much as we like, the pope, in the silence of his austere furnished room, with his simple fare of pasta and cold water, is a power in shaping the destinies of the world greater than the czar, greater than Emperor William, greater than all the foreign secretaries who fret and fume on the political stage in the length and breadth of Europe.

And why? Because he embodies the idea of a persistent, unwavering policy, with one distinct aim,—an aim that will outlive him, that will be followed with the relentlessness of a sleuth-hound by his successors. Triple alliances will have crumbled, dual monarchies have split into fragments, the sun may have set on the British Empire, republics rise and fall; but still this one supreme object will be in view, everything moral and material will be utilized with that sole idea, everything which stands in its way crushingly and persistently set aside. And this terrible power is and must continue to be in the hands of the only true autocrat living, a man who need not be swayed by faction, master of himself and master of thousands of highly trained men, who blindly do as he bids, chancellor of his own exchequer, with no one to question the use of the immense sums that flow into his coffers. He is the only autocrat free from the res angusta domi: he has no personal family worries. Royal Marriage Acts cannot afflict his dreams, and complicated dynastic arrangements do not affect him.

But to the outside public a latter-day pope often seems to be merely the spiritual head of the Roman Church, occasionally seen at some festival in the Sistine Chapel, while the rest of his time is taken up in receiving ladies in black veils,—mostly Protestant and mostly American,—in granting audiences to some wandering Britisher with a new patent for the union of the churches, or in dispensing blessings and indulgences on hordes of amiable pilgrims (personally conducted) who have taken the Vatican, Lourdes, or anywhere else, in their trip.

But, however true this might have been of other popes, it is distinctly not the case with Leo XIII. It is true he is compelled to go through many of these trivialities; for women are still women, and noodles are not as extinct as the dodo. But the amount of work of other kinds he gets through, and its extreme importance, is known to few. The diplomatic correspondence alone, carried on chiefly by his very able Secretary of State, Cardinal Rampolla, but verified and examined in every line by his Holiness himself, would occupy the time of most men to the exclusion of everything else. In addition to this are naturally all the "Cares of the Church," its government, preferments, missions; the political bearing of every act of every parliament as affecting the papacy; an analytical scrutiny into the lives of all the Roman hierarchy; a study of the personal character of every statesman of eminence; the ever-shifting kaleidoscope of European foreign relations; and countless other matters,—Home Rule in Ireland, Catholicism in America, religious questions in Austria, with everything else embraced in the universal dominion of the Church.

And now a word as to the spiritual condition of the hierarchy of Rome. To the student of history it seems indisputable that a great boon and blessing has befallen the Church of Rome through the loss of its temporalities. To any one familiar with the "good old days" of Roman society thirty years ago—the ease and luxury of the great prince cardinals, their fat revenues, their palaces, their nephews and also their nieces, and the pomp and splendor of their lives—the existing state of affairs in the Catholic world of Rome presents a marvellous change. A visit nowadays to a cardinal or a monsignore is quite another thing,—no relations of either sex dangling about his eminence's ante-chamber, no lackeys in livery, no great rumbling coach with fat horses; nothing of this,—all gone; nothing but austere and decorous economy. And, by a process common in all lives, improved domestic economy has produced higher spirituality, has revived that earnestness essential to success in anything, and has added a dignity to their position in the eyes of the vulgar which luxury had never succeeded in imparting. Further, what was true of the prelates was true of the pope, whose very person grew more and more sacred the less he came in contact with the outer world. Rome gained immeasurably by the loss of her ridiculous papal army, laughable as a menace, perilous as rendering it obligatory under certain circumstances to take part in European quarrels.

But now the Vatican works the polling-booth, an infinitely surer and more effective force, and one which it is almost beyond the powers of any State to control.

Thus round the person of Leo XIII. a strength has accumulated unknown to modern papacy, while, personally, no pope for centuries has been more implicitly obeyed or more devoutly revered. Nevertheless, it is also clearly his own remarkable personality which has greatly contributed to this state of affairs, coupled with the fact that the loss of the temporal power, and with it relief from the trumperies which take up the time of ordinary royalties, has left him at leisure to devote his great intellect to what may be properly called the legitimate business of his position. Then, again, it is a fair speculation as to how far even Leo XIII.'s extraordinarily pious mind, as proved by the blameless purity of his prepal life, would have stood that greatest of all human trials, elevation to an exalted position, coupled with power. As it is, the transcendental has remained conspicuous in him. To himself, and to millions of others, he is above all human consideration of earthly weakness and incapability of wrong-doing; for the simple fact that he has had no opportunity to show through erring that he is fallible.

It is said that Leo XIII. has not changed in the smallest degree since his election to the chair of St. Peter; but it must be pointed out that it was certainly not anticipated that that quiet, calm, and holy mind had another side to it which would entitle it to rank with Bismarck's or that of the shrewdest of modern statesmen,—namely, a fixity of purpose that none have excelled; a personal courage that would smile at the stake; and a grasp of all questions, social, moral, or political, equalled by few. Add to this an undoubting belief that he is God's Alter Ego here below,—not alone in matters concerning the Church, but in all things secular as well; add again his firm faith that this God takes cognizance of the traditional sparrow on the house-top, and is forever guiding the world through the pope, and through the pope alone; add his extraordinary personal influence (before laid stress on), and last, but by no means least, the financial condition of the papacy (more flourishing than it has been for centuries), and it would appear that the power of the pope is not dead in the person of Leo XIII.—Fortnightly Review for July.

REPORT OF THE SUPERINTENDENT OF MISSIONS FOR THE SOUTH.

To the Directors of the American Unitarian Association:—

I place at the head of this report a statement with which I propose to begin every address or paper I may give concerning the South until that statement is corrected by a change in the facts. It is this: One-third of the land and one-third of the people of the United States are in the South. One-thirty-third of the Unitarian churches are there.

It is our task to divide the denominator, or, better, multiply the numerator of that last fraction by eleven. Let us multiply the dozen Unitarian societies at the South eleven times, and we shall do for its religion what business enterprise is doing for its industry and what modern education is doing for its culture. Whether the South wishes it or not, the law of the correlation of work and thought and the correspondence of occupation and character will revolutionize her religious institutions as well as her social and industrial conditions. It is the duty of people who have in their career anticipated some of the inevitable transitions of the coming age in this fateful portion of our country to share with it the results of their experience.

During the last ten months I have visited all the Southern States, and held religious services there. Starting from Saratoga immediately after the National Conference in September, I visited in succession Cincinnati, Louisville, and St. Louis, preaching in these cities and conferring with their ministers and people on our duty to carry a restored Christianity to the Southern States. From St. Louis I went to Memphis, where the movement begun by Mr. Preston with four members has developed into an enterprising society, with fifty enrolled members, under the charge of Rev. G. H. Clare. These earnest people are already prospecting for a church building. They deserve all the aid the older churches can give them.

From Memphis I went through Arkansas to Texas, stopping a day at Little Rock. I am told that there are intelligent and well-to-do people in this city who would welcome our church among them. At Dallas I preached one Sunday, and took counsel with a few known friends there. At Fort Worth I found little remaining of the Unitarian society once formed there. We ought to have a strong minister here or in Dallas, who should minister to both cities. At Waco I found a city centrally located in a very productive country, and with an assured future. It would welcome a liberal church which was both liberal and religious. I then visited Austin, the capital and educational centre of Texas. Here Rev. E. M. Wheelock is doing telling work as a preacher, and his society is growing and active. At San Antonio, where I went for the following Sunday, Rev. N. Shultz is bravely and cheerfully doing what he can. Galveston and Houston were my next preaching points, and in both places I found hearers and would-be confessors of the better faith and larger hope in religion. One able man could minister to both these cities until each could support a minister of its own.

New Orleans is always interesting. Our church there holds its own and a little more under Rev. W. C. Peirce. That is saying much, when we consider the difficulties under which it labors. It is planning to move as soon as its present edifice can be profitably sold. Then will begin its new day.

A Sunday in Mobile gave me a hearty and hopeful hearing from fifty or sixty people. A Jewish synagogue is built on the foundations of the old-time Unitarian church. A Sunday in Montgomery, besides a good congregation, brought favorable notice from the press and unfavorable comment from the pulpit. A visit to Tuskegee at the time of the Labor and Educational Conference there was a day or two well spent, and full of evidence that the colored people of that region are rising under the influence of sensible education and counsel. In Florida we saw brother J. C. Gibson and some of his coworkers and fellow-worshippers. I did what I could to organize and encourage them. A Sunday service in Jacksonville brought out a small but excellent congregation. I visited Tampa, and talked with our friends there, but only for a day. In Savannah I found but one Unitarian, and he was not anxious to have a church there. At Charleston there is always welcome and devotedness to our cause. I preached and lectured there, and took counsel on church-extension matters. From Charleston to Greenville, S. C., takes one from low-country to up-country folk. Both are getting ready to think our thought and walk our way. The little band of Unitarians and their liberal friends in Greenville are earnest and active. They have salt in themselves. They hold services whether a minister is with them or not. At Knoxville, where I preached twice and lectured once, they also hold continuous services. Asheville is always full in its season. Its minister, Rev. H. A. Westall, divides the year between Asheville, Knoxville, and Greenville. Atlanta I found the same wide-awake, enterprising, friendly city as ever. Our opportunity there was never so great as now. This year, with its great exposition, offers us the chance of a lifetime to make our way, our men, and our cause known throughout the South and beyond. The Unitarian books will spread our literature broadcast, and special services will give personal weight to our liberal word.

Chattanooga, the church, has done what it could, when Chattanooga, the city, was doing nothing. Rev. S. R. Free has gone to Willimantic, Conn., where he was needed to begin a new church among his old friends and former parishioners. At Nashville I met two or three men much in earnest in their desire for a Unitarian movement there. On my return to Richmond, I found the young society in good heart and keeping, with Rev. J. M. Seaton filling the pulpit in my absence.

An interesting trip to Wallace, N. C., introduced me to Rev. J. G. Dukes, who is preaching a truly liberal gospel to the people in that region. He and many of his people are in perfect accord with our principles and views. I preached in Norfolk one Sunday. The service was not largely attended, but it gave me an opportunity to meet and converse with a few effective men in that city. The Baltimore Conference brought the ten months' travel, preaching, organizing, and counselling to a good conclusion, and marked the beginning, let us hope, of a new advance of organized, progressive, Unitarian church-extension work at the South.

I cannot close this report without calling attention to the extent of the Southern field, requiring a journey of ten thousand miles to make a visit to all our posts. The isolation in which our Southern men and churches carry on their work makes it more important for them than for others more closely connected to have the visitation and counsel of a brother in the faith. In due time not one superintendent for this immense field, but six such officers, will minister to six sections of the South. There will be associated with certain ministers centrally located in these sections one or more assistant ministers, who will visit every year the scattered individuals, circles, alliances, leagues, or churches of each district. This is part of the purpose of that circuit work which is just starting at the South. It is the desire of the present incumbent of this office to be superseded by local superintendents, who will bring to the sheep scattered abroad the service and sympathy of friends near by.

For the present, although the word "missionary," with its association with religious enterprises among the brethren, is not a fortunate one, I must say that the Southern work is pre-eminently missionary; that is, it is a work which Unitarian people must do patiently, generously, and long for people who are not Unitarians, and who can only become such by gradual change and natural growth.

GEORGE L. CHANEY.

THE LIQUOR QUESTION IN FRANCE.

It has been a very common remark that no nation is drunken where wine is cheap, and the grape-growing countries have been pointed out as a verification of the truth of this assertion. It has generally been said that the social and political issues of the drink question are confined to the Northern nations of Europe. But now we are informed that France, which is among the chief wine-growing countries, is considering this subject, at least so far as legislation upon it is concerned. A project of law has been introduced in the form of a measure of revenue which takes account of the moral and social aspects of the question, and in some of its details is avowedly determined by these. The New York Times says:—

The Chamber of Deputies passed the law, which includes an entire removal of the taxes on what are called "hygienic drinks,"—including wine, beer, cider, and perry,—which raises the duty on alcohol, and which includes supervision by the State of the rectification of alcohol.

The French Academy of Medicine has been fully committed to the principle of the new law, and apparently has been consulted about its details. At any rate, Dr. Magnan, one of its members and a very distinguished physician, has just submitted to an interview in a Parisian newspaper, in which he justifies the law upon medical, which in this case are also moral, grounds. The liquor question, he declares, has forced itself upon public attention in France by reason of the increasing mischief wrought by alcoholism in France within the last twenty years. According to him, the medical profession finds extremely urgent the need of some measure to allay the evil results of unrestricted competition; and it considers that it has found them in the bill just passed by the Chamber of Deputies. The encouragement of beverages in which the proportion of alcohol is small he regards as important, but not more important than the proposal to give a government guarantee for the purity of such spirits as are permitted to be sold.

The history of this measure is especially interesting, as showing that the production of wine and of beer, of which the production in France has been steadily increasing during the period specified by Dr. Magnan as that in which the evils of the liquor traffic have been increasing, is not the guarantee that it was formerly supposed to be against drunkenness. It is true that the mischief has by no means gone so far in France as in Great Britain, but it has gone far enough to indicate that the increase of drunkenness comes from causes pertaining rather to the general conditions of modern industrial life than to the circumstances of any particular nation.

CALVIN AND SERVETUS.

The burning of Servetus, in one or another form, is brought into court from generation to generation; and now we have the story once more by Leonard Woolsey Bacon in Christian Literature for July. After giving a brief but graphic sketch of the burning, he thus sums up the affair:—

The punishment of Servetus, considered in itself, leaves no very dark stigma on the reformer's character. But on moral principles, that are the same in every age, Calvin stands condemned for having denounced Servetus to the Catholic Inquisition by the use of confidential papers, and for having delivered the unfortunate fugitive to the Geneva magistrates when he was on his way to try his fortune in Italy. Granted that Calvin was in the line of his duty when he kept guard, in his way (which was the way of his age), for the security of the reformed churches, had he any charge over the police of consciences in Catholic countries? Neither can we accept as natural or compatible with a Christian spirit the hard heart with which the reformer expresses himself to the end with regard to his rival, without so much as a moment's softening at the sight of the scaffold.

To defend Calvin for his course toward Servetus is no longer possible, in the light of the full array of evidence now accessible to every scholar. Something can be pleaded in mitigation. He was not, as is sometimes asserted, guilty of unfaithfulness to any principles of toleration of his own. Farel expressed his master's thought as well as his own in one of the letters to Calvin, in which he clamored for the death of the heretic. "Because the pope condemns believers for the crime of heresy, because passionate judges inflict on the innocent the punishments which heretics deserve, it is absurd to conclude from this that the latter ought not to be put to death as a protection to the faithful. For my part, I have often declared myself ready to die, if I had taught anything contrary to sound doctrine, and that I should be worthy of the most dreadful punishment if I were to turn any from the true faith of Christ; and I cannot apply any different rule to other men." This point being established, the fatal conclusion followed; for it is impossible to dispute that Servetus was a heretic of an aggravated and dangerous type. He was no mere unbeliever, but a theologian intense in his convictions, with a plan for reconstructing theology, the Church, and society, as set forth in his book of the "Restitutio Christianismi," or "Christianity Restored." And, since he was a theologian of that period, it is needless to add that his manner of expressing his views was acrimonious and insulting to all antagonists, both Catholic and Protestant. Taking his career altogether, he does not appear to advantage in the figure of a martyr of free thought and fidelity to conviction, under which some would fain present him to us.

HUXLEY.

Huxley admired Mr. Gladstone, and during a great part of his life gave an honest adhesion both to Mr. Gladstone's measures and to the eloquence of his tongue; but, when it came to exposing the fallacies of Mr. Gladstone's theology, he naturally went straight to the point without pausing to pay compliments. For a long time his name was anathema to the clergy, who entertained a vague dread of what they supposed were his opinions, and a more positive resentment for his treatment of Bishop Wilberforce in the memorable scene which took place in 1860 at the Oxford meeting of the British Association. The practised rhetorician was rude to the young man of science, and got the worst of it; and the old-fashioned clericalists were long before they forgot and forgave. Strange are the revenges of time! Thirty years later the head of a conservative and ecclesiastical government made Huxley a Right Honorable; and in the very city where the duel had taken place in 1860 Lord Salisbury, in 1893, in his memorable address as president of the same association, accepted the essentials of Darwinism, and was thanked for his address by Huxley.

I intended, when beginning this letter, to say but little of Huxley in his public capacity; for to me he was not so much the teacher and the controversialist as the beloved elder friend, almost a kinsman, more admirable and charming in all the relations of private life than almost anybody I have ever known. Of late years he had been somewhat deaf; and he greatly felt the trouble of this, which, to a man of his extraordinary social gifts, implied a very serious diminution of the pleasures of life. To the end he talked wonderfully well; and in earlier years, before his deafness came upon him, no one was so quick in the give-and-take of conversation, or so ready both with pregnant aphorisms and with bright and humorous repartee. His family worshipped him; and, indeed, when one looks back upon his unvarying sweetness of temper, upon his total disregard of self, and upon his readiness to give them of his best, whether in great matters or in small, one does not wonder at the worship. It is scarcely too large a word to apply to the feeling held toward him by many of his scientific friends, especially by those a few years younger than himself; for they saw in him, not only the great leader, the protagonist in the struggle between truth and superstition, but also the most devoted, the most kindly, the most human of men. He has left a gap which none can fill. In this department of knowledge, as in almost every other, there are more clever men than ever, more investigators, more trained reporters; but here, as there, the great men have disappeared or are passing rapidly away.—Humphry Ward, in New York Tribune.

TOLSTOI.

In describing a visit to Tolstoi, Mr. Andrew D. White speaks of the great Russian reformer as follows: "Tolstoi resembles a patriarch, a philosopher, who with prophetic vision sees the future. He is about seventy years old, but is remarkably well preserved and capable of doing a great deal of manual labor. Whether in his home or on the streets, he is usually attired in his peasant's garb. His blouse and his trousers, instead of being bright-colored, as those worn by peasants, are of a dull brown hue. His boots are heavy; and, when out walking, he always stuffs his trousers into their tops. In this garb he receives professors, men of learning, princes, aristocrats, and, in fact, every one who visits him. His shoulders are broad, and his frame is large. It is his custom to labor daily at some manual occupation,—not because he thinks it necessary for his health, but because it is his theory of life. And, no matter who may call or what the occasion, he does so much labor daily, rain or shine. His home in Moscow is not pretentious, but it is comfortable. What surprised me when I first visited his house was the room into which I was ushered. I found myself in a small room, similar to those occupied by Russian peasants in moderate circumstances. Here I met for the first time this strange philosopher and writer, attired, as I always found him afterward, in his peasant's costume. Another surprise awaited me when I was presented to Mrs. Tolstoi. The room or saloon where she received me was handsomely furnished and modern in every way, and her costume was of the latest Parisian style. Communication was easy, because Tolstoi speaks English and his wife French. The latter language I acquired years ago in France. In this peasantlike room I have often seen the novelist surrounded by savans and professors from the university. They did not seem to fear proscription for visiting one who entertained such liberal ideas."

HANDEL'S EXPRESSIVE PATHOS.

When Handel was blind, he composed his "Samson," in which is the most touching of songs, "Total Eclipse." He sent for Beard, the most popular singer of the day. "Mr. Beard," he said, "I have made a song which I cannot sing as it ought to be sung, but I can tell you how it ought to be sung." And then he sang it with most expressive pathos. Beard stood listening in silent wonder and admiration. When it was ended, he said with tears in his eyes, "But, Mr. Handel, I can never sing it like that." This anecdote, not recorded in common biographies of Handel, used to be told by the late Edward Fitzgerald, whose letters have recently been published.—Littell's Living Age.

MILITARY DRILL.

The Grand Army of the Republic is taking considerable credit for their instrumentality in introducing military drill into many public schools. They propose to do so into all of them, if they can. For our part we think they are doing harm in this rather than good. Military drill is not a good system of physical culture. It is no substitute for a thorough course of instructions in gymnastics. It does not train all the muscles equally. It does not produce an even development of the body, but a one-sided development. In all the countries of the world where soldiers are trained it is necessary to supplement military drill by gymnastic training to get the results required. Not only is the physical effect bad, but the mental is also bad. The drill suggests war, not peace. The true patriot will fight for his country when there must be fighting, but he will use all peaceful means first. In a great majority of cases they will be all which are required.—Journal of Hygiene.

AMERICAN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

The treasurer of the Association proposes through the columns of the Register to make such announcements and suggestions as he may desire to those interested in our denominational work; also such information as may be gathered from time to time about our publications and the general conduct of business at headquarters. This is vacation time; and many of our churches are closed, and their ministers are absent from their home, seeking rest and recreation. Business is therefore quiet at headquarters.

The meetings of the two great societies of Christian Endeavor and the Young People's Christian Union, the orthodox and Universalist organizations for young people, brought a great many visitors to our rooms. An unlooked-for but very gratifying interest was manifested by many badge-wearing visitors in our building, our publications, and the pictures of our saints. One only needs to stay in this building a short time to see people who are finding their way out of the dogmatism of the old faiths; and the inquiries and expressions of interest in the new-old thought that all the law and commandments can be summed up in that one word, "love," are impressive, and many times really touching. I am sure that, if our own people, secure and satisfied as they are in the enjoyment of their own free faith, could know how much good it was in our power to do for those who are tired of the doubts and complexities of Calvinism, and who long to learn the secret of our love and trust, we should be overwhelmed with gifts to be used for the spread of the "religion of Jesus." That we shall all some day appreciate not the duty, but the privilege, of having a share in this glorious work I firmly believe. To be sure, the Church wants money; but it wants with it the same spirit that made the Galilean peasant over into a man and world Saviour,—not by the words he uttered, but by the good deeds he performed for his fellow-men, by his life and example. Let us stop wondering what is true and what is false. "If any man will do his will, he shall know of the doctrine." If every Unitarian will have faith enough to make a thoroughly sincere and exhaustive test of that assertion, we shall get something besides words, words. But we must let the preachers do the preaching. Those of us who are at headquarters will be glad to see here any and all of those who are in any way interested in our work. We shall be glad to send you tracts which you do not have to pay for, or books which you do have to pay for. Come and see us, or write to us, if you cannot come.

GEORGE W. STONE, Treas.

The Sunday School.

A Sunday-school worker in New Jersey sends the following letter to the editor of the Sunday School Times. It is a very sensible utterance concerning Sunday-school libraries:—

"For books specially written for Sunday-schools I have little or no respect; and, after reading and handling and reading about, literally, hundreds of them, the conclusion has forced itself upon me that, for a story pure and simple, we should go to the authors whose names have been stamped upon the world as standard. This is a broad statement; but you will understand it to exclude Fielding, Smollett, Sterne, even wonderful George Eliot, and others. After an experience of many years among publishers of religious literature, I have been convinced that Sunday-school books, like hymn-books and other articles of merchandise, are often made to sell, and that even among books approved by committees bigotry is so pronounced as to be deplorable. I have known... 'reading committees' to exclude books for a single sentence that may not have been satisfactory. But I hold that good writers of Sunday-school stories are so few that it is doing a scholar, who may never see good books outside of Sunday-school, an injustice to rob him of the world's great thoughts, and, by placing Sunday-school books in his hands, instil a taste that is weakly sentimental. I have written from experience, though I could cover reams about my 'ideal Sunday-school library,'—a question that to me is a burning one, and needs as much attention as corruption in politics; but I would like to know the result of your large experience."

The editor adds something of his own in the subjoined extract:—

"There is no absolute standard for a good book for the Sunday-school library. One Sunday-school wants only religious books in the library, while another would give a place to books not distinctively religious. A mission school needs different books from a church Sunday-school of the highest grade. Even within recognized limits of treatment and aim tastes and preferences differ widely as to matter and style. Whether the books are to be mainly or exclusively for the children's general reading, or more strictly for their 'Sunday reading'; or whether the library is to be made up in considerable degree of books of devotion or books useful as helps in Bible study and religious work; or, again, whether literature as literature is to be regarded in the make-up of the library,—all these questions and conditions serve to complicate the problem, and, in fact, to render its satisfactory settlement possible only by those immediately interested. So various are the points of view, then, in judging of books, that it would be impossible for the editor satisfactorily to pass opinion upon particular books with reference to their use in the Sunday-school library. One thing, however, is certain. Every school should have a standard by which its selections are made."

Religious Intelligence.

MR. RICHARD W. BOYNTON, a graduate of Meadville, Pa., has received and accepted a unanimous call to the Roslindale Unitarian church, his duties to commence in September.

THE fifth annual Lithia Springs encampment will be held this year from Saturday, August 17, to Tuesday, August 27, inclusive. The now famous Lithia Springs are situated in Shelby County, Illinois, about four miles east of Shelbyville and one mile from Middlesworth Station, on the C. C. C. & St. L. R.R. Col. John Sobieski, the famous Polish prince and American patriot, presides during the eleven days. This gentleman presided over the ten days' camp last year, and won the admiration of all who came in contact with him. Col. George W. Bain, "the silver-tongued orator" of Kentucky; Hon. John G. Woolley, the great temperance lecturer of the world; Mrs. Leonora M. Lake of St. Louis, the eloquent vice-president of the Catholic Total Abstinence Union of America; Prof. Samuel Dickie, national chairman of the Prohibition party; Rev. Dr. Carlos Martyn, leader of the National Christian Citizenship League; Rev. O. W. Stewart of Eureka, Ill., secretary of Illinois State Christian Endeavor Union; Prof. James Clement Ambrose, the famous writer and lecturer; Helen M. Barker, treasurer of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union; and many other good men and women and fine singers,—are engaged. Special days are given to National Reform, Financial School, Woman's Christian Temperance Union Work, Education, Christian Endeavor, Total Abstinence, Prohibition, Humane Society, Good Health, Children's Training, etc.

THE meeting at Ayer, notice of which we gave in our last issue, was held this week; and both the spirit of the discussions and the action taken were memorable. There were thirty-one clergymen present, and not a discordant note was struck. Both Catholics and Protestants were very strong and explicit in their declarations in favor of forming a union. There were many speeches, all of one tone; and slips of paper were handed to each clergyman to express his opinion of what the union should be. The result was that a committee on organization was appointed, and their report was adopted. It is as follows: "Name.—The United States Religious Association."

"Object.—Resolved that we form ourselves into an organization, the object of which shall be fellowship and acquaintance with each other's religious doctrines, local co-operation with each other on the basis of love to God and man and to the furtherance of all social reforms and the bringing into the kingdom of God. Clergymen in attendance at the meetings of this association shall be deemed members thereof."

"Officers.—President, two vice-presidents, corresponding secretary, recording secretary, assistant secretary, treasurer, and an executive committee of five."

"Meetings.—Semi-annually, in spring and autumn."

The report was adopted, after which the following officers were elected: president, William J. Cloues; vice-presidents, P. A. McKenna and Joshua Young; corresponding secretary, William J. Batt; recording secretary, E. I. Lindh; assistant secretary, H. F. Hallett; executive committee, A. W. Blackford, W. W. Cambell, I. F. Porter, S. P. Everett, and W. R. Buxton. The meeting was closed with the Lord's Prayer, repeated in concert by all present.

THE circular for the Unitarian Grove Meeting at Weirs from July 28 to August 4 has been issued, and promises to be more inspiring than ever. Already a large number of ministers and an unusually large number of the laity have signified their intention of coming to spend the week in the delightful social and religious atmosphere which always characterizes this unique gathering in nature's temple, beside New Hampshire's noblest lake and within sight of mountains lofty and grand. It is beyond question that these delightful meetings have been of great service in spreading the religion of Jesus; and, now that a new missionary spirit is manifesting itself in our midst, it is hoped that all those who wish to see the spirit of the Saratoga Conference triumphant throughout our borders will rally round the standard we have set up at The Weirs, and help to make this year the best year in the history of our Grove Meeting. Some of the names of our speakers this year are: Rev. E. L. Rexford, D.D., of Columbus, Ohio; Rev. J. H. Crooker of Helena, Mont.; Rev. W. W. Fenn of Chicago, Ill.; Rev. Edward J. Wright of Montpelier, Vt.; Rev. D. M. Wilson of Boston; Rev. S. C. Beane, D.D., of Newburyport, Mass.; and Rev. Charles J. Staples of Manchester, N.H. Besides these we are expecting many others who will cheer by their presence and help. One of the notable features of the week will be Layman's Day. Addresses are expected from Senator W. E. Chandler, Hon. Charles F. Stone, Hon. H. W. Parker, Col. H. B. Quinby, and others. The music for the day will be furnished by the Oberon Quartette of Laconia. Rev. William J. Tucker, D.D., president of Dartmouth College, has promised to speak on some educational theme; and it is expected that other prominent educators will also be present and deliver addresses. Mr. Washington, the head of the Tuskegee School, is to be present and speak. Plan to come to The Weirs for the week of the meeting. It will do you good, and us, too. Mr. Origin B. Young of Hopedale, Mass., will have charge of the music. We hope that many of our readers will, in making their summer arrangements, have this meeting in view. Arrangements have been made for reduced hotel and railroad rates. Any one can obtain further information by addressing Rev. Frank L. Phalen, Concord, N.H.; Rev. Charles J. Staples, Manchester, N.H.; or Rev. S. C. Beane, D.D., Newburyport, Mass.

BOSTON.—Bulfinch Place Church: Summer services are being held every Sunday as follows: Sunday-school at 10.30, with general lesson upon "Noble Lives and Noble Deeds," conducted by Mr. Eliot, assisted by members of the school. Next Sunday's lesson will be upon Whittier, with readings from his poems. Vesper services at 7.30 P.M., with special music and brief practical sermons. Mr. Eliot's subject for July 28 will be "The Gospel of Hope." The music will be furnished by the Gounod Quartette. Mr. George A. Burton, director. All are welcome.

Notwithstanding the great heat of last Sunday, a good-sized congregation listened to the speakers at the Unitarian meeting on the Common. By way of novelty, Rev. Mary T. Whitney took part with Rev. C. F. Dole in the services. The latter gave a novel explanation of the miracle of the loaves and fishes. He is reported as saying: "When the people had assembled to eat, there was only one boy who offered his dinner to all present. Christ did not create from these two loaves and three fishes the wherewithal with which the multitude was fed, but rebuked the others so that they brought him the food they had been keeping for their individual delectation. By dividing this, Christ proved that the possessions of the few might contribute to the general happiness of everybody, if wisely disposed of." Rev. Mrs. Whitney, who followed, said she believed that the Church had just awakened to the importance of what people ought to do rather than what they ought to believe. The late Christian Endeavor Convention was proof of it. "Anybody who is not up to the two great ideas of Christian Union and Christian Endeavor," she continued, "is not in the vanguard of moral enterprise. The discovery of these is the great discovery of the nineteenth century, which is destined to revolutionize the Christian world. The essence of Christianity is to do something. The ultimate result will be that Christian Endeavor will prove Christianity is practicable. It is going to take hold of everything in society, and men and women will learn that being Christians is simply being honest and upright and industrious and loyal in all business and domestic affairs." The speakers next Sunday will be Rev. Minot J. Savage and Mr. George W. Stone, treasurer of the American Unitarian Association.

ASHBY, MASS.—The twenty-seventh anniversary of the settlement of Rev. G. S. Shaw as pastor of the First Parish was observed on Sunday, July 21. The church was very finely decorated with flowers. The services consisted of one address by the pastor, a reading, with music and singing and responsive reading, etc. Mr. Shaw reported that during the year he had preached 81 times, attended—including Sunday-school—203 other meetings, officiated at 19 funerals and 3 weddings, and made 450 calls. Average attendance, 78+. Lily communion was also observed, and was very much enjoyed by the people.

DORCHESTER, MASS.—Third Religious Society: The church of the Third Religious Society of Dorchester is situated on Richmond Street, at the Lower Mills. The society which forms this religious home has always been Unitarian, having severed itself from the First Church at Meeting-house Hill in 1813, and formed an independent organization. The church has no creed; and what it stands for is probably best explained in the words of the pastor, Rev. F. B. Mott. He says: "It has no test of compulsory belief. Its members belong together, not because they have given up thinking for themselves and all agreed to accept one statement of faith, but because they have a common purpose. They unite to worship together, to seek divine guidance, strength, and help together, that they may grow each and all more and more into Christ-like life. More than anything else this may be said to be a church of the living God. For it is the divine presence, God with us here, giving whenever we ask, revealing himself whenever we seek, answering whenever we knock, upon which the church relies. That is its height. Its breadth is all Dorchester first, and then all the world." It has a large and flourishing Sunday-school, and many organizations for missionary, charitable, educational, and other purposes. Rev. F. B. Mott, the pastor of the church, is a young man, bright and interesting in personal appearance, a clear and distinct speaker, and a sermonizer of power. Last Sunday was Children's Day at the Lower Mills, and union services of all the Protestant churches were held at this church. The platform was profusely decorated with potted plants, green boughs, and flowers; while the rear of the pulpit was one bank of ferns, with the word "Welcome" in daisies. The singing was by a quartette, and the organ was played by Mrs. Martha Dana Shepard. The people are most hospitable and kind at the church, and surely endeavor to follow out their creed of "love to God and love to man."—Dorchester Beacon.

TOWER HILL, ILL.—Preparations are being made for the annual study season at Tower Hill. The institute will continue from August 8 to 18. The exercises will be in charge of Rev. A. W. Gould and Rev. J. Lloyd Jones. The subjects to be treated are varied and interesting.

WINTER HARBOR, ME.—Services at Channing Chapel as follows: July 28, Rev. George Batchelor; August 4, Rev. Samuel A. Eliot; August 11, Rev. S. M. Crothers; August 18, Rev. F. B. Hornbrooke; August 25, Rev. F. B. Hornbrooke; September 1, Rev. F. G. Peabody, D.D.; September 8, Rev. Roderick Stebbins.

—The pope's appeal to the English for unity, and the discourse of Father Vaughn, has stirred up the bishop of Manchester to reply in his preaching at the Manchester cathedral. "The bishop," says the Christian Life and Unitarian Herald, "pressed the arguments of the papal advocate to their logical extremes, and showed the claims of Rome to be untenable, adding: 'If these conclusions were accepted, then it followed that the Roman claims must be regarded as tyrannical usurpations, mischievous to Christian life and truth, and fatal to Christian freedom. As such, they must be manfully resisted by all who were loyal servants of Christ, and who discerned in Roman errors and arrogance one of the most formidable of the hindrances to the progress of the gospel.'"

Business Notices.

A Good Effort.—The public appreciates every effort on the part of any firm to lower the price of a desired luxury. One house in this city is constantly making this effort, and to-day they announce the result of their latest attempt in the reduction of the price of a good rattan rocker to the low figure of $2. The firm making this offer is the Palme Furniture Company, on Canal Street.

Dr. Lyon's Perfect Tooth Powder Gives the most perfect satisfaction. It has a world wide reputation. Recommended by dentists.

Marriages.

In Leicester, 16th inst., by Rev. Nathaniel Seaver, Jr., assisted by Rev. Samuel May, Dr. George A. Slocumb, of Worcester, and Florence White Seaver, daughter of the officiating clergyman.

In Taunton, 17th inst., by Rev. John P. Forbes, William F. Palmer and Marie E. Convers, both of Taunton.

Religious Notices.

THE address of Rev. Carl G. Horst is Athol, Mass.

Situation Wanted

By a young man 18 years old (graduate of Bryant & Stratton's) in some business where faithfulness and application will count for future advancement. Address H. A. E., Office Christian Register.

TO LET. The desirable house, 113 Highland Street, Roxbury; 11,000 feet of land; beautiful location; Norfolk House cars now run near. Two furnished cottages, West Falmouth. S. G. DAVIS, 113 Devonshire Street.

A SOPRANO SINGER of experience desires position in church choir. Highest references. Address H. M. W., care Christian Register.

THOMAS À KEMPIS.

Brother of mine, good monk with cowl'd head
Walled from that world which thou long since hast fled,
And pacing thy green close beyond the sea,
I send my heart to thee.

Down gust-sweet walks, bordered by lavender,
While eastward, westward, the mad swallows whir,
All afternoon poring thy missal fair,
Serene thou paces there.

Mixed with the words and fitting like a tune,
Thou hearest distantly the voice of June,
The little, gossiping noises in the grass,
The bees that come and pass.

Fades the long day; the pool behind the hedge
Burns like a rose within the windy sedge;
The lilies ghostlier grow in the dim air;
The convent windows flare.

Yet still thou lingerest; from pastures steep
Past the barred gate the shepherd drives his sheep;
A nightingale breaks forth, and for a space
Makes sweeter the sweet place.

Then the gray monks by hooded twos and threes
Move chapelward beneath the flaming trees;
Closing thy book, back by the alleys fair
Thou followest to prayer.

Born to these brawling days, this work-sick age,
Oft long I for thy simpler heritage;
A thought of thee is like a breath of bloom
Blown through a noisy room.

For thou art quick, not dead. I picture thee
Forever in that close beyond the sea,
And find, despite this weather's headlong stir,
Peace and a comforter.

—Lizette Woodworth Reese.

The Pulpit.

IN THE GARDEN A SEPULCHRE.

BY REV. C. S. LOCKE.

"And in the garden a sepulchre."—JOHN XIX. 41.

We may take these words as an emblem that into every life, however prosperous and attended by all the means of happiness, the element of trouble enters. The Egyptians recognized the same fact when at their feast they placed a skull on the table, and so did the author of the saying that there is no house without a skeleton in its closet.

The garden itself offers an illustration. As in summer the casual visitor traverses its paths, free from weeds or litter; as he sees the trees, with their luxuriant foliage, the lawn, with its smooth, thick carpet of verdure, the shrubbery and flower-beds, with their variety of rich colors and rare perfumes,—very little thought may he take of the labor and painstaking by which this beautiful result has been accomplished. What he beholds may seem to him the easy effect of the processes of nature instead of the hard achievement of human toil. He does not appreciate what labor has been necessary in the preparation of the soil, in clearing it of weeds, in draining it and supplying it with moisture, in protecting delicate plants from inclement winds, in driving off or destroying injurious worms and insects. He does not know by what perpetual vigilance the freshness and beauty of the garden is preserved the summer through. Or we may find an illustration in the most common vegetable you plant. We will say a squash seed. It soon sends forth its two broad leaves. You guard it carefully against an untimely frost or the fatal cut-worm. Other leaves appear, and with them yellow bugs, which you carefully destroy. Others, darker and larger and more ravenous, follow; and these, too, you vanquish. But, when a grub enters into the stem, you leave all hope behind. In fact, we find that each useful vegetable has one or more of the lower forms of animal life which share our fondness for it.

The wheat has the weevil; the apple-tree, the borer and canker-worm; and the potato, its sudden decay. An attack of army worms or grasshoppers, a freshet or a drought or a blasting, may nullify the year's labor of the husbandman and disappoint the most sanguine expectations of harvest.

And, as in the garden elegant with fountains and rockwork and rare and beautiful plants there are these foes concealed from the transient observer, but well known to the gardener or owner, so in the happiest household, in the most successful career, in the gayest and merriest life, there is an element of sadness, some disturbing cause, often unknown to the world, which prevents unalloyed enjoyment.

One of these causes is the hand-to-hand fight with nature and with men for a livelihood. The difficulties which the farmer meets are paralleled in every occupation. Where greater gains are possible, greater risks must be encountered. The sailor with fortune for himself and family may sink in sight of his home. The manufacturer and mechanic in a dull time may lose the profits of a busy season, or, still worse, may in their prosperity have spent in advance the probable earnings of the future, and find themselves face to face with bankruptcy and financial ruin and compulsory dependence. It is no idle figure of speech when a family, seeing its means of comfortable support diminishing, says that the wolf is approaching its door.

I think we may fairly say that the hostile elements and insects, numerous and busy as they are, with which the farmer contends, hardly bear comparison in their importance with the difficulties that beset those engaged in mercantile and financial business. The lack of punctuality on the part of a debtor may lead to the most disastrous results. Honest enterprises that promised much turn out worthless or are superseded by something better. The follies of friends prove as fatal as the competition and fraud of enemies. A change of tide in business, the introduction of new methods, the production of another class of articles, merely a change in the fashions, the rushing in of hundreds into a profitable employment where there was only room for tens,—a hundred unforeseen contingencies may bring disaster, may bring it, too, not in youth when we are elastic and versatile, can spring from a lost chance to one possibly successful, but after maturity, when the character and habits are formed, when we have lost the ability of adapting ourselves to new things, must do what we have done or do nothing. A few persons obtain the success which raises them above anxiety and care for the future, and which affords them means and leisure for the indulgence of their special tastes and aptitudes; but the majority of men will own that the struggle for a livelihood, a good thing though it be, as a sepulchre is a good thing, is still a sepulchre in the beautiful garden of life.

Another disturbing element is ill-health. I do not refer to short and limited sickness, though this often interrupts greatly one's plans and occupations. I mean those ailments which are not very evident except to those who suffer from them, and which hinder, but do not prevent activity, and which hardly seem to shorten life. We know that, not only the quantity of our work is diminished, but its quality is much impaired, if we are suffering with rheumatism or dyspepsia or headache. A certain amount of the energy which we would gladly put into our labor is taken up in bearing pain patiently, and the task which the vigorous body would have performed with alacrity and pleasure becomes burdensome and distasteful. The attention is distracted, the power of application impaired, continuous effort made impossible, the ability for expression rendered defective, the manner modified, the temper affected, the range of culture and useful exertion limited, often by some chronic ailment hardly known except by the sufferer. The bite of a mosquito or the sting of a bee, though their effects are very transient, show us in some slight way how chronic illness may affect its subjects. Next to good qualities of character we may call sound health the most precious of possessions. Our vigor and cheerfulness, our freedom from anxiety and depression, our resolution in carrying forward our pursuits, our gentility and gaiety in society, our serenity under misfortune, and our carelessness with reference to adverse circumstances, depend upon our good health. How pitiable, too, is the lot of those whom sickness renders helpless and dependent, who linger long years in paralysis or consumption or some chronic disease without hope of recovery! They may have the solace which comes from the affection of relatives and friends, they may have wealth to procure every possible alleviation and comfort; but a melancholy shadow has fallen upon their life which can never be lifted. From whatever point of view they look, there is a sepulchre in their garden.

Not very different from this matter of ill-health is that of hereditary tendencies. While we do not believe that "in Adam's fall we sinned all," or that we are held guilty for the transgression of our first parents, we know that physical and moral qualities run along the line of descent. Your rate of premium in obtaining a life insurance will be modified by the record of your ancestors. Intemperance, a propensity to dishonesty or theft or more violent crimes, run in families. Another evil element, which I may suggest, but not fully describe, is domestic discord. I do not mean those cases where brutality resorts to physical violence, but those in which with good intentions there is uncongeniality of disposition. The two yoke-fellows do not draw well together. One of them may be exacting, may not appreciate the severity of the other's toil nor be satisfied with its results. So fault-finding and discontent afflict one member of the family, and the sense of hard conditions and of bearing unmerited disapprobation renders miserable the other. One, perhaps, is extravagant; the other, penurious: one, capable and enterprising; the other, slack and injudicious. An indolent, dissipated, thriftless husband will spoil the results of a good wife's neatness, economy, and good management. A wife ambitious for social position, fond of company and dress, and despising work, has brought many a hard-working husband after years of struggle to bankruptcy. I remember seeing in the Louvre a painting of the deluge. Its composition was something like this. An athletic man was endeavoring to escape from the rapidly rising waters. On his shoulders was his aged father. With one hand he grasped the arm of his wife, who was holding an infant, while an older child clung to her garments. With the other he had seized the branch of a tree on the high bank above. The branch had already broken before meeting half the burden it would be called upon to bear, and it was evident that the whole family must sink beneath the flood. The face of the principal figure interpreted to me the agony and despair of men whose helpless families, often innocently, but sometimes wilfully, have dragged them into ruin. It would of course be easy to find pictures, emblems of what actually exist, of united, harmonious families, whose members are joined by the closest affection and confidence, delight in one another's companionship, and work for the same objects. It would be difficult to enumerate the bitter ingredients which, when there is no actual cruelty, spoil the sweetness of home. Dissimilarity of tastes, different views of the nature and objects of life, a gradual divergence through differences of occupation and development, lack of regard for each other's feelings,—as if the marriage ceremony shut out the claim for mutual courtesy and gave one human being the same proprietary right in another that he has over a horse or a dog,—differences with respect to the management and discipline of the family, peevishness, fretfulness, a fault-finding disposition, ill-temper, moroseness, and sulkiness, if they are not sepulchres of love, are at least unsightly weeds in the garden of home. Sometimes, too, when husband and wife are well agreed, children will afford anxiety. Their lack of health may occasion solicitude, and their death cause a settled sorrow. Without being ill-disposed, they may disappoint you in their mental and moral qualities and in their choice of occupation. Or, still worse, they may yield to temptation, become the victims of evil habits, the foes of good order, a perpetual source of distress. Thus in homes where father, mother, brothers, and sisters should find rest, sympathy, recreation, comfort, help, enjoyment, there is, it would often seem, a needless painful element, without which many other burdens and difficulties would be cheerfully met. It is comparatively easy for the members of an affectionate family to encounter the buffets of fortune, and in one another's love and helpfulness to find a solace for every kind of trial.

The last factor which I shall mention, and the one which, perhaps, mars most the beauty of life, is our innate evil tendencies. We do not believe that human beings are born totally depraved, we do not believe that any one sins until, consciously and wilfully, he transgresses his sense of moral obligation; but we know that there have existed within us, from our earliest remembrance, inclinations which, unless subdued and controlled, will issue in wrong-doing. No effort or education will completely eradicate them. What is called in the New Testament "the new birth" may develop within us a sense of duty and of our filial relations to God which will help us to overcome our lower nature; but we shall still find, like Paul, that, when we would do good, evil is present with us. By becoming a Christian, you do not get rid of your former self: you simply lay yourself open to those motives, encouragements, examples, and principles which will help you in self-conquest.

He who would be my disciple, says Jesus, must take up his cross daily and follow me, meaning that every day we must contend against the indolence, the appetites, the inclinations, and the desires that would lead us astray or prevent one good action, and that we must subdue those emotions of vanity, envy, jealousy, and uncharitableness to which we may be subject. This is the great personal contest in which we each are engaged. Victory brings to the soul salvation: defeat issues in the soul's ruin. Often it is the case that those tendencies are so held in check as not to result in wrong action. Sometimes they may not become manifest to one's most intimate friends; but I think that those whose lives are most saintly will tell you that they have always contended with this enemy within, and that, the stronger has been the aspiration after excellence, the more ardent has been the longing for a perfect character and a spotless life, the keener has been the conscience, correspondingly greater has been the suffering which this sense of deficiency and of easily besetting sins has caused.

In conclusion the question comes, How shall we deal with this sepulchre in the garden? We cannot remove it. Stray as we will through the shady bowers and trees, we come back to it. As we look upon the sweetest flowers and pluck the rarest fruit, we catch glances of its ghostly aspect. We turn obstinately from it, and it becomes more vividly present to our imagination. We may chafe at its presence, we may seek in every way to divert our attention from it, but without success. It is necessary to accept it as an element of our lives and to make the best of it. Some of you remember the old graveyards, overgrown with weeds; the moss-covered-slate slabs, half prostrate and rudely sculptured with death's-heads and cross-bones; their whole aspect emblematic of gloom and dismal neglect. You remember the tomb, with its loosening mortar and its tumbling stones and creaking iron door and chilly breath. With these you have contrasted the cemeteries of later days. You have walked, perhaps, through Mt. Auburn or Forest Hills or Greenwood, have admired the graceful monuments, with their hopeful inscriptions, the well-trimmed sward and the beds of flowering plants. Thus in the old graveyards and in the modern cemetery are presented to us two classes of lives,—one class which sees only the sepulchre in the garden, and the other which makes a garden around the sepulchre. One class refuses to be comforted. Those belonging to it fasten their thoughts on their personal ills without thinking of or endeavoring to use the mitigating or favorable circumstances of their lot. The ills that trouble them, when compared with those that others suffer, may be trifling. They may be those that a little effort or sacrifice of pride or concession would overcome, but they persist in being wretched. Again, there are those whose

CHANDLER & CO.

Comfortable, Easy Summer Gloves.

During the warm summer days Kid gloves are distressing, and Silk gloves handsome and expensive, but not very serviceable.

We have always in stock

The Ideal Summer Glove.

Fits like a kid glove, and wears perfectly Made of Silk and Lisle, with buttons, 75c., and without buttons, 60c. per pair.

Ask to see

THE IDEAL SUMMER GLOVE.

CHANDLER & CO.,

Winter St., Boston,

hopeful, cheerful, courageous spirit no disaster can cast down. Pining in sickness, tortured with pain, looking forward to death, they can say, "In whatsoever state I am, I have learned to be therewith content." Around the painful conditions to which they are subject they have assembled whatever is beautiful and joyous in nature, and, without asking it,—indeed, through humility not expecting it,—have won the friendliest sympathy and affection. With them the sepulchre is not concealed; but it is wreathed with garlands of flowers, and its open door discloses not gloom and dreariness, but seems a gateway to a light more radiant than that of this world,—a gateway to that city of God which has no need of the sun, neither of the moon to shine in it; for the glory of God lightens it, and the Lamb is the light thereof.

Sermon Gleanings.

THE FRIENDSHIP OF RELIGIONS.

BY REV. JOHN W. CHADWICK.

Some of you may ask, Do not the different religions really differ as higher and lower, better and worse? It is a question much more easily asked than answered. It seems to me that the proportion of wheat to chaff is much greater in the Hebrew and Christian Scriptures than in any others. It seems to me that the personality of Jesus is infinitely more engaging than the personality of Confucius or Mohammed or Buddha. Zoroaster, or Zarathustra, as they call him nowadays, is too remote for a comparison. But probably neither of these things appears to be so to the Mohammedan, Buddhist, or Confucian, as well qualified to judge as I am in the matter. And this, not only because of the bias of affection and association, but because their central personality, their great religious teacher, is bone of their bone and flesh of their flesh. What is betterness in religion? It is nothing absolute: it is something relative. Would Phillips Brooks's religion, as he preached it from the pulpit of his beautiful Trinity, have been any better for the Negroes of the rice swamps and the cotton fields than that of their own Methodist exhorters? It would not have been half so good. Half!—not a hundredth part! What could our administration of religion here do for the multitude of people who worship at the end of the next block? Less a good deal than theirs could do for us. I never get into the tide of the great happy swarm that comes surging out of St. Peter's every Sunday morning just at my hour without thanking God that these people also have their symbol of religion, and that, irrational and tawdry though it be, it is a symbol and a picture of the reality and seriousness of human life, of the goodness of God in the land of the living and beyond the gates of death, of the beauty of divine compassion, of the exigencies of a moral law. Things are good that serve a useful end. Whether a grand piano is better than a dredging shovel depends on what you want to do,—evoke an excellent music or dredge a muddy dock. You will get no music out of your shovel, no dredging out of your piano. The religions of the lowest races are better for those races than the religion of Martineau and Frothingham and Potter. The religious instincts of humanity in one respect are like the green-eyed monster jealousy,—“they make the meat they feed on.” They fashion the religions of the world according to the needs of men at different stages of their growth. And it is not as if any expression of religion were an expression of the absolute reality. At the best, we are only trying to say something,—not saying it right out sufficiently and perfectly. Our symbol may be a more refined and delicate symbol than some others, but it is a symbol still. And this ought to gender in our minds a wholesome modesty, and to lay a hushing finger on our lips.

There were a good many people at the Parliament of Religions who saw the heavens opened, and beheld a vision of the religion of the future, in which there should be an end of all sectarian names and divisions,—no more Presbyterians or Methodists, no more Christians or Buddhists, but one great, all-including body of believers. That is a vision which has for me no particular attractions. It is as impracticable as the dream of a universal republic, and quite as undesirable as that. I cherish a better and more reasonable hope. It is that, with little or no diminution of the present multiplicity of sects and households of belief and faith, we may come into an ever larger sympathy, each cultivating our own little patch with loving and assiduous care, but each rejoicing in the others' flowers and fruitage, not always harping on their barrenness and weeds; taking down all the fences, but allowing the ancient landmarks to remain; loyal to our own traditions, reverent of all those that others cherish with a glowing heart. At the same time, if we have a noble confidence in our ideas and beliefs, we must do what we can to lead those who do not now see how true and beautiful they are, how noble and inspiring, how sweet and grand. We must do this in persuasive words, and much more with persuasive deeds, seeing to it that our walk and conversation show that our ideas and beliefs are no barren virgins, but fruitful mothers of fair-featured, large-limbed purposes and actions, strong for the doing of brave things and the building-up of God's eternal kingdom among men. And we must do these things, not that we may have dominion over men's faith, but that we may be helpers of their joy. If those whom we can cheer and brighten can conscientiously and happily remain in their old homes, so much the better: if they cannot, then let them be thrice welcome to our table and our hearth. But it is a matter of vastly more importance that we make our life true and deep than that we have bigger sheepfolds and a greater multitude of sheep. So, not to-morrow, and not soon, shall come to pass the prophecy of one who saw in mystic vision

“A temple, neither pagod, mosque, nor church,
But loftier, simpler, always open door'd
To every breath from heaven; and Truth and Peace
And Love and Justice came and dwelt therein,” and that of him who said, “It shall have heaven and earth for its beams and rafters, science for symbol and illustration; it will fast enough gather beauty, music, picture, poetry.”

Spiritual Life.

Minutes are like gold dust, which is never so fine that it cannot be used or that it loses any of its value.—Philip Stafford Moxom.

If your life is dark, then walk by faith; and God is pledged to keep you as safe as if you could understand everything.—Horace Bushnell.

To be in line with God's great purposes is to be the conductor through which the resistless currents of God's sovereign will are passing.—Merrill E. Gates.

Paradise is here, visible and tangible by mortal eyes and hands, whenever self is lost in loving, whenever the narrow limits of personality are beaten down by the inrush of the divine Spirit.—Mrs. Humphry Ward.

To-day all science, all philosophy, and all religion in the minds of its interpreters conspire to show us what a profound faith has been reached by any man who can sincerely say, “I accept the universe.”—John Learned.

One cannot too soon forget his errors and misdemeanors. To dwell long upon them is to add to the offence. Not to grieve long for any action, but to go immediately and do freshly and otherwise, subtracts so much from the wrong.—Thoreau.

How serene, how beautiful, how sublime, the thought that the strongest power in the universe is on the side of our utter alliance with the highest and holiest kinships of our nature! “Greater is He that is in you than he that is in the world.”—Mrs. Gates.

If he could doubt on his triumphant cross, How much more I in the defeat and loss Of seeing all my selfish dreams fulfilled, Of having lived the very life I willed, Of being all that I desire to be? My God, my God! why hast thou forsaken me? —W. D. Howells.

Instead of shrinking back from life's ordeals, we should welcome them as opportunities long desired to prove our faithfulness, to recite our lesson once again,—this time more perfectly, to expiate, perhaps, some long past faithlessness. How eagerly we should then go about our tasks, how purposeful would life become!—Letters from an Unknown Friend.

This is the law, not Moses' law, but the gospel law; the law of liberty, by which a man becomes truly free, because he has trampled under foot the passions of his own selfish flesh, till his immortal spirit can ascend free into the light of God. Remember that Saint Paul always couples with the resurrection and ascension of our bodies in the next life the resurrection and ascension of our souls in this life.—Charles Kingsley.

Our being is not quite buried in torpor and darkness. Already it is bursting out into light and expansion. Full it is of epochs and heroic crises. It feels itself called upon to act and to advance. And to this earth-strife that presses upon us every day, to this solemn waiting, to this dim bordering upon the realm of boundless light, is there not a voice that says: “Onward! Onward forever!”—Orville Dewey.

Spirit of the Press.

The Sacred Heart Review has this to say in relation to a movement in Chicago to read the Bible in the public schools:—

A significant movement, inasmuch as it furnishes plain evidence that the Catholic theory of education is commending itself more and more to thoughtful and intelligent non-Catholics, is the one that has been inaugurated out in Chicago, with a view of introducing into the public schools the reading of portions of the Sacred Scriptures regarding whose interpretation and meaning all Christians are in accord. Several prominent members of the Catholic hierarchy have spoken in approval of this plan, and Cardinal Gibbons earnestly commends it. “The men and women of our day,” wrote the cardinal, in reply to a request for his views on the subject, “who are educated in our public schools will, I am sure, be much better themselves, and will also be able to transmit to their children an inheritance of true virtue and deep morality if at school they are brought to the knowledge of Biblical facts and teachings.” The approval which Cardinal Gibbons and other Catholic prelates have given to this Chicago plan should not, however, be interpreted as meaning that they consider the daily reading of a few Scriptural passages all the religious instruction a child requires during its school days.

Zion's Herald answers below the question which has often been asked, why the Methodists have not joined the Christian Endeavorers, and aims to clear the policy of separation from the charge of narrow exclusiveness or sectarianism:—

A sufficient answer to such a charge should be found in the indubitable fact that the Methodist denomination in all its history has been noted pre-eminently for its spirit of fraternity and catholicity. Wesley, its founder, was one of the most fraternal and tolerant of men, impressing his spirit so strongly upon his followers that it descends through the generations. The simple and only reason that Methodism is not included in the Christian Endeavor Society is because it was discovered by actual experience that the training given, while excellent and most helpful to the Congregationalist and Presbyterian, did not develop our young people at their best according to the Methodist type and pattern. Methodism is peculiar in spirit and polity, as was the apostolic Church. To make the best Methodist Christian, it is found that our own unmixed training is the more effective. And is the desire of the Methodist family to train and nurture its own children in its own peculiar way a manifestation of bigotry and sectarianism? Not so to any person who intelligently understands our Church,—its genius, spirit, and peculiar work. Is it reasonable to ask a denomination with a membership of nearly five millions to surrender its youth to another denomination for education and moulding?

The Churchman thus discourses on democracy in the Church:—

The realization of the democracy and absolute equality of all men in the realm of religion is being discovered to be a very serious difficulty in our day, certainly not less so than in the apostolic age. Prestige and distinctions and privileges that belong to men in the secular world will crowd into the Church. Pride and exclusiveness and aloofness, which men cultivate as social beings, will obtrude and express themselves in relations that we are pleased to call purely religious. And the question that is crowding upon the Church's consciousness to-day more, possibly, than any other question, and is asking itself in all manner of ways, is the old-new question, How shall the Church get rid of this persistent endeavor of the purely worldly elements of life to establish and maintain differences and distinctions in religious relations, the rich bidding the poor keep their distance in the words, “Stand thou there, or sit under my footstool”? How shall artificial classifications be simply merged and lost in a common, equal, divine heritage as children of one common Father? One of the most distinctive qualities and attributes of the Church of God is its absolute impartiality as it utters its message and does its work in this time-world. It knows neither Jew nor Gentile, neither black nor white. Translating this impartiality into modern phraseology, the Church is supposed to know neither capital nor labor, neither millionaire nor pauper, neither employer of labor nor the laborer himself, as making a difference. God is no respecter of persons. His Church cannot have “the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Lord of glory, with respect of persons.” In truth, the Church is the only leveller among all the forces that are making and shaping human destiny. It is the only institution known to history that has the authority to “put down the mighty from their seat and exalt them of low degree.” Ideally, the Church is an absolute democracy, recognizing temporal distinctions, it is true, recognizing kings and rulers and worldly authorities; but in her own province, as a spiritual kingdom for the government of men before God, she knows no difference, the meanest and poorest and least accounted of having the same rights and privileges and position as the most exalted in human affairs.

Dr. C. H. Parkhurst writes vigorously in the Independent on “Church Unity,” as will be seen from the following:—

Ecclesiastical cleavage lines are not of a kind to be closed up by concocting a scheme of church reunion, either federal or organic. It is not one of those issues that can be consummated by an arrangement. People cannot be made ecclesiastically cohesive by any amount of ecclesiastical fixing and ecclesiastical tinkering. The secret of true and constructive church union and church unity lies only in the intensifying of the cohesive power, and the cohesive power of the Church is the mutual love of Christ and his people. Anything that presumes to take the place of that is a cheap and profitless subterfuge. Coming together in convention, and attempting to lay down lines upon which the unifying experiment can proceed, exhibits an evidence of everything but just the one thing that is necessary; and for people to ruminate upon methods by which the thing shall be done is considerably like a congress of botanical savans convening to decide upon the steps by which a mass of inorganic matter shall be constructed into an organized plant. There is no working power in a scheme. . . . We are not going to become one in the sense intended by our Lord, by means of minimizing the respects in which we differ, but by accentuating and maximizing the one great respect wherein we are in accord. There is only one key-note in which the music of a united Church can be composed, and that is the note of a living Christ with whom our life is hid in God. Now it does not conduce very much to that result to treat different modes of doctrinal opinion

$2 Rattan Rocker.

Rattan furniture is usually expensive. As we sell an immense quantity of it, we are enabled to quote prices which are sometimes ridiculously below other houses.

It has been our constant endeavor to secure a good Rattan Rocker which could be sold as low as $2. This is impossible in all rattan; but, by making the frame only of maple and the rest of the chair of rattan, we have at last accomplished it. This is practically a rattan chair, and has all the extreme comfort of one.

The entire seat, back, and head-rest are of closely woven rattan, which is twice as enjoyable as the open-work rattan patterns, since they all tire the body after prolonged sitting.

We build this chair with broad arm-rests, seat low to the floor, and long roll rockers. At our price it has never been equalled.

PAINE FURNITURE CO.,
48 CANAL STREET.

as having all about the same value, and none of them to be exactly credited with having any value. That easy-going indifference which keeps good-natured toward all opinions, for the reason that it cares nothing in particular about any opinion, does not denote either an intellectual or a moral tone that makes candidacy either for the reception of great blessing or for its conveyance. We are not going to reach church unity by dropping, all of us, to the dead level of doctrinal "don't care," but by rising to the positive altitude of mutual coherence in a loved and living Christ.

Literature.

STORY OF THE LIFE OF JESUS FOR THE YOUNG, TOLD FROM AN ETHICAL STANDPOINT.*

Like Brahma, in the famous song of Emerson, the Bible seems to sing,—

"They reckon ill who leave me out;
When me they fly, I am the wings."

Dr. Felix Adler, recently addressing the Unitarian Sunday School Union in New York, contended that the Bible is the most indispensable of all helps in the religious instruction of the young. But what he had in mind was almost exclusively the Old Testament stories of the patriarchs. To hook the New Testament parables and the other teachings of Jesus to some useful end seemed to him a far more difficult business. But it is a business that Mr. Sheldon has essayed with ample courage, if not altogether happily. What he has attempted is to give us a purely ethical Jesus; to eliminate not only the "theology," but the religion that is implicated in the Gospels, as warp with woof in any fabric of the loom. Failure was to be expected from such a tremendous tour de force. The wonder is that the failure is not much more conspicuous. The candid reader will be surprised that so many sayings of Jesus can be economized for purely ethical purposes without doing them violence, that so many more can be economized with very little violence. Mr. Sheldon would have done better if he had remained content with these. Within their range his appreciation of the character and teachings of Jesus is very beautiful. We have never read an orthodox account of Jesus that has made his human worth and sympathy so great and wonderful. Here is an appreciation to which not many of our Unitarian radicals attain, and fewer of our Unitarian conservatives. But, either to task his ingenuity or through unwillingness to deny himself so many tempting things, Mr. Sheldon has gone far beyond those that with little or no violence offer themselves to purely ethical uses, and subjected to the stress of his ideal a great many that have not lent themselves at all willingly or gracefully to his purpose. In furtherance of this purpose, he has truncated and garbled many passages in a manner that can be hardly less offensive to the Christian theist than to the agnostic who has a lively sense of the right of a great man to his own thought. The curtailments and suppressions are often remarkably ingenious, but they will stir up many readers to righteous indignation and excite many others to Homeric laughter. It is impossible to avoid the impression that Mr. Sheldon is himself wholly without humor. A very little would have enabled him to see how ridiculous some of his circumlocutions would appear to others. It is a subordinate matter that he has allowed himself to use the birth legends freely, including the birth at Bethlehem. This certainly is superfluous disrespect to critical sincerity. "The Christmas Poem," as Mr. Gannett calls it, is very beautiful; but, if freely used with children, the indication that it is poetry, and not fact, should be made clearer than it is here by such phrases as "it is said" or "according to the tale," which would not arrest the attention of a child.

Mr. Sheldon's enthusiasm for the life and character of Jesus is beyond dispute. He says: "I think it the most beautiful story in the world. I look upon it as the most beautiful life that was ever lived." But he has presented a picture of this life so partial that it is terribly misleading. Here are beautiful lessons which we would not willingly deny ourselves. But whoever uses them is bound to tell his pupils that Jesus was very different from the person represented here; that, for better or for worse, he trusted in a heavenly Father, and had his name continually on his lips. It is a serious question whether, in order to economize the ethical import of Jesus, Mr. Sheldon was justified in presenting him to us in this moon-faced way,—one side in absolute darkness. We are inclined to think that he was not, while warmly grateful for the many beautiful and noble things the book contains. J. W. C.

THE REBEL QUEEN. A Novel. By Walter Besant. Illustrated. New York: Harper & Brothers.—Mr. Besant in this novel deals chiefly with Jewish thought and life. Though the scenes are in England, the characters represent the chosen people, with the customs, ideas, and peculiarities of race and religion which have grown out of this ancient faith. "The Rebel Queen," on whom the story chiefly hinges, is Madame Alveda, a woman of strong personality, endowed with a brilliant mind and an heir to an immense fortune. Early in life she marries a man whom she loves. Though poor in purse, he is rich in the promise of future intellectual achievements. He is thoroughly a Jew in his faith, and believes that God ordained that the woman should obey the man. At this the proud spirit of the young wife rebels, and she asserts the equality of the woman with the man. Though they love each other, their natures are so positive that neither will yield. So, after a few months of wedded life, they agree to separate. The husband for a long period disappears, and is thought to have died. A girl is born; and the mother, renouncing her faith and people, becomes the champion for woman's equality and enfranchisement. This is the great purpose of her life. She writes a book on "The Condition of Women," which is read throughout the world; and she is everywhere recognized as the leader of "the cause." This absorption and the renunciation of her faith and people make her life one of isolation and void of personal attachments. In this atmosphere the daughter lives; and, though she has everything which wealth can command and the aid of the best teachers, she grows up without any living personal contact with life around her. With all her beauty, high aspirations, and a quick mind, in her isolation from all family connections she looks upon the world as if it were a show. But her noble nature tires of this; and, in order to see common life as it is, she leaves her home, with its rich surroundings, and mingles for a short time with those of the "common lot." At once a new world of experience opens upon her. An eager interest is awakened, and she feels the intense reality of life. By a series of events she becomes associated with persons who are near family relatives. Among others she meets her father. But to her he figures as a wood-carver, yet full of high and rich talk. He lives in an ideal world, and with a prophet's faith outlines the future reign of righteousness and love on earth. The "Rebel Queen," in the height of her career, finds her fortune swept away; and her daughter, instead of desiring to take up the "cause," prefers to be a woman and become one of the "common lot." Through all this experience the woman's heart in the girl blossoms into a sweet and beautiful love for one who has long been a valued friend, and in the end she marries. The truth at last comes out that the wood-carver is her father, and many of her companions are her relatives. From this brief outline and the scenes and persons woven into it, we have ample material for the portraiture of character, and these have been used with skill and power by the author. While the whole book breathes a Jewish atmosphere, there is a deep human element underneath which is very striking. It may seem to some readers that justice has not been done to the "cause," or to Madame Alveda as its leader. But such must keep in mind that the persons who act and speak are Jews, and therefore represent their ideas, and not necessarily the opinions of the author. "The Rebel Queen" bears the stamp of the author's mind, and has both interest and power.

STUDIES OF MEN. By George W. Smalley. New York: Harper & Brothers.—With one or two exceptions, these "Studies of Men" were written by Mr. Smalley as London letters for the New York Tribune. They well deserve their present exaltation to the dignity of literature in a handsome book. Their defects are obvious. Mr. Smalley "dearly loves a lord"; and, when he has dined with one, how is he straightened until he has let us know about it! It is evident, also, that he is continually under the necessity of compliment, writing, as he is, of distinguished people whom he is meeting socially. Where he is least restrained, we are obliged to wonder if he is on dining terms with this or that, Lord Salisbury, for example. A further limitation comes from the fact that many of these studies have an obituary character, and hence an adherence to the nil nisi rule more positive than would otherwise have obtained. Sometimes, too, we have the bias of closer personal relations. This is particularly evident in the chapter on Lord Randolph Churchill. Hardly can Mr. Smalley expect that any one who knows anything about that gentleman will accept his statement as a final one. His taking up with Boulanger marked his capacity for blundering; and that, after this, he should not have known that he could not be persona grata as the English minister to France is almost incredible. Last, but not least, Mr. Smalley's taste is sometimes weak in proportion as his love of gossip is strong. When the Tennyson letters appeared in the Tribune, we were astonished that Mr. Smalley could retail two such abominable stories as those of Tennyson's brutal manners in the matter of port wine. We expected to find them omitted here; but they are here, as gross, and probably as false, as ever. But these qualifications must not be insisted on too much. Notwithstanding them, the book is one of very great interest, and would help any one to a better appreciation of current English politics. Mr. Smalley has a happy knack of describing his various personalities. He begins with Cardinal Newman and he ends with George William Curtis, the former being one of his most inadequate appreciations. Of the more important between these extremes are Balfour, Parnell, Spurgeon, Jowett, Tyndall, Froude, Rosebery, Carnot. Several of these studies are made up of letters of different periods, and afford a panoramic view of this or that great career. Mr. Smalley is always "the Tory squire," but his admirations are not at the mercy of his political opinions. He has much more admiration for Gladstone than for Salisbury. His praise of him is generally direct, his blame taking the form of slur and innuendo. It is certainly a matter for regret that Mr. Smalley has returned to America, to be the American correspondent of the London Times. But such papers as those on Holmes, Winthrop, and Curtis are among the most delightful in the book; and it is greatly to be hoped that the Tribune will retain him for such things.

THREESCORE AND TEN YEARS—1820 TO 1890: RECOLLECTIONS. By W. J. Linton. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.—Mr. Linton's picture—an admirable likeness—looks the man he is, at once artist and revolutionist. His book suffers a good deal from the multitude of his acquaintances and friends. So touch and go is the treatment that the chapters almost degenerate into so many catalogues of distinguished names. It is hardly worth while to be told that Mr. Linton knew such or such an one while we are not told anything about him; and, if there had been less of mere naming in some parts, there might have been more of expansion in others. His likes and dislikes are set down with equal candor and simplicity. He did not think much of Dickens, and he admired Thackeray immensely. He compares Holyoake with Bradlaugh, much to the former's disadvantage. Among his early intimates were W. J. Fox and the Flower sisters. The way in which Browning's acquaintance with them is spoken of, as already a thing of the past in 1837, does not agree with the representation in Mrs. Sutherland Orr's biography. The Chartist agitation, in which Mr. Linton took an active part, is dwelt on a little more than other matters; and still the treatment is extremely slight. Leigh Hunt is cooked as if Mr. Linton loved him, as he plainly did. It was, it seems, his son Thornton who was the criminal accomplice of the first Mrs. G. H. Lewes. Mr. Linton's admiration of Mazzini was very great, and he takes up the cudgels for him against Mr. and Mrs. Carlyle with good effect. Mr. Linton came to the United States in 1866 with no thought of remaining, but he has never been able to get away. As a revolutionist, his occupation has been gone; but, as one of the great engravers of the world, he has had generous appreciation and had troops of friends. There is a queer letter from Whittier, saying that his birthday was "the very last of 1807." The critical opinion is that it was December 17, and Whittier's reckoning was apparently a little out.

THE WORLD AS THE SUBJECT OF REDEMPTION. Eight Lectures delivered before the University of Oxford in the year 1883. By Hon. and Rev. W. H. Fremantle, M.A., Canon of Canterbury and Fellow of Balliol College, Oxford. With an introduction by Richard T. Ely, Ph.D., LL.D. Second edition, revised. New York and London: Longmans, Green & Co.—The second edition of Canon Fremantle's book is opportune. When it first appeared in London, it fell flat on the English public, so that the publishers were inclined to give it up as dead. In the university where the lectures were given the opinions were not cordially received, but regarded as new and revolutionary. But in this country the book fell as good seed cast into more fruitful soil; and its reception has induced the author to publish a new American edition, with a fuller preface and introduction by Prof. Ely. Although the first edition was noticed in our columns, it is worthy of a second consideration, because the subject treated is one of the most important in its practical application. It begins with the maxim that Christianity is primarily a life, and only secondarily a system of doctrines, public worship, and clerical government; that the world, the whole of human society, is to be brought under the power of Christ; that God is working for the redemption of the world through all the agencies of secular life, as well as through the specific forms of doctrine or worship,—that, in fact, all life is one, and that all its manifestations, whether in art, literature, government, or business, is a part of the method by which God designs to build up in this world a divine kingdom. Christ's religion is for the present life, as well as for that which is to come. These ideas are fully unfolded; and, aside from some peculiarities of the authors, we have presented a larger view of religion, and one fitted to inspire lofty ideals and to awaken grander hopes. In reading this book, one's thought is stimulated and the mind moves in a wider sweep, and we dwell in a region of lofty ideas. These lectures will well repay careful study, especially by the young; and no minister who would keep in touch with the best and noblest thought and aspiration should fail to have it in his library.

AN EXPERIMENT IN ALTRUISM. By Elizabeth Hastings. New York: Macmillan & Co.—The temper of this book is sufficiently indicated in a motto on the title-page taken from Sir Thomas Browne. It is, "The world, which took but six days to make, is like to take six thousand to make out." That is to say, none of our social panaceas are going to reform society altogether and bring in the millennial dawn. The book is very different in its intention from Mr. Howells's "Visit to Altruria." That is a criticism on our present methods and a suggestion of a new order: this is a criticism on the new methods, gentle and serene; if cynical, very delicately so. The stage is not a little crowded, a great many different phases of social effort being exhibited,—the college settlement in the slums, the anarchist, the pessimist. There is also a woman doctor, who furnishes quite as much of the criticism on the reformers as the author. "Shovelling fog" is her description of their social theorizing. There is a "Butterfly-hunter," as they call him,—an entomologist, who has found a rare specimen, but has never been able to make out its entire history. Perhaps he is meant for a symbol of the average sociologist. The final judgment on the college settlement is that there is no particular objection to its being tried by any number of young men with Ph.D. degrees and honest enthusiasm and a saving sense of fun. But, then, there is no objection to young men's carrying up their coal anywhere, and blacking their own boots, and being on terms of simple, sweet humanity with all persons who are serving them at home or abroad. The Lad, so called, who writes a book and makes it as good as he can, seems to send his arrow nearest to the white. There are good things all the way along, and the book is one that can be particularly commended to the professional reformer. It may not kill his appetite for panaceas, but it will give him food for thought.

THE CONDITION OF WOMAN IN THE UNITED STATES: A TRAVELLER'S NOTES. By Madame Blanc. Translated by Abby Langdon Alger. Boston: Roberts Brothers. The women who desire to see themselves as others see them will here find a sympathetic and, in the main, accurate picture. Madame Blanc must have taken notes very diligently, for the book is packed with facts. She gives hearty and honest praise

If you wish your Linen White as Snow

Sunlight Soap

will make it so.

Lever Bros., Ltd., Hudson and Harrison Sts., New York.

*STORY OF THE LIFE OF JESUS FOR THE YOUNG, Told from an Ethical Standpoint. By W. L. Sheldon, lecturer of the ethical society of St. Louis, S. Barnes Weston, publisher, Philadelphia.

where praise is deserved, and her criticisms are kindly. The description of a day at Hull House is admirable in its fidelity, and the writer evidently caught the spirit of the place surprisingly. So of her account of the Boston Woman's Club, the preaching of Julia Ward Howe, and many another place and scene. Madame Blanc's opinions about the Negro race are not quite what one would expect from a Frenchwoman, and they are expressed in one place in words that will cut like a knife: "At New Orleans . . . I saw a class of little Negro girls, with faces like monkeys, studying Greek; and the disgust expressed by their former masters seemed to me quite justified." "Their former masters" never existed; for, thank Heaven, the days of slavery are so far behind us that no "little girls" were ever under its rule. The opinion, however, that industrial education is better for the Negro than classical is quite as applicable to the mass of whites as blacks.

THE GARDEN OF EDEN, U.S.A. By W. H. Bishop. Chicago: Charles H. Kerr & Co.—Dreams of an ideal community, where the lives of all shall be governed by disinterested love, and where unhappiness and perplexity shall be unknown, still find place in fiction, as this book shows. In an appendix the author asks, after explaining the industrial and social features of his scheme, "When shall this glorious consummation of our hopes be brought to pass?" and answers his own question with an enthusiastic: "Why, in 1901, as a matter of course. When a generation of men have the opportunity to start a new century, why should they not insist that that century should be a perfect one in every respect?" It is perhaps needless to state that the gentleman who wrote this book is not the W. H. Bishop with whose name readers are already familiar.

A TRUCE, AND OTHER STORIES. By Mary Tappan Wright. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.—There is genuine power in two or three of these stories,—power of the sort that grows on one with each rereading, as he notes the subtle strength or beauty of description or the sudden force of a situation. The horror of the first one, which gives the name to the book, is actual and present from the first premonition of what is coming till the reader shuts the book, paraphrasing the closing words, "And he who reads forgets not." The vivid contrast between happiness and despair which it contains is very effective. "As Haggards of the Rock" is also a strong story; but the others are unequal in merit, somewhat too long drawn out, and too vague for one who can write so clearly and to the point as Mrs. Wright, when she chooses.

YALE YARNS. By John Seymour Wood. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons.—Mr. Wood is not by any means a novice in writing, and yet these sketches have rather an undeveloped character. There is more of a champagne flavor than one quite likes in stories about undergraduates,—and we say this not so much because of any quarrel with champagne in literature as because there seems here an apparent determination to bring in the college slang and the college weaknesses, whatever else may be left out. Some of the stories are quite amusing, and others show an inventive faculty that ought to have wider scope; but we cannot help the feeling that Yale deserved better of her would-be representative.

A SIREN'S SON. By Susie Lee Bacon. Chicago: Charles H. Kerr & Co.—This publishing firm have started a series of twenty-five-cent novels, and they open the new series with this story by a young Southerner. Miss Bacon began writing when only fourteen years old, and her first book was published in Richmond, Va. This is the story of a young man whose mother exerts a singular influence over him,—an influence really opposed to his best interests. She separates him from the girl he loves, who betakes herself to a convent. The entire story is curiously vague and shadowy, making its motto especially appropriate,—"Life is a gray plain, whereon are mirages, nothing more."

PANTOMIMES; OR, WORDLESS POEMS. By Mary Tucker Magill. New York: Edgar S. Werner.—This is a new and enlarged edition of a book which Miss Magill published some years ago for the use of elocution teachers. There are many new illustrations of poses and gestures and appropriate music written expressly for these exercises. Though the book may be a suggestive one, it would hardly do to follow the directions too carefully and precisely. The teacher who wishes to make a success of facial training must give play to her own originality and personality, and not merely copy the mechanical directions of a book.

STORIES OF COLUMBIA. By Will H. Glascock. New York: D. Appleton & Co. These fifteen true stories are sent out to American boys and girls with the hope that they may teach a genuine pride in their country's achievements and a deeper love for her institutions. There are three or four stories of Columbus. One chapter is devoted to the Pilgrim Fathers, another to Washington, another to Lafayette, and still others to Revolutionary heroes, inventors, etc. Much of it is already familiar, doubtless, to the boys and girls for whom it is intended; but it is well to have the stories in such convenient form.

Miscellaneous.

"Kolberg," Paul Heyse's historical drama, appears in the series of modern German prose literature, intended for advanced students and published by Maynard, Merrill & Co. of New York. The notes are by R. H. Allpress.

Ten of Charles Lamb's essays, edited with biographical sketch and notes, form No. 79 in the Riverside Literature Series of Houghton, Mifflin & Co. The collection includes "Old China," by which name the little book is known, "Dream Children," "Detached Thoughts on Books and Reading," "Barbara S.," etc.

Gamaliel Bradford, Jr., has edited Macaulay's Life of Johnson, one of the books required for admission to many of our colleges; and the book is published in Leach, Shewell & Sanborn's Student Series of English Classics. A biographical sketch, a consideration of Macaulay as a critic, and a few pages of notes are included in the volume.

The American Book Company publish three small books which will be found helpful and interesting by German students. "Die Monate" and "Der Lindenbaum," by Seidel,—one of the best writers of short stories with whose work we are acquainted,—and Stifter's "Das Heidedorf," will be found of value, both as examples of pure German and for their intrinsic interest.

Literary Notes.

Rev. Frank Buffington Vrooman contributes a very timely and important paper on "Child Life and the Kindergarten" to the July Arena. A carefully prepared bibliography accompanies this paper.

Scribner's has secured the right to reproduce for its August number eight of the wonderful pastels recently exhibited by Edwin A. Abbey in New York and Boston. Hopkinson Smith writes with enthusiasm about Abbey as a colorist.

The interest in the American life of the past will increase the appreciation of Mr. Hezekiah Butterworth's forthcoming volume of fiction, entitled "In Old New England," in which the romantic side of colonial New England is pictured. "In Old New England" is to appear in Appleton's Town and Country Library.

Dr. Henry C. McCook's new volume, entitled "Old Farm Fairies, or a Summer Campaign in Brownieland against King Cobweaver's Pixies," will be published July 20 by Messrs. George W. Jacobs & Co., Philadelphia. It presents in a pleasant and most interesting form some of his observations and findings in natural history.

Beginning with the May number, Vol. III., Messrs. D. C. Heath & Co. will issue in the United States the monthly periodical Science Progress, a publication now well known in England, and one that has there taken the highest rank. Science Progress is not a magazine of compiled matter for popular reading, but a serial for scholars who desire to discuss the results of investigation.

Books Received.

TO PUBLISHERS.—All books sent to the CHRISTIAN REGISTER will be promptly acknowledged under the head of "Books Received," with statement of publisher's address and price, if known. But we can guarantee no other return, as the rapid multiplication of new works compels us to limit the number selected for critical notice and review.

From Massachusetts New Church Union, Boston. The Sexuality of Nature. An Essay. By Leopold Hartley Grindon.

From Joseph Knight Company, Boston. On the Point. A Summer Idyl. By Nathan Haskell Dole.

From G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York. Master Wilberforce. The Study of a Boy. By Rita. Her Majesty. A Romance of To-day. By Elizabeth Knight Tompkins.

From Macmillan & Co., New York. A Confession of Faith. By an Unorthodox Believer.

From Flood & Vincent, Meadville, Pa. Thinking, Feeling, Doing. By E. W. Scripture.

Music Received.

From Oliver Ditson Company, Boston. Sweetly slumber. Little One. A Cradle Song. Words by William H. Gardner. Music by Philip Greely.

Merry Mandarin. A Chinese Dance. For Pianoforte. Composed by J. Warwick Moore.

My Shepherd is the Lord my God. Sacred Song. Words by Eugene Field. Music by Philip Greely.

At the Church Gate. Song. Words by Thackeray. Music by F. A. Schneckler.

Mr. Clifton Davis. As sung at the Baltimore Cathedral. By Ave Verum.

The Coal King. Ballade Romantique. For Bass or Baritone. Words and Music by E. W. Foster.

I didn't mean to. Song. Words by Edward W. Barnard. Music by H. H. Thiele.

Yoho. Song. Written by W. Saple. Composed by Martin Silber.

ARMSTRONG & McKELVY
Pittsburgh
ANCHOR.
Cincinnati.
ATLANTIC.
New York.
BEYMER-BAUMAN,
Pittsburgh.
BRADLEY,
New York.
BROOKLYN,
New York.
COLLIER,
St. Louis.
CORNELL,
Buffalo.
DAVIS-CHAMBERS,
Pittsburgh.
ECKSTEIN,
Cincinnati.
FAHNESTOCK,
Pittsburgh.
JEWETT,
New York.
KENTUCKY,
Louisville.
JOHN T. LEWIS & BROS. CO
Philadelphia.
MORLEY,
Cleveland.
MISSOURI,
St. Louis.
RED SEAL,
St. Louis.
SALEM,
Salem, Mass.
SHIPMAN,
Chicago.
SOUTHERN,
St. Louis and Chicago.
ULSTER,
New York.
UNION,
"

Whatever

the price, Pure White Lead is the best and cheapest paint, because of its great spreading power and durability. Properly applied, it never chips or scales, thus forming the best possible base for subsequent repainting. The price of Pure White Lead is now lower than ever before in this country (see list genuine brands).

Tint the White Lead to any shade of color desired with the National Lead Co.'s Pure White Lead tinting colors, prepared especially for this purpose. Send for pamphlet giving information and color-card. It is free.

NATIONAL LEAD CO.,
1 Broadway, New York.

The House Beautiful.

By WILLIAM C. GANNETT,

Author of "A Year of Miracle," "Blessed be Drudgery," etc. Paper, ornamental, choice edition, price 15 cents. (In "Life-Studies" form, 6 cents; 10 copies for 30 cents.)

CONTENTS: The Building of the House; House-Furnishing; The Ideal of Beauty; Flower Furniture; Book Furniture; Our Guests; The "Dear Togetherness."

In the cheaper form the edition is neat and serviceable. The special edition, on rich, tinted paper, silk-stitched, with neat, illuminated cover, serves admirably as a dainty remembrance for a friend, and especially to "tuck in with wedding-gifts."

[From The New Unity, May 2, 1895.]

The selection we give in another column from "The House Beautiful"—one of Mr. Gannett's uplifting studies which James H. West has just published—was not made because it was the most inspiring word the pamphlet contains. Where all is so good perhaps there is no best, though to our mind the section on "The dear Togetherness" is fullest of strength, sweetness, and light. But this extract was selected simply because it was the shoiest that could be made to stand by itself. By sending its publisher fifteen cents our readers can procure the little book for themselves; and if they want to be strengthened and lifted up, they will do so.

Sent postpaid on receipt of price by

JAMES H. WEST, Publisher,
471 High Street, - - - Boston.

A College Town Pulpit.

MR. SUNDERLAND'S MONTHLY SERMONS.

50 Cents a Year. 5 Cents a Number. Reduced rates in quantities.

Series for 1894-95.

1. The Soul's Cry for God.
2. Jesus as Humanity's Ideal.
3. Sectarianism: Its Evils, Causes, and Cures.
4. The True Cross of Christ.
5. Was Jesus God? How he came to be worshipped.
6. Loyalty to Conviction.
7. Is Life a Blessing?
8. Robert Ingersoll's Treatment of the Bible.
9. A Religion for a Republic.
10. The Surest Way of Doing Good.

Order from Rev. J. T. SUNDERLAND, And Arbor, Mich.

The Deeper Meanings.

BY

FREDERIC A. HINCKLEY.

CONTENTS:

The Cost of the Divine Spark; The Post-vision; Looking at Life through New Eyes; Rejoice, we Conquer!

Price 50 Cents.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

OLD AND NEW UNITARIAN BELIEF.

BY

JOHN WHITE CHADWICK.

Price, $1.50.

CONTENTS.—Historical Introduction, The Doctrine of Man, Concerning God, The Bible, Christianity, Concerning Jesus, The Future Life, The Great Salvation, Loss and Gain.

"A valuable as well as very readable treatise. . . . The best popular history of Unitarian doctrine that has come to our notice. . . . Mr. Chadwick has most interestingly set forth the rapid transformations of Unitarian belief."—The Nation.

"The best summary of Unitarian history and doctrinal development, and the most radical and optimistic outlook on the future which has yet been produced among us."—Pacific Unitarian.

"A weighty testimony to a notable religious movement from the religion of the letter to the religion of the spirit. . . . His attitude not always that of the contemplative philosopher; . . . his pulse throbs strongly, and quickens that of the reader. There are some passages that belong to the anthology of prophetic literature"—CHAS. G. AMES, in the New World.

"We can here trace the growth of the New Unitarian gospel, see something of the great moulding influences that have shaped and changed it, note the dangers it has encountered, thrill with the warm light of its newly discovered hope, feel ourselves taken into comradeship with its noble army of workers and saints. . . . Decidedly marking a clearer point of vision in the development of Unitarian thought."—The Unitarian.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Spiritual Life.

A Year of Miracle: A Poem in Four Sermons. By Rev. WM. C. GANNETT. 106 pages. Cloth, limp, red edges, 50 cents. Fine edition, bevelled edges, full gilt, heavy paper, $1.00.

"A dainty little book, full of delicate fragrance. Love of nature is in it, and a longing to interpret that secret of nature's power over the soul which no man has yet understood. There is devotion in it, too, and neither clashes with the other."—Critic.

In Spirit and in Truth. Essays by Younger Ministers of the Unitarian Church. 163 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

CONTENTS: Introduction, by Rev. JAMES DE NORMANDIE; The Philosophy of Religion, by Rev. GEORGE CROSWELL CRESSEY; The Revelation of God in Nature, by Rev. L. D. COCHRANE; The Bible as Literature and as Revelation, by Rev. W. W. FENN; The Thought of God in the Bible, by Rev. FRANCIS B. HORN BROOKE; The Revelation of God in Man, by Rev. S. M. CROTHERS; The Christ, by Rev. ALBERT WALKLEY; The Use of a Liturgy in Worship, by Rev. JOHN TUNIS.

The Insight of Faith. Brief Selected Paragraphs from the Writings of Rev. HENRY W. FOOTE. 115 pages. Flexible cloth, 50 cents. Morocco, full gilt, $1.50.

"Rarely does one find a little volume so full of helpful and precious words. Devotional in spirit and uplifting in aim."—Christian Inquirer.

Ecce Spiritus. A Statement of the Spiritual Principle of Jesus as the Law of Life. 238 pages. Cloth, $1.25.

"Nothing more remarkable has appeared since 'Ecce Homo.' It is as ingenious and original as that famous book, and far more subtle, inward, and spiritual."—St. Louis Spectator.

Pebbles, Pearls, and Gems of the Orient. Selections from Eastern Wit and Wisdom. By Rev. C. D. B. MILLS. 238 pages. Cloth, full gilt, $1.50.

Light on the Cloud; or, Hints of Comfort for Hours of Sorrow. By M. J. SAVAGE. 176 pages. Cloth, gilt edges, $1.25.

The Religious Life. By M. J. SAVAGE. 212 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

The Home.

For the Christian Register.

THE WEED'S TRANSLATION.

BY A. R. MACALPINE.

Dandelions, whose heads of gold
So lately decked the meadow's mould,
Are now arrayed in shrouds of white,
And silent wait to take their flight.

Nor long they wait; on gleaming wings
The whispering breeze the message brings.
How quickly now they buoyant rise,
How eager seem to gain the skies!

These ghosts of flowers soaring high
Bear tiny seeds as up they fly.
Seek they, with gifts, on other shore
The birds that sing on earth no more?

Ah, no! the seeds must fall to earth,
And, buried there, shall wait new birth;
For 'tis God's law to seeds and men
"They first must die who'd live again."

O doubting soul, the lesson heed,
Be trustful thou as modest seed;
For all that sleep beneath the sod
Shall wake again at touch of God.

THE VISITOR IN PINK SILK.

When I was a little girl,—I hope I have a big crowd listening to me, with clean, smiling faces and Sunday-go-to-meeting clothes on, sitting row upon row on Sunday-school benches,—when I was a little girl, there came into our country neighborhood a family of rich people, who lived in more style than I had ever heard of.

I was allowed to go with my mother when she went to call on the Pages, and was delighted to find in the family a little girl about my own age, whose name was Fenton. I did not see her, however; for she was just getting over the mumps, and my mother did not want me to take the disease.

Mrs. Page promised that Fenton should return my visit as soon as ever she was well; and I went home much impressed with the butler's brass buttons and the silver bowls on the sideboard.

One bright summer day, some weeks after this visit, I was enjoying myself very much playing in our back yard with our wash-woman's daughter, when I heard my mother's voice calling: "Constance, O Constance! Come here, my daughter!"

"Bother!" I said to myself, in a very naughty tone. "Now I'll have to go and learn that old geography lesson."

"O Conny, beg your mother not to make you!" coaxed my little visitor.

"Well, you come and beg for me," said I, with sudden craftiness; for I had observed that my mother, who was gentle to every one, was especially kind to those who were called "the working people."

So we left the happy sand pile on which we had been sliding, and I hurried Delia into the sitting-room to find my mother. She was there; and with her was a very fine-looking maid, in muslin cap and apron, and my new neighbor, Fenton Page!

My, but I was abashed! She had come to spend the afternoon, and the maid said she would come back for her at six o'clock.

I can't help being amused now, as I look back at that utterly dejected little self, in a dark calico dress, bare-headed, with a brown linen apron, none too clean or smooth from sliding down the sand pile.

But there was no help for it, so Delia and I carried her off to the sand pile. There we came to a full stop, for clearly no girl in a pink silk dress could play in the sand. Then I took her to the flower garden, but she did not know pansies from tulips. She had never planted a seed or watched a rose bloom in her life. I showed her my little fluffy chickens, but she was afraid of them. Think of being afraid of chickens!

At last I took my finely dressed visitor up to my play-room; but she didn't seem to care for my dear dolly, because the red had come off her cheeks. She said she had sixteen dolls at home, and one could talk and one could walk.

At last I sat down flat on the floor, and gave up the job. "What do you play at home," I asked, "if you don't have chickens nor flowers, nor birds nor sand piles, and if you are tired of dolls and don't like to read?"

"I dress up and walk out, and go to dancing-school, and visit the other girls, and go to shows and things," said the city child, smoothing down the pink silk.

At last six o'clock came, and with it the stately maid; and my visitor minced away under her lace parasol. I felt like a prisoner set free, and Delia and I tore back to the sand pile.

"I never want to see her again, never!" I exclaimed.

But the next morning early back came my visitor. This time she wore a pink lawn and a white sunbonnet.

"Mother says I can slide on the sand hill," she cried as soon as she came in sight; and of all pleased girls she was the most delighted. She got them to give her a little garden at home, too; and we worked in it together.

I soon found that all God's little girls loved his birds and flowers and chickens when they had a chance, and when they were not too much dressed up; and I was entirely cured of coveting my neighbor's brass-buttoned butler and their silver bowls when I found that being tied up in fine clothes went along with these things.

"When we have little girls, Delia," I said, "we mustn't ever dress 'em in pink silk dresses."

"Nor white lace parasols!" said Delia, with a little sigh; for Delia admired my visitor very much.

"No, indeed!" I answered positively. "If we do, they will never learn all the beautiful near-the-ground things that God means us to play with. I s'pect he just made little chickens and bluebirds for us, and hid the violets in the woods so we could have fun hunting them. My! ever since that first visit it has almost made me sick to see a piece of pink silk!"

"Well," said Delia, reluctantly, "if you think my little girls can't have both, I guess I won't dress 'em in pink silk!"—Elizabeth P. Allan, in the Presbyterian.

MRS. TABBY AND HER KITTEN.

"Mew! mew! mew! mew!" sang Mrs. Tabby's four little kittens.

Mrs. Tabby felt a very proud mother as she looked at her little darlings lying in a basket in the wash-house at Grafton parsonage. "I'll be back soon," she whispered to them in her cat language. "Be good while I am gone. Don't quarrel, but be kind to one another." So saying, she gave them all a kiss in her cat way of kissing, and they all said, "Mew! mew! mew! mew!" which meant, "Yes, mother"; and off she went to see a neighbor whom she had promised to call upon that afternoon.

"I don't much like leaving them," she said to herself, as she turned to give them a last look at the wash-house door. "I hope they will be safe. I don't feel quite happy about them after what I overheard the master saying this morning, but I won't be gone long. I just want to have five minutes' chat with my friend, Miss Spot, and then I'll hurry back again."

With this she sprang up the garden wall and jumped over into the next garden, where she was soon deep in conversation with Miss Spot.

She was not away very long, but long enough for the gardener to steal away three of the four kittens in their mother's absence. Only one was left in the basket for poor Mrs. Tabby to find on her return.

There was only one little "Mew!" sounding from the basket as she entered the wash-house door. She feared the worst when she heard the feeble sound. "Oh, my babies, my babies!" she cried. "Where are you? Oh, what has become of you?"

She looked everywhere,—in the coal cellar, in the wood cellar, in every corner; but she could not find her children anywhere. She was very sad indeed.

Mrs. Tabby, however, was a very sensible cat, besides being a very affectionate mother; and indeed she had made her head quite ache with crying. She thought to herself: "If they have taken away three of my kittens, they may come and take the fourth; and they shall not do that if I can help it, for I'll hide her."

It was a very wise idea of Mrs. Tabby's; but the question was, where could she hide the kitten. She looked about in all the rooms downstairs, but she could not decide upon any corner where her kitten would be safe.

The master and mistress were away from home that day, so she had a good chance to look all round the house. She went into all the rooms, but she could nowhere find a home for her little one. At last she went up to the attics. They were only used for storerooms. In one corner of the front attic a lot of blankets were stored.

"This is the very place," she thought. "If I can but make a way through, I'll make our home at the back of this pile of blankets. No one will ever find us out here."

With this she began to push her way through, making a very narrow passage between the different bundles of blankets till she came to the wall. Then, by means of pushing very hard, she pressed the blankets forward till she had made a most cosy little hole, with just room for herself and her child. Of course she felt rather tired with the effort, but she did not mind that. She was so glad to have found such a safe and warm home.

The cook was fortunately busy, and did not notice her as she caught her kitten in her mouth, just telling it to be quite quiet, and ran with it up to the attic. After she had had a long sleep, she woke up feeling much better, though still very sad.

She told her kitten that it must never mew now, and that it must be very quiet, or it might be taken away, too.

The kitten gave a tiny little mew, which meant, "Yes, mother," and was quite happy very soon.

All went well for about four weeks. Mrs. Tabby used to creep downstairs when she knew no one was about, to get what food she could find. She generally managed very well, though sometimes, I am sorry to say, she was obliged to steal. Then she would go back to her little kitten, and they enjoyed themselves very much in their comfortable nest.

But in the mean time the master and mistress and the cook had missed Mrs. Tabby and her kitten. They hunted everywhere, high and low, in all the rooms, even in the front attic; and poor Mrs. Tabby trembled behind the blankets as she sat and listened to their voices. "She must be somewhere," she heard them say; but where she was they could not make out.

One day she had a terrible fright. Her kitten was so very happy she gave a louder mew than usual, and it happened that the mistress was at the bottom of the attic stairs. "That cat is somewhere in the house," she heard her say. And there was another search, but no one thought of turning out the blankets.

At last one day Mrs. Tabby was feeling very hungry, and she lingered longer than usual downstairs over a very tempting plate of fish that she had found. She was late in returning to her home. As she was running up the attic stairs, the mistress came out of her room. She crept up gently after Mrs. Tabby, and reached the attic door just in time to see Mrs. Tabby's tail disappearing through the blanket pile.

"I have found you at last," she said; and soon she called the master and the cook.

"Good, faithful old Mrs. Tabby!" they said, as they stroked her and fondled her; and soon the kitten was brought out,—such a bonny, plump little kitten, so happy and well!

This is a true story. Was not Mrs. Tabby a loving, devoted mother to her kitten? She tried to hide it once again, but she was not so successful. She did not mind this time, though; for she soon found out that neither her master nor mistress nor the cook wanted to take this kitten from her.—Little Folks.

ONE HUNDRED HAPPY BIRDS.

It was the 16th of June, and a dreadfully hot day. I remember the date because it was the day after my birthday, and mamma wouldn't let me go to school. I had had a birthday party, and was very tired, mamma said. My head ached, and mamma said it would ache worse if I went out in the hot sun. Everybody said it seemed as if they should melt, but I felt as if I were roasting.

I sat by the front window with a fan, trying to get a breath of air; but there wasn't any. And I kept saying I knew I should suffocate if a breeze didn't come along pretty soon, till mamma told me if I would not talk so much I should be cooler.

So I looked out of the window to see what I could see. The big stone block opposite shut out the blue sky, and the sidewalks were so glaring in the sun that I felt hotter than ever. There were two maple-trees in front of the house; but the leaves looked wilted and dusty, it had not rained for so long.

We lived in Hartford, and boarded on Capitol Avenue. We had the front chamber and two other rooms; but I knew it was cooler downstairs, and should have gone down if there had not been company in the parlor. Oh, how glad I am that I didn't! There was a piazza in front, and the roof was right under our windows. I was just thinking that I would go and get a drink, when I saw a sparrow sitting on the edge of the roof with his mouth wide open. I called to mamma to come and see if he were sick, and she said he was only hot and thirsty.

"I am going to pour some water out on the roof," I said, "and see if he won't drink."

So I poured down a whole pitcherful. It was a tin roof, with a gutter on the edge, so that the water stayed there. The place where it would have run off was stopped up with leaves and dirt, so it happened all right. And you ought to have seen that sparrow! Why, I thought he would never stop drinking! And then, when I saw that the water did run away a little, I poured out some more; and what do you think? That bird popped right into that water and took a bath!

It was not long before other sparrows came, and mamma said I would have my hands full if I kept them supplied with water. But it was such fun! I forgot all about being hot, and mamma helped to carry the water. We took it from the marble basin in her room. It seemed as if the news had spread all over town, by the way the sparrows and robins flocked there to enjoy it.

I never saw a robin take a bath before, and I was so delighted I could hardly keep still; but I had to, for fear of scaring them away. Folks say that the sparrows drive away the robins; but I don't believe it, for they went in bathing together just as peaceably as could be. There would be two or three in at a time.

I must tell you about the first robin that

PILLSBURY'S BEST IS TODAY, AS FOR TWENTY-FIVE YEARS PAST, THE STANDARD FLOUR OF THE WORLD.

PILLSBURY'S

BEST

Makes
FAULTLESS Bread;

sweet as the wheat; light and fine and white; honest bread that may be honestly called the staff of life. No bread-maker, no bread-lover, will take any other kind after one trial of PILLSBURY'S BEST.

NOW, while the price is low, is your time to buy it.

PILLSBURY'S BEST IS TODAY, AS FOR TWENTY-FIVE YEARS PAST, THE STANDARD FLOUR OF THE WORLD.

SAPOLIO

given home and personal instruction in a private family in the suburbs; modern methods; large house grounds; permanent or summer arrangement. Add M. R. W., Christian Register.

BLINDFOLD.

What do we know of the world, as we grow so old and wise?
Do the years, that still the heart-beats, quicken the drowsy eyes?
At twenty we thought we knew it,—the world there, at our feet;
We thought we had found its bitter, we knew we had found its sweet.
Now, at forty and fifty, what do we make of the world?
There in her sand she crouches, the Sphinx with her gray wings furled.
Soul of a man I know not: who knoweth, can fore-tell,
And what can I read of fate, even of self I have learned so well?
Heart of a woman I know not: how should I hope to know,
I that am foiled by a flower or the stars of the silent snow;
I that have never guessed the mind of the bright-eyed bird,
Whom even the dull rocks cheat, and the whirlwind's awful word?
Let me loosen the fillet of clay from the shut and darkened lid;
For life is a blindfold game, and the Voice from view is hid.
I face him as best I can, still groping, here and there,
For the hand that has touched me lightly, the lips that have said, "Declare."
Well, I declare him—my friend—the friend of the whole sad race;
And oh that the game were over, and I might see his face!
But 'tis much, though I grope in blindness, the Voice that is hid from view
May be heard, may be even loved, in a dream that may come true.

—E. R. Sill.

THE LOVE OF HOME.

It has been well said that, like charity, pleasure begins at home. To a man or woman with no sweet memories of home the world is, after all, but a battlefield or a wilderness. Some are too poor and some too rich to have a home. Lord Beaconsfield describes a duke who had many residences, and adds, "He had only one misfortune, and it was a great one,—he had no home!" Sir Walter Scott strikes a chord which vibrates in every heart, when, after returning from the sights of the Continent, he ordered his servant to wheel him slowly through the rooms at Abbotsford, and then said, "I have seen much, but nothing like my ain home; give me one turn more."—Frederick Saunders, in the Christian Work.

AN AFRICAN FABLE.

Concerning an African idea of the origin of monkeys, or chimpanzees, Mr. Herbert Ward relates a fable of the natives of Balangi and adjacent tribes of the Upper Congo, to the effect that many generations ago a tribe of natives who lived on the banks of the Congo River, near Bolobo, fell into a condition of debt and difficulties with their neighbors. In order to escape the persecutions of their wrathful creditors, they retired into the great forest. Time passed, but they still remained poor. Forest life degenerated them. Hair grew upon their bodies. They arranged to forego speech, lest they should be recognized. They are still in the forest, and are known as Bakewa, or "monkey men." Upon being asked if they ate chimpanzees, a member of the Balangi tribe replied, "No: we are not cannibals!"—Popular Science Monthly.

Charities and Reforms.

A movement has been instituted in New York City to co-ordinate the various municipal reform bodies which have sprung into existence during the past few years. The idea is not to have any of the present organizations give up their distinctive features, but rather to form a central council composed of delegates from all associations working for municipal purity.

An English writer who is despondent over the cruelties of the world says: "Our very pastime is murder, and our 'sports' involve some creature's wounds and agony. There sits the gentlest maiden in all the church; and even she wears on her bonnet a broken wing, from which 'chemicals' have with difficulty cleansed the stain of blood. Where shall I find worshippers whose 'sport' is not the torture of some helpless creature, or whose adornment is not the broken wing which some poor bird fluttered over its defenceless young, left to perish of cold and hunger, in order that that dainty little hat might be 'lovely' enough to appear in the house of prayer?"

A settlement that has taken a considerable step in the direction of public work is that at St. Mary Street, Philadelphia, the head worker being Miss Katharine B. Davis. Owing to its influence, the city council has begun the work of enlarging the "Starr" garden which belongs to the settlement. Many of the worst of the surrounding tenements have been demolished, and $5,000 has been appropriated toward the cost of laying out the ground and converting it into a pleasant public park. A new development is the Branch Free Library which the Free Library of Philadelphia has now consented to run entirely at its own expense in a part of the large building which is being erected for various purposes in connection with the settlement. Two librarians are to be paid by the city, and a large stock of books provided. In the same way their kindergarten work has been taken over by the board of education, the teachers being paid by that board, and one of them being a resident. Another resident, Dr. F. L. Van Gasken, is a medical inspector for the city board of health,—the only woman who has yet been appointed in that capacity in America.—Outlook.

Temperance.

At a recent important public ceremony, of which the Duke and Duchess of Teck were the central figures, three ladies of the aristocracy drank her majesty's health in cold water.

The Michigan House has passed the anti-treating bill. It prohibits the purchase of spirituous, malt, brewed, fermented, or vinous liquors for another to drink and the sale thereof to a person to be given to another as a treat.

During the last twenty years it is claimed that the consumption of alcoholic liquor in England has fallen off one-half, while it has doubled in France.

Mr. Bryce, M.P., speaking at Aberdeen, said he thought it was a good sign that the drink question had got a hold on the consciences and thoughts of so many people of both sexes. Of all the evils that afflicted the country, this was probably the greatest; and its effects were such that they were bound to ask what steps they could take to reduce drinking in the country.—Christian World.

Science.

One of the most sensible of recent inventions is that of an electrical mail-box. Whenever a letter is put into the box, a signal is sent to the occupant of the building. The box may be placed in the same electric circuit with a call-bell.

It is said that an electric camera has been invented which can be attached to a telephone or other electric circuit, its object being to reproduce images of the persons speaking to each other.

Guttmann proposes the erection of convenient stations for the thorough disinfection of physicians after they have visited an infectious case. The operation will take about fifteen minutes, when the doctor can go about his work certain that he cannot carry the disease to his fellows.

In experiments suggested by the fact that in a photographic dark room with ruby-glass windows a scarlet uniform will appear perfectly white, Herr H. W. Vogel finds that, where white light is rigidly excluded, the eye loses all sense of color, and sees only in shades of black and white.

The flying machine is still one of the prospective successes of the opening of the twentieth century. Prof. Langley's aluminum engine has achieved a flight of about one thousand feet; and, although only an experimental model, the recent experiments with it are considered more successful than those of Mr. Maxim in England.—Inventive Age.

Prof. Holden of Lick Observatory writes that before the art of photographing the moon can be carried to greater success there must be plates of greater sensitiveness and finer grain. Now the photograph of a volcanic crater on the moon's surface will appear like a grain of the silver on the plate unless the crater is over a tenth of a mile in diameter.

Like a magic touch
Luster the greater Labor the least

SILVER
ELECTRO-SILICON
POLISH

Never scratching
Never wearing
Never equalled

Trial quantity yours for the asking.
Box post-paid, 15 cts. It's sold everywhere.
THE ELECTRO SILICON CO., 72 John St., New York.

How to Make Pie Crust.

Make it with COTTOLENE instead of lard. Then it can be eaten and enjoyed without fear of dyspepsia. Pie crust made with COTTOLENE is crisp, flaky and wholesome, possessing a delicate flavor impossible to obtain with lard.

USE COTTOLENE

next baking day. The genuine is sold everywhere in one, three and five pound tins, with trade mark—steer's head in cotton-plant wreath—on every tin. Made only by

THE N. K. FAIRBANK COMPANY,
CHICAGO, 224 State Street, BOSTON, PORTLAND, ME.

Lectures and Sermons

BY

WILLIAM J. POTTER.

With a Biographical Sketch

BY

Francis Ellingwood Abbot, Ph.D.

This book is published in style of Mr. Potter's previous volume, "Twenty-five Sermons in Twenty-five Years." Gilt top, bevelled boards.

Price $2.00.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

The Essential Man.

A Monograph on Personal Immortality in the Light of Reason.

BY

George Croswell Cressey, Ph.D.

CONTENTS: Preface; I. The Conditions of the Problem; II. The Nature of Man; III. The Persistence of Mind or Soul; IV. The Nature of the Universe; V. Personal Belief; VI. Conditional Immortality; VII. Conclusion.

Price 75 Cents.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

MESSAGES OF

Faith, Hope and Love.

Selections for Every Day in the Year from the Writings of

JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE.

PRICE $1.00.

For sale by all Booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Scraps of Travel.

BY

MINOT J. SAVAGE.

Under this title Mr. Savage's letters written to the Commonwealth during his last trip abroad have been printed. Although not regularly published, copies in pamphlet form, at 50 cents, may be obtained of

GEO. H. ELLIS, 141 Franklin St., Boston.

THE UNITARIAN

The "Unitarian" unites many opinions, many suggestions, many individual methods in one spirit, the spirit of Jesus, love to God and love to man.

CONTENTS FOR JULY.

The Water-lilies. Maud L. Cotton.
"Good News of God." Rev. Douglas Walmsley.
Man a Factor in Evolution. John M. Scott.
Resignation. Herbert H. Yeames.
A Confessional. I. Ursula Tannenforst.
Reasons for spreading Unitarianism. W. G. E.
American Unitarian Association.
The Anniversaries.
In the Pulpit.
The Pansy's Lesson. Clara K. Daly.
What Birthdays teach. J. T. Sunderland.
True Liberty. H. Hayes Robbins.
Types of the Spirit. W. M. Bicknell.
A Hymn. C. A. Rohrabacher.
What would You Do?
One Upward Look Each Day.
Editorial.

DEPARTMENTS:

American Unitarian Association, George Batchelor;
Sunday-schools, Edward A. Horton; National Alliance of Unitarian Women, Emily A. Fifield;
Guilds, B. R. Bulkeley; Temperance Work, C. E. Eliot; Literary Notes.
Children's Corner.

NEWS FROM THE FIELD.

*Terms, $1.00 a year. Sample copies free. Will be sent three months on trial for 10 cents.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher, 141 Franklin St., Boston.

Topics of To-day.

Essays and Lectures on Important Themes.

27. EVOLUTION OF THE WAGES SYSTEM. The definition of wages; economic characteristics of the wages system; wages the outgrowth of slavery; development of the system. By PROF. GEORGE GUNTON.
28. EDUCATION AS A FACTOR IN CIVILIZATION: Early methods in Egypt, Persia, China, Greece, and Rome; early Christian ideas of education; Catholic and Protestant views; the common-school system. By MISS CAROLINE B. LE ROY.
29. EVOLUTION AND SOCIAL REFORM. I. The Theological Method. By REV. JOHN W. CHADWICK.
30. EVOLUTION AND SOCIAL REFORM. II. The Socialistic Method. By WILLIAM FORTS.
31. EVOLUTION AND SOCIAL REFORM. III. The Anarchistic Method. By HUGH O. PENTECOST.
32. EVOLUTION AND SOCIAL REFORM. IV. The Scientific Method. By DANIEL GREEN-LEAF THOMPSON.
33. ASA GRAY: His life and work. By MRS. MARY TREAT.
34. EDWARD LIVINGSTON YOUNG. The Man and his work. By PROF. JOHN FISKE.

"Replete with facts and suggestions; not only interesting, but a substantial contribution to sociological literature."—Christian Register.
"The mode of presentation seems to me admirably adapted for popularizing Evolution views."—Herbert Spencer.

Pamphlets, 34 numbers, 16 to 32 pages each, some of them illustrated.

Ten Cents Each.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

EDITH THOMAS.

Last winter there was a doll show held in Boston for the benefit of the Blind Kindergarten. There were big dolls and little dolls, dolls in ball dresses, dolls in wedding gowns, dolls in long baby dresses, and dolls in check aprons in the district school. Most of them were so fine that I don't think any little girl would care to play with them, but they were pretty on show.

But the dearest of all the dolls was dressed by Edith Thomas, who is blind and deaf and dumb, but whose fingers worked as skilfully as if her eyes could guide them. She is a very busy little girl, and some of her work was sent across the sea to the great Paris Exposition. I wonder if you can knit a doll's hammock with your two good eyes.

She is in the School for the Blind in South Boston, and was very happy when she found she was to have a room-mate. But, alas! she was fond of early rising. She cannot see a clock, you know, nor hear one strike, nor hear a rising bell. How is she to know when it is time to get up?

She disturbed her companion so much by her early hours that they were to be separated. But Edith begged for the child to stay, and promised to wait till she was called. Can you think how this is done? Some one comes to her bed, and spells b-e-l-l in her hand. She can dress herself, and she likes to go to the laundry and help to turn and fold the clothes. She can wash dishes, too, and sweep, and make beds. I think she must be very useful.

And she has a loving heart. Once, when she knocked another child's doll off a shelf and broke it, she was very sorry, and told her teacher many times of her grief. But suddenly she thought of something better than to speak her sorrow, and ran to her room to get her favorite doll, which she carried to the little girl to replace the one that was broken.

The first time she was taken to church she was so glad that she ran about the house telling with her fingers where she was going. This is what she said, "Edith put on best dress and go to church after make bed and fix room nice." She tied up her penny in the corner of her handkerchief, that she might not lose it, and ran along the street in great excitement. But in church she kept perfectly quiet.—Selected.

Personals.

The bicycle clubs of St. Petersburg were so delighted to hear that Count Tolstoi had taken to the wheel that they made him a present of a silver bicycle, ignoring the fact that he would be the last person in the world to approve of such a thing.

Mr. Gladstone is an unusually good modern linguist. He talks French fluently; and those who remember his extemporized after-dinner speeches years ago in the mansions of the Parisian élite know that he could turn graceful phrases and express clear views in French, though he has never loved or professed to love that tongue. Italian, on the other hand, Mr. Gladstone admires most among all "living" languages. He is as reticent and modest about his command of it as he is about his other qualities, yet his knowledge of it is very wide indeed.—Westminster Gazette.

Education.

Mary Sharp College of Winchester, Tenn., was the first woman's college to make Latin and Greek a requisite for graduation, a claim which is substantiated by John Eaton, United States Commissioner of Education. This requirement was never made prior to 1853.

The perfection of any public-school system depends, must depend, on the cordial interchange between the two governing influences in every child's life,—the home and the school. Whether they will or not, they are allies; and their victory depends on directed co-operation, unity of aim because of a unity of effort. Public education depends on educated public sentiment, and that on the comprehension of what is being done in other communities at home and abroad.—Outlook.

The happiness which comes from serving others ought to be taught elaborately, carefully, thoughtfully, as a part of the training in all schools and colleges. The reward for service is never proportioned to the amount of service rendered. The lesser oftentimes brings the greater satisfaction, or rather, perhaps, brings it home better. In short, all schools, from the elementary to the professional, are fitting for life; and, if they keep the true end in view, all teachers should instruct the young creatures intrusted to their charge how they may best be happy and how they may best serve their fellow-men.—President Eliot, Harvard College.

The history of Christianity in Corea is remarkable and even marvellous. It has been introduced twice in that country,—first about the close of the sixteenth, and the second time near the close of the eighteenth century. Its first teachers and converts in Corea were utterly exterminated, but Christianity was again reintroduced in a most remarkable manner. Some Chinese religious tracts had been brought from Peking, among which were some expositions of the Christian religion by French Catholic missionaries, who had established stations in China. A number of Corean students, being engaged in a critical study of the text of Confucius, found these tracts. One of their number espoused the Christian faith, and became a prominent teacher of its doctrines. He was soon joined by friends, and in this singular way Christianity was again planted in Corea.—American Educational Bulletin.

Here and There.

Lake Superior is in danger of losing its distinction of being the largest fresh-water lake in the world. African explorers begin to think Lake Victoria Nyanza is larger.

A concrete bridge having a clear span of 164 feet and 26 feet wide was recently constructed over the Danube at Munderkingen, in Austria. Stone is scarce and dear there, while good Portland cement is produced in large quantities.

The project to build an aerial tramway at Niagara Falls is likely to be carried out the coming summer. The plan is to run a cage-like car on a huge cable strung across the river immediately over the falls. It will be operated by electricity.

In Italy, one of the first countries to take up cremation as a substitute for burial, the number of crematories in 1894 was 23, and that of bodies cremated 2,509. Though the membership of the cremation societies increases steadily, progress is not very rapid, owing to the hostility of the Church.

Cape Juby, on the coast of the Sahara, with the adjacent territory and the factories lately established, has been bought by the sultan of Morocco from the English company settled on the land, with a view to avoiding complications with England and preventing England from obtaining a foothold in Morocco.

There were 17,864,714 bunches of bananas consumed in the United States last year. Jamaica, Cuba, Honduras, and Colombia supply most of the fruit, and its transportation has become an important item in the business of various steamship companies. It is within the easy memory of people of middle age when a banana was a great rarity. But now, unquestionably, the consumption of this one tropical fruit in this country has become large enough to affect to some extent the demand upon the wheat supply.—Springfield Republican.

The Indian agent in charge of the remnants of the Six Nations reports that there are now left in New York 168 Cayugas, 478 Onondagas, 260 Oneidas, 2,750 Senecas on the Cattaraugus Reservation, 401 Tuscaroras,—in all, 5,141. There has been a slight increase in their numbers during the past twenty years, a perceptible improvement in their morals, and a "gradual but steady" improvement in their habits as to industry, etc., and their general condition. The farms, houses, and barns of the Tuscaroras are as good as those of their white neighbors; and the Senecas on the Cattaraugus Reservation are hard-working and thrifty. Very few of these New York Indians manifest any desire for citizenship.

P.S.

The point of a woman's letter is always the postscript. We will send (free of charge) a sample bag of Bradley's "Yorkshire" Salt to any woman mailing us her address. "Yorkshire" Salt is free from lime and dirt, and won't harden in damp weather. Let us know if you can't buy it at your grocer's. He can supply you if you insist.

BRADLEY SALT CO.,
49 Jay St., New York, . 4 Commercial St., Boston.

was kept informed about Pearline. This was necessary. With anything so new and so different from old ideas, people had to be educated. Third: The best advertising Pearline has ever had (and it costs nothing) is from every women who has used it. She tells everyone how much it has done for her in all kinds of washing and cleaning; that while the cost is nominal, she has found it to be better than anything else, always the same, and perfectly harmless; and that the saving by using cheaper imitations for a year wouldn't be enough to pay for one ruined garment.

Beware Peddlers and some unscrupulous grocers will tell you, "This is as good as" or "the same as Pearline." IT'S FALSE—Pearline is never peddled, if your grocer sends you an imitation, be honest—send it back.

Books of Value.

The Evolution of Christianity. By M. J. SAVAGE. 178 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

CONTENTS: Old World Religion; Judaism and its Hopes; Conditions when Christianity was born; Jesus and What he attempted; The Influence of the Christ Idea; The First Church and Paul; The Problem of the Trinity; The Church of Rome; Growth away from Jesus; The Protestant Revolution; Science and the Church; Free Christianity.

"One would seek in vain for a more enlightened application of the scientific method to the history of religion; and one can believe that, if close reasoning and rational faith could convert, Mr. Savage's words might bear a message to those who are without the churches and within. One reads with pleasure and confidence and hopefulness, and finds the end come all too quickly."—Boston Times.

Members of One Body. Six Sermons by Rev. S. M. CROTHERS. 132 pages. Cloth, 75 cents; paper, 50 cents.

CONTENTS: I. Roman Catholicism; II. Calvinism; III. Methodism; IV. Rationalism; V. Mysticism; VI. The Unity of Christendom.

In the whole list of Liberal Religious books, past and present, it would be hard to find any series of utterances freer with the true freedom—more ingenious, more appreciative, more prophetic of the unity that is to be, more religiously "satisfying"—than Mr. Crothers gives us in these six discourses. The outline alone, which each chapter contains, of the stronger, more helpful points in the various schemes of religious thought and life discussed, renders the book invaluable.

Phillips Brooks in Boston. Five Years' Editorial Estimates. By M. C. AYRES, Editor of the Boston Daily Advertiser. With an Introduction by Rev. W. J. TUCKER, D.D., President of Dartmouth College. 120 pages. Cloth, 50 cents.

"One of the most valuable of monographs upon the late Bishop Phillips Brooks. No editorial pen in Boston has done such discriminating and appreciative work along religious, ethical, and literary lines as that of Mr. Ayres in the Advertiser. The publisher has done well to gather these five years' estimates."—Journal of Education.

Afterglow. By FREDERIC A. HINCKLEY. 81 pages. Cloth, 50 cents.

There are few who, reading it, will not be strongly attracted to this little book. It is written out of life,—out of the struggling, perplexing, troublous, hopeful, aspiring life we all know and dread and delight in. And grow in. And this is how the book is to help us.

CONTENTS: I. Voices out of the Silence; II. They had all Things Common; III. Spiritual Awakening; IV. "The Star" The Star.

"Afterglow," like Gannett's 'Wrestling and Blessing,' is a book which one would like to keep in stock, to be given to the stricken, the troubled, the perplexed, the struggling, and the discouraged."—Christian Register.

The Work of the Ministry. Lectures given to the Meadville Theological School. By Rev. W. P. TILDEN. 186 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

CONTENTS: The Ministry; Object of Preaching; Pastoral Work; Sunday Schools and Guilds; Pulpit Services; Usages and Duties; Personal Influence; Sealed Orders.

Written in a delightfully fresh style, free from pulpit tone and theological terminology, but serious, earnest, and up to the high plane of ministerial responsibility.—Independent (New York).

Kindling Thoughts. By ELIZABETH P. CHANNING. 315 pages. Cloth, $1.25.

Contains fifty-seven brief essays, such as Dev upon the heart; The angel in the shadow; A disappointed life; Plain living and high thinking; The spiritual tangle; The charm of the old; Accepting ourselves as we are; etc., etc.

It is a long time since anything so brightly refreshing as these Kindling Thoughts has come to us. . . . They are full of that best cheer which comes from the deepest, clearest springs of faith.—Unitarian.

Vexed Questions in Theology. A Series of Essays. By JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE. 250 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

The remarkable faculty possessed by James Freeman Clarke for presenting difficult problems in a simple way—clearing away all non-essentials, and having the heart of the subject stand out vividly and helpfully—is nowhere better seen than in the present volume. For any earnest seeker after the more reasonable thought of God, duty, life, religion, the book has very much of help.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

The Secrets of Pearline's success? Well, there are several. Here are some of them, just to prove that its enormous growth was only natural. First: The article was precisely what its makers claimed it to be; it has never changed—no improvement has been found. Used for years — always alike. Second: The public was kept informed about Pearline. This was necessary. With anything so new and so different from old ideas, people had to be educated. Third: The best advertising Pearline has ever had (and it costs nothing) is from every women who has used it. She tells everyone how much it has done for her in all kinds of washing and cleaning; that while the cost is nominal, she has found it to be better than anything else, always the same, and perfectly harmless; and that the saving by using cheaper imitations for a year wouldn't be enough to pay for one ruined garment.

Beware Peddlers and some unscrupulous grocers will tell you, "This is as good as" or "the same as Pearline." IT'S FALSE—Pearline is never peddled, if your grocer sends you an imitation, be honest—send it back.

Books of Value.

The Evolution of Christianity. By M. J. SAVAGE. 178 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

CONTENTS: Old World Religion; Judaism and its Hopes; Conditions when Christianity was born; Jesus and What he attempted; The Influence of the Christ Idea; The First Church and Paul; The Problem of the Trinity; The Church of Rome; Growth away from Jesus; The Protestant Revolution; Science and the Church; Free Christianity.

"One would seek in vain for a more enlightened application of the scientific method to the history of religion; and one can believe that, if close reasoning and rational faith could convert, Mr. Savage's words might bear a message to those who are without the churches and within. One reads with pleasure and confidence and hopefulness, and finds the end come all too quickly."—Boston Times.

Members of One Body. Six Sermons by Rev. S. M. CROTHERS. 132 pages. Cloth, 75 cents; paper, 50 cents.

CONTENTS: I. Roman Catholicism; II. Calvinism; III. Methodism; IV. Rationalism; V. Mysticism; VI. The Unity of Christendom.

In the whole list of Liberal Religious books, past and present, it would be hard to find any series of utterances freer with the true freedom—more ingenious, more appreciative, more prophetic of the unity that is to be, more religiously "satisfying"—than Mr. Crothers gives us in these six discourses. The outline alone, which each chapter contains, of the stronger, more helpful points in the various schemes of religious thought and life discussed, renders the book invaluable.

Phillips Brooks in Boston. Five Years' Editorial Estimates. By M. C. AYRES, Editor of the Boston Daily Advertiser. With an Introduction by Rev. W. J. TUCKER, D.D., President of Dartmouth College. 120 pages. Cloth, 50 cents.

"One of the most valuable of monographs upon the late Bishop Phillips Brooks. No editorial pen in Boston has done such discriminating and appreciative work along religious, ethical, and literary lines as that of Mr. Ayres in the Advertiser. The publisher has done well to gather these five years' estimates."—Journal of Education.

Afterglow. By FREDERIC A. HINCKLEY. 81 pages. Cloth, 50 cents.

There are few who, reading it, will not be strongly attracted to this little book. It is written out of life,—out of the struggling, perplexing, troublous, hopeful, aspiring life we all know and dread and delight in. And grow in. And this is how the book is to help us.

CONTENTS: I. Voices out of the Silence; II. They had all Things Common; III. Spiritual Awakening; IV. "The Star" The Star.

"Afterglow," like Gannett's 'Wrestling and Blessing,' is a book which one would like to keep in stock, to be given to the stricken, the troubled, the perplexed, the struggling, and the discouraged."—Christian Register.

The Work of the Ministry. Lectures given to the Meadville Theological School. By Rev. W. P. TILDEN. 186 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

CONTENTS: The Ministry; Object of Preaching; Pastoral Work; Sunday Schools and Guilds; Pulpit Services; Usages and Duties; Personal Influence; Sealed Orders.

Written in a delightfully fresh style, free from pulpit tone and theological terminology, but serious, earnest, and up to the high plane of ministerial responsibility.—Independent (New York).

Kindling Thoughts. By ELIZABETH P. CHANNING. 315 pages. Cloth, $1.25.

Contains fifty-seven brief essays, such as Dev upon the heart; The angel in the shadow; A disappointed life; Plain living and high thinking; The spiritual tangle; The charm of the old; Accepting ourselves as we are; etc., etc.

It is a long time since anything so brightly refreshing as these Kindling Thoughts has come to us. . . . They are full of that best cheer which comes from the deepest, clearest springs of faith.—Unitarian.

Vexed Questions in Theology. A Series of Essays. By JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE. 250 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

The remarkable faculty possessed by James Freeman Clarke for presenting difficult problems in a simple way—clearing away all non-essentials, and having the heart of the subject stand out vividly and helpfully—is nowhere better seen than in the present volume. For any earnest seeker after the more reasonable thought of God, duty, life, religion, the book has very much of help.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

IMPORTANT WORKS BY

FRANCES POWER COBBE

The Peak in Darien: With Some Other Inquiries touching Concerns of the Soul and Body. An Octave of Essays. 266 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

"Vigorous in thought and style. We have read the volume through from preface to 'the end,' and enjoyed it."—Watchman.

Darwinism in Morals, and Other Essays. 422 pages. Cloth, $2.00.

Some of the chapters: Darwinism in Morals; Hereditary Piety; The Religion of Childhood; Prehistoric Religion; The Religions of the World; The Religions of the East; The Religion and Literature of India; Unconscious Cerebration; Dreams; The Evolution of Morals and Religion.

The Duties of Women. A Course of Lectures. 193 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

"The profoundest, wisest, purest, noblest book in principle, aim, and tone yet written upon the true position of woman in society."

The Scientific Spirit of the Age, and Other Pleas and Discussions. 243 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

Religious Duty. 311 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Register Tract Series.

No. 1. MY NEW NEIGHBOR. By Rev. W. H. Lyon. $1.00 per hundred.

No. 2. THE CONGREGATIONAL METHOD: How it is worked and how it ought to be worked. By Rev. Charles F. Dole. $1.50 per hundred.

No. 3. BEHOLD THE MAN. By Rev. W. P. Tilden. $1.00 per hundred.

No. 4. PRACTICAL CHRISTIANITY. By Rev. Charles A. Allen. $1.00 per hundred.

No. 5. AMERICAN UNITARIANISM: Its History and Development. By Rev. Edward Everett Hale. $1.50 per hundred.

No. 6. CHURCH ORGANIZATION. By Rev. William L. Lawrence. $1.00 per hundred.

No. 7. OF MAKING ONE'S SELF BEAUTIFUL. By Rev. William C. Gannett. $1.00 per hundred.

No. 8. THE JUDGMENT: The True Doctrine of the Judgment Individual and Universal. By Rev. William R. Alger. $1.50 per hundred.

No. 9. THE BREATH OF LIFE. By Rev. H. M. Simmons. $1.50 per hundred.

No. 10. WHAT DOES THE UNITARIANISM OF TO-DAY STAND FOR? By Rev. W. P. Tilden. $1.50 per hundred.

No. 11. LIBERAL CHRISTIANITY AS MOTIVE-POWER. By Rev. E. A. Horton. $1.00 per hundred.

No. 12. MORALITY IN THE SCHOOLS. By William T. Harris, LL.D. $1.00 per hundred.

No. 13. JOSEPH PRIESTLEY: The Old Unitarianism and the New. By Rev. C. C. Everett, D.D. $1.50 per hundred.

No. 14. WHAT O'CLOCK IS IT IN RELIGION? By Rev. M. J. Savage. $2.00 per hundred.

No. 15. A SOUL WITH FOUR WINDOWS OPEN. By Rev. James Leonard Corning. $1.00 per hundred.

No. 16. SCIENTIFIC THEOLOGY: THE GROUND OF ALL RELIGION. By Francis E. Abbot, Ph.D. $1.00 per hundred.

No. 17. REFORMS ABOUT WHICH GOOD MEN MIGHT AGREE. By William M. Salter. $1.50 per hundred.

No. 18. HOW WE HELPED OUR MINISTER TO WRITE GOOD SERMONS. By Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D. 50 cents per hundred.

No. 19. FOUR SERMONS ON REVIVALS. By Rev. S. M. Crothers. $3.00 per hundred. Single copies, 6 cents.

No. 20. THEODORE PARKER'S LETTER TO A YOUNG MAN. 50 cents per hundred.

No. 21. THE THEOLOGY OF THE FUTURE. By Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D. 50 cents per hundred.

No. 22. THE RESTRICTION OF VIVISECTION. By Albert Leffingwell, M.D. 50 cents per hundred.

No. 23. A WORKING THEORY IN ETHICS. By Rev. J. H. Crooker. $1.50 per hundred.

No. 24. THE CHRISTIAN UNITARIAN POSITION, DOCTRINAL. By John Hamilton Thom. 60 cents per hundred.

No. 25. THE NEW BIRTH AND THE NEW TYPE OF MAN. By Rev. Charles F. Dole. $1.00 per hundred.

No. 26. THE RESURRECTION OF JESUS. By Rev. W. H. Furness. $1.00 per hundred.

No. 27. SHORT AND LONG VIEWS. By Rev. Charles F. Dole. $1.00 per hundred.

Sent post paid on receipt of price by

CHRISTIAN REGISTER ASSOCIATION.
141 Franklin Street, Boston.

Pleasantries.

Customer: "Give me a dozen fried oysters." Waiter: "Sorry, sir; but we're all out of shell fish, excepting eggs."—Selected.

A student, describing the salubrity of Italy, stated that, "in spite of the cholera the immortality only reached twenty per thousand."—The Budget.

A gentleman, who was relating an accident he had, was asked by the surgeon if it was near the vertebrae that he had been hurt. "No, sir," was the reply: "it was near the Observatory."—Selected.

The most remarkable case on record is that of a Yankee soap man, who in a violent storm at sea saved himself from drowning by taking a cake of his own soap and washing himself ashore.—Selected.

An auctioneer at a sale of antiquities put up a helmet with the candid remark: "This, ladies and gentlemen, is a helmet of Romulus, the Roman founder: I think he was the first in the iron business."—Selected.

Betsey, an old colored cook, was moaning around the kitchen one day, when her mistress asked her if she was ill. "No, ma'am, not 'zactly," said Betsey. "But the fac' is, I don't feel ambition 'nough to git outter my own way."—Exchange.

She: "Theatrical people would hardly fancy the advent of that hat and these sleeves together." He: "But they would be a great boon to the stage." She: "How so?" He: "The stage would have to be elevated."—Pacific Unitarian.

In the summer Baby was very busy supervising everything that went on at the farm. After a while she pushed away her chair at supper one afternoon, declaring that she did not want any more milk. "Why not, dear?" asked mamma, gently. "Because," said Baby, with an air of superiority, "I know all about it now: milk is nothing but chewed grass."—Selected.

Mrs. Newriche (patronizingly): "Were any of your ancestors men of note, Mr. Cynic?" Mr. Cynic: "Yes, madam, I should say so. One of them was the most famous admiral of his day, and commanded the allied forces of the world." Mrs. Newriche (with altered tone of deep respect): "Is it possible, Mr. Cynic! And what was his name?" Mr. Cynic: "Noah, madam."—Life.

The Musical Courier tells this anecdote about Joachim and a London barber: "The great violinist is said to have once visited a barber in that city to get his hair cut. He is in the habit of wearing it rather long behind, and intimated as much to the barber, whereupon that individual promptly replied, 'I wouldn't wear it too long, mister: if you do, you'll look just like one o' them fiddlin' chaps.'"—Exchange.

One day a college professor, going to his class, came across one of his students who had just fallen down. Asking him how he fell, the student replied, "Notwithstanding." Telling the anecdote a short time later the professor said: "I met Mr. Junior the other day, and he made a very bright remark. He had just fallen down, you know; and, when I asked him how it happened, he said, 'Nevertheless.'"—The Budget.

He had been silent in thought for some time. At length he heaved a sigh, which moved his friend to inquire what the trouble was. "This world ain't run right," he answered. "Why, you ought to be happy. You've been away enjoying yourself, I understand." "Yes. I've been away, but I don't see much enjoyment,—not in a world where the fish are so shy about bitin' an' the mosquitoes so eternally willin'."—The American.

FROM RECENT EXAMINATIONS.

Name five forms of water. Hot water, cold water, faucet water, well water, and ice water.

Name and locate the five senses. The eyes are in the northern part of the face, and the mouth in southern.

Who were the mound-builders? History cannot answer these questions. Science only can.

Define flinch, and use it in a sentence. Flinch, to shrink. Flannel flinches when it is washed.

By what is the earth surrounded, and by what is it lighted? It is surrounded by water, and lighted by gas and electricity.

Name six animals of the arctic zone. Three polar bears and three seals.

What is yeast? Yeast is a vegetable flying about in the air, and hitching itself on to anything.

Why do you open the dampers in a stove when lighting a fire? To let the oxygen in and the nitrogen out.

What did the Constitution do for the country? It gave the President a head.

What are the last teeth that come to man? False teeth.—The Budget.

Highest of all in Leavening Power.—Latest U. S. Gov't Report

Royal Baking Powder

ABSOLUTELY PURE

Ladies Travelling Alone to Boston

WILL FIND THE

HOTEL BELLEVUE

A quiet hotel, with a café of rare excellence. Located on Beacon Hill, near the State House, and convenient to all the large stores and places of amusement. Adjoining American Unitarian Association Building, BEACON STREET, BOSTON, EUROPEAN PLAN, J. W. SMITH, Proprietor.

PALMER HAMMOCKS.

PALMER'S VALANCE HAMMOCK

PAT. MAY 21, 1883

PAT. FEB 13, 1883

The merits of the Palmer Woven Patent Hammocks have never been equalled. Their superiority of material, construction, and design has made them the standard since first introduced. While there is a continual effort by imitators and infringers to produce something similar, it has all been without success, and the "Palmer Patent Hammocks" still stand pre-eminently superior to any of the imitations. They are produced in larger quantities and infinitely more varieties than the combined production of all others.

Before purchasing, insist upon seeing the "Palmer Patent Hammocks." Remember, the name "Palmer" is a synonym for all that is best in Hammocks. If your dealer does not have them in stock, he can get them for you, but be sure that he does. I. E. Palmer, Middletown, Conn.

Foundry established in 1790 by PAUL REVERE.

BELLS and CHIMES

of Copper and Tin.

BLAKE BELL CO.,
Boston, Mass.

JOSEPH GILLOTT'S STEEL PENS.

GOLD MEDAL, PARIS EXPOSITION, 1889, AND THE CHICAGO EXPOSITION AWARD.

THE MOST PERFECT OF PENS.

Christian Registers WANTED.

Copies of The Christian Register for Feb. 15 and March 29, 1894, are wanted to complete files. Any one having copies of the paper for above dates which they do not care to preserve will confer a favor by sending them to the office of the Christian Register, 141 Franklin St., Boston.

A LADY with a pleasant home near Boston, and having the care of a young girl of thirteen, desires to communicate with parents or guardians who may be seeking a temporary or permanent home for one or more children. References exchanged. Address GUARDIAN, care Christian Register.

The MAGEE Boston Heater

FOR WARM AIR ONLY, and the MAGEE COMBINATION here shown (for warm air and water), each received THE GOLD MEDAL AWARD at the World's Fair, Chicago.

They are honestly, carefully and intelligently made for USE, not merely to sell.

No one can afford to keep house without a Magee Range and Furnace, because the saving in fuel and food will pay many times their cost above any others on the market.

BEWARE OF IMITATIONS.

The name Magee carries our Guarantee of PERFECT SATISFACTION with proper use.

DESCRIPTIVE CIRCULARS FREE.

For Sale by Leading Dealers Everywhere.

MAGEE FURNACE COMPANY,

Hot Water Combination.
32, 34, 36 & 38 Union St., Boston.
242 Water Street, New York.
86 Lake Street, Chicago.

USE "DURKEE'S SALAD DRESSING"

GEO. H. ELLIS,

Printer,

141 FRANKLIN ST.

BOSTON.

CHANNING BUILDING.

WITH extensive, light, and commodious rooms, large and fast Presses, embracing all the latest improvements, Type-setting Machines, new and modern material throughout, the Establishment ranks with the best in the City for the execution of Letterpress or Plate Printing.

BOOKS

PAMPHLETS

NEWSPAPERS

MAGAZINES

SERMONS

CATALOGUES

REPORTS

LAW WORK

AND EVERY VARIETY OF

Mercantile and Job Printing.

Excellence in Workmanship.

Promptness in Delivery.

The Pamphlet Bindery, included in the office, is furnished with every facility for rapid and good work.

The Christian Register

Liberty, Holiness, Love.

VOLUME LXXIV.

BOSTON, THURSDAY, AUGUST 1, 1895.

NUMBER 31.

The Christian Register.

TERMS: $3.00 per year. Single copies, 6 cents.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY THE
CHRISTIAN REGISTER ASSOCIATION,

141 Franklin Street, Boston, Mass.

Entered as second-class mail matter.

Contents.

EDITORIAL.	PAGE
Notes; The Supernatural,	481
The Place of the College; Consolation,	482
MUSINGS,	483
BREVITIES,	483
PRO AND CON.
Books to give away; The Ayer Conference; For Sick Men; An Ideal Hospital; Free Church System,	483
ORIGINAL AND SELECTED.
Missionary Notes,	484
A Contribution to Modern Religious History; Middle States and Canada,	485
A Reminiscence of Paris, by Edward Frost Watrous; The Awful Avalanche; Tammany's Protected Saloons,	486
Living Unitarian Ministers; American Unitarian Association,	487
Napoleon and Washington; What Two Women have done,	494
Children of Inebriates; The Great Spiritual Epidemics,	495
THE SUNDAY-SCHOOL,	487
RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE,	487
THE PULPIT.
Culture without College, by Rev. W. C. Gannett,	488
SPIRITUAL LIFE,	489
SPIRIT OF THE PRESS,	489
LITERATURE.
"William the Silent, Prince of Orange"; Other Book Notices,	490
Miscellaneous; Literary Notes; Books Received,	491
THE HOME.
A Lesson; Why Daisy won't eat Lamb,	492
"Little Sun-bonnet"; Little "Put-off"; He loves Dolls; A Clock that keeps the Sabbath,	493
POETRY.
In Dog Days,	484
Sonnet,	488
The Language of the Sea, by Edward N. Stone,	492
Home,	493
EDUCATION,	494
SCIENCE,	494
PERSONALS,	495
CHARITIES AND REFORMS,	495
TEMPERANCE,	495
HERE AND THERE,	495
PLEASANTRIES,	496

Editorial.

MR. GLADSTONE'S withdrawal from public life marks an epoch in English politics. His career covers a large part of the century, and he has for years been its foremost public figure. After the partisan heat engendered by the intense struggles in which he has been engaged become a memory, and passions of the strife have cooled, then a fair judgment of the nature and extent of his influence will be had. But Mr. Gladstone was a scholar as well as statesman; and, like many other political leaders in English politics, he gave himself to the study of the classics and general literature. Now, in ripest old age, as he leaves the hall of debate and retires to private life, he returns to the studies of his youth with earnestness and fidelity, and will be remembered as the Grand Old Man.

THE Summer School of Theology which a short time since had its first session at Cleveland was in the nature of an experiment. President Thwing, who organized the programme, was wise enough to invite men to take part whom the public would like to hear. The result was that most of the daily sessions were generally crowded. One of the most marked men who lectured was Principal A. M. Fairbairn of Mansfield College, Oxford. He is a specialist in theology, and is working to make ministers realize the permanent practical value of theology as a science. He speaks without notes, and is both a popular orator and profound speculative thinker. Rev. Dr. George A. Gordon and others also took part. As a venture, it was a success, paying its expenses out of its income. The attendance at times reached three hundred. It is probable that this summer congress will be repeated; and this discussion of great religious topics on broad lines of thinking will be of value especially to the younger ministers, in giving their minds a clearer insight of the real condition of theological thought.

THE controversy in the Presbyterian Church between the radicals and conservatives has again come to the front by the action of the Otsego presbytery in granting a license to preach to Frank B. Seeley, a student of the Union Theological Seminary. This, say the more conservative, is in direct violation of the vote of the late General Assembly, which forbade such license to students of those seminaries for whose teaching the General Assembly disavows responsibility. The case will probably be brought before the synod, and possibly be carried up higher.

IN a previous issue mention has been made of wealthy Negroes who live in New York and other American cities. In Europe there are those who have been honored by royal authorities for their intellectual achievement. Among the foremost of these may be classed Ira Aldridge, who was born in Maryland. He went to Europe, and rose to be one of the most distinguished tragedians of his time. It is reported of him that at one time, when he played Iago in Moscow, he excited so great a furor of enthusiasm among the students that they unhitched the horses from the carriage in which he was going home, and dragged him in triumph to his lodgings. The king of Sweden knighted him, and the emperor of Russia conferred a decoration upon him. From others he received medals and decorations to the value of a quarter of a million of dollars. He was, from the reports given of him, one of the most modest and polished of men, thoroughly refined, unostentatious in speech and manner. Dr. Edward Wilmot Blyden, a full-blooded Negro, had a world-wide reputation as author and linguist. He also was appointed to places of trust and distinction, and was elected an honorary member of the aristocratic Athenæum Club in London. Another coal-black Negro, Peter Salem, received from Queen Victoria the honor of the Victoria Cross for his heroic act in throwing himself in front of his commanding officer and receiving the bullets in his own body which otherwise would have found lodgment in that of his captain. Still other cases could be given. In estimating the future possibilities of a race, we must have in mind its highest type of manhood and character.

THE volume containing the statistics of churches in the United States, which has recently been issued, gives a favorable account of the religious organizations. The Methodists and Baptists lead by far all the other Protestant denominations. It may be a surprise to some to learn that the number of communicants is greater in the cities than in the country, and that the greatest number was in New York City. Philadelphia leads in the number of church buildings, Brooklyn comes next, and Chicago follows as third. There has been a marked increase of Protestant members since 1880 of 3,895,128, or 42.03 per cent., while the increase of population was only 24.86 per cent. From these and other facts we learn that the power and influence of organized religion are greater now than forty years ago.

It is often said that the power of religion is on the wane, but the statistics prove the contrary. So also the present drift of opinion. In Oxford and Cambridge the prevailing tone of thought on religion has changed during the last thirty years. The tendency to what may be called scientific atheism is far less strong than in the earlier stages of evolution. Such writers as Prof. John Fiske are now pronounced theists, and the change in the world of action is still more evident, as will be seen in the birth and progress of Salvationists and Christian Endeavorers. We are told that in some of the European art galleries, where a few years ago not a religious picture could be found, they now abound. In addition to all this there is the growth of Christian missions, which has been very wide-spread and increasing. The churches as a whole are more alive, and, inspired by lofty consecration, are going forward in aggressive religious work.

EDWARD BEECHER has died, and this leaves another gap in one of the most gifted and influential families of the United States. He was the eldest son of the family, and has had a very memorable career. He was a very vigorous thinker, and, like his brother Henry and his sisters Catharine and Harriet, swung off from the moorings of the old Calvinistic theology with the intensity of one who, by the larger growth of the mind and the higher moral instincts, found it hard to reconcile his intellectual convictions and finer ethical feelings with the creed of his Church, and therefore modified his early beliefs. To an intense longing for the truth and courage to carry his ideas to their logical results he added a deep attachment to the faith of his childhood. This sometimes led him into strange and fanciful conclusions, as will be seen by "The Conflict of Ages." This book was a theory to escape a dilemma, and during his whole life he did not reach to clear thinking, as did Henry and Harriet. During the anti-slavery struggle he fought with the fire and faith of a Hebrew prophet, and in various reforms had the courage of his convictions. In no sense was he a trimmer; but, like a doughty champion, he was a brave and outspoken leader. As minister, teacher, and writer, he took a foremost place, and was an independent thinker, with the limitations already noted, and will be remembered as a man of strong personality and moral elevation, who consecrated his gifts for the advancement of the highest human welfare.

REV. ROBERT COLLYER has been interviewed by a New York Tribune reporter, who says that Mr. Collyer told him he did not intend to retire from his pastorate. Some years ago he told the trustees of his church that they should get a younger man to fill his place, and that "I wanted to retire when I was seventy. A short time ago I again spoke of the matter, and said I thought I would better retire; but they wouldn't let me. Then I told the trustees I would like to have an assistant, and I shall have one who will relieve me of some of my work. I have not selected an assistant yet. You may say that I shall not retire until the church is willing to let me go, and I don't know when that will be." The Tribune adds to this the following brief editorial: "The report that Dr. Collyer was to resign from the Church of the Messiah was, naturally, not credited by people familiar with the circumstances of his ministry and the high regard in which he is held by his people. The denial which he makes of the current rumor is not intended for these, but for the public in general, which will be glad to know that Dr. Collyer is to remain in the active ministry as long as his parish wants his services. It is good news, further, that he is to have an assistant, who will relieve him of a share of his work. Dr. Collyer is now seventy-two years of age; but his health continues good, and his mind is clear and active. Though it was his intention to retire when he reached seventy, it is probable that he will not go on the superannuated list for some time yet,—let us hope not for many years."

THE summer Chautauqua has reached its twenty-fifth anniversary. It is a growth from small beginnings. The August Forum has an article by Albert S. Cook which gives an outline of this institution and a sketch of its history and progress. The term "Chautauqua" stands for the name of a place and for an idea. Its existence is largely due to John H. Vincent, now a bishop of the Methodist Church. In early life he awoke to the fact that he had an intellect, and he also felt the longing for culture. In his personal development he reached in his own mind the reconciliation of culture and religion. He was an organizer, and soon he took the first step which has led to great results. The agencies which are the result of his labors are an organization, first, to promote systematic home-reading; second, courses of instruction by correspondence in certain larger branches; third, a summer school offering courses in a number of departments of study. These are known, respectively, as the Chautauqua Literary and Scientific Circle, the Chautauqua College of Liberal Arts (Correspondent Department), and the Chautauqua College of Liberal Arts (Summer Session). During the twenty-five years it has had 2,590 students in regular courses, more than one-fourth of whom have earned degrees; and nearly every religious denomination has been represented. This is what has been done in the College of Liberal Arts; but the attendance for the same period is 225,000, and the total number of graduates is 35,153. Here we have the people's college, reaching out to the homes and lives of the people. "In seeking," says Mr. Cook, "to define the Chautauqua idea above, I spoke of it as an 'attempt to elevate, enrich, and inspire the individual life in its entirety.' We can now better see, perhaps, the force of the italicized words. It is this conception of truth as a whole, and of life as a whole, which makes its protagonists irresistible. This is the universal solvent of opposition and of bigotry in every form.

THE SUPERNATURAL.

The Fortnightly Review for July contains a striking article on the papacy, which attributes the growth of its influence during the last quarter of a century, in part, to a revival of belief in the supernatural. The fact of the increase of its power, and the reason assigned for it, may both be assented to within limits, though the article in question is open to the charge of presenting only one side of the case. Probably the net gain of practical influence to the papacy as a governing force in the world's affairs is not very great; for, while it has won triumphs in one place, it has lost prestige elsewhere. It is a little curious that, while the author of this article sees clearly how much new spiritual command has come to the pope through loss of temporal sovereignty, he represents the Church as scheming night and day for recovery of that worldly power, and does not appear to understand that success in this direction would probably prove as fatal in the future as it has been in the past.

When he speaks of growth of belief in the supernatural, it is to be noted that he uses that word to include any direction of events outside of or above the usual order of nature. For our part, we agree that such use of the word is entirely legitimate. There is a sense in which the telephone is a supernatural instrument, for nature never would have produced it without help from man's inventive genius. If above the natural laws that govern the world there is a higher Will or Intelligence making use of them for definite purposes, that is a supernatural Power. The divine government thus conceived of may be also a government of law, but that does not bring it within the domain of what we call nature. Indeed, the question as to the method by which a supernatural Power acts is not first in importance. First of all is the question whether or not such a governing Intelligence exists.

No doubt, the most powerful currents of thought have now been for some time setting toward a wider and deeper persuasion of the reality of the supernatural, in this large sense of the word; and this makes for a revival of interest in religion in all its myriad forms of historic development. The article above referred to truly says, "Nothing is more remarkable than the number of persons nowadays who are in earnest about religion of some sort." A bit of evidence not there noted might be found in French art, which certainly has borne the stamp of materialism and irreligion as strongly as the most zealous opponent of the Church could desire. Whereas a few years since a picture treating of a religious theme was almost never discovered in the salon, now one source of information goes so far as to say that a majority of these pictures deal with scenes taken from the Old or New Testament. This may be in some measure a fashion which will soon pass away; but, taken in connection with the great amount of literature now published having to do with the sources of Christianity, it surely indicates a large new growth of interest in all that pertains to the Christian religion.

Among thinking people everywhere there is, beyond question, a growing conviction of the certainty of some divine government of the world, which awakens new interest in all traditional forms of faith. This return of belief in the supernatural must bring more or less new strength to churches of every name. It will be more or less, however, according to the interpretation of the supernatural which these churches give. To assume that the Church of Rome is to get most of the benefit of this reviving interest in religion is to ignore some very plain difficulties which stand in the way of that Church. Its conception of the divine government, and of the whole realm of the supernatural, so far as one can judge from the outside, is widely at variance with the controlling spirit of modern thought. It appears to believe in a Providence which is one of arbitrary will, and not in a spiritual order governed by laws and principles capable of universal application. It seems to depend upon miracles which in each case are special and unique, and which are something other than the invasion of a lower by a higher realm of established law and order.

We say this appears to be true, not meaning to declare what the teaching of the Church of Rome really is, or what its symbolism implies to those who cherish it. We may, however, say with some confidence that this is the way in which the modern mind mostly understands its teachings; and, as this mind, under the influence of science, has been trained to think of the universe as one illimitable domain of law, it will not take kindly to any supernatural world in which divine favors are conferred through the personal influence of the saints.

Ultimately, we apprehend, this difficulty will be found very much in the way of the older schools of Christian thought, though it is to be confessed that science furnishes only a partial view, through its blindness to the supreme fact of personality. At present, if we are to try to balance up the causes at work, we must allow a large influence to fear or dislike of all the tumult and unrest of the age by way of holding people to the ancient creeds. The threat of social anarchy, for instance, makes the established discipline of the Church of Rome seem a very haven of refuge to many peace-loving souls. But, as the two great forces of this century, science and democracy, reach a maturer stage of their development, most of the disquieting excesses and vagaries which have marked their advent will disappear; and then the old forms in which belief in the supernatural has been cast will have to be profoundly modified. Just now the public mind overlooks many things which then it will not tolerate. They who are now wrestling with this problem—how to amend our conceptions of the divine government in accordance with the new knowledge that has come into the world—may often seem to be engaged upon a thankless task. Still, the day is not far distant when every positive result they have wrought out will be eagerly accepted by the world at large, and will prove to be of great practical value to religion of every name and kind.

THE PLACE OF THE COLLEGE.

Probably nine-tenths of the thinking men and women to-day congratulate themselves occasionally, with a genuine, whole-souled gratitude, that the opportunity for university education is in these days offered freely to women. It is no uncommon thing to meet one whose inclinations draw her so strongly in the direction of science or research that it amounts to the possession of genius; and we think with sudden pity of the many in years past who must have felt the same urgent call, only to know that the doors leading to their chosen work were hopelessly barred, or opened so grudgingly that half the energy must go to the overcoming of unnecessary difficulties of preparation. As Nan Prince, in Miss Jewett's story, said reverently, "If God meant that I should be a doctor, the best thing I can do is to try to be a good one." Even where all special talent is wanting, it is a fortunate thing when a woman may gain that steadiness of purpose, the concentration of will, and the broadened sympathy that are the results we naturally expect from our college training. No education ought to be too good for a mother, and certainly the woman who is good for nothing in the world but to bear children is not very good for that.

Nevertheless, it is quite possible to attach an unreal importance to the college degree, and instinctively underestimate the possible intellectual force of a woman who does not possess it. Emerson instances somewhere the leading man of a leading city who, having set his heart on a college education and missed it, could never feel himself the equal of his brothers who had gone thither, and adds that his easy superiority among men was never able to countervail to him this imaginary defect. Almost any woman whose friends happen to be largely among the college-bred class can relate numerous instances leading her to wish that another Lowell might write an essay "On a Certain Condescension in College Graduates." Not long ago, for instance, a distinguished woman was proposed for a place of honor high in educational circles. She was a woman of fine mental training and long experience, but immediately there was head-shaking and demur. "But she is not a college graduate, and has no degree. College women should see to it that only a graduate is chosen." Again one hears a remark like this: "Miss Blank is not really educated, you know: she is not a college woman." Are we not in danger of putting the shadow for the substance every time that we allow a remark like that to pass unchallenged, if referring to a woman to whom life has given the same results we seek from our college training?

It is natural enough that college women should prize the outward emblem of their new opportunity and the victories they have gained, but it is also a sign of immaturity when they fail to recognize that a college is of use just so far as it teaches them to live. As of a woman's club, so of a college: its best service is to teach a woman how to get along without one; that is, how to put the wisdom, the decision, the sympathy, the broad-mindedness that it should develop, into application in daily life, long after the college itself is a thing of the past. If college does not put into a woman a splendid impulse for the finest living, then it may fall far below many another influence in real educative training. Thinking is a partial act, and "time shall teach that the scholar loses no hour which the man lives."

In the lower grades of education it is not difficult to see how the mind casts off material aids one after another, and learns to depend on its own private powers. The time comes when the child no longer needs to repeat the multiplication-table in order to know the product of seven times eight. The boy knows whether a construction is correct or incorrect without looking up the rule in his grammar. So it is with the knowledge we gain at college; but the habit of thinking thus fostered, the love for the best that has been known and thought in the world, the sympathy with differing forms of experience,—these remain, and must be worked into the commonplace life of every day.

Perhaps there is encouragement in this for those who are forced to forego the college training for which they have longed. The compact, consecutive study of the university is desirable, and should be eagerly sought; but it is not indispensable. The habit of thinking, the love of the best, the wider sympathy, of which we have just spoken, may be gained by other methods, if need be. One of the most valuable gifts of a university education, but one not given to every careless comer, is the irresistible desire to shun stopping-places, and to carry the love of learning all the way through life. Now, that may be the share of one who never goes beyond the threshold of Radcliffe or Vassar. The best knowledge and the best ideas of the times are open far more freely than we think to all who have the determination to pursue them, whether in college or out. Matthew Arnold declares that culture is the study of perfection. It looks beyond machinery. It has one great passion, the passion for sweetness and light; and so long as the intellectual life consists not in the things we have learned, but in the things we are learning, not in what we have accomplished, but in the habitual temper of the mind, not the place where we are standing, but the direction in which we are moving, we may take heart and push on, looking at college opportunities as means to the end we are all seeking, but remembering that to have really lived will mean some day far more than our books have taught.

CONSOLATION.

Time may soften the edges of our grief, but it cannot always restring the soul. To get back to the level of buoyant feeling, we must be tuned and tempered by varied influences. Nature's soothing is the best because she deals in hints and suggestions which we grasp for ourselves without the filter of other minds. When no other form of consolation seems possible, we try the outdoor sanitarium. The voice of the water fall silent by day, but heard in the night, the balsamic scent of pine woods with the odor of dew, the murmur of the forest and of waters, the great silences, have sympathetic intimations to the listening ear to purge grief and lighten the black shadows of loss.

Slowly, the ear that has long seemed indifferent to the noises of humanity, to words meant in kindness, but falling dead, attunes itself to the low, tender monotone of nature. Long we sit in the forest, and listen to the vague murmur of leaves, the hum of insect life, the rustle of the underbrush, the short warbles and scattered notes of birds. Busy seem the innumerable inhabitants with their housekeeping. They have no private griefs. They are never gloomy or morbid. Insensibly, their cheerful optimism passes into the blood. The sore heart finds a salve in this communion that is neither fussy nor intrusive.

Birds twitter as they chase each other on the wing. Their little ones tumble out of the nest, and are resourceful and self-supporting in a day. If you have bruised your foot against a stone, nature is not going to cry over you. She will infuse vigor into your blood as she lends strength to the hawk's wing or braces the fin of the lake trout. Far away from cities, in the pine woods, with your feet in the ferns, the mountains lift their strong, brave heads into the sky, the lake unfolds its shining spaces ruffled by the breeze, or smooths its mirror to reflect cloudland and forest,—there is tonic and health for the heart grown suddenly old under the withering hand of sorrow. Well-meant efforts at condolence have perhaps done you little good. The sermons you have heard preached on death and the decay of human hopes may have left you still hungry for what you have lost, still unreconciled to the blow that fell in the night while you slept, and seared and withered your green spaces.

Nature has a better method with the bruised heart. She does not preach, she has no homilies to offer; but she sends her ministers of consolation in at the ear and eye. She touches the senses with new spiritual intimations, makes her vigor and soundness to prevail over our morbidity and sickness of soul. With the deeps of her heavens, the shining of her skies, her cloud trains, the strength of her great mountains, the loveliness of her tall trees, her pageants of morning and evening, she brings the consciousness of the partial nature of all grief, how small it is, what a speck in the spaces of time and the infinitudes of eternity, what a poor fretting moth compared with the joy wings of the great angels of light.

Thus the detached grief from the soul makes it look like a mist on the lake, like a cloud on the mountain. We come to contemplate it in her presence as something apart, a thing to be examined outside ourselves. No longer does it live exclusively in the inner chambers, shrouding the windows and hanging the walls with black. Consciousness is at last freed from its tyranny. It grows more tender, more lovable, a better housemate, because it has put on a white robe or a gray. God's messenger to the heart that grieves comes on the breeze, in the song of the night thrush, in the wash of waves on the little lake beach where the boat is moored. The smoke of the camp-fire rising above the spruces, the voices of children in the forest, the squirrel winding his clock in the pine, the chipmunk darting about mossy logs and boulders bring peace. How companionable they are! How exactly they suit your mood! You can afford to put aside your private feeling, to enter into this sylvan life or the life of the fields. You see the selfishness of many feelings you once thought noble. When the bird and the honey-bee and the field-mouse and tree-toad pluck at you, and say, "Come, sympathize with me, enter into my little experience," it were churlish, indeed, to deny the request. And thus the heartache is eased, the wound is healed by Nature's intention.

The larger things rest you and heal you, as do the little things. The deep, contemplative shadows of the wilderness know your darkest mood. They have something to give you of their own nature that refreshes, like sleep. The solitude that does not tire or tease is in their bosom. They offer the tonic of delicious, inspiring wildness. It is good at times to get away, and be alone in their company. They have secrets to impart you can never tell another. Like an old witches' magic, they must look into your hand, or rather your heart, and whisper in your ear. They will show you the best things,—such glory and gloom of the day as you never see in company, such clouds chasing over the purple bloom of the mountains as cannot even be hinted at to others. All the stories of enchantments in forest and dell are based on this intoxication of the spirit of Nature, when she shows herself alone to one who loves her.

Her confidences and artless revelations enter your nature, silently soak into it, fill it as the spring fills with pure water. Healthier throbs come into your heart. Your laugh sounds less hollow and forced. A hint of exultant happiness has come back. You have put yourself lovingly into the old mother's arms, and she has kissed your eyelids and breathed into your nostrils. You find you have still within your withered heart the deep abiding love of this earth God has made so beautiful to delight man's senses, and lift him to the contemplation of the things of the spirit, the realities of which these glories are but hints and fore-runners. The chords of your spirit harp were broken or relaxed for a time, but the divine hand restrains them. They give forth, not the merry strain of old, but a psalm of resignation, humility, and faith. Things that once seemed dead are not really dead. The soul is like the frost-bitten tops of the trees that are putting out new buds and leaves in July. In these hints it finds that nature is its congener. Under heaps of ashes there still is a spark. Under mountains of gray mould and dead leaves there still is a germ. Nature is God's commissioned consoler. It reaches the stricken heart not in one, but in a million ways. It makes all things speak to us of eternal vigor. It teaches that the lost may be found, that invisible things are real things. God leads us back in the simplest ways after all our stumbles and bruises and hurts and wounds, our faithlessness and despair,—leads us back, and tells us, his tired children, just to be still, and rest in him.

Musings.

It is easy to see why a Frenchman loves Paris. His language indeed does not permit him to distinguish between the things he likes and the things he loves. He would ignore the distinction made by a prim little Puritan pedant of six or thereabouts, who corrected another's English by saying, "We like our food: we love our parents." The Frenchman loves his food as well as his parents. And so he does not simply like Paris: he loves it. But, if he had the choice of some cooler word, he would not apply it to his beloved city. Paris is a focalization of the genius of France. Its history, its tragedies, its hopes, its sorrows, its victories, its defeats, its irrepressible gayety, its wild, tumultuous passions, its joy in the beautiful, and its love of liberty are all blended in the history and life of Paris. A swiftly revolving, kaleidoscopic world, a bright, gay panorama of existence of varied color and beauty,—that is the first and the constantly repeated impression of Paris. Then there are the dark and turbid streams, like the Catacombs, and the sewers beneath. Paris is wicked enough. Whether it is any more wicked than London, New York, or Chicago, I will not attempt to say, though I very much doubt it. To sober Puritanism the reproach of Paris lies in its gayety; for the Puritan has often confounded gayety with wickedness and sombreness with piety. But the gayety of Paris is an attribute which belongs to it as much as the song of a bird belongs to the bird or the brightness of a rose belongs to the flower. And gayety is not inconsistent with fragrance. The attempt to turn heaven into a Quaker meeting would not suit the French. Nor are they content to postpone the enjoyment of existence to any remote time, provided they can enjoy it now and here. Paris and London are very different. They are as different as the French are different from the English. Each retains the distinctively national accent. It is not surprising that Daudet finds London grim. It would be hard to imagine London surrendering itself so absolutely to the joy of a fête as Paris does on the fête of the republic, the 14th of July. There is misery in both cities; but the misery of the London slums seems more solid misery, less decorated with plume and feather, than the misery of Paris, which tempts suffering to disguise its reality, with the feeling, undoubtedly, that to disguise is to mitigate.

As I WRITE, the preparations are going on for the national fête; for the French 4th of July comes on the 14th. In the public square stands, booths, merry-go-rounds, and all sorts of shows are establishing themselves. Preparations are made on a large scale, and pre-eminently for the people; for it is the French people that take the day into their own hands, and celebrate it with the geniality, heartiness, and vivacity which belong to their character and traditions. When I saw this fête observed in Paris two years ago, I was impressed with the perfectly natural and innocent enjoyment of the people. At the review of troops in the Bois de Boulogne many thousands gathered to admire and applaud the twenty thousand soldiers. Perfect good-nature reigned in the crowd. In the evening the streets and squares were completely taken possession of by the people. Omnibuses and hacks were withdrawn, and the carnival of gayety proceeded without interruption. Nothing is more characteristic on this festival than the music and dancing in all the public squares; and it is perfectly proper in the great city, as in the smallest village festival, for a gentleman to invite any lady he may fancy in the crowd to dance with him, and perfectly proper for the lady to accept. There are showers of bonbons and paper fillets, brilliant illuminations, and gay music; but rioting and drunkenness are rare. The effervescence of French enthusiasm exhales more easily and naturally in other ways.

THE Americans in Paris always keep the 4th of July with a dinner and a sufficient number of speeches; and the dinner this year was, I am told, one of the best. As I had accepted an invitation to be present at a dinner given by the Société Générale des Prisons in the Eiffel Tower, I could not drop to any lower level. But to me the most impressive and memorable celebration of the day was the decoration of the tomb of Lafayette by the American delegates to the International Prison Congress. Lafayette is not buried at Père-la-Chaise, but in the retired grounds of a secluded monastery, where members of his family had been laid to rest before him. A large wreath, with an appropriate inscription, was prepared; and at nine o'clock in the morning the American delegation drove to the secluded tomb. Notice had been given of this plan; and about fifty Americans gathered at the spot, some of them bringing flowers to strew on the grave. The address of Hon. Charlton T. Lewis of New York was brief, fitting, and eloquent. I could not but feel that this quiet, simple tribute to the memory of the noble Frenchman who gave himself so completely to establish liberty in America and in his own beloved France was better than any number of fireworks. The life of the ardent young marquis, so lofty, self-sacrificing, and generous with his service and his purse, has always had a charm for me, and will always be recognized as a most fortunate event in the history of our struggle for liberty. Right alongside of the tomb of Lafayette is that of his son, whose name, George Washington Lafayette, is a reminder of the affection which existed between the French marquis and the American commander. A few steps from these tombs lie the bodies of 1,306 who were guillotined in the French Revolution, reminding us how much France has paid as the price of her freedom.

Brevities.

Rev. Edward Beecher, who recently died at the age of ninety-two, is reported as saying, "I never smoked or chewed tobacco, and never drank ardent spirits in any form, but was fond of out-of-door exercise."

The Interior advises the New York Observer and Outlook, who are discussing the vertical movement of our father Adam, to call upon Dr. Parkhurst and ascertain the vertical position of Adam in New York to-day, and enter upon a friendly consultation as to what they can do for him.

Mrs. H. W. Beecher, though eighty-five years old, contemplates writing a biography of her husband. The following remarkable statement is accredited to her: "In the nearly fifty years that we lived together he never gave me a cross word, and I believe his conduct was as near like the life of Christ as any man's has ever been."

The Emperor William, it is reported, has during the past year been thoroughly converted to the repose of a British Sabbath, and would like to establish something like it in his own country. The "Continental Sunday" is far from being one of bodily or mental rest, and its moral influence in some directions is far from desirable.

Rev. Robert Collyer, in speaking of the case of Marie Barberi, said: "The poor girl should not be put to death. She should be taken care of somewhere for the rest of her life, but they should not kill her. From what I have read of her case, she committed the act for which she will have to suffer in a frenzy brought on by the treatment of the dead man, which produced emotional insanity. I may be wrong, but I don't think she should be put to death."

The reformer has at last reached Wall Street. The first note is given by the New York World, and the prophet of this movement is Mr. Arthur Brisbane. That there needs a reform in the methods of Wall Street few will deny; but, to make any headway, the work must be carried forward by men of the Dr. Parkhurst type. As a means in this direction, it is proposed to organize clubs, and through them to create a public opinion which will demand and secure a reform. To accomplish the latter, very much is yet to be done. That a reform is needed few will deny. How to do it is the difficult problem.

The latest novelty is to explore the North Pole by balloon. Mr. S. A. Andree, at a recent meeting of the Geographical Congress in London, suggested that the start should be made "in the summer of 1896, in time to reach the Norskoarne Islands, situated in the north-west corner of Spitzbergen, by the middle of June. The sun in that region, he said, was always above the horizon at that season; and for that reason the temperature of the air and the balloon would be very uniform." What next? Perhaps Prof. Langley may yet succeed in his flying machine, so as to take a voyage across the Atlantic.

The colored women bring up the rear by their congress, which had its session this week in Boston. It was somewhat of a novel sight to see gathered in Berkeley Hall lawyers, physicians, poetesses, authors, editors, and other representative colored women, to consider and discuss the best way of influencing the people of their race in temperance, chastity, hygiene, higher education, and domestic questions. Mrs. Josephine St. P. Ruffin presided, and gave the key-note when she said: "It was time for the colored women to unite in more strenuous efforts for good and for the benefit of their race, that the unjust and almost unholy charges that are made against them may be the better refuted. This, I am sure, can be done by the present organized army of intelligent and progressive colored women." Besides the listening to reports from the clubs, useful papers on live topics were read; and the members behaved very much as "white folk." At least a dozen clubs were represented; and, as these have been the growth of less than five years, the result is full of promise. An organization of this kind cannot fail to have a widespread influence, which will be felt in many colored homes and quicken the minds of the colored people.

Pro and Con.

BOOKS TO GIVE AWAY.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

The Sunday-school of the Unitarian church at Peabody, Mass., has the following discarded books to give away :—

Twenty-two copies of the "Sunday School Hymn, Tune and Service Book," published in 1871, by A. U. A.

Thirty copies of the "Sunny Side,"

Thirty copies of the "Golden Harp," song books for Sunday-school use. Any Sunday-school desiring these can communicate with Rev. J. W. Hudson, Peabody, Mass.

E. A. H.

THE AYER CONFERENCE.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

I notice that you have fallen into the mistake of the Boston dailies, which reported wrongly the name of the new organization formed at Ayer the 23d inst. I am sure that, as chairman of the committee on a form of organization, having penned the same, the name finally adopted was "The United Religious Association," and not "The United 'States' Religious Association," which would be quite vague and absurd. Also the phrase "bring in the kingdom of God," and not "bring into the kingdom of God," was the phrase adopted.

A. J. RICH.

FOR SICK MEN.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

Dear Sir,—We have many friends with whom we can communicate most directly through the Register. Are you willing that we should say to them that, as the hot weather lasts longer and longer, we have more and more applications at this office from physicians and others, who know the facts that we will send into the country those who are sick or who need country air, who are not provided for by organized plans for outings?

It is, in particular, the cases of sick men for whom we ask for contributions as generous as we have received in former years.

EDWARD E. HALE,

For the Ten Times One Society.

AN IDEAL HOSPITAL.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

Woodbine shades the west piazza from the glare, letting through only splintering sunbeams to perform an elfin dance over the floor below. Here one may lie at ease, gathering strength from the soft airs, and listening to the pleasant sounds of nature. Just outside towers a fine elm-tree from whose long branches depend not one, but three, oriole nests, one of them full of twittering nestlings, over whose welfare the flame-colored parents keep a careful and melodious supervision. And the elm-tree has other tenants. If you should have the temerity to spread your reclining-chair beneath it, two fluffy gray squirrels will come and warn you in unmistakable language that they were first in possession, and you are but a trespasser. Beyond one catches glimpses of the lovely Newton hills. Within doors a tranquil refinement prevails, from the two pleasant parlors to the daintily appointed bed-rooms, in which it would be a privilege to be sick if one were not making such haste to get well and outgrow them. This comfortable home—which has about it no breath of the hospital—is called the Newton Rest Cure, and is situated upon Otis Street, West Newton, so near to the centres that one marvels at its seclusion. Its inception came about last winter from the conviction of a few sympathetic persons that there was need of small sanitariums for gentlewomen disabled by nervous disease,—a place which should offer, with skilful medical attendance, the concomitants of a genuine home, and which should be at a price consistent with limited incomes. That their confidence has not been misplaced it needs but a passing visit to demonstrate.

Those who come here merely prostrated soon go forth again renewed and refreshed. To those who bring the long-drawn suffering of months or of years there dawns gradually a vista of returning nervous forces, and life begins to seem again worth the living.

J. P. D.

FREE CHURCH SYSTEM.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

In the annual report of the directors of the American Unitarian Association I notice that a resolution approving the "free system" as being best suited to efficient missionary work was presented and passed. How the free pew plan may operate, in strictly missionary work, I cannot say from experience; but for the usual church purposes it is so unpracticable and unbusiness-like as to be really farcical.

The free pew idea is one of those sentimental theories that are attractive and easily argued for, because it seems somehow broader and higher and nobler than the rental system. But it is all sentiment and theory. In practice it is an utter failure to the point of absurdity.

It sounds so fine, so helpful, to say: "Our pews are free, absolutely free, to all. Come, and be welcome!" But how is it in reality? My first taste of a free church was something like this :—

A pew was assigned to us, and we were invited to consider it our regular seat. A collection was taken each Sunday, and I supposed this was to meet expenses. But in a few days the treasurer of the society called with a book in which I was to sign my name, agreeing to give so much a year toward the support of the parish. Glancing over the signatures, I saw that the respectable saints in good standing pledged themselves to from $25 to $75 each; and, wishing to be deemed an average saint myself, I put $50 opposite my name. I did not object to the expense; but, if one agrees to pay a fixed sum and occupies a special pew, what becomes of the ennobling "free system" idea?

My next experience of the anti-rental system, in another town, was somewhat similar. We could take our choice of several pews, and there was no rent bill to look out for. How broad and free this sounds! And yet, with yearly and weekly contributions (all agreed to in black and white), extra assessments for the choir, and other demands to meet expenses of various kinds, the actual cost of the church attendance in this country parish was about twice what it was in a large city, where the regular pew rent was $50 a year.

What is the use of dodging the facts and of calling a church "free" where everybody is taxed? The fact is that we cannot honestly have free pews until we can have free preachers and free music, not until insurance companies are eager to take free risks on church property, coal-dealers, sextons, and gas companies looking for an opportunity to do missionary work on the free system.

How absurd this seems! Yet it is no exaggeration. Agreements have to be made to actually pay these demands; and it is only open and business-like to arrange as nearly as can be for a certain rental income to meet the outgo agreed upon. If these outlays are not arranged for by rentals, but by "voluntary (?) contributions," still what becomes of the free church idea?

LAYMAN.

IN DOG DAYS.

I see the landscape tremble in the heat,
I hear the murmur of the rustling trees;
I close my eyes, and to myself I seem
As one who floats 'mid odorous Indian seas.
Scarce draw the sails in the dull opiate air;
Scarce stirs the breeze the opalescent calm;
Upon the sleeping islands that we pass,
Scarce move the fringes of the shadowy palm.
And, as I sail, I seem to hear the voice
Of one who reads some drowsy Eastern tale,
Telling of men untouched of all the ills
Which for our hands and for our hearts prevail;
Aye, to be living in those days I seem,
And in those days still dreaming that I dream.

—John W. Chadwick.

MISSIONARY NOTES.

IN THE PACIFIC NORTH-WEST.

Rev. C. W. Wendte has recently returned from a vacation missionary trip to the Pacific North-west, during which he has travelled some four thousand miles and made nineteen public addresses. He reports the business condition of Oregon and Washington decidedly improved. The prevailing hopefulness is in marked contrast with the despondency which ruled a year ago. At the same time this people is practically at the end of its resources; and whatever income they now receive must be devoted to the discharge of debts and still more pressing material needs. At no time did the ideal interests among them suffer so severely as now. The church finances are at their lowest ebb; and the ministers' salaries are greatly in arrears, or have been reduced to a point which compels them in many cases to surrender their charges and seek settlement elsewhere. Were it not for the American Unitarian Association, all our churches in that region, save the mother church in Portland, would have to close their doors for a season.

SPOKANE, which felt the financial stringency of the times perhaps more keenly than any other of these North-western cities, is one of the first to rise from the depression. The enhanced prices of cereals and shipments of flour direct to China and Japan are leading to the erection of additional flour-mills. The discovery of valuable mines to the north induces a brisk trade in supplies, and the impending location of a large army post near the town adds to the cheerful outlook. Rev. A. G. Wilson, after serving our church faithfully and well for several years past, has resigned, and will seek at the East a congenial settlement. He leaves the church united and in better financial condition than for years past, though the salary it can offer a minister is but small at present. Meanwhile, if ever manifest destiny was written on the face of a town, it is at Spokane; and every day makes its superb water power and transportation facilities of more and more importance. The membership of the Unitarian society, while not large, is representative of the best life of the city; and it has a fairly good edifice, with no other incumbrance than about $900 owing the Loan Fund. It wants, of course, "a man like M. J. Savage," and will take what it can get. Rev. L. W. Sprague and Mrs. Lila Frost Sprague of San Francisco have been supplying the pulpit on a six weeks' exchange with Mr. Wilson. They are greatly liked. On Sunday evening a symposium was held by these speakers, together with Mr. Wendte, on the topics, "What it is to be a Liberal, a Unitarian, and a Christian."

SEATTLE.—The new minister, Dr. J. H. Acton, draws larger audiences than ever before attended our Unitarian church here. Financially, however, our cause suffers. Many of our most zealous members are much crippled in their resources. Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Shippen, Messrs. Conant, Allen, Lindsley, Preston, and others are faithful as in former times. Mr. Wendte, while here, discoursed on "The Weakness and Strength of Unitarianism"; and, in response to an appeal at the close of the service, a collection of $150 was taken up. Seattle is unquestionably the coming city on Puget Sound, and is resuming something of its former metropolitan aspect. The new canal to be cut through a hill from the waters of the sound to those of Lake Washington, a great body of fresh water in the rear of Seattle, is an enterprise of much importance from a commercial point of view. One feature of it is the reclamation of the tide lands adjoining the city with the earth from the cutting. St. Louis capital, chiefly, is invested in this scheme.

PUYALLUP, in the centre of vast fields, holds one of the most attractive and well-arranged of our smaller churches. Its chief pillars are the two brothers, Ezra and John Meeker. When hops sold at $2, the farmers in West Washington waxed rich. But last year 5 and 7 cents were the ruling prices, while lumber is equally depressed. The American laborers in the hop fields and gardens are glad to accept 80 cents and $1 a day as wages. It should be said, however, to offset this, that the cost of living also corresponds somewhat to these prices. One of our ministers, now out of employment, told me that he was able to secure good board at a neighboring farm-house for himself, wife, and two children at $16 a month, or 50 cents a day for four persons. Their appearance showed that the fare was at least plentiful and wholesome.

But for the luxuries and ideal interests of life little remains, though I did hear of one worthy lady who spent $2,000 on her late husband's tomb. To offset this, however, she subscribed only 5 cents a week toward the support of Unitarian preaching. Yet 5 cents a week represents for many housekeepers in this region quite a large sum. It is not pleasant to have the cause of the gospel in these parts so closely dependent on hops or any other single article; but so it is, and until the autumn returns come in it would not be easy to predict the future of Unitarianism or any other ism in this beautiful valley.

Mention ought to be made of the fine reading-room attached to this church, containing fifty or sixty of the leading English and American magazines and papers. These are not only accessible on week-days and Sundays in the church, but circulate freely among the townspeople, farmers, and wood-choppers throughout the county. They must be a great influence for good in all that region.

McMILLIN.—On Sunday morning, July 7, the superintendent drove six miles through hop-fields and a dense fir forest to McMillin. The latter is a little hamlet in the woods, consisting of ten or twenty houses, and is a flag station on the Northern Pacific Railroad. Here the enthusiasm of Mr. A. D. Hale and half a dozen other independent and clear-thinking heads of families built a modest little church of our order. The Women's National Alliance contributed $300 toward the structure. Last winter the Oakland (Cal.) Sunday-school curtailed the windows and replenished the Sunday-school library. A group of some twenty-five children with bright faces, many of them dwelling miles away on isolated ranches in the forest, was in session. The superintendent addressed them, and helped teach the Bible class. Then followed the service for their elders, a little company of perhaps forty persons. The music was not quite equal to that at Arlington Street, but it was fully as earnest and much less expensive. It is not as easy to speak to this frontier congregation as it would be to address Mr. Savage's or Mr. Ames's people. It requires far more energy of body and demonstration of the spirit, and they are far more critical of the sermon and delivery than a Boston audience would be. Some of our most able and honored preachers in New England would, I fear, fail to receive a call from these frontier churches. The most flattering comment made upon a discourse by the writer in one of our Central California towns was made to him at its close by a citizen of that country, guileless of a shirt-collar, but with a sincere desire to please,—"Waal now! 'Twan't nigh so bad as I expected!"

After the sermon came a general hearty hand-shaking, then the trustees' conference with the superintendent, and a lunch with the kindly and hospitable Hale family in their garden. Few as are these people, and limited their resources, denominational rivalry here displays itself in a hateful form. A second meeting-house is rising not forty feet away from our little Unitarian tabernacle, and the American Board actually pays $500 a year to a missionary to reside here and prevent the Unitarian heresy from gaining a permanent foothold. In vain did our people offer their orthodox brethren the partial use of their edifice for worship. A thousand dollars or more, chiefly from the East, is going into the new structure,—practically, a dead waste of money. And now the five or six German Lutherans in this village of a dozen or twenty houses are meditating a third church. But our McMillin friends hold lay services, and are encouraged by a monthly or semi-monthly sermon by the Puyallup and Seattle pastors or the Universalist preacher at Tacoma, Rev. Mr. Felt. To assure this, the American Unitarian Association makes them a grant of $100 annually.

We drove back to Puyallup in the afternoon, reaching it in time for the four o'clock service. About seventy-five persons were present, mostly men, including a delegation from the Grand Army. In the evening a third service was held, followed by an appeal for subscriptions for the year. After this a conference was held with the trustees; and then the superintendent went home with the Meekers, a tired but happy man. Some of our lazy ministers in the East, who, with only one service a Sunday, an exchange of pulpits once a month, an eight weeks' summer vacation, and a new settlement every fourth year, complain bitterly of overwork and exhaustion, might be benefited if they were to take a turn now and then at missionarying on the frontier.

CENTRALIA is a small town in West Washington, where a liberal movement has sprung up spontaneously. A little company assembled one week-day evening to hear the setter-forth of strange doctrines. It is hoped to give them an occasional missionary service. They have met for some time past as a Sunday Circle, under the auspices of the Post-office Mission, and are an unusually bright lot of people.

OLYMPIA, the capital of the State, had a vigorous Unitarian society years ago, under Rev. David Utter's ministry. That gentleman, by the way, has just distinguished himself in the annals of American exploration by making, in company with his fifteen-year-old son, the perilous passage of the Grand Cañon of the Colorado, from Utah to the Needles in Arizona, on a raft! Nothing more daring can be conceived of. The writer has visited the cañon, and it seems almost incredible that any such insecure craft should have borne the intrepid voyagers over those terrible rapids and dark and winding chasms.

After Mr. Utter came Rev. John C. Kimball, and made the fir forests ring with his stentorian eloquence. Mr. Kimball was immensely popular in these parts. Had he remained, he would probably have been sent to the United States Senate by this time. Later our society lost its little church by fire. The site, during the boom four years ago, was sold for $8,000. In their overconfidence they built a church for $10,500, and a block of flats for as much more, and assumed a large indebtedness. The boom subsided, the flats were unrented, the town went to pieces for a time. Rev. Mr. Hoagland felt compelled to leave them for want of financial support; and for two years only occasional services have been held. The congregation has melted away to a handful of discouraged and financially embarrassed men and women. Meanwhile the debt presses heavily, and the Loan Fund instalments are not paid. Altogether the situation is most distressing. The superintendent is thankful in such a strait that he had eight years of business training ere he entered the ministry. Two visits to Olympia makes our problem there a little nearer solution than before, and it is hoped that ultimately all will be arranged for the best interests of those concerned.

It would have been pleasant to visit Waitsburg, Ore., where one of our old-time Meadville graduates, Postmaster Duncan Ingraham, is the centre and soul of a Unitarian circle which meets regularly for study and worship.

Astoria, Fairhaven, Whatcom, and Everett, each with a little circle of friends of our cause, proffered a welcome. But no permanent work can be done in these towns until business revives, and it seemed best to devote one's labors to places offering larger immediate inducements.

PORTLAND, ORE.—Our well-established and vigorous society at this point goes on as usual. Rev. Dr. T. L. Eliot, pastor emeritus, has improved in health, and is able to occupy the pulpit more or less on Sundays. The Eliot home remains, as ever, the hospitable centre of Unitarian social life in that city, and of all genial and refining influences. Rev. Earl M. Wilbur continues his earnest and able ministry. His friends predict for him a large place in the intellectual and moral life of our fellowship. If there is a better, more efficient Sunday-school in our body than that conducted by Mr. Wilbur, I have never learned of it. The twenty-five years of Mr. Eliot's fostering care are now crowned by the thorough and painstaking endeavors of Mr. Wilbur. The principal drawback is the narrow, inconvenient quarters assigned to the school. Our Portland church sadly needs a new structure with modern appointments. As its property is now very valuable for business purposes, it will not be long, let us hope, before it arouses to the need of a new and beautiful church home, such as the other leading societies of the city have already acquired.

The Frazier Public Reading-room in this church is one of the best institutions of Portland, while Miss Davidson's work in the Post-office Mission is a quiet but telling influence throughout all this region for liberal Christian principles. Portland is a beautiful city, with its handsome public and business edifices, its charming homes, its broad river, and its glorious panorama of snow peaks and primeval forests. It is the emporium of a fertile and prosperous State, and has a great future before it.

SALEM.—It was a sorrow to find our old-time fellow-worker, Rev. W. E. Copeland, a very sick man. With the kind aid of Mrs. Thomas L. Eliot, who is not only a poetess of acknowledged merit, but occasionally drops into preaching; of Rev. Messrs. F. H. Adams and Wilbur, and Drs. Acton and Eliot, a series of supplies was arranged for the Salem pulpit; and Mr. Copeland will be given a much needed rest. Salem is the capital of the State of Oregon, and a beautiful little city, shaded by that most handsome of shade-trees, the Oregon maple. The public buildings, asylums, reformatories, etc., of the State, are largely located here, with woollen and flour mills; while all around is a fertile agricultural country. The vast wheat-fields of Oregon are a pleasant sight at this season, with their golden billows of grain. Mr. Copeland has wrought well here. The church is composed of prominent and substantial people, who are determined to maintain it with power. Twelve of the leading members, bankers and business men among them, take each a spell of acting as sexton, to save the expense of that functionary. Twenty-four of the women members, in turn,—in some cases aided by their servants,—attend to the cleaning of the church. Five of the wealthiest members promise soon to give $500 apiece to clear off the debt on the church edifice, which, it may be remarked, is a well-appointed and handsome building. Mention should be made of the efficient labors of Mrs. Copeland in the Sunday-school and parish.

EUGENE.—The seat of the State University is a place of importance. For a year past monthly Unitarian services have been held here by Mr. Wendte, Mr. Wilbur, Dr. Eliot, Mr. Copeland, and others. These have awakened much interest. About one hundred persons attended the superintendent's services. On Monday Mr. Wilbur came down from Portland, and a canvass of the town was made. Some twenty calls showed all favorable, and many ready to help in the organization of a Unitarian society. The best elements in the town are represented in the list of names. It may, however, be best to await the dawning of better financial times, and simply continue our services. The State University is doing admirable work in informing and broadening the minds of its pupils and the people of Oregon in general. President Chapman especially, although nominally a Methodist, is abreast of modern ideas and methods; and under his energetic direction the institution is increasing in numbers and influence.

So ended a vacation trip to the Pacific North-west. There was reward and inspiration in it as well as toil and weariness. The single thought that all this vast region, several times larger than New England, and with infinitely greater resources in climate, soil, mines, forests, and fisheries, will some day, in the not far distant future, be the abode of twenty millions and more of Americans, of itself gives a great uplift to one's missionary endeavors, and makes this preliminary work of the utmost importance to our liberal cause. Portland, Seattle, Spokane, are to be the metropolises of the Pacific North-west; and around these will cluster cities and towns of only secondary importance, with great and rich districts behind them. Let us not, therefore, "despise the day of small things," but toil on in the full conviction that "it is our Father's good pleasure to give us the kingdom."

A CONTRIBUTION TO MODERN RELIGIOUS HISTORY.

Rev. S. M. Crothers gave a very broad and able lecture at the Plymouth School of Ethics on "The Tendencies of Thought in Liberal Christian Churches," which was fully reported in the Transcript. From this we condense the following:—

We are not so much elaborating a universal religion as coming to realize the universality of religion. The liberal Christian, acknowledging in other religions this tendency to develop universal ideas and sympathies, and rejoicing in it, comes to see it in that which has come to him by inheritance. It is his mother tongue. He believes first of all in religion as a universal fact in human experience, an elemental force in history. Believing in the universal, he sympathizes with its special manifestations. Christianity has already assimilated many elements. It has felt the "influence sweet of Athens and of Rome, and old Judea's gift of sacred fire." It has responded to "slow, sure Britain's secular might and the German's inward right," and to-day its pulse quickens with the abounding life of America. At its centre it has enshrined a type of humanity which in tenderness and grace has never been surpassed. It is rich in memories, it has a moral impulse not yet exhausted. The tendency of present thought strengthens while it enlarges Channing's idea of Christianity as a spiritual system. The action of the Unitarian National Conference last year, when conservatives and radicals united in expressions of loyalty to the religion of Jesus, while with the same unanimity they understood that religion to be not a body of doctrines, but a manifestation of love to God and man, is indicative of this attitude. In Martineau's "Seat of Authority in Religion" may be found a frank statement of this position, which thus concludes: "Christianity understood as the personal religion of Jesus Christ stands clear of these perishable elements, and realizes the true relation between God and man. For religion is the right attitude of the finite to the Infinite; the straining of the vision from within the shadows to the far-off light; the devotion of goodness, still immature and precarious, toward the Perfect and the Eternal."

The work of liberal Christianity in theology has been more largely negative than affirmative. The great affirmations had been made long ago. But theologians have mingled with these other affirmations which largely nullify the sublime conceptions. The contribution of liberal Christianity has been in its denial of the limitations to the thought of God. Infinite power working through eternal laws does not need the transient miracle. Infinite wisdom is not consistent with the afterthought implied in formal schemes and plans of salvation. Infinite goodness leaves no room for a hopeless hell. "Be assured," said Channing, "that God cannot demand your assent to what shocks your best feelings." This purified theism is the essential faith. In the development of the idea of the fatherhood of God the liberal Christian has often fallen into an anthropomorphism more undisguised than that of the creed which he had rejected. The Calvinist had room for the harsher facts of existence. The preaching of liberal Christianity has often been characterized by an easy optimism. God is so good that there is nothing for us to fear or to exert ourselves about. He will take care of everything.

From this paradise of sentimental piety we have been driven by the scientific spirit. It has revealed the "Calvinism of Nature." The element of struggle comes back. Optimism we still may have, but an easy optimism is henceforth impossible. The best is not a gift, but an achievement.

In regard to the faith in the personality of God there are three general positions in regard to the theistic faith. The first is that of those who accept the categories of human personality as sufficient definitions of the one Power of the universe. When it is said, "God is a Person," it is taken for granted that we understand what personality is. This faith is definite and dogmatic. Secondly, those who, looking upon personality as limitation, refuse thus to limit the Power which forever must be unknown. In the third place, we have those who look upon personality, not as a limitation, but as the most mysterious and unfathomable mystery of being. In the abysmal depths of personality they see, not an explanation of that Power in which we move, but the most sublime and awe-inspiring manifestation of that Power. The soul of the good man, conscious of himself, devoted to righteousness, aspiring to perfection, is not the only manifestation of that Power, but it is the highest that we have.

One phase of the social question with which the liberal churches have dealt is the conception of the function of the Church in society. The pioneers of religious liberalism in America were inclined to undervalue the Church, and to cultivate extreme individualism.

Their attitude as reformers compelled this. During the Transcendental period a virtue was made out of this necessity. The religious institution was treated as a prison-house of the religious spirit, from which it was seeking emancipation. There is noticeable now among Unitarians a certain pride in the paucity of numbers as contrasted with what they love to speak of as the popular religion. This is not always consistent with their fine appreciation of the enthusiasm for humanity. Their attitude is like that of the squirrel,—

"If I'm not so large as you,
You are not so small as I,
And not half so spry."

The historical question which has caused the most discussion is that of the relation of the free and rational piety which Channing and Ballou believed in to Christianity. In the Universalist body this has only recently assumed any importance; but among Unitarians it has caused not a little controversy, and has passed through several phases of opinion. In the first stage the claim for the Christian name was a claim for recognition, and was a part of the struggle for existence. To the early Unitarians of New England Christianity and religion were practically synonymous terms. What were called the false religions were only dimly seen in the horizon. The liberal party claimed by eliminating the accretions to present the purity of the Apostolic Church. As a relic of this period, the American Unitarian Association has still a tract on its remoter shelves called "The Apostle Peter a Unitarian." The so-called Christian connection has remained in this stage of development. Discarding man-made creeds, and contenting itself with the language of the New Testament, it professes to reproduce in the nineteenth century the faith of the first. Two new forces entering the Unitarian field made this position untenable. One was criticism, the other was the comparative study of the great world-religions. The effect of Biblical criticism was to discredit the assumption of the primitive perfection of Christianity. The critic found no spiritual Eden free from superstition and misleading speculation in the first century. The apostle Peter was evidently not a Trinitarian, and would have been sorely perplexed over Calvin; but he would have been no more at home in the atmosphere of modern liberalism. If by primitive Christianity we mean the exact reproduction of the thought of the first group of the disciples, we are asking an impossibility. We do not know exactly what it was. And, if we did know, it would be impossible accurately to imitate it. And, moreover, if we could accurately imitate it, it would have no more practical value than any other curious anachronism. Each age must develop its own peculiar type of piety.

On the other hand, the impartial study of other religious systems makes it evident that the spiritual and ethical elements which we find in Christianity are not its exclusive possession: they are found in different degrees and in various proportions in all the great faiths of humanity. As a consequence of this, many of the liberal party in religion, after having earnestly contended for their right to bear the Christian name, began to feel that, after all, it was a limitation. In the Unitarian body this has been largely the line of cleavage between so-called radicals and conservatives. The same essential faith was held by both, but historic phrases which to some were full of broadest and most inspiring meaning to others had come to seem narrow and exclusive. Most of those who pleaded for some formal acknowledgment of the lordship and leadership of Jesus had in mind no Messianic doctrine: they would follow Jesus only because they believed he led into the full freedom of the truth. And those who would yield allegiance only to a universal religion were ready to acknowledge that in the words and spirit of Jesus they found the best concrete illustration of that universal religion.

The "flesh and blood" were linked into a truth divine. The differences were differences of approach to the same central facts. To one a free and spiritual religion was an inheritance, to the other it was a discovery. No wonder that there was much misunderstanding. This period is rapidly passing away. The question which once threatened serious division, and, in fact, occasioned a schism in the Unitarian body, small in numbers, but important because of the high character and attainments of the seceders, is no longer a threatening one. Does the acceptance of the method and spirit of liberalism in religion take one necessarily outside Christianity? To those brought up in the prevailing thought of a century ago this question had an importance and definiteness it has not now, and it was answered according to a different method. There were in religion, as in botany, hard and fast classifications, and an impassable gulf between the species. At a certain time Christianity was created. It is either good or evil, to be accepted or rejected. The unsatisfied must create a new religion. Timid piety trembled that the faith delivered to the saints might be destroyed. More daring spirits accepted the challenge, and issued prospectuses of a new rational and universal religion.

To-day both these dispositions have been superseded by a temper of mind which is the result of the application of the principle of evolution to religions. The old classifications became obsolete. The genetic connection comes to be more important than formal definitions. It is seen that the "World-soul knows his own affair," and does not leave his choicest works to the caprice of an individual, even though that individual be a philosopher of good repute. The great events come not when one man says, "I will invent a religion," or another says, "Go to, I will destroy it!" They only come in the fulness of time. Thus the historic faiths, viewed as living things, have new importance and authority. They endure not because they remain the same, but through their adaptability and assimilation.

MIDDLE STATES AND CANADA.

To the Directors of the American Unitarian Association:

With the revival of business prosperity which began several months ago we come to the close of the year in this department with a decidedly improved outlook. The paralyzing effect on our missionary work of the great financial depression through which we have been passing is already perceptibly modified. The discouraging features in the situation are beginning to disappear. There is a renewed interest in missionary work among us that promises to result in the immediate future in the starting of several new and hopeful movements.

But even the past year is not without its record of new missionary enterprises successfully started. For several years plans for a second church in one of the newer parts of the rapidly growing city of Buffalo have been maturing, and have now ripened into fulfilment. Early last autumn, under the auspices of the Church of Our Father in Buffalo, the pastor, Rev. Thomas R. Slicer, began at Parkside a new movement, which has already developed into a permanent organization. A good congregation has been gathered, a Sunday-school established; and the society starts with a membership which, in quality and numbers, insures stability and steady growth. In addition to his arduous duties as pastor of his large and flourishing church on Delaware Avenue, Mr. Slicer preaches and conducts the Sunday-school at Parkside regularly every Sunday afternoon. To him, and to the hearty co-operation of his people, the success of this new enterprise is entirely due.

It is a pleasure to report that, after many years of suspended animation, the Unitarian Church on Staten Island is exhibiting signs of revival. Beginning first with a Sunday-school in a private house, the interest grew until last autumn the society quietly proceeded to the erection of a beautiful new chapel, which takes the place of the old church which had been for many years disused. This new and attractive place of worship was dedicated with impressive ceremonies on the 31st of March. The church was filled to overflowing, many Unitarians from New York and Brooklyn being present. No regular pastor will be settled at present; but the pulpit will be supplied by the ministers from New York, Brooklyn, and the neighborhood.

The most important undertaking of the year has been the resuscitation of the First Unitarian Church of the city of Albany, N.Y. Organized in 1842, this church had a checkered history up to 1872, the date of its last suspension. Previous to that there were several suspensions, owing to long interregnums in the pastorate. At the date last named above a combination of circumstances seemed to make further effort to maintain it impracticable. Its property was sold, and after paying off its indebtedness a small sum of money left over was deposited in a savings-bank. The corporate existence of the church, however, was maintained by the officers; and now, after a suspension of twenty-three years, the society is again revived,—this time under such changed conditions as make it practically certain that from this time on it will go steadily forward to develop into vigorous life and power. This result has been made possible chiefly by changes in the situation in Albany which have taken place within the last few years, and especially within the last few months. When the able and popular pastor of one of the largest evangelical churches in Albany applied to me early in the winter for admission to the Unitarian fellowship, it seemed to me that the opportune time for inaugurating a movement for the resuscitation of the cause in that city had come. After much earnest entreaty, and the assurance of many persons of liberal religious views in Albany that they would heartily co-operate in an effort to build up a Unitarian church in that city, Rev. Dr. Brundage was finally persuaded to remain, and become the pastor of the revived church. Steps were immediately taken to inaugurate this work; and on the evenings of March 21 and 22 two platform meetings, arranged and presided over by your superintendent, were held in Jermain Hall. The speakers were Rev. Messrs. Thomas R. Slicer, S. R. Calthrop, Minot J. Savage, Charles F. Dole, S. M. Crothers, and Dr. Edward Everett Hale. The attendance at these meetings, and the wide and deep interest aroused by them, surpassed all expectations. On the first six Sundays following these meetings the Leland Opera House was occupied by very large audiences, attracted there by the preaching of Rev. Dr. Brundage, who was at once put in charge of the work. The services are now held in the new Odd Fellows Hall, with an average attendance of over three hundred. On April 21 the church was reorganized, and a full board of officers elected according to the statute governing such cases. Dr. Brundage was then regularly engaged as pastor of the church, steps were taken to put its financial affairs on a good business basis, and all the work of the church is now being conducted in an energetic and efficient way. The church now has an enrolled membership of one hundred and fourteen, and there is every reason to expect that in the coming autumn and winter this will be steadily and largely increased.

In addition to the foregoing I desire to make mention of two new movements in country towns,—the first in Union Springs, Cayuga County, N.Y.; the latter, at Gouverneur, St. Lawrence County, N.Y. The former was inaugurated by Rev. J. M. Scott of Ithaca, and the latter by Rev. Mr. Mitchell. It is as yet too early to say what will be the outcome of these undertakings, but both seem to have in them some promise of growth and usefulness.

Since my last report three pastoral changes in this department have taken place. The first was caused by the greatly lamented death of Rev. Walter C. Moore of Trenton, N.Y. This vacancy has just been filled by the election of Rev. Edward F. Temple, who will enter upon his work on July 1. In All Souls' Church, New York, Rev. Frederick J. Gauld succeeded, in October last, Rev. W. W. Locke as assistant minister. At Passaic, N.J., the withdrawal of Rev. Stephen H. Camp from the temporary charge of the society was followed on April 17 by the installation of Rev. Frank S. C. Wicks as the first regular pastor of this flourishing new society.

I take pleasure in calling your attention to the fact that since my last report the society in Orange, N.J., has, within five years from the date of its organization, become entirely self-supporting.

In concluding this report, it gives me satisfaction to mention the fact that during the past year three of our older churches have, with very gratifying results, introduced the business-like subscription method of raising their missionary funds.

Respectfully submitted,

D. W. MOREHOUSE,

Supt. for Middle States and Canada.

A REMINISCENCE OF PARIS.

BY EDWARD FROST WATROUS.

A few weeks since I stood before the Palais du Commerce in Lyons upon the spot where Carnot was assassinated, startled at the thought that nearly a year had passed since that memorable event in the history of France.

Paris was deeply stirred on that June evening when the news spread throughout the city that the President of the republic was dying, and that his distracted family was rushing toward the city that mourned in bitterness the treachery that had lain low an honored guest.

I was in Paris then and during the days of excitement that followed, and noted with interest the effect of the calamity upon citizens of all classes. The very air seemed heavy with the horror that filled all minds in the knowledge that another noble life had been sacrificed to the demon of anarchy. The suppressed excitement was manifested in various ways,—in the crowds representing all ranks and grades of society passing up and down the boulevards, each face wearing a subdued anxious expression. There was increased activity at the news-stands; and nearly every man was reading the last issue of Le Temps, Le Figaro, or other of the journals which gave full accounts of the dastardly crime that had left vacant the chair of state in the French Republic. Theatres and places of amusement were closed for several nights, while various fêtes and entertainments were indefinitely postponed. So general was this expression of sorrow that the Bourse seemed a conspicuous exception, until the explanation was given in the journals "that the law did not allow of that expression of their association with the national grief."

Early on Monday the Elysée Palace, the Chamber of Deputies, War Office, and other government buildings displayed the tri-color, furled and crape-bound; and another twenty-four hours saw the hotels and prominent business houses in the heart of the city shadowed with the insignia of mourning. The statue of Strasbourg in the Place de la Concorde, always bearing mourning wreaths since her separation from France, received many additions; while the statue of Lyons was heavily draped with crape, even to the encircling veil.

The black-bordered photographs of M. Carnot were offered for sale on every street corner. In one day the bright costumes and gay flowers disappeared from the shop windows; and in their places were only goods of black or white, alternating with large clusters of the national flag tied with crape. Even the flower-booths changed in appearance. There were not alone garlands of natural flowers on sale, but those hideous works of distorted art so extensively used in France for funeral decorations, made from black, white, and purple beads, strung upon wires and shaped into impossible flowers and foliage.

The body of the late President reached Paris before dawn on Tuesday, and was at once removed to the Elysée to lie in state until the funeral. It was early surmised that the obsequies would be at Notre Dame, and the burial in the Pantheon, where the ashes of the patriot might mingle with those of other great men who had contributed to the glory of France.

At the palace hundreds of floral offerings were received the first day, and every hour increased the number. Of those received later many were unrivalled in magnificence, as the gardens and conservatories of all Europe contributed their most precious treasures at the command of royalty.

Telegrams of condolence came promptly from every civilized nation, and each European monarch gave expression to his personal sympathy with the bereaved family. The truth of the words of Shakspeare, "One touch of nature makes the whole world kin," was verified in the fact that, notwithstanding the relations of France with Germany were not entirely harmonious, yet the first message of condolence received at the Elysée was from the Emperor William.

As with one voice, the nations of the world expressed condemnation of the crime that had deprived France of a political leader, who, through devotion to his country, by faithful performance of duty, regardless of self, had done more for the French Republic than any other man, and who in his untimely death had won the crown of martyrdom.

But, as the truest sympathy must come from a similar experience, so from no other country were the honest and cordial words of commiseration more welcome than from the sister republic of the United States, where twice the hand of an assassin laid low her chief executive.

The Convention of the National Assembly was called for Wednesday,—a delay that occasioned some surprise, as the law of 1875 provided "that, in case of vacancy from death or any other cause, the two chambers shall proceed immediately to the election of a new president." The interval gave opportunity for the various journals to suggest names and comment with great freedom upon the qualifications, desirable or otherwise, of the several possible candidates. M. Casimir-Périer received many commendatory notices, though it was evident that one faction feared, as much as another desired, his election.

But the suspense was soon ended, as at the first ballot M. Casimir-Périer was elected: the six hundred deputies who drove out to the historical palace of Versailles at mid-day of June 27 returned before sunset, their task finished.

The result was promptly telegraphed to the city, and long before six o'clock the principal avenues of the Bois de Boulogne and the Champs Elysées from the Arc d'Etoile to the Place de la Concorde were thronged with carriages filled with citizens and strangers awaiting the coming of the newly elected President. Around the Arc d'Etoile swept the double line of cavalry, and between was the carriage of the man thus unexpectedly raised to the highest position in France. At his side was his principal rival, M. Dupuy, and opposite two officers of high rank. The breastplates and carbines of the cavalry flashed in the rays of the setting sun; and the Lancers, who followed the first carriage with glittering brass helmets, tossing plumes, and waving pennants, made a brave appearance as Guard of Honor to the new President. The hundreds of deputies formed a long procession; and, as it filed rapidly cityward, I waited in vain for indications of the excitement that one might naturally expect. But there was not a shout nor an exclamation. One could not regard the silence as a mark of indifference, but rather as indicating respect to the memory of the dead,—the man still lying in the quiet chapel of the Elysée.

Late that evening, as on other evenings, I passed by the palace. All driving in that vicinity was suspended, and the only sound to be heard was the tread of the soldiers on guard before the chamber of death.

Preparations for the funeral continued through the week. Notre Dame was hung without and within with drapings of black; while the entire façade of the Pantheon was covered with black, relieved by the ornamentation in silver and gilt in stars, fleurs de lys, and other emblems. As soon as the route for the procession on Sunday was known, there was great activity along the boulevards. Thousands of positions in windows, upon roofs or balconies, were secured at extravagant prices.

But these did not suffice; and long before midnight of Saturday the Champs Elysées presented a busy scene, where thousands of Parisians were preparing to pass the night, to make sure of a desirable place for the morrow. Carts, tables, chairs, boxes, ladders, anything that promised an elevated position, was brought into requisition. The sound of the hammer was heard throughout the night, as by the dim light of moving lanterns temporary stands were erected. Amid the medley of confusing noises weary men, women, and children sought for much needed rest. But there was little opportunity for rest anywhere in Paris, as the entire city was astir at dawn, many going down the Champs Elysées to look upon a scene unknown in Paris in a time of peace. With dismay they gazed upon the beautiful boulevard, transformed into a disorderly market place, with its undisputable evidence that the transients had breakfasted as well as slept there.

For hours I watched the gathering of the multitude and the deputations going to the palace with floral emblems, many being borne upon the shoulders of two or four men. These were artistic productions, some, of rare orchids, being of fabulous value. The wreaths were often six feet in diameter. Among them I recall one of especial beauty: the lower half was of Parma violets, massed; the upper half was composed of nodding ferns, long-stemmed pink roses, and sprays of heliotrope.

As a rule, each wreath was crossed by a broad purple ribbon, with suitable inscription in gold letters, followed by the name of the society sending the same. It was said that millions of francs were expended upon the floral tributes,—a creditable statement to those who saw the dozen or more large wagons loaded with flowers that preceded the funeral car.

The black car, with muffled wheels, upheld the catafalque, with ornamentation of gold, silver, and waving plumes; while over the coffin was thrown the French tri-color in graceful folds. The reins that crossed the six coal-black horses were of broad white ribbon, a mute holding the bridle of each horse.

The atmosphere from early morning had that peculiar shimmering only seen when the heat is intense. At ten o'clock the procession left the palace; and, as it moved across the Place de la Concorde, so dense was the throng that it was difficult for the advance guard of cavalry to clear a route through the mass of packed humanity. Some confusion resulted, and morbid curiosity was expressed in remarks that were ill-timed. Panics occurred as frightened horses backed into the crowd, or trees and stands broke down under the restless movements of occupants. Each vase along the guarding fence of the Tuileries held from one to three men, and the trees overflowed with boys. Ambulances were kept busy carrying to the hospitals those who were injured by falling, overcome by the heat or who fainted under the fearful pressure.

This confusion was only temporary; for, as the car moved along, there was a silence such as is only known when the presence of death is recognized. This was an impressive spectacle. Men bared their heads, and muttered their prayers; while women sobbed, as they counted their rosaries and crossed their breasts.

Close behind the car walked the three sons of M. Carnot. Next, alone, bare-headed, came M. Casimir-Périer. The appearance of the new President awakened great interest, as, seemingly unguarded, he followed the body of his predecessor to its last resting-place. It was well known that apprehensions had been expressed that his life would be the forfeit of his presence; and the journals had stated that, after having exhausted every argument in the hope of keeping him within doors that day, his anxious family had spent the entire night in prayer for his safety. These reports added to the general interest felt, and he was the cynosure of all eyes. He was in full evening dress,—the costume worn by French gentlemen upon all important occasions,—his broad breast crossed by the red sash of the Legion of Honor, as, with eyes lowered, erect carriage, and martial tread, he passed through the crowd, which was proud of the bravery displayed by the new President.

Minute-guns sounded from the time the cortege started until Notre Dame was reached, when the great bell of that cathedral began to toll, and the Archbishop of Paris in full ecclesiastical robes stood in the central door to receive the dead. The friends gathered about the bier placed before the high altar, and the vast congregation stood during the mass and the brief eulogy pronounced by the archbishop. The procession then re-formed, and marched to the Pantheon,—the Westminster of Paris. Here four short addresses were made by prominent officials. The bier was left standing there; and the burial in the crypt was during the evening, witnessed only by the family and immediate friends. It was four o'clock when the procession disbanded, and thousands of weary people who had stood or marched for six consecutive hours sought their homes for rest and refreshment.

On both Monday and Tuesday I visited Notre Dame and the Pantheon to gaze upon the throngs who gathered to see the decorations, and at the latter to look upon the burial-place and secure a souvenir of the occasion.

The Place before the Pantheon was filled with people, quiet and orderly, but earnest in the desire to secure admission and a souvenir. The former required much patience, as only a few could be admitted into the crypt at once. A line was formed which reached far into a neighboring street, where many stood for hours beneath the broiling July sun, awaiting their turn.

Duplicates of the more important emblems were made by the skilled flower-makers of Paris; and the thousands of original tributes were placed within the enclosure at the left of the Pantheon, whither the people continually pressed to receive a rose, violet, or leaf of palm.

A few days since I stood again in the Pantheon, near the spot where the monument of M. Carnot is being placed. Although entirely hidden from the public view, it was said that considerable progress had been made, and that the public ceremony of its dedication would undoubtedly occur during the summer. When completed, it is to be a magnificent monument worthy of the prominent place it will occupy among the thirty-five memorials to men famous in the history of France.

THE AWFUL AVALANCHE.

A touching story comes from Turin. In a narrow valley, near the celebrated Therma di Vinadio, there is a little hamlet which every winter is almost completely separated from the rest of the world by the snow. A few days ago an avalanche rolled into the valley, and, reaching some of the houses, carried off the roof of one and completely crushed and buried another in which were two peasants and their child.

The neighbors immediately proceeded to dig them out, making a tunnel through the snow, but found the mother and father dead. The baby, however, was found in its cradle under two tables, which had fallen one against the other, forming a kind of roof. A dog was also in the cradle with the child. American.

TAMMANY'S PROTECTED SALOONS.

Commissioner Roosevelt has an article in the Independent of last week which shows how the law was observed. An arrangement was made with wealthy saloon-keepers that, as long as they loyally supported the Tammany ticket, they should not be molested in their Sunday traffic. Mr. Roosevelt says:—

Only recently I came across a curious case, in which this lesson was taught. A new patrolman from the country was put upon a given beat for the first time. He knew that under the law all saloons had to close at one o'clock. A big corner saloon kept by a noted Tammany politician remained open after the hours, as a matter of course. The smaller saloons in the neighborhood had closed. The policeman put his head in the door, and directed the proprietor to close. The proprietor regarded this as a joke. It was something so novel in his experience he could not understand that it had a serious side. After making his rounds once again, the policeman, finding the place still lighted, walked in, and told them to shut forthwith. They regarded it first with amazement, then with anger, and finally told him that he had better mind his own business and leave. Thereupon he replied that he would instantly arrest the saloon-keeper and his assistants if they did not close. Accordingly, close they did, but sent word immediately to the police station. At the station the news created more consternation. In fifteen minutes an officer had been sent around to the too zealous policeman, who was taken off that beat and put on another, where there were no saloons. In five minutes after the saloon was again blazing with light and in full blast. Three or four complaints were soon afterward lodged against the countryman for trivial faults, and in a very few weeks he had learned the lesson of being blind unless his superiors chose to order his eyes open.

Another case which came within my personal knowledge may also be interesting. A certain officer arrested the lookout man of a saloon whose owner was an influential politician. The lookout man's friends came to his assistance, assaulted the officer, and injured him very severely. Instead of commending him for his actions, the board actually fined him severely on a trumped-up charge of assault, and the saloon was not again molested.

LIVING UNITARIAN MINISTERS.

The Unitarian Exhibit at Atlanta will have on its walls portraits of our late Unitarian ministers. It is proposed to prepare albums which shall contain photographs, cabinet size, of all living Unitarian ministers, to be open to examination during the exposition, and afterward presented to the American Unitarian Association and placed in the American Unitarian Association Rooms, 25 Beacon Street, Boston. The usefulness of such a collection there is obvious.

It will save much correspondence and expense if each one of our ministers will, on reading this, send a cabinet photograph of himself, with his autograph on the card beneath it, to Mrs. George Leonard Chaney, Leominster, Mass. She will see that the photographs are properly arranged in simple, strong albums. All ministers who do not send photographs by August 20 will receive a begging letter. Please save the work and the expense by sending before August 20. After September 10 address her at Atlanta, Ga., Box 643.

AMERICAN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

A church without a Sunday-school or guild is like a family without children: its disappearance is merely a question of time.

The infant class in the Sunday-school is a good place to begin the missionary work, or perhaps it would be more accurate to say the missionary education. If every Sunday-school had its missionary Sunday, say once each month, at which time the scholars should bring their pennies, their nickels, or their dimes, with an occasional talk from the superintendent or minister about it, so that they might catch the significance of it, we should then begin to build for the future as well as to provide for the present.

There is a thought that grows out of the preceding paragraph. If the children are taught to think of others, to care for others, —if they are taught in this way the meaning of that word they ought to know all about, altruism, should we not be educating them in the second great commandment more effectively than we could in any other way?

Once more. How long would it be before the children would be wanting to know what their parents were doing in the same direction? Who knows what an influence upon the parents would be set in operation? Every one with any powers of observation knows that the child is the real master in the family, spiritually speaking; and how long would it be in this missionary work before "a little child should lead"?

In the guilds there should be a branch, or section, devoted to the missionary work; and it, too, should have a practical side. There is no work connected with the church that exceeds it in interest for the young, if you will only let them see the results. In these guilds, therefore, there should be regular giving, for human nature is the same in a boy or a girl that it is in a man or a woman; and they, too, value a thing, generally speaking, at what it costs, sacrifice being an essential and indispensable element among the items of cost.

We hear much said about what this rich man or that, this rich church or that, ought to do for our work, and perhaps the judgment is accurate; but what about the person that discerns this duty for another? Does he or she always see it with a clear, unclouded vision, or is it true that the other's duty is seen by looking over or under the beam in the critic's eye?

It is undoubtedly true that, if every one except the rich men, did their full duty, the missionary treasury would be much fuller than it has ever yet been. Would it not be a good plan to limit the privilege of criticism to those who have already performed their full duty?

This week we have quite a number of new books in the rooms. They are, with one exception, all small books. Most of them have just been published. A small volume, entitled "The Forward Movement in Religious Thought, as interpreted by Unitarians," is by Dr. Brooke Herford, published by Philip Green, London. We have "Five Lectures delivered by Dr. Herford in Rosslyn Hill, Chapel Hempstead." The titles of the lectures are as follows: "The Old and the New Thought of the Bible," "The Old and the New Faith in God," "The Christ of the Gospels brought back," "Practical Christianity the Salvation of Society," "Heaven and Hell: Here and Hereafter"; also, "Heads of English Unitarian History," with appended lectures on Baxter and Priestley, by Alexander Gordon, M.A.; also "Life in the Holy Spirit, and Other Sermons," by John Dendy, B.A.; also "Psalms of the West," second edition, published by Kegan Paul, Trench, Trübner & Co. Limited, London.

We have also the little book of "Poems" by John B. Tabb. These poems have attracted much attention, and the call for it is increasing. Price $1. Another volume of poems is by Philip Henry Savage, entitled "First Poems and Fragments," published by Copeland & Day, price $1.25; also a new supply of "The Theology of the Future," and other brief essays, a very convenient little volume, published in 1894 in London. This is a compilation from the writings of James Freeman Clarke, D.D., W. Copeland Bowie, J. Page Hopps, R. A. Armstrong, B.A., Charles Hargrove, M.A., Frank Walters, J. C. Street, Brooke Herford, D.D., G. Vance Smith, D.D., and S. Fletcher Williams. Price 25 cents. This is a useful book to distribute to those inquiring about Unitarian views.

"The Natural History of the Christian Religion," by William Mackintosh, M.A., D.D., is generally regarded as a very important book, and is highly commended. It is a large volume, containing twenty chapters and an appendix. The book is a study of the doctrine of Jesus as developed from Judaism and converted into dogma. Price $3, sent free of postage.

These are a few of the latest books. Our friends will remember that we can furnish any Unitarian publication, and, generally speaking, almost any book that those living outside the large cities may wish to procure. Unitarians ought to understand that they can assist our work by using the facilities for this business which we furnish, and we believe them to be fully equal to those offered by any one else.

G. W. S.

The Sunday School.

So many of our Unitarian Sunday-schools used the one-topic graded system last year, they will be interested to know in good season what the developed plan is for the coming year. The subject of the first twenty lessons will be "The Teaching of Jesus," and of the last twenty, "The Beginning of Christianity." The first subject will be treated in the parables. Mrs. J. C. Jaynes will write original lessons for the Primary Department, to be illustrated as heretofore. Instead of issuing the entire forty lessons at once, as has been done for the Primary the past two years, these illustrated leaflets will be published at the same time with the Intermediate and Advanced, and sent out together. The intermediate lessons on the same subjects will be prepared by Rev. Edward A. Horton, and the Advanced by Rev. Thomas R. Slicer. Lectures will be given at the Unitarian Building, 25 Beacon Street, as before on Saturday afternoons, for the Primary in one section, and the Intermediate and Advanced together in another section. The latter "talks" in Channing Hall will be by Rev. W. Hanson Pulsford, who has been so successful with them the past season. Although bearing no date, it is planned that the first lesson shall begin with the 15th of September (the third Sunday), and the first "talk" on the 14th (Saturday) at 3 P.M.

Religious Intelligence.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be sent in by Saturday Morning: announcements of meetings which are to take place must be sent in before Tuesday Noon.]

"In his discourse Sunday at Athol," says the Orange Enterprise, "Rev. Carl G. Horst made the broad statement that indiscriminate almsgiving was wrong,—little less than sin. The thinking person cannot fail to see that Mr. Horst is correct. It is far better to help others to help themselves than to aid them directly."

THE Athol Transcript, under its "Church Notes," gives a programme of the Sunday services; and the Unitarian church welcomes to its fellowship, irrespective of creed, color, or nationality, all who "in the love of the truth and the spirit of Jesus Christ wish to unite for the worship of God and the service of man."

THE sixth annual session of the Hancock Conference at the Unitarian church, Bar Harbor, will begin August 7, programme as follows. Morning session, beginning promptly at 10.30, standard time: devotional exercises, conducted by Rev. S. W. Brooke; "A Word of Greeting," Rev. Francis G. Peabody, D.D.; address by the president, Hon. John D. Hopkins; introduction of business; appointment of committees; address, Rev. Samuel M. Crothers; discussion, opened by Rev. Charles F. Dole. From 12.15 until 1.30 P.M. there will be a recess and collation. Attendants at the conference are expected to bring a basket lunch. This may be left in charge of the committee of the Bar Harbor church. This committee will prepare the collation at some room near the church. Afternoon session, beginning promptly at 1.30 P.M.: opening exercises, conducted by Mr. Charles H. Porter, Jr.; address, "The Work of the Interdenominational Committee in Maine," President William DeWitt Hyde; address, "The Work of Liberal Christians in Maine," Rev. D. M. Wilson; address, "The Liberal Gospel: How to proclaim it," Rev. L. D. Cochran; reports of committees; election of officers; concluding exercises, conducted by Rev. Francis G. Peabody, D.D. The conference is expected to adjourn about 3.15 P.M. The Bar Harbor Unitarian church is on Ledgelawn Avenue, a few minutes' walk from the steamboat wharf. The conference has no regular membership. All persons interested in the subjects discussed are cordially invited to attend. The meetings are open to all. Steamers leave as follows for Bar Harbor: From South-west Harbor 7.30 A.M., North-east Harbor 7.40 A.M., Seal Harbor 8.05 A.M.; from Winter Harbor 9 A.M., Grindstone Neck 9.30 A.M.; from West Gouldsboro 8.30 A.M.; from Mount Desert Ferry 7.45 A.M., Sullivan 8 A.M., Sorrento 8.30 A.M. Returning, steamers leave Bar Harbor for Seal Harbor, North-east Harbor, and South-west Harbor at 5 P.M.; for Grindstone Neck and Winter Harbor at 5.45 P.M.; for West Gouldsboro at 3.30 P.M.; for Sorrento at 6 P.M.; for Mount Desert Ferry at 5.45 P.M.

BOSTON.—The Country Week Mission is now very busy, and in some of the towns arrangements are made to secure places for the visitors. Thus in Athol nineteen families of the Unitarian society have promised to take ten or more children free of charge. This is equal to a contribution of $3 per child. One feature of this work is that the money subscribed is spent in the town where the subscription is made. The travelling expenses are paid by the "Boston Country Week."

Bulfinch Place Church (Benevolent Fraternity of Churches): Sunday-school at 10.30. Subject, "William Lloyd Garrison." Vesper service at 7.30. Music under direction of Mr. George Mendall Taylor. Mr. D. Mark Babcock, Miss Emma Becker, and others will sing. Rev. C. R. Eliot will speak upon "Business-life Duties." All are cordially invited.

Boston Common: Rev. Minot J. Savage and Mr. George W. Stone, treasurer of the Unitarian Association, were the speakers in the popular religious open-air services last Sunday. They were listened to by the usual large audience, and everything passed off well. Thus far the services have not been broken by rainy weather, and last Sunday was the eleventh on which services have been continuously held. These meetings are held under the auspices of the Benevolent Fraternity of Churches, and the Executive Committee is so well pleased with the results that it has been voted to continue through August and September. On next Sunday, August 4, the speakers will be Rev. Thomas R. Slicer of Buffalo and Rev. W. J. Batt, chaplain of the Concord Reformatory, Massachusetts. For the other Sundays in August the following ministers have been secured: Rev. Messrs. F. B. Mott, E. C. Butler, F. B. Hornbrooke, T. C. Williams, James De Normandie, and George L. Perin.

BATH, N.H.—The ladies of the Lend a Hand of All Souls' Church at Bath, N.H., will hold their annual sale for the benefit of the church at the church parlors, August 22, and will give a dinner and supper at the dining-room of All Souls'. The ladies will be grateful for any donations of money or articles from their many kind friends of the past. A large debt makes a heavy burden upon the church, and the ladies are striving to liquidate it. Contributions can be sent to Mrs. Gen. Bedel or Mrs. Sophia Orne.

DORCHESTER, MASS.—Rev. John W. Chadwick will preach at the First Parish Church on August 4.

GREEN HARBOR, MASS.—The annual fair of Grace Chapel Society, Green Harbor, will be held August 7 and 8, Wednesday and Thursday afternoons and evenings. We invite the Unitarian friends to be interested, and hope as many as possible will be able to be with us. Mr. and Mrs. Savary will receive at the parsonage for luncheon all who come from abroad. Trains leave Old Colony station, South Shore Road, at 9.30 and 11.30 A.M. for Green Harbor. Barge at station, 25 cents each way.

Round-trip ticket, $1.45. Barge returns at four o'clock P.M. to meet afternoon train for Boston.

OAKLAND, CAL.—Sunday services have been kept up this summer as usual. In the nine years of its existence this church has never suspended Sunday worship except on a few occasions when closed for repairs or participation in some general city service. Rev. C. W. Wendte resumed his work on July 14. The Sunday-school has met regularly for worship, though not for study, during the summer, but begins its new year of work August 4. The cool summer climate around San Francisco Bay permits this early resumption of services. Indeed, so far as the thermometer is concerned, there need be no cessation of church life. Great heat is unknown, and fires are often in order at evening during June and July. The floral wealth in California at this season is wondrously beautiful.

SAN DIEGO, Cal., is pastorless. Services are suspended during the heated term.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.—Rev. William G. Eliot preached Sunday mornings during June and July. Recently he gave a series of three thoughtful discourses on socialism. Mr. Eliot's earnestness, devotion to duty, and spirituality of nature are winning him a large place in the esteem and affection of both laity and ministers. Mrs. Eliot also is much esteemed and beloved. Rev. Dr. Horatio Stebbins is enjoying a brief vacation among his parishioners. Rev. Mr. Sprague returns to his pulpit in August.

SAN JOSE, CAL.—Rev. W. M. Jones has resigned this pulpit to accept a call to the Universalist church at Pasadena, recently left pastorless by the translation to Boston of our much admired Miss Florence Kollack, a woman in earnest. Mr. Jones is a broad-minded and able man, and worthy to succeed her.

—VICTORIA COLLEGE.—The object of this institution is to train up Indian "females not to become M.A.'s and B.A.'s, but to become good mothers, good housekeepers, good wives, etc." The Calcutta Unity and the Minister has the following:—

"The Victoria College has now been practically opened. Needful arrangements in connection with the boarding are complete. An elderly lady for looking after the comforts of the boarders and the resident superintendent with family have taken their quarters in the institution. One of our missionaries with family is now a resident of the institution. One of the daughters of a missionary of our church, who is well qualified to teach the girls, has become a boarder. The girls' class has just been opened, and the beginning has been hopeful; and it is believed a sufficient number of girls will soon be enrolled as pupils. The adult class has also been opened. Yesterday Babu Kali Churn Banerjee, M.A.B.L., delivered the first lecture, which was heard by a large number of ladies. The publication of a monthly periodical in Bengali intended for the females is in contemplation. In it these lectures shall be preserved in a tangible form, so as to enable females, not only those who hear those lectures, but also those who live in the Mufassil, to compete in the annual examination. The girls' class is held every day except Saturdays and Sundays; and the tuition fee, including carriage hire, is 1 rupee per mensem. The lodging and boarding fee for the boarders is only 10 rupees per month, and it is hoped that the institution will be as a home unto them. No fee will be charged in the adult department. For the present classes for teaching English and Bengali will be held twice a week; and popular lectures on scientific subjects and laws of health, etc., will be delivered every week. The institution cannot be made successful without public sympathy and support.

Business Notices.

An Old French Model.—For a thoroughly sensible economical china cabinet, we commend our readers to examine the pattern advertised in another column of this paper by the Paine Furniture Company. It is made with as much care as if it cost $100, but the price is only $29. It is very capacious, and a really charming design of the antique French school.

Dr. Lyon's Perfect Tooth Powder Gives the most perfect satisfaction. It has a world wide reputation. Recommended by dentists.

Situation Wanted

By a young man 18 years old (graduate of Bryant & Stratton's) in some business where faithfulness and application will count for future advancement. Address H. A. E., Office Christian Register.

A LADY with a pleasant home near Boston, and having the care of a young girl of thirteen, desires to communicate with parents or guardians who may be seeking a temporary or permanent home for one or more children. References exchanged. Address GUARDIAN, care Christian Register.

A SOPRANO SINGER of experience desires position in church choir. Highest references. Address H. M. W., care Christian Register.

SONNET.

Have patience: it is fit that in this wise
The spirit purge away its proper dross.
No endless fever doth thy watches toss;
For, by excess of evil, evil dies.
Soon shall the faint world melt before thine eyes;
And, all life's losses cancelled by life's loss,
Thou shalt lay down all burdens on thy cross,
And be that day with God in paradise.
Have patience; for a long eternity
No summons woke thee from thy happy sleep;
For love of God one vigil thou canst keep,
And add thy drop of sorrow to the sea.
Having known grief, all will be well with thee;
Aye, and thy second slumber will be deep.

—George Santayana.

The Pulpit.

CULTURE WITHOUT COLLEGE.*

BY REV. W. C. GANNETT.

It is vacation time. The boys and girls have shut their school books, the school-rooms are given up to janitors, the teachers are resting in the country places or have themselves turned into scholars in the summer schools. It is a good time, in this breathing-space, to say over again to ourselves certain homely old truths about education which we are apt to forget in the school hours,—certain old truths which those who go to school and those who have got through school and those who hardly ever have had a chance for school all equally need to bear in mind; homely truths which the schoolmasters and the school books comparatively little emphasize, yet which are more important than anything which they do emphasize; truths about the fundamental education, that which underlies all other education, and which all the rest is for, and which goes on independently of time and place, equally in school and out of school, equally in term-time and in vacation, equally in youth and age; truths about the fundamental education which knows no vacations.

And this is the very first thing to say about the matter: one girl and one boy can go to Harvard College or to Wellesley or Ann Arbor or Cornell, while a thousand boys and a thousand girls cannot go: let not the thousand think that culture without college is impossible for them.

But, of the thousand, many say, perhaps, that they do not care for "culture," any way. Yet "culture" is but a sort of glory word for "education." There is a flower hint in "culture" that suggests not only the process of growing and unfolding, but the beauty of the blossom and the service of the fruit at last. When men laugh at it, their very misspelling—"culchur"—shows that what they laugh at is not the real thing, but some dwarf or caricature that apes the real thing. No one that is wise laughs at the true culture. Everybody that is wise wants it. Everybody that is wise tries for it. Culture is that which turns the little, sour, wild crab-apple of the roadside into the apple of the orchard. Culture is that which turns the clumsy apprentice into the workman who is an honor to his calling. Culture is that which transforms the wilful, crying child of five years into the earnest boy of ten, the self-controlling man of twenty, the helper of men at thirty, the loved of men at fifty. Nobody really laughs at this. The laugh comes in when this large, inspiring word is dwarfed to mean a bookish education only, or—dwarf of a dwarf—a mere text-bookish education, such as the high school and college are sometimes thought to give, and sometimes do give.

Yet, if to-day they give no more than that, it is the fault of boy and girl rather than of the school. Our colleges and high schools have much yet to learn, but no one knows this better than themselves. The educators were never quite so wise as now in suspecting their own methods, and never more in earnest to find out better ones. By all means go to college, if you can; or, if when young you could not go, give your boys and girls the chance you missed. That is an uncolleged parent's glory,—to give his child the education that he missed. Go to college, if you can; for college is a greenhouse for the mind, where its faculties can be started and trained more quickly than outside. But, after all, the great crops on which the country feeds are not started in the greenhouses, and the great faculties of mental and moral nature have no vital need of college training. Yes, go to college, especially if you have to pinch in order to get through it; for that pinch on the money side will halve the college dangers and may double the college profits for you. But, whether you go or not, keep two main facts in mind: this, first, that education depends chiefly on the boy, not on the place, even when the place is the best college in the land; and this, second, that in the boy or girl it depends more on the will power than the brain power. And what are these two facts but saying that culture can be won outside of college by means which nearly all of us can master? So I repeat: while one boy and one girl can go to Harvard or Cornell, and a thousand boys and girls cannot, let not the thousand think that culture without college is impossible.

THE MAIN OF EDUCATION: WHAT IS IT?

Rather let each one of the thousand think just the other way, and repeat often to himself or herself, "Culture without college is possible, and possible for me!" Keep that motto bright on the mind's inner wall. It is possible because the main of education lies in self-disciplines,—self-disciplines in certain habits that are the tap-roots of both mind and character. Parents, teachers, friends, employers, home, school, workshop, travel, never make one grow: they only offer us materials for growth. "Each for himself" is the inevitable law of the actual growing. No one can assimilate the materials and make mind from them except one's self, just as no one can digest another's dinner for him. Education is always at bottom a self-discipline; and all of us, to speak exactly, are "self-made" men. What is more, these tap-root habits lie at the bottom of everybody's culture, and are the same for all. College men and uncolleged need them alike. Rich men and poor men need them alike. Talent and genius need them as much as the ordinary mind.

What are they,—these tap-root habits? They lie in three great groups: first, and underlying all, those habits by which we adjust the powers within us to each other,—self-control and temperance, courage to bear, courage to dare, concentration, energy, and perseverance. Do you call these mental, or do you call them moral habits? Practically, they are both. They make the tap-root of both mind and character. It is they that compact the man into a unit, into a "person." And without them high success in any life-path is impossible. One cannot go far in book knowledge without them, cannot go far on in his trade without them,—of course, cannot rise far toward nobleness without them. Without them the average man dooms himself to remain all his life a half-failure. Without them talent is lop-sidedness and genius top-heaviness,—sources of downfall rather than of rise. But with them, whether one be dull or talented, every year of life sees growth, advance, uprise.

Next, another group,—those habits by which we adjust ourselves to other people,—habits of justice, of sympathy, of modesty, of courtesy, and of the public spirit which begins in self-forgetting for those we love and widens into self-forgetting for all whom we can help. And, besides these two, a third group,—those habits by which we adjust ourselves to our ideals, habits of loyalty to truth as truth, of delight in beauty as beauty, of reverence for goodness as goodness. In this last group we reach religion.

As we name these great names over one by one, the feeling rises in us,—these surely are the main things in culture: to have these habits is to have vigorous mind, firm character, high tastes. Specialties of knowledge and of art are good, but these are worth more than any specialty the college gives. Think them over once again, these man-making habits,—the power of self-control, the power to dare and to bear, the power to face obstacles, to stand firm and to push hard; the splendid power of centring one's whole mind in fixed acts of attention; the power to side instinctively with right against the wrong, to side with the weak against the strong, to side with public against private ends; the power to obey with answering joy a call to come up higher. This, this is the real culture. And he who strengthens these powers in himself is a well-educated man. Now, all these noble powers can be attained without high school or college. Then culture without college is possible, and possible for me.

THE THREE TEACHERS: (1) ONE'S WORK.

Who are the teachers that teach these things to us,—us who cannot go to Harvard or Cornell? The teachers are three in number,—work, society, books; and the greatest of the three is one's work. To our work we owe more education than to anything else in life, spite of the hard names we sometimes give it. Work makes mind; work makes character. No work, no culture. It matters less than we are apt to think what the work is, so that it be hard enough to require will, attention, and honor to do it. Of all the educating forces, a steady need to do something promptly, persistently, accurately, and as well as we can, stands paramount, because nothing else so vitalizes those primary roots of mind and character,—the habits that came first upon our list. "Every man's task is his life-preserver," Emerson reminds us: he means our soul's life. The workless people are the worthless people, even to themselves. What wealth gives, or should give, is choice of work, but not exemption from it. The man born rich is born into danger. He, as also the man quick to win riches, must make himself trustee for causes not his own, or else his riches become his doom. In our land, at least, a "gentleman," whatever else he is, is a good workman; that is, one who has something to do, who can do it well, and who always does it well. To-day even the daughter of wealth elects a task to save her life. To be a true woman, to be an educated woman, she must stand for some good work well done.

Well done; for, if our work is to teach us, it must be good work,—good as we can do. The culture in it is proportioned to the quality of it,—not the absolute quality, but the quality as proportioned to our power; and good work means, first or last, and usually both first and last, hard work. The master-workmen in any trade or profession have always been hard workmen. The actor Kean was a master on the stage, it is said. He practised two days on a single line; but, when he spoke the five words, they melted the house to tears. Hard work did that. Ruskin is a master in the art of making sentences. He tells us he has often spent several hours in perfecting a single period. Hard work, again. Edward Everett Hale is a master in the art of writing short stories. To write the well-known story, "In His Name," he took a journey in Europe, ransacked a Lyons bookshop for old pamphlets, studied the history of poisoning, shut himself up a week or two in a country house, and then, says he, "I was ready to go to work." George Eliot was a mistress in the art of writing a long story. She spent six weeks in Florence before beginning "Romola," in order to catch the trick of language among the common people of the city; and her husband said that, before writing her "Daniel Deronda," she read a thousand books on Jewish history. Hard work, that; and she was a genius, too! Darwin was a master-workman in science. In his scrap of autobiography he explains the success of his book, "The Origin of Species," by two causes: (1) It was so slowly written. More than twenty years of collection and arrangement of facts preceded its publication, and that publication was his fifth rewriting. First came a short, condensed statement, then another, then a long, full statement, then an abstract from this, and at last, abstracted from this abstract, came the book. What patient labor! Yet Darwin was a man before whose genius all the men of science in the world stand in reverence. And (2) for years it was his "golden rule," as he calls it, to note and study every fact that seemed opposed to his theory. The result of this rule was that his book, when it appeared, was a sifted argument presented at its strongest, anticipating most of the objections that were raised to it. Hard work, all this, as he himself knew well; for it was himself who said, "Whenever I have found out that I have blundered, and when I have been contemptuously criticised, and even when I have been over-praised, it has been my greatest comfort to say to myself, 'I have worked as hard and as well as I could, and no man can do more than this.'"

Such instances hint how master-workmen educate themselves by and in their work to be the masters. And, if this be true in book-making, it is no less true of any humblest task. Hear what Mrs. Garfield once wrote her husband, the man who was to be the President: "I am glad to tell you that, out of all the toil and disappointments of the summer just ended, I have risen up to a victory. I read something like this the other day, 'There is no healthy thought without labor, and thought makes the labor happy.' Perhaps this is the way I have been able to climb up higher. It came to me one morning when I was making bread. I said to myself: 'Here I am, compelled by an inevitable necessity to make our bread this summer. Why not consider it a pleasant occupation, and make it so by trying to see what perfect bread I can make?' It seemed like an inspiration, and the whole of life grew brighter. The very sunshine seemed flowing down through my spirit into the white loaves; and now I believe my table is furnished with better bread than ever before. And this truth, old as creation, seems just now to have become fully mine,—that I need not be the shirking slave of toil, but its regal master, making whatever I do yield its best fruits."

It is a great comfort and inspiration amid long, hard tasks to remember all this, and to say to one's self: "Why, this is going to college for me: this task is the day's lesson. I'm not a drudge, but a pupil: do this as well as I can, and there is education, there is 'culture' in it for me." The sense of quantity in the task may tire and age us, often does: the sense of high quality put into it refreshes and makes young. Many of us contrive to miss the joy by not doing the work well enough to get it.

(2) SOCIETY.

The second teacher for those of us who cannot go to college is society. And, as with the head teacher, work, we scarcely realize how much we owe this tireless assistant, and how much more it can teach us than it does, if we will let it. "Every man my schoolmaster," is a motto for the wise. It is said of Daniel Webster that he never met a stable-boy without extracting some bit of information from him that was worth remembering. Probably no eye meets eye, no hand clasps hand, no two voices mingle in a minute's conversation without some actual interchange of influence, unconscious if not conscious. Think, then, of the education always going on for good or ill! A wilderness of varied character stretches around us in every social circle. The heroes and the villains of the novels walk our streets, and we ourselves are the stuff that Shakspeare's plays are made of. The carpenter and the carpentress, the grocer and the grocer's wife, the parson and the lawyer, and the broods of playing children hold more texts than any text-book. If we can only read well our neighbors, each, like a bit of Scripture, is "profitable for teaching, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness"; and the best among them are "inspired of God" to reveal to us—what? Ourselves, our own unknown possibilities, the sleeping powers within us, and to make us come up higher. "Our chief want in life,—is it not somebody who can make us do what we can? We are easily great with the loved and honored associate."

MARK DOWN SALE
PARASOLS.

We have marked down our Stock of Fine Parasols, and have many choice pieces to offer much under price.

—ALSO—

WHITE PARASOLS, $1, $1.50, $2.50. All Silk.

HEAVY CHANGEABLE SILK PARASOLS, $2.50.

UNION SILK SUN UMBRELLAS, Dresden Balls, $1.50.

UNION SILK RAIN UMBRELLAS, Colors and Black, $2. All Warranted.

FINE BLACK PARASOLS and SUN UMBRELLAS. Pure Heavy Silk, $2.50.

CHANDLER & CO.,
Winter St., Boston.

*The above sermon was printed a few years since in the Unity. There has been a wish from many to have it republished. We print it with corrections and additions from Mr. Gannett.

As if unexplored wastes of human nature lay within us all, waiting for some Livingstone or Kane to come that way.

Blessed are they who have the eyes to see to the inside of a neighbor! Among discoverers thus gifted are men we put upon the school committee, send to the legislature, elect as mayor and as governor, make overseer of the very college that, as boys, they longed, but never could afford to go to. And these men might answer, should we ask them about their schooling: "My schooling? I have had none to speak of. My school-masters have been the men and women I have met in parlors, in the church, in the caucus, in the shop, the counting-rooms, on 'change. One taught me manners: one taught me tact. She raised my standards of justice and truthfulness and honor: he widened my ideas of public spirit. This one showed me how to save time in my work, and that one how to spend my leisure to advantage; and many a man and many a woman has served to warn me by making my mistakes for me. I have seldom faced a neighbor without facing a teacher." He who can truly say such things was born for education, and will get it, whether he go to college or not.

But how is it that they manage to extract so much from others,—these head scholars in the bookless school? Some do it by that gift of eyes to see the inside of a neighbor. Others have a genius for geniality. But, as in work, so in society, few win a great success without deliberate effort. There is no easy, royal road to any art. To extract the good out of society takes bravery, takes modesty, takes a kind heart, takes a high aim. Bravery to conquer shyness, if one has it. For some poor fellows it takes campaigns of suffering to conquer shyness. If we know that we are shy, better launch ourselves into the party, though we drift to the wall forlorn; better send ourselves to dancing-school, though we only dare to dance with the little girls; better make ourselves tell the story at table until we can tell it and others can hear it without a shudder. By and by we shall hug and bless ourselves for all this bravery. But through it all keep bravery's twin, modesty; for modesty gives the ready passport through the outer lanes to the doors of good society. The clean, kind heart is needed, too; for this alone admits one past the doors and the reception-rooms of courtesy to the inner living-rooms of mind and heart. And the high choice is needed which habitually companions the best side, not the poorer side, in men, and which instinctively seeks friends among those brighter and nobler than one's self. Four things,—it takes them all,—bravery, modesty, a kind heart, and high choices in comradeship. Have these, and you will have the fine art of making neighbors, and of making your way quickly to the inside and the best side of a neighbor. And men and women in loving faculties of approval will confer upon you an invisible degree, "Master of Arts."

(3) BOOKS.

And now a word about the third teacher who waits to teach us boys and girls and men and women who cannot go to college. His name is Books. He is the same great teacher that they have in colleges; but in this day he goes about the country, teaching everybody. He goes to the big city and every alley in it, teaching. He goes to the little village and every cottage in it, teaching. He will teach just what one wants to hear,—all manner of trash, all manner of vileness, if one wants that. He does teach a vast deal of mental dissipation, and leads many minds into very bad company. On the other hand, there is no end to the good things he will teach, if one wants them. He will teach us history, he will teach us science. He will teach us the love of noble literature. He will teach us how to think well, how to talk well, how to write well. And he will stand to us in place of good society, if we cannot otherwise command it; for in books we can visit the best of the race. He will almost bring the college to us who cannot go to it, if we are willing to study under him patiently and steadily and with high aims. But, again, it takes the patience, the steadiness, the high choices, and the hard work, or else he can do little for us. The young man ready to give that price for his help will make for himself three golden rules:—

- I will be a reader;
- I will read best books;
- I will read best books in the best way.

"I will be a reader": that means no day shall make me so tired that I will not find an hour—if not an hour, a half-hour; if not a half-hour, then a quarter; if not a quarter, then five minutes—in which I will read something. With many of us the odd minutes of ten years are enough to make the difference between an educated and an uneducated man. The odd minutes of this summer can make the difference between two good solid books taken into us and none at all put in. The odd minutes of tomorrow can make the difference between a rich day and a poor day for our minds. The men on exchange grow rich on "margins": it is margins of time well used that gives us mental riches. How many opulent minds have taught that secret! There were Franklin, Theodore Parker, Lincoln,—all of them poor boys with horny hands and candlelight, no more; there were Faraday, Chambers, Stephenson. Many and many a boy starting with good eyes, a fair mind, a strong will, and his odd minutes, has become an intellectual capitalist. Many a boy,—and how about the girls? Let me quote from Far and Near, a journal for working-girls:—

"A young mother said: 'I haven't read a book in three months. I can't with the children.' But her neighbor across the way, with one more child, had read many volumes in that time by always keeping a book in her work-basket, ready to catch up at odd minutes. She seasoned her darning and mending with literature. Lucy Larcom, when a mill girl in Lowell, carried a book in the big pocket of her apron, and records specially the fact that she read Wordsworth's poems and many of Shakespeare's plays in spare minutes amid the clatter of spindles. Another lady told the writer that she read Carlyle's 'French Revolution' and Taine's 'English Literature' while waiting for her husband to come to dinner. She was her own housemaid, and kept the books close at hand in the dining-room."

But, of course, if I am to reach culture, the books I read must be "best books,"—not bad, not even pretty good, but the best my mind is able to absorb. That is our second golden rule. In this happy day of cheap literature beware of the literature of cheap quality. Each age begets out of its very civilization its own new temptation, its own new form of dissipation. The saloon at the corner is only about two hundred years old. The newspaper in every home is hardly fifty years old; but the newspaper habit has already become a direful dissipation for many of us, partly because the papers are so good. We could not live without them; but their toothsome scrappiness, taken as our minds' "square meals," bewilders the attention, shallows the judgment, fritters the memory, steals the growing-time. It is the newspaper habit that does the harm. Too much newspaper will spoil one for magazines. Too much magazine will spoil one for a solid book. Our margins are small. How shall we use them? It is easy to use them all up, and have nothing to show. Look out the words "Index Expurgatorius" in the cyclopædia to see what they mean, and then make a private Index Expurgatorius, on which a great many innocent books as well as all bad books should be registered,—innocent books which are not innocent for you and me because our time-margins are so small. Am I a boy, the question on which my education is apt to turn is this: Shall the newspaper be the staple of my reading? Am I a girl, the turning question is, Shall love-stories be the staple of my reading? Am I a grown man or woman, the turning or perhaps the turned question is, What sort of books lie waiting on my table for the leisure hour at night, and what do I read on Sunday afternoons? In the public libraries seventy to eighty-five per cent. of the books taken out are classed as "juveniles and fictions." If my library book is often in that seventy per cent., one thing is sure,—I am no candidate for "culture." Whereas the habit of absorbing three or four "real" books each year, and year by year, goes far toward making one in ten years the gentleman or lady.

Of absorbing them, I say; for "I will read best books in the best way." This, our last rule, can be put in one word,—Read and ruminate! Read and ruminate! A book that gives no cud to chew is scarcely worth reading once, a book worth reading of which one does not chew the cud has scarcely been read.

A bracing word from John Stuart Mill shall end the talk. He says: "They who know how to employ opportunities will often find that they can create them, and what we achieve depends less on the amount of time we possess than on the use we make of our time. Several great things which this generation is destined to do will assuredly be done by persons for whom society has done far less, to whom it has given far less preparation, than those whom I am now addressing." If that be true in England, how much more true here in the Land of Opportunity! Work, society, books, with these three teachers, and a will to get the best from them, culture without college is possible, and possible for me.

Spiritual Life.

To store our memories with a sense of injuries is to fill that chest with rusty iron which was made for refined gold.—Seeker.

The only way to regenerate the world is to do the duty which lies nearest us, and not to hunt after grand, far-fetched ones for ourselves. If each drop of rain chose where it should fall, God's showers would not fall as they do now.—Charles Kingsley.

If you prepare a dish of food carelessly, you do not expect Providence to make it palatable. Neither, if through years of folly you misguide your own life, need you expect divine interference to bring round everything at last for the best.—Ruskin.

Every true spiritual longing is a reaching up out of self into a better, truer, nobler life. Praying is always a climbing upward toward God. We can thus climb only at the cost of struggle and self-denial, the crucifixion of the old nature.—J. R. Miller, D. D.

Love, like the opening of the heavens to the saints, shows for a moment, even to the dullest man, the possibilities of the human race. He has faith, hope, and love for another being, perhaps but a creature of his imagination. Still, it is a great advance for a man to be profoundly loving, even in his imaginations.—Helps.

A man does not receive the statements that "two and two make four" and that "the pure in heart shall see God" on the same terms. The one can be proved to him with four grains of corn: he can never arrive at a belief in the other till he realize it in the intimate persuasion of his whole being.—Lowell's Essay on Dante.

The only conclusive evidence of a man's sincerity is that he gives himself for a principle. Words, money, all things else, are comparatively easy to give away; but, when a man makes a gift of his daily life and practice, it is plain that the truth, whatever it may be, has taken possession of him.—James Russell Lowell.

A God above it all, my heart, my heart,—Above the seething passion and the pain, A great, calm presence. Plunge thy fever vain In perfect peace again, and yet again. Take courage and look up, my heart, my heart!

—Hannah Parker Kimball.

Man's greatest need is not to eat, not to win wealth or honor, not even to live or to go to heaven, but to do and be what God wills. Duty—that is, the carrying out of God's purpose in our lives—is greater than all else. As George MacDonald makes one of his characters say, "Better go to hell doing your duty than go to heaven doing nothing."—Cumberland Presbyterian.

This truth comes to us more and more the longer that we live, that on what field or in what uniform or with what aims we do our duty matters very little, or even what our duty is, great or small, splendid or obscure. Only to find our duty certainly and somewhere, somehow do it faithfully, makes us good, strong, happy, and useful men, and tunes our lives into some feeble echo of the life of God.—Phillips Brooks.

Spirit of the Press.

The Christian Leader, in reply to an article in the Christian at Work, uses the opportunity to set forth New Testament Universalism in the light of "clear ideas":—

We must at the outset give notice to "the outside world," not, however, at all needful as respects most of our readers, that the formal and authoritative creed of Universalism is very brief, and that it attempts no definition of the nature of Christ beyond what is implied by the special designation which makes him the Saviour of the world. There has been a quite general agreement as to the meaning of the New Testament phraseology which declares him to be the Sent of God, the special Personality whereby God was in him reconciling the world to himself. The light of the knowledge of God in the face of Jesus Christ, whereby he is the brightness of the Father's glory and express image of his Person, is a verbal formula that has excited but little discussion, for the reason that it has not occasioned noteworthy difference of opinion. The designation of him as "the Man" among men, and the declaration that he is the head, and that we attain perfection as we in all things grow up into him, can hardly be matter for much interpretation, as the words themselves are interpretative.

The extreme rationalistic doctrine that Jesus is simply one of the world's teachers and helpers, even the best, but that he is this only, by the same sort of credentials as those which commissioned Socrates and Luther and Channing and Ballou, has at this time some favor in the Universalist body; but we have no reason for the suspicion that any theory that robs his office of a special and distinctive character has favor with the average Universalist,—in regard to which a long and wide-spread experience and observation should enable us to know.

The Churchman is still keeping up a continued discussion on the subject of unity. In its last issue it thus considers the question of "The Christian Ministry as One Basis of Christian Unity":—

Discussion of church unity, its prospects, and even its possibility, seems to us, at this present moment, to have almost narrowed itself to one single issue. Christians of different denominations are already at one upon many radical points of the faith. Those who are contemplated as likely to enter into the great Catholic Zollverein already agree in their acceptance of the Scriptures, of the two sacraments, and probably of the two creeds. The heart of all Christendom beats together in harmony with the Church's truth on these points. But, when it comes to a practical question of church polity and organization, there seem to be at present but slight traces of unanimity, excepting among some leading minds in all denominations. The question of polity brings us at once to the question of the ministry. The ministry is the executive of the Church in teaching, in ruling, and in the ministration of the sacraments. Each denomination has at present a separate ministry. Yet the union, say, of the Presby-

For China, $29.

Here is a good example of the French design of a hundred years ago. It has the refinement and restraint of the Louis Seize school, and will harmonize with any surroundings.

Many persons prefer that a China Cabinet shall be wholly unadorned. The Contents of the Cabinet should be entitled to the sole attention of the beholder, and decorative enrichment of the mere case is best omitted.

No better China Cabinet than this has ever been offered at the price. It is made with as much care and attention as if it cost $100 instead of $29. The shelves are adjustable. They are double grooved, and fitted with double rows of hooks.

The French curved glass in the sides always heightens the picture. The back of the Cabinet is covered with a special selection of the richest quartered oak in beautiful graining.

PAINE FURNITURE CO.,
48 CANAL STREET.

terian, the Methodist, and the church ministries, would be the practical realization of church unity between these bodies. What is it that has so far prevented this union between the different ministries from being consummated? It is idle to talk of any union among the separate bodies of professing Christians unless there be a unity established by which the authority of the Church shall be made one and undivided.

The Congregationalist, in referring to Prof. John Fiske's lecture at the Greenacre Conference, after giving an outline of it, adds:—

These essential elements of religion, as Prof. Fiske states them, are the primary principles of the Bible, which to the belief in God presents the moral law as from him, and to the belief in an inseparable connection between the unseen world and the moral law presents the sacrifice of Jesus Christ as the means of restoration to fellowship with God of those who have broken the moral law, and, therefore, their connection with the unseen world. The theory of evolution is constantly undergoing changes, though in some form it is steadily gaining ground among all classes of religious students. It is constantly approaching toward harmony with Biblical teachings. As Dr. Fiske expounds it, it seems to make the fact of a revelation from God not only possible, but necessary. If to these fundamental beliefs which he names evolution points to objective realities, they must disclose themselves to the human soul reaching out after them. God cannot be silent to those who believe in and love him. The movement of evolution is the activity of the Father of mankind. The Bible is the record of his thought finding expression in human history and experience, and of his love and mercy finding expression in the incarnation, death, and resurrection of his only begotten Son.

The Outlook, in an editorial on "Foundations of Belief," says:—

Reason may and should deal with its affirmations, but it can no more set them aside than it can set aside the affirmations of sense-perception. One set of affirmations is as fundamental and as trustworthy as the other. There is no more reason for repudiating spiritual truths which cannot be deduced from sense-perception than there would be in repudiating those sensuous truths which cannot be deduced from spiritual perception. The belief of a devout soul in God is due, primarily, to a spiritual perception of and a personal fellowship with him. It would be as legitimate to conclude that some of the external phenomena of life are not real because it is difficult to reconcile them with this spiritual faith in a wise and beneficent God as to conclude that God is not wise and beneficent because it is difficult to reconcile his wisdom and beneficence with some external phenomena. In other words, reason must take for granted all perceptions, both sensuous and supersensuous, and harmonize them as well as it can: the rest it must leave to be harmonized in the future. It is irrational for reason to say, I cannot find a place for certain perceptions in the scheme I have thought out, therefore I will deny their existence. There are certain facts of the spiritual life which are at least as clear as any facts testified to by the sense-perception. It is in these facts the religious life is grounded, and out of them reason constructs theology, as in those other facts the sensuous life is grounded, and out of them reason constructs science.

Literature.

"WILLIAM THE SILENT, PRINCE OF ORANGE."*

It was certainly a daring business for Miss Putnam to write the life of William the Silent, seeing that Motley's "Rise of the Dutch Republic" derived its chief interest from the light it cast on his impressive and yet baffling personality. But that her book, as written, amply justifies her daring there can be little doubt, if any. Her admiration for Motley is very great. She tells us that he has been her guide through the labyrinth of partisan opinion, and that she has patiently followed his inspiring lead with growing admiration for the untiring industry of his laborious researches and for the accuracy and skill of his adaptations from the enormous mass of matter that he examined. At the same time she thinks it possible that, if Motley had written in the end instead of the middle of the century, he might have painted his characters in less heavy lines of black and white; and at particular points she does not hesitate to differ frankly from him in his interpretation of motives and events. But it was not in such mere incidents as these, of which she could hardly have been conscious in advance, that Miss Putnam found the motive for an enterprise involving so much labor as this elaborate biography, which necessarily is at the same time a history of the Netherlands for a period of nearly thirty years' duration. The motive actuating her inhered in a great mass of documents, many of which Motley used, but which since his time have been published in full with scholarly editing, "so that these manifold views of the times are open to all students." "The correspondence of the Prince of Orange himself has been printed in two series, aggregating fourteen volumes," and containing over seventeen hundred letters. Motley had taken much of this material and made it over into his own brilliant and fascinating pictures of the times and the man. It has been Miss Putnam's humbler task to write the life of William somewhat in the manner of Carlyle's "Cromwell," to compel William as far as might be to tell his life story in his own letters. And yet, that she might give order and connection to her book, she has been obliged to write a large part of it with her own hand,—a larger part, indeed, than that contained in the letters and other original documents from which her liberal quotations are a source of unflinching interest.

The outcome is, of course, very different from that of Motley's "Dutch Republic." Miss Putnam is too depreciatory when she says it is "a running series of pictures arranged in somewhat a kaleidoscopic fashion"; but that there is a tendency to this effect may be allowed. There is a certain lack of stream. The current breaks upon the letters and contemporary documents; but, as it breaks, it often flashes a truth, a meaning, a suggestiveness, that the most brilliant paraphrase, even such a one as Motley himself might have written, could not impart.

Miss Putnam has brought to her work a judgment singularly sound. To the temptation of the biographer, either to exalt the hero unduly or systematically depreciate his worth and standing, she has not succumbed. She has honestly endeavored to see and to report William "in habit as he was," remembering that wise men are not always wise. William was wiser for others than for himself, the quality of two of his four marriages witnessing, and also the manner of the third. The apparent inconsistencies of his character are not reconciled. "Pursue virtue virtuously," said Sir Thomas Browne. It was a hard thing to accomplish in the sixteenth century. Machiavellian diplomacy was the order of the day; and William resorted to it often in the course of his long, hard struggle with the conscienceless and remorseless power of Spain. The reader cannot but wish that Miss Putnam had been able to render a better account of his long subjection of himself to Philip's hand, and of his determination to foist the Duke of Anjou as a protector (!) on the Flemish Provinces.

Nevertheless, from out the baffling obscurity some things emerge with clear and admirable definition. One of these is the marvellous patience of William. Where in history shall we look for anything equal to it? Year after year his struggle with Philip was a long series of humiliations and defeats, relieved by little of a different character, and even this little generally passing to the credit of some other than the prince. It is by no means plain how he achieved his final measure of success. There is no cause or group of causes explicated that seems adequate to the effect. Another thing that comes out clearly is the growth of William's character with the process of events. Here is in part, no doubt, the explanation of his long pretence of devotion to Philip and his regent, Margaret of Parma. "Sub pondere crescit" might well have been the motto on his shield. But what distinguished William most from his contemporaries was his apprehension of the principle of religious liberty. The failure to appreciate this principle was the rock on which the Dutch Republic split. Neither Catholics nor Protestants could rise to the height of their great opportunity. If they could have done so, the States of Belgium and Holland might have been amalgamated into a nation capable of resisting every foreign shock,—one of the greater powers of Europe to this day.

The merit of Miss Putnam's book is far less in its manner than in its matter. Her style has nothing of special charm to recommend it. It is somewhat vitiated with colloquial expressions and others remarkable for their infelicity. On the other hand, it is always simple and straightforward; and of writing deliberately florid there is not a line. The frequent use of the first person singular is a deduction from the dignity appropriate to such a work. Looking deeper, we seem to find a too generous confidence in the intelligence of the reader, a certain fear on the part of Miss Putnam that she may tell him something that he already knows,—as, for example, concerning the rise of Lutheranism and Calvinism in the Netherlands and the grounds of their antipathy. But, when every proper deduction has been made, the book remains one of surpassing interest and of great importance, for which our gratitude to the faithful and industrious author is indeed very great.

J. W. C.

LETTERS OF CELIA THAXTER. Edited by her Friends, A. F. and R. L. Boston and New York: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.—Mrs. Thaxter's friends, Mrs. Annie Fields and Miss Rose Lamb, have made a very beautiful selection of Mrs. Thaxter's letters. There is little in them of the nature of a revelation. The objective parts,—the aspects of sea and shore, of storm and calm, as the vision of these things passed before her eyes at Appledore—have been anticipated in her books and poems. And, as for that which is more personal, a few months ago Mrs. Fields wrote a delightful paper for one of the magazines which left little to reveal in a biography deliberately reserved in its exposure of the more intimate concerns of Mrs. Thaxter's private life. What we have here is a more liberal quantity of that the quality of which we had acquaintance with already, and the fresher, more immediate and spontaneous record of experiences that were the raw material of her literary work. That work and this record each has its peculiar charm. Here in her letters our complicity in her enjoyment of her island life is more active than in the books wherein her emotion was recollected in tranquillity. Here, too, we have much more of herself than in her books. It was a self as pungent as the salt sea's breath, which was her vital air; as vigorous in its individuality as the isles that helped to make it what it was. She owed much to her environment; but, had she been "land-locked" all her life, she would have been no common woman: her personality would have asserted itself in some distinct and memorable way. Our "land-locked" is a reminiscence of the title of her first poem, published in the Atlantic, than which she never wrote a better. It was extremely beautiful, but its title was its most poetic trait; and this, we are sorry to read, was suggested by Mr. Lowell. However unacquainted with Mrs. Thaxter, in her books or personally, one may be, there is "a garden of refreshment" for him in these letters; but their attraction will be greatest for those who knew the woman, both in her literary expression and in the "real presence" of her superb and radiant and joyous walk and conversation. They will hear her tones in these sentences, her ringing laughter. It will be as if again they sat with her before the driftwood fire, and listened to her more glowing talk of her beloved rocks and flowers. But here, too, is the assurance to which the casual visitor or the less intimate acquaintance could not attain,—that not without long and painful struggle had Mrs. Thaxter conquered for herself that peace which radiated from her face, that joy which she dispensed with lavish hand. There were phases of her intellectual experience that had no beauty that we should desire them, but through them, and other things even more threatening, her human heart persisted with indomitable courage; and our own hearts beat truer as we take to them this story of her life so bravely set "midmost the beating of the steely sea."

OUR FIGHT WITH TAMMANY. By Rev. Charles H. Parkhurst, D.D. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.—If Dr. Parkhurst were writing his book now instead of six months ago, it would be different in some respects. Its estimate of what has been already accomplished would be considerably reduced. More would be said about another principality and power, quite as corrupt as Tammany, through whom the victory of November last has been shorn of more than half its proper strength. An enormous majority was rolled up for reform; but, in the mean time, Boss Platt sat quietly in a corner, laughing in his sleeve to see the men that he had nominated carried into the legislature on the wave of popular revolt, and looking to him for their instructions once they were securely settled in their seats. A legislature less qualified for the work to which it had been called was never assembled. No other in the history of the State has furthered so many private jobs. No other has assaulted the civil service with such ingenious assiduity. But for the clutch of public opinion on its throat and the gubernatorial veto in its eye, it would have done much more evil. But the one thing it was elected not to do it did,—establishing a bi-partisan police board, easily capable of a worse operation than that which it displaced, Mayor Strong consenting to the iniquity. One of the disappointments has been his conception of non-partisan municipal government as multi-partisan, a placarding of factions instead of a choice of the best men, regardless of their partisan proclivities. Dr. Parkhurst tells his story frankly, and without more of self-assertion than is justified by the events. With less he would not have accomplished what he did. Thank Heaven, it was a minister of religion that initiated the reform and made a fighting chance for it, and compelled the press to come and range itself upon his side! If all has not been done that was hoped for, much has been accomplished. Theodore Roosevelt is practically the Police Commission, and that is "significant of much." But Platt is not a whit to be preferred to Tweed or Croker. Delendus est! And we hail with joy the institution of a State Republican Association devoted to his political annihilation. But it has taken in hand a business of the greatest difficulty. May its success be as complete as it is well deserved!

THE COUNTESS BETTINA: THE HISTORY OF AN INNOCENT SCANDAL. Edited by "R." New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. A motto on the title-page assures us that "the story trips upon a very airy foot, within a measurable distance of unreality." The distance is quite inappreciable. The motto is, in fact, a comment on some story of Dumas'; and thus we are informed at the outset to what family of fiction this particular book belongs. Mr. Weyman has eaten "the bee-bread" of Dumas to such good purpose, why not another? But, if we have here a relation of Dumas and Weyman, it is, if not a poor relation, not one distinguished for its quality. The sequence of events has not, perhaps, more unlikelihood than that of many famous and successful novels; but there is something in their character or their arrangement which is so prejudicial to their interest that it never quite attains to fascination. It may be that there are no impossibilities in the novel of adventure any more than in the fairy story; but the improbable must not be made too gross and palpable, or something in the art of the narrator must convince us that he tells a sober and unvarnished tale or render us indifferent as to whether he does so or not. The author of "The Countess Bettina" does not attain unto these things.

A LOST ENDEAVOR. By Guy Boothby, author of "A Bid for Fortune." New York: Macmillan & Co.—Somewhere in literature there is, we believe, a couplet which declares that "In the wreck of noble lives

Something immortal still survives."

Vary that couplet so as to make it read,

"And in the dregs of wasted lives Something immortal still survives," and you have the motif of Mr. Boothby's "Lost Endeavor." It is a story written with much power, which sometimes ventures on a realism which is horrible and revolting. The scene is laid in an island off the coast of New Guinea. Two miserable castaways drift together there, and the attrition of their lives strikes out a spark of love. Soon their whole beings are on fire; and, if all that is base in them is not burned up in the purifying flame, much that is noble, sweet, and tender is revealed. We have many stories celebrating the response

There is no mystery about

Sunlight Soap

it is simply a clear, pure, honest soap for laundry and household use, made by the most approved processes, and being the best, it has the largest sale in the world. It is made in a twin bar for convenience sake.

This shows

The Twin Bar

Use will reveal

The Twin Benefits:

Less labor
Greater comfort
Lever Bros., Ltd.,
Hudson & Harrison Sts., New York.

of innate goodness in the depraved to a goodness far above them, but there is something novel in the mutual incitement to good works of two whose feet take hold on hell.

THE ADVENTURES OF CAPTAIN HORN. By Frank R. Stockton. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.—When Mr. Stockton wrote his "Ardis Claverden," and his humor therein proved itself able to subject itself to the exigencies of a story that was very sweet and pleasant in its course and end, many of us hoped that he would go on in this direction; and we were encouraged to believe that he would do so by the example of Charles Dudley Warner, the measure of whose gift is all the distance between "My Summer in a Garden" and "The Golden House." But Mr. Stockton has not gone further in the direction of "Ardis Claverden." "The Adventures of Captain Horn" is even more extended than that novel, but it has none of its coherency and development. It is little more than a succession of burlesque adventures, and would have been more interesting if it had been worked up into half a dozen different stories. Gen. Grant's father said that Ulysses had "the gift of continuance." Mr. Stockton has it not. It is true of his longer stories generally that they decline in interest as they go on, and "The Adventures of Captain Horn" is not so free from all complicity in this defect as those who are most jealous for the author's fame could wish.

LYRICAL POETRY FROM THE BIBLE. Edited by Ernest Rhys. London: I. M. Dent & Co., Aldine House.—This book is exquisitely beautiful in every outward way, and the idea which inspired its preparation was not a bad idea. But it has not been well carried out. A general adhesion to the authorized version was perhaps well conceived, though the English of the Old Testament revision is much better than that of the New. But there seems to be no good reason why the manifest errors of the King James translation should be reproduced. In such errors the book of Job disproportionately abounds; and many of the corrections of the revised version are very happy, and detract nothing from the noble rhythm of the King James translation. It is hardly less than wicked to reproduce Job xix. 25, "I know that my Redeemer liveth," in its classic form. Of the whole book about 100 pages are given to selections from the Psalms, 60 pages to Job, and some 30 pages to lyric fragments in the Pentateuch, Judges, Samuel, and Chronicles. Each selection has a Latin title, presumably from the Vulgate. There is to be another volume, and the venture is sure to justify itself for all its obvious defects.

ROBERTA. By Blanche Fearing. Chicago: Charles H. Kerr & Co.—This is the story of a life begun in poverty, tried by the severest tests of misfortune and humiliation, severely disciplined by mistakes and misunderstandings, but reaching at last a triumphant serenity, as well as earthly happiness. The book bears witness to the high purpose of the author and to her thoughtful study of social problems rather than to her skill as a novelist. If she were to devote herself for a time to the writing of short stories, it might help her gain the condensation, directness, and power of letting her characters speak for themselves, which in a short story are imperative, and are hardly less valuable in a novel. Scattered through the book are many reflections upon life and society, which, while they may possibly detract from the success of the book, looked upon as what should be an artistic whole, are yet valuable and significant in themselves. The book is carelessly bound, several pages being missing in one copy, at least.

THE ZEIT-GEIST. By L. Dougall. New York: D. Appleton & Co. 75 cents.—Miss Dougall, who is the author of "Beggars All" and "What Necessity knows," both of them strong and satisfactory novels, shows the characteristics of her former work even in this narrow compass. This is mainly a study of the religious development of a thoughtful man, who learns by slow degrees, not only to conquer his appetite for drink, but to attain a working theory of the universe which is to him inspiration and support. Miss Dougall justifies herself for this study (though such work, thoughtfully done, needs no justification) by saying, "I do not believe that it belongs to the novel to teach theology; but I do believe that religious sentiments and opinions are a legitimate subject of its art, and that perhaps its highest function is to promote understanding by bringing into contact minds that habitually misinterpret one another."

OLD MAN SAVARIN. By Edward William Thompson. New York: Thomas Y. Crowell. $1.—Mr. Thompson is one of that group of Canadian writers now enriching our English literature with their stories and poems, and incidentally reflecting glory on their country. There are fourteen stories in this collection, and not one that is not well worth the reading for some especial excellence of its own. "Old Man Savarin" and

"The Privilege of the Limits" delight us with their fresh humor, besides affording us an interesting study of French Canadian manners and customs. "McGrath's Bad Night," the main idea of which is nothing new, is told with a simplicity and directness that send it straight to the heart of the reader, who immediately becomes conscious of a wider sympathy for its sake. In short, the stories are clear-cut and picturesque, written in a straightforward, effective style.

DIPLOMATIC DISENCHANTMENTS. By Edith Bigelow. New York: Harper & Brothers.—This is a bright and rather original story, well adapted for the reader who intends to relax in his summer reading, and has yet no desire to reduce himself to the level of absolute inanity. The quiet professor, who is suddenly transplanted to Berlin with his somewhat ambitious family, and obliged to turn his attention to diplomacy instead of abstract social economics, is well drawn. His daughter, instead of making a brilliant alliance with a foreign nobleman, falls in love with an American who has only his good looks and fair prospects to recommend him; while his married niece narrowly escapes unhappy complications with a fascinating actor. The book is well written.

A MODERN MAN. By Ella Macmahon. New York: Macmillan & Co. 75 cents.—It is only fair, while so much is being said about the new or modern woman, that modern man should also have his chance in fiction. It might be difficult for a reader to define the new product in careful distinction, however; for, as presented here, he is not unlike men of other generations, though he is certainly not the typical and romantic hero. The plot is remarkably simple, but it is well developed; and the interest is confined to few characters. The book is one of the pretty Iris Series; and the flexible covers, the attractive print, and the general daintiness of the make-up would lend a charm even to an uninteresting story, which this one certainly is not.

A GENDER IN SATIN. By Rita. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. 50 cents.—The rather meaningless title of this book is the epigram of its Mephistopheles, who declared that "a beautiful woman is a gender in satin," wherein we fail to find either the wit or the application. The story has no decided recommendations, and inspires at best only a languid interest. A woman who is in love with the wrong man has the courage to tell her husband and ask him to save her from herself, which he does, incidentally shaking the breath nearly out of his false friend; and we are left to suppose that, after a period of waiting, husband and wife may be really united and live happy ever after.

CAUSE AND EFFECT. By Ellinor Merion. G. P. Putnam's Sons.—This is the story of an episode, an unfortunate love affair that ended in sighs and tears and regrets, but which need not have ruined the happiness of the young woman involved, who seems to have taken the affair rather too seriously. At all events, her experience was probably better for her than marriage with the conceited young clergyman she did not love; though the author seems to imply that her suffering was a kind of Nemesis. The book is a fair average sample of the light literature supposed to be particularly appropriate for the summer season.

DOCTOR IZARD. By Anna Katharine Green. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons.—The whole interest of Mrs. Rohlf's new book centres in the explanation of a mystery, a case of identity; and even that interest is much less compelling than in some of her other books. The chief fault of this writer is that she fails to arouse in the reader any interest in her characters for their own sake; and without this the complexities of a plot, however ingenious, take no real hold.

Miscellaneous.

The latest bound volume of Littell's Living Age contains the weekly issues for April, May, and June. These quarterly volumes form valuable additions to any library, made up as they are of the best articles in leading magazines, each one selected for real worth.

"The Naulahka" appears in paper covers for summer reading, published by the Macmillans; and the reader will find that the four years which have passed since its first appearance have had no power to dim its interest. The contrast between the breezy, self-confident, rather unscrupulous young Westerner and the secrecy and subtlety of the Eastern civilization he is bound to circumvent produces stirring and original situations; and one surrenders himself to the romance with real enjoyment. The early death of Wolcott Balestier, in collaboration with whom Rudyard Kipling wrote this book, is regretted anew in its reappearance.

Literary Notes.

"Forty Years in China," the new book by Rev. R. H. Graves, will be published soon by R. H. Woodward Company. It is to be sold by subscription, and part of the proceeds will be given to foreign missions.

Maurus Jókai, the distinguished Hungarian poet, novelist, historian, and patriot, has written for the August number of the Forum a highly interesting article entitled "My Literary Recollections,"—practically, an autobiography of his life.

The second of Robert S. Peabody's delightful papers appears in the Atlantic for August. "The Architect" chooses charming regions for his summer rambles, and talks interestingly in this number of French and English churches.

Dr. Max Nordau writes a "Reply to my Critics" in the August number of the Century. His book on "Degeneration" has called out a large amount of simply abusive criticism; and, while he pays his respects to such writers, he gives serious answers to several objections which have been urged against his theories.

"Chapters in Workshop Reconstruction and Citizenship," by C. R. Ashbee, A. M., is the most recent publication in the political economy series of Messrs. D. C. Heath & Co., Boston, Mass. As the title suggests, the volume in question is a practical thesis on the application of technical art education to skilled labor in the workshops. The author's ideas are far-reaching: they apply not so much to the immediate personal benefit of the artisan as to the national value of art education applied to skilled handicraft.

There has been an unexplainable Napoleonic craze in the United States this last year; but none of the writers have dealt with the Little Corsican from the standpoint of the modern science of criminology and mental and moral disease and perversion. This Hon. John Davis does in the Arena; and he argues from Napoleon's ancestry and the careers of his parents to show that the great general and exploiter was a born brigand, with all the gambling and lying, deceitful, unscrupulous instincts of the Corsican bandits on sea and land.

The old town of Machias in Maine had a more remarkable history in the time of the Revolution than perhaps any other town upon the long line of the exposed Maine coast, and the heroism and adventurousness of the little community in its conflicts with the English forces which descended on it are something about which most people know very little. Miss M. E. C. Smith tells the story in the August number of the New England Magazine, and her article will be read with interest by the hundreds of people who in this summer time are scattered along the Maine coast.

Books Received.

TO PUBLISHERS.—All books sent to the CHRISTIAN REGISTER will be promptly acknowledged under the head of "Books Received," with statement of publisher's address and price, if known. But we can guarantee no other return, as the rapid multiplication of new works compels us to limit the number selected for critical notice and review.

From Lee & Shepard, Boston.
The Christian Consciousness. Its Relation to Evolution in Morals and in Doctrine. By J. S. Black.
From Leach, Shewell & Sanborn, Boston.
Sir Walter Scott's "Lady of the Lake." By James Arthur Tufts.
From Harper & Brothers, New York.
The Veiled Doctor. A Novel. By Varina Anne Jefferson Davis.
My Lady Nobody. By Maarten Maartens.
Pony Tracks. Written and Illustrated by Frederic Remington.
From Funk & Wagnalls Company, New York.
A Hundred Years of Missions; or, The Story of Progress since Carey's Beginning. By Rev. Delevan L. Leonard.
From the Transatlantic Publishing Co., New York.
Pan-gnosticism. A Suggestion in Philosophy. By Noel Winter.

From the Bancroft Company, Chicago.
The Book of the Fair. Part Fifteen. Price $1.00.

Music Received.

From Oliver Ditson Company, Boston.
There is an Hour of Hallowed Peace. Sacred Song. By C. Chenery.
American Guard. March. For Pianoforte. By Rich-Graziella. Waltz. For Pianoforte. By Joseph Knecht.
Uncertainty. Song. Music by Robert A. Keiser.
Ave Verum. Music by D. S. Hollingshead.
Seek Ye the Lord. Sacred Song. By Walter Gould.

The Chief Charm

of silver and gold, whether for table or toilet, is their brilliancy. That's the charm that attracts. With their brilliancy is developed to a remarkable degree—equalled only when fresh from the hands of the silversmith.

SILVER
ELECTRO-SILICON
POLISH

Send for trial quantity or box post-paid, 15 cts. It's sold everywhere.

THE ELECTRO SILICON CO., 72 John St., New York

SUMMER READING.

A Child of Nature.

By MARION D. SHUTTER, D.D.

Cloth, red edges, neatly stamped, 50 Cents.
Special gift edition, full gilt, $1.00.

Philadelphia To-day.—One of the most charming little collections of essays that have recently come under notice. Written with lovely simplicity of diction, taking us into a happy apprehension of Nature, and withal habited in the happiest thoughts and conceits. Altogether delightful.

Minneapolis Journal.—Dr. Shutter has a keen zest for Nature, and a mind to receive lasting impressions from her manifold moods in sky, water, cloud, leaf, grass, and flowers. He makes some charming applications and analogies in this volume, which will be prized by all who love homilies in stones and running brooks.

Toronto Week.—The ideas are so simply and so strikingly expressed that it is a pleasure to read it from cover to cover. The author strikes us as having eyes to see.

For sale by booksellers, or sent postpaid, on receipt of price by

JAMES H. WEST, Publisher,
174 High Street, - - - Boston.

The Deeper Meanings.

BY

FREDERIC A. HINCKLEY.

CONTENTS:

The Cost of the Divine Spark; The Poet-vision; Looking at Life through New Eyes; Rejoice, we Conquer!

Price 50 Cents.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Spiritual Life.

Afterglow. By FREDERIC A. HINCKLEY. 81 pages. Cloth, 50 cents.

There are few who, reading it, will not be strongly attracted to this little book. It is written out of life,—out of the struggling, perplexing, troublesome, hopeful, aspiring life we all know and dread and delight in. And grows in. And this is how the book is to help us.

CONTENTS: I. Voices out of the Silence; II. They had all Things Common; III. Spiritual Awakening; IV. "The Star! The Star!"

"Afterglow," like Gannett's "Wrestling and Blessing," is a book which one would like to keep in stock, to be given to the stricken, the troubled, the perplexed, the struggling, and the discouraged."—Christian Register.

A Year of Miracle: A Poem in Four Sermons. By Rev. WM. C. GANNETT. 106 pages. Cloth, limp, red edges, 50 cents. Fine edition, bevelled edges, full gilt, heavy paper, $1.00.

"A dainty little book, full of delicate fragrance. Love of nature is in it, and a longing to interpret that secret of nature's power over the soul which no man has yet understood. There is devotion in it, too, and neither clashes with the other."—Critic.

In Spirit and in Truth. Essays by Younger Ministers of the Unitarian Church. 163 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

CONTENTS: Introduction, by Rev. JAMES DE NORMAN-
DIE; The Philosophy of Religion, by Rev. GEORGE CROSWELL CRESSEY; The Revelation of God in Nature, by Rev. L. D. COCHRANE; The Bible as Literature and as Revelation, by Rev. W. W. FENN; The Thought of God in the Bible, by Rev. FRANCIS B. HORN BROOKE; The Revelation of God in Man, by Rev. S. M. CROTHERS; The Christ, by Rev. ALBERT WALKLEY; The Use of a Liturgy in Worship, by Rev. JOHN TUNIS.

The Insight of Faith. Brief Selected Paragraphs from the Writings of Rev. HENRY W. FOOTE. 115 pages. Flexible cloth, 50 cents. Morocco, full gilt, $1.50.

"Rarely does one find a little volume so full of helpful and precious words. Devotional in spirit and uplifting in aim."—Christian Inquirer.

Ecce Spiritus. A Statement of the Spiritual Principle of Jesus as the Law of Life. 238 pages. Cloth, $1.25.

"Nothing more remarkable has appeared since 'Ecce Homo.' It is as ingenious and original as that famous book, and far more subtle, inward, and spiritual."—St. Louis Spectator.

Light on the Cloud; or, Hints of Comfort for Hours of Sorrow. By M. J. SAVAGE. 176 pages. Cloth, gilt edges, $1.25.

The Religious Life. By M. J. SAVAGE. 212 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

A Living Faith. By GEO. S. MER-RIAM. 300 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

The Home.

For the Christian Register.

THE LAUGHTER OF THE SEA.

BY EDWARD N. STONE.

"Numberless laughter of ocean waves,"
Myriad-twinkling smile of the deep,
Breaking over low coral caves
Where shipwrecked sailors sleep!

Down, down in the soundless gloom
There full many a good ship lies,
Watched for in vain till the Day of Doom
By weary, tear-dimmed eyes.

Hopes and loves and youth's fair dreams
Lost in those silent depths there be;
And over them all there shouts and gleams
The laughter of the sea.

A LESSON.

"O mother!" cried Ruth, in dismay: "if I have to wipe the dishes, we shall miss the coach."

Mrs. Blake glanced at the clock. "Oh no," she said briskly: "there's nearly half an hour yet, and I have so much to do this morning, I really need all the help you can give me."

"Mr. Day said they were going to start earlier this year," said Ira, uneasily.

"Well, I'll not keep you long," returned his mother.

"Now, Ruth, let's hurry," urged Ira, when they were ready to go. So they almost ran, down the street, around the corner, up the hill, and then around another corner to the church, from which the excursionists to the beach had arranged to start.

Alas! there were no coaches there, and no excursionists.

Ruth and Ira looked at each other in despair, and the tears gathered in Ruth's blue eyes.

"Don't cry," said Ira. "I know a way to go now; and we've got money enough, too. We can take the train to the city, and then inquire the way to the wharf and take the boat. We'd get there almost as soon as the others did."

"But mother told us never to go on the water unless she or father was with us," objected Ruth.

"Then you won't go?" said Ira, a little contemptuously.

"Are you going?" demanded Ruth, irresolutely.

"No!" was the savage answer; and then they both turned and walked home.

The disappointment was very great, and their mother felt even worse than they did. "I am so sorry," she said. "I didn't think they would start so early."

She looked up at the clock. "Why, it has run down!" she exclaimed. "That explains it. I'll tell you what you can do," she said, after she had wound the clock. "Right after dinner you may go to your aunt Martha's, and stay till after tea. I'd let you go now, but I'm afraid it might not be convenient for her to have you all day."

Ruth and Ira brightened, for going to Aunt Martha's was almost as great a treat as going to the shore. They always had a delightful time there with their six cousins, to say nothing of the ride in the electric cars.

Ira immediately began packing up a home-made telephone apparatus he had promised one of the cousins to put in between their house and a room over the stable; and Ruth went to making up a package of books, consisting of certain volumes she had borrowed and others she was going to lend.

After this Ruth took the baby to ride; and Ira went on several errands, which occupied the time till noon.

Mrs. Blake had made a batch of cream-cakes for Ruth and Ira to carry to Aunt Martha, and had then begun on the week's ironing, heating her irons on the oil stove, which was placed on the kitchen range, and hanging the clothes as fast as ironed on the clothes-horse which stood close beside the stove. Just before sitting down to the hasty dinner, she rocked the baby to sleep and put him in his cradle, which happened to be in the kitchen near the clothes-horse.

Ruth had on her prettiest gingham, and Ira, too, was all ready to start. So as soon as they had swallowed the last mouthful, they put on their hats, kissed the sleeping baby, took the basket of cream-cakes, and started.

Mrs. Blake followed them to the door, with the scissors to trim the ravelled end of Ruth's hat ribbon.

Just then the door of the next house burst open, and a woman rushed out, wringing her hands and screaming.

"O Mrs. Blake!" she cried out on seeing her neighbor: "Johnny's cut himself, and is bleeding to death. Come over quick!"

Mrs. Blake, scissors in hand, almost flew across the yard between the two houses, calling to Ruth and Ira, as she ran, not to leave the house till she came back, and disappeared within Mrs. Dill's.

"Humph! I don't believe it's anything," Ira grumbled. "Mrs. Dill always makes a mountain of a molehill."

"Well, if it isn't, mother'll be back in a few minutes," said Ruth.

"Yes, but we'll miss the car, and have to wait an hour for the next one."

They sat down in the sitting-room, gloomily silent. At the end of a very long five minutes Ira spoke.

"What's the use of staying in the house?" he said. "Let's go out and sit under the oak. The baby'll cry when he wakes up, and let us know."

"Mother told us not to leave the house," returned Ruth, hesitatingly.

Ira waited a few minutes.

"Well, are you going?" he asked crossly.

"Going where?"

"Out under the oak, of course."

"No," answered Ruth, decidedly: "I'm not. Are you?"

"No!" snapped Ira. "Mother told us not to leave the house."

Then they looked at each other, and laughed.

"Let's have a game of checkers," Ruth proposed.

"All right," agreed Ira, jumping up to get the board.

Ruth paused, in the act of crowning her first king, to lift her head and sniff the air. "Seems to me I smell smoke," she said slowly, still sniffing.

Then Ira sniffed. "It is smoke!" he cried, turning pale, and starting up.

The board fell to the floor, and the checkers rolled all about, as they both rushed to the kitchen.

"Oh!"

A light wind had arisen, and, blowing on the oil stove, had caused the blaze to burn higher, and set fire to the clothes on the clothes-horse; and, as Ruth and Ira entered the kitchen, a corner of the light cotton coverlet over the baby was sending up a little flame.

Ruth seized the cradle and dragged it half across the room, frantically put out the little blaze with her bare hands, and then snatched up the baby; while Ira, with all fury, pumped the wash-basin full of water to dash over the clothes-horse.

In three minutes every spark of fire was out. The baby was crying, and Ruth was hugging and kissing him, and crying, too. Ira had found the mop, and was wiping the water from the floor, carefully concealing his face from Ruth; for he was ashamed to be caught showing emotion.

When Ruth warmed the milk for the baby's dinner, Ira took his turn in petting him; and then they both watched him eat, and after he had eaten they carried him about and took a great deal of pains to amuse him.

At length, as he seemed to prefer creeping about the floor to anything else, Ruth and Ira let him have his sweet will, and, collecting their scattered checkers, sat down near the window to continue their playing.

"Dear me!" exclaimed Ruth, after several games, "it's after three o'clock, what do you suppose is the reason?"

"Here she is now," said Ira.

Seeing them at the window, Mrs. Blake came in the front way. She looked very tired, and Ruth and Ira studied her face earnestly.

"Is—Johnny?" began Ira, in an awed tone.

"No, dear," said Mrs. Blake, reading what was in his mind. "He's going to get well, though it will take a long time. The doctor said, if I had been half a minute later, it would have been too late."

"'Tis too bad you had to be disappointed a second time, but it couldn't be helped," she went on. "As soon as I had tied a strip of my apron around the poor boy's leg above the cut, and twisted it up with the poker, I had to go for the doctor; and, when I had helped him tie the artery and put Johnny to bed, then Mrs. Dill began to have fainting fits, and I couldn't leave her till just now, when her sister—"

"Do I smell smoke?" she said, interrupting herself, and then hurrying out to the kitchen, while Ruth and Ira began telling her about the fire.

She turned very pale at sight of the blackened clothes; and, when she learned about the little coverlet, she caught up the baby from the floor, and, holding him fast, began to cry.

This last was so rare an occurrence that it filled Ruth and Ira with dismay; and they hung about her, begging her not to.

Finally, she wiped her eyes, smiling at their distressed faces. "I'm all right now," she said; "and you are good children. You've stayed indoors all the afternoon. Now go out and swing in the hammock."

They swung back and forth in the hammock for some time in silence.

"It doesn't seem as though I should ever again be even tempted to disobey mother," said Ira, at length, with a little choke in his voice.

"And I shall never feel so badly about being disappointed," said Ruth, soberly. "I shall think 'tis for some good reason. Supposing we hadn't missed the coach, or supposing we had started a little earlier and gone to Aunt Martha's."

"That isn't near so bad as supposing we had taken the cars and gone to the shore or gone out to sit under the oak," said Ira. "If we had disobeyed mother, Mrs. Dill would have had to use up that half-minute in coming clear over, and Johnny would have died, and the—baby—would!"

"O Ira, don't!" sobbed Ruth.

"Well, I won't," said Ira. Then, after a minute, "I say Ruth, let's go into the house and see the baby."—Lizzie Robbins, in the Independent.

WHY DAISY WON'T EAT LAMB.

Daisy came into the cool dining-room and seated herself in her chair at the table, with the least bit of a frown between her big brown eyes as she looked over the table.

"Oh, dear, I am hungry enough to eat a whole lamb and lots of peas; and I thought I heard mamma tell Sarah to have lamb and green peas."

"That was for dinner, my dear, and you shall have all you want then of lamb and green peas; but now I'm afraid you must be satisfied with this nice fresh bread that Sarah has baked, and these delicious strawberries," said Mrs. Hamilton, as she gave Daisy a dish of the beautiful fruit.

"Oh, yes, mamma, they are nice; but you know, when I play in the Park, I always get so dreadful hungry." And further speech was stopped by some big berries, which, I'm afraid, went into the little mouth rather faster than mamma approved.

Soon Daisy's older sister, Dorothy, came into the room, just from the street, with her big hat on, trimmed with lace and a beautiful little bird coquettishly perched a little on one side of it.

"Oh, what a dear little bird! When I'm grown up a young lady, I shall always wear such lovely birds on my hats to match all my dresses: they look presackly as though they were alive, and stayed there because they wanted to."

Dorothy laughed, and kissed the eager, bright little face as she passed around to her chair on the other side of the table.

"Mamma, just as soon as I have finished luncheon, I want to go right out again; for Bessie Brown and Nannie Ford and I are going to give our children a party under the big maple on the Common, and we have so very much to do yet, to get them all ready. Not one of all my children are dressed yet, and— Oh, Bessie's Marguerita has the loveliest yellow chiffon dress, she does look witching in it, with her dark curls." And Daisy looked as absorbed and interested as only little mothers of large families of dolls can look.

"But, Daisy," said Dorothy, "where is your rest and ten minutes' nap to come in? You know doctor said you must not neglect it these warm summer months that we are obliged to stay in New York."

"Yes," said Mrs. Hamilton, "you must take your nap first, Daisy; for you are not yet very strong, and you do not want to be sick again."

"No, indeed, mamma, but just this once. We will not run about in the sun, but stay under the shade of the big tree where we are to have the children's party; and we have a little May-pole for them, with such lovely ribbons."

"Well, my dear, I shall have to let you go this time; but come in when you get tired, won't you?" said Daisy's indulgent mamma.

Daisy lived near Central Park, and with some little friends spent many happy hours there. Their favorite place was under a spreading maple on the Common, where they could sit on the grass and watch the sheep and the big dog guarding them; and they felt quite as happy there as though they owned all they could see of the beautiful park.

At dinner-time, when Mr. Hamilton had served all the family, and passed Daisy's plate, she said, "Plenty of peas and potatoes, papa, but no lamb, please."

All turned to Daisy, who looked as demure as such a little maiden could.

"Why, Daisy," said her mamma, "I thought at luncheon you were greatly disappointed that we did not have lamb and green peas; and now you do not want any lamb at all?"

"None, mamma," said Daisy, with a curious little quiver in her voice. "I shall never eat any more lambs, or ever wear beautiful birds in my hat, as Dorothy does."

"But what does this mean, pet?" said her papa.

"I'll tell you how it is, papa: When we were playing this afternoon with our children, under the maple, and they were all sitting around their little May-pole with

PILLSBURY'S BEST IS TODAY, AS FOR TWENTY-FIVE YEARS PAST, THE STANDARD FLOUR OF THE WORLD.

PILLSBURY'S BEST IS ALWAYS BEST—THE BEST FLOUR THAT MONEY CAN BUY.

PILLSBURY'S

BEST

PILLSBURY'S BEST IS ALWAYS BEST—THE BEST FLOUR THAT MONEY CAN BUY.

Makes

FAULTLESS Bread;

sweet as the wheat; light and fine and white; honest bread that may be honestly called the staff of life. No bread-maker, no bread-lover, will take any other kind after one trial of PILLSBURY'S BEST.

NOW, while the price is low, is your time to buy it.

PILLSBURY'S BEST IS TODAY, AS FOR TWENTY-FIVE YEARS PAST, THE STANDARD FLOUR OF THE WORLD.

their ribbons in their hands, and looking too sweet for anything, I got all at once dreadfully tired, and took my Dotty Dimple in my arms and went off by myself under another tree to rest: they did all chatter so, it made my head tired. I sat looking at some birdies swinging on the branches, when all at once a great many birds came all flying down at me; and one big red bird said: 'Let's pick her baby's eyes out: she says, when she is a big girl, she will have a bird on every hat to match all her dresses; and that means all of our babies will be killed and their eyes picked out.' Then they all chattered and flew around me, and tried to pick out Dotty Dimple's eyes; but I threw my arms around her, so they could not get her, and I told them I had never thought how dreadful it was to have their babies killed, and I never, never would wear a bird in my hat. I begged them to forgive me; and I told them, if they would only go away and not hurt my baby, I would ask sister Dorothy never to wear a bird, either. Then they all sat on a limb, and talked together very fast, and soon all flew away. Oh, I was so glad." And Daisy breathed such a sigh they all laughed.

"But that has nothing to do with your eating lamb with your peas, Daisy," said Dorothy.

"I know," said Daisy; "but I think the sheep had been listening, and, as soon as the birds had all gone, they came up close to me. I was not afraid of them until one big one put his head down and shook it at me, and said I was a cruel little girl; and he looked very ugly at me, and said: 'This is the little girl that said she could eat a whole lamb, she was so hungry: we'll eat her baby, and see how she likes it. How would you like to have your baby dragged away from you by big men, who never pay any attention to its cries for its mamma, or our cries for him not to take our babies, but carry them away and kill them for big people and little girls to eat?' Then they all shook their heads and said, 'Baa, baa,' so loud; and I think they would have eaten me and Dotty, too, but I begged them not to hurt us, and I told them I had never thought that lamb and green peas meant eating a dear little lamb that had to be killed, and that I would never eat any more lambs as long as ever I lived."

"But that was all a dream, my little girl," said papa; "and I think you may safely eat some of this lamb."

"I don't think it could be all a dream, papa; for, when I jumped up to run away, there were all the sheep up close around me, and looking right at me. I could show you the one that wanted to eat my baby,—only they did not look ugly at me any more; but I don't want ever to eat lambs again. I never thought they had to be killed,—those dear little lambs that run and play and look so pretty and happy. I don't want any lamb."

"But," said mamma, with a smile, "they were made to be eaten; and it must be right to kill them."

"I think they were made for their nice wool: that is better than to think they were made just for us to eat," said sister Dorothy, quite seriously.

"Yes, I think you are right, Dorothy," said Mr. Hamilton; "and, if we had to see them killed, we would not enjoy eating lamb with our green peas any more than Daisy does to-night."

"Well," said Daisy, "I never will eat any more lambs." And I'm afraid there wasn't much lamb eaten at Daisy's home that night.—New Church Messenger.

"LITTLE SUN-BONNET."

They called her "Little Sun-bonnet." I will tell you why.

Her mamma had promised to take her to a picnic, and for days little Beth could talk of nothing else.

The night before the picnic day Beth had caught sight of little round cakes, tarts, and a Washington-pie on the pantry shelf; and when her bed-time came, and she was up in her little room with mamma, she asked so many, many questions that at last mamma said,—

"There, there, dear, you must go to sleep, so as to wake very, very early in the morning."

After mamma had left her, Beth lay for a long time thinking; and this awful thought came to her,—suppose she shouldn't wake "very, very early," and so have no time to get dressed for the picnic!

In a twinkling Beth was out of bed. She pulled on her stockings. She buttoned the six buttons of each small boot, and as many buttons of her dress as she could reach. Then she felt around in the dark for her pink calico sun-bonnet. This she tied tightly under her chin. Then she crept softly back into bed.

How mamma laughed when she came into her little daughter's room in the morning! And how every one else laughed! And now you know how Beth came to be called "Little Sun-bonnet."—Babyland.

HOME.

There lies a little city in the hills;
White are its roofs, dim is each dwelling's door,
And peace with perfect rest its bosom fills.

There the pure mist, the pity of the sea,
Comes as a white soft hand, and reaches o'er,
And touches its still face most tenderly.

Unstirred and calm, amid our shifting years,
Lo, where it lies, far from the clash and roar,
With quiet distance blurred, as if through tears.

O heart, that prayest so for God to send
Some loving messenger to go before
And lead the way to where thy longings end,

Be sure, be very sure, that soon will come
His kindest angel, and through that still door
Into the Infinite Love will lead thee home.

—E. R. Sill.

LITTLE "PUT-OFF."

"I'm going to ask Jessie to come and see me this afternoon after school, mamma."

"Are you, dear?"

"Yes; and couldn't you let us have a little afternoon tea?"

"I think I could."

"Something very nice?"

"I'll see about it."

"I know what that means," said Patty, giving her mamma a very nice, loving kiss.

"But wait, Patty," said mamma, as the little girl was tripping away. "I want you to come straight home from school, so as to attend to your little duties before Jessie comes."

"My dusting my own room, you mean?"

"Yes, it ought to have been seen to this morning, hey, Patty?"

"Yes, mamma; but I had to study my reading lesson this morning."

"I thought the evening was always the time for that."

"But I put it off because I wanted to play checkers with Jack."

"I wonder if my little daughter will ever learn not to put off duties for pleasures. And it seems to me there was something out in the arbor which ought to have been looked after."

"Oh, I remember! I was pasting scraps out there with May the day before yesterday, and I put off picking up the things till morning, and then I wanted to weed my flowers."

"I hope you will do it before Jessie comes."

"That's what I mean to, mamma. Good-by."

"Where's mamma?" asked Patty, on her return from school, after the short afternoon session.

"She's gone out," said Jane, the girl.

"Gone out! Did she say anything to you about a little supper for me, Jane?"

"No: I didn't hear anything about it."

"That's very strange of mamma," said Patty. "She must have forgotten it. Oh, perhaps she put it off until she comes home. I wish she hadn't."

The "put-off" reminded Patty of the room she was to dust. But, as she passed a window, she caught sight of some of her flowers which grew outside.

"Oh, my pansies!" she cried in great concern: "they are all drying up and withering." She was very fond of her flowers, and everything else was for the moment forgotten as she hurried for some water to give them.

"You dear little things," she said, "you almost seem to know I am giving you a nice cool drink. You look just as if you wanted to say, 'Thank you.' Oh, I wish I was a fairy, and lived in the times when they could hear flowers and lambs and birds and things talk."

Walking on with her watering-pot, dreaming of the delights of such a condition of things, she came near the arbor.

"Now, I must tidy up that arbor. Jessie'll be here in a minute, and I'd better put off my dusting until she's gone home. I shan't take Jessie up to my room: I'd hate to have her see how untidy it is. I do wish mamma did not think little girls ought to keep their rooms dusted, and pick up their things after they're done playing. Ah! look at that great weed growing so near that beautiful white lily."

The weed was removed with little fingers, which took tender care not to disturb the roots of the queenly lily. And then Patty looked up, and smiled a very loving greeting to a bluebird which chirped above her in the branches of a tree.

"There you are, you little beauty! Are you singing to this lily? Of course you are. You sing to the flowers all day, don't you?"

And off went the little lassie into a train of fancies as to which flowers she would sing to oftenest if she were a bird, springing up at length to say, "But I must be sweeping the arbor."

She ran for the broom; and, as she hurried back, her little friend Jessie came down the garden walk.

"Ah! there you are, Jessie. I'm glad to see you. I was just going to sweep this arbor, but it can wait until you go."

The sweeping of the arbor would not have taken more than five minutes, and Patty felt a little prick of conscience as she led the way to another part of the large, pleasant garden. But she quieted it with the reflection that it would not be polite to work when she had company, and that, of course, mamma would not wish her.

They played croquet for a while, and then made dolls of daisies and hollyhocks. When they had a long row of the flower maidens, Patty thought it was full time for the treat which had been promised; and, excusing herself to her friend, she ran into the house.

"Hasn't mamma come yet?"

"No," said Jane.

"Dear me, Jane, can't you give us something nice for a tea with Jessie?"

"I don't know, I'm sure," said Jane, good-naturedly. "To-morrow's baking-day; and there's nothing much in the house now, for we are to have hot biscuit for tea by and by."

"Not a bit of that cocoanut cake?"

"Not a bit," said Jane, going to look.

"There was a little this morning, I know."

Jane did what she could for her, and Patty returned to the garden with a piece of apple pie, some crackers, and a little currant jelly,—a very poor sort of tea, she thought, and wondered more and more how mamma could have neglected to see to it when she had promised. Mamma was famous for getting up nice little treats when Patty's friends came, and it was easy to see that Jessie was rather surprised.

Patty's mother came home a few minutes after Jessie was gone, and Patty met her at the door with a very mournful face.

"I suppose, mamma," she said, "that you put off fixing my nice little tea until you came back. But it's too late now, for Jessie's gone."

Mamma smiled at Patty's injured tone, and asked, "Did you dust your room, dear?"

"No, ma'am, I went to water my pansies, and"—

"Did you clean up your paper in the arbor?"

"No, ma'am, I put it off because Jessie came."

"Well, I think you had better go at once and do them."

Not one word of regret for the neglected afternoon tea.

Patty went up to her room, and began dusting.

What was that behind her toilet cushion? A game for which she had been for some time longing. There it had been all the afternoon, when it would have been such a delight to try it; for they had become tired of those flower dolls.

She put her room in good order, and then went down to the arbor. An unfolded napkin lay over something in the seat, and Patty lifted it up to see what it might be hiding.

"Oh, my!"

What a dainty lunch lay on the little tray! The last of the cocoanut cake was there, with macaroons and kisses, some cunning little sandwiches, sliced pineapples, and bunches of grapes. And Jessie was gone, and there was no one to see it or help her enjoy it.

Poor Patty sat down and cried. Then she swept the arbor, sighing to herself!

"Oh, dear! If only I hadn't put off!"—Christian Leader.

HE LOVES DOLLS.

An English paper tells of a dog in Birmingham that is devoted to dolls. The owner of the dog had a little daughter who taught the dog to carry her doll. The dog became so fond of the doll that he would snatch it and carry it to his kennel, and lie down beside it. The children of the neighborhood thought this was fun, and would ask the dog's owner, "Please, may your dog come and take my doll for a walk?" Alas! Now the dog snatches dolls from the little owners, and runs off to his kennel. He never harms them, carrying them by their clothes. One day he brought four dolls home. He is no longer a favorite: his reputation as a friend of the children is gone. He does not wait to be asked to take the dolls for a walk: he runs off with them without the owners' consent.—Outlook.

A CLOCK THAT KEEPS THE SABBATH.

A London gossip writes: "The Aquarium people have organized an exhibition of curious old clocks and watches. Among the two thousand examples acquired are several of special interest. Of the general exhibits, one of the most interesting is a clock built by a pious Scotchman a century and a half ago. To guard against any possible consequences of breaking the Sabbath, he so constructed it that at midnight on Saturday it stopped dead, and never so much as ticked until Monday morning began."—Christian Advocate.

Bottle-Fed
* Babies
are often insufficiently nourished; they are actually starving in their mother's arms, becoming feeble, debilitated, colorless. The mother is puzzled. Add a few drops of

Bovinine
to the milk at each feeding. Health and strength will rapidly return. BOVININE contains no medicine. Is food only. Your own physician will recommend it. All Druggists.

A. P. BUSH, 149 Pearl St.

CAUTION.
Spoons and forks not our make are frequently sold as "Rogers." Our trademark is 1847 Rogers Bros. "1847" guarantees original genuine goods, silver plate that wears, on nickel-silver. Look out for imitations.

MERIDEN BRITANNIA CO., Meriden, Conn.

"CLEANLINESS IS NAE PRIDE, DIRT'S NAE HONESTY." COMMON SENSE DICTATES THE USE OF

SAPOLIO

NAPOLEON AND WASHINGTON.

Simultaneously with these events the most careful preparation was made for a step which might redound to Bonaparte's credit if properly taken, but could easily be detrimental to the complete success of his schemes. Under the new constitution every department of government had an assigned dwelling-place. That of the consuls was to be the Tuileries. How could an absolute dictator install his penates in the some time home of absolute royalty without inspiring general distrust? The first step was to rechristen the pile as "the palace of the government," the next to consecrate it to glory. From far and near the statues of the great were gathered to adorn its halls. The choice of these displayed in significant confusion the generals and statesmen of all times in all places. Alexander, Cæsar, Frederick, Cato, Cicero, Brutus, Mirabeau, Marceau, and Joubert, and many others of lesser note, were assembled in effigy. But highest of all was set the image of Washington, the news of whose death had just reached Europe. His example was to be held up as the real inspiration of the new ruler. In order both to arouse the imagination of the people and to convince their understanding, the army was put into mourning for the great American, and a festival was instituted in his honor. To honor the typical and ideal republican of the age was a conspicuously effective idea, since it accorded thoroughly with the approved traditions of the Revolution.

The celebration was set for Feb. 9, 1800, and proved a great success. It had already been decided to reawaken public enthusiasm by instituting great military ceremonies to accompany the final deposit of the captured standards from Aboukir in the Hospital of the Invalides. These and the Washington festival were interwoven with consummate art; and, while the First Consul's victories were recalled in the imposing parade, the simple and impressive words of an able orator, M. de Fontanes, reminded the nation that the immortal Washington had shown as a general more strength than brilliancy, and had awakened little enthusiasm, but great confidence, that he was one of the men inspired to rule who appear from time to time in the world, that he was neither partisan nor demagogue, and that, when peace had once been signed, he had laid down his arms to become the wisest of constructive legislators. "Yes, Washington, thy counsels shall be heard, thou warrior, legislator, administrator! He who in his youth surpassed thee in battle like thee shall close with conquering hands the wounds of his country." Minds less quick than those of the Parisians would have discovered the moral of the address even without the peroration. When the official journal next day published the glowing words and described the brilliant ceremony, the coming monarch was already lodged under the roof of the Bourbons. Since at Leoben Bonaparte had made the liberation of Lafayette and his family an indispensable condition of the treaty, it might have been expected that his name, so long used elsewhere in a natural juxtaposition, on such an occasion would be linked with that of Washington; but the honors of that day were to be shared with the dead foreigner, not with the living Frenchman.—Prof. Sloane's "Life of Napoleon," in the August Century.

WHAT TWO WOMEN HAVE DONE.

According to the Chicago Times-Herald Miss Jane Addams's work as garbage inspector has been as successful as any of her work in connection with Hull House. She has associated with herself a young graduate of Wisconsin University, Miss Johnstone; and the two of them have swept one dark corner of Chicago as it has never been swept before. "Two months," says the Times-Herald, "have worked a wonderful change. Goode Street, which was formerly heaped with piles of refuse, overflowing from the garbage-boxes, is now comparatively clean. Back of Tilden Street, between Aberdeen and Centre Avenue, running parallel with Van Buren Street, is an alley that was impassable two months ago because of the accumulated garbage and refuse. The emergency team carried away fourteen loads of dirt, and the alley now is a neat-looking thoroughfare." The work has not all gone smoothly. Some of the residents in the ward, particularly the Italians, are disposed to throw their refuse into the alleys instead of dumping it into the garbage-boxes. And other residents, without distinction of nationalities, are disposed to use the garbage-boxes for firewood. "A man, who was requested lately to get a garbage-box for his property, replied: 'Not much! I don't get no garbage-box for the boys to burn up on the Fourth of July. Just wait till next week, and I'll tend to it.' As a new garbage-box costs $5.50, it is rather expensive firewood." In some parts of the ward notices had to be served upon property-owners before the great piles of refuse were removed. In half a dozen cases the inspectors had to take the matter before the court; but in each case they were successful, and the conviction has been spread that it is cheaper to comply with the law than to fight it. Miss Addams and her assistant start out on their tour of inspection every morning at six, returning to Hull House for an eight o'clock breakfast. Then they go off again until eleven o'clock. It is believed that in a short time, when they have had a chance to get even with the world,—or the normal level of the street,—the young women will have their house in order each day before noon.

Education.

Teachers' salaries are being raised once more, which means not only better times, but higher appreciation of good teaching.

The young women of the Louisville public schools have undertaken to classify and index all the trees grown on the sidewalks and in the various parks of the city.

A Russian Hebrew is said to have devoted a large sum to establishing a Jewish University in Jerusalem, in which special attention is to be paid to the Semitic languages and Hebrew literature. Significant figures from Russia tell of but one hundred and twenty university students per million inhabitants, while Germany has five hundred to every million.

The manual training work as seen in actual operation in many of the board schools of London surpasses most of the similar work exhibited at Chicago. No effort is made to provide every school-house with a workshop; but at certain centres in the city there are rooms furnished with carpenters' benches and fitted with vises and other necessary attachments, the boys from neighboring schools—usually within the radius of one mile—going, divisions of twenty, one-half day each week, to these manual training centres for this special training. This plan works well, and one workshop suffices for two hundred boys. The work is mostly in wood, although work in iron is receiving some attention; and drawing is always taught in connection with the manual training exercises.—Journal of Education.

Science.

The pneumatic principle has been applied to boots. The air tubes lie between the upper and lower soles, and give a springy movement to the foot, calculated to reduce friction with the ground and to alleviate fatigue.

One of the most sensible of recent inventions is that of an electrical mail-box. Whenever a letter is put into the box, a signal is sent to the occupant of the building. The box may be placed in the same electric circuit with a call-bell.

A pulsimeter has been invented with which, it is claimed, it is possible to tell to a fraction the exact condition of the heartbeat. An electric pen traces on prepared paper the ongoings, haltings, and precise peregrinations of the blood, showing with the fidelity of science the strength or weakness of the pulse.

Walter Baker & Co. Limited,

The Largest Manufacturers of

PURE, HIGH GRADE

COCOAS and CHOCOLATES

On this Continent, have received

HIGHEST AWARDS

from the great

Industrial and Food

EXPOSITIONS

IN EUROPE AND AMERICA.

Caution: In view of the many imitations of the labels and wrappers on our goods, consumers should make sure that our place of manufacture, namely, DORCHESTER, MASS., is printed on each package.

SOLD BY GROCERS EVERYWHERE.

WALTER BAKER & CO. LTD. DORCHESTER, MASS.

PRATT INSTITUTE, Brooklyn, N.Y.

NORMAL, professional, and special training in the various branches of Applied Art, Literature, Science, and Mechanics, and carried on under the following departments: Fine Arts, Domestic Art, Domestic Science, Science and Technology, Kindergarten, Library, and Museum. The Manual Training High School offers a Four Years' Course for both sexes, in preparation for College or for the advanced work of the other departments. FREDERIC B. PRATT, Secretary.

The Essential Man.

A Monograph on Personal Immortality in the Light of Reason.

BY

George Crosswell Cressey, Ph.D.

CONTENTS: Preface; I. The Conditions of the Problem; II. The Nature of Man; III. The Persistence of Mind or Soul; IV. The Nature of the Universe; V. Personal Belief; VI. Conditional Immortality; VII. Conclusion.

Price 75 Cents.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher, 141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

OLD AND NEW UNITARIAN BELIEF.

BY

JOHN WHITE CHADWICK.

Price, $1.50.

CONTENTS.—Historical Introduction, The Doctrine of Man, Concerning God, The Bible, Christianity, Concerning Jesus, The Future Life, The Great Salvation, Loss and Gain.

"A valuable as well as very readable treatise. . . . The best popular history of Unitarian doctrine that has come to our notice. . . . Mr. Chadwick has most interestingly set forth the rapid transformations of Unitarian belief."—The Nation.

"The best summary of Unitarian history and doctrinal development, and the most radical and optimistic outlook on the future which has yet been produced among us."—Pacific Unitarian.

"A weighty testimony to a notable religious movement from the religion of that letter to the religion of the spirit. . . . His attitude not always that of the contemplative philosopher; . . . his pulse throbs strongly, and quickens that of the reader. There are some passages that belong to the anthology of prophetic literature."—CHAS. G. AMES, in the New World.

"We can here trace the growth of the New Unitarian gospel, see something of the great moulding influences that have shaped and changed it, note the dangers it has encountered, thrill with the warm light of its newly discovered hope, feel ourselves taken into comradeship with its noble army of workers and saints. . . . Decidedly marking a clearer point of vision in the development of Unitarian thought."—The Unitarian.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher, 141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Lectures and Sermons

BY

WILLIAM J. POTTER.

With a Biographical Sketch

BY

Francis Ellingwood Abbot, Ph.D.

This book is published in style of Mr. Potter's previous volume, "Twenty-five Sermons in Twenty-five Years." Gilt top, bevelled boards.

Price $2.00.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher, 141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Theodore Parker to a Young Man.

This letter from Theodore Parker, to a young man just starting out in life, was first printed in the Christian Register in 1885, and afterwards in leaflet form. It has been some time out of print, and yet, from its straightforward, manly tone in relation to life, duty, wealth, study, religion, is still called for as a very available tract to be handed to boys and youth. It is now entered permanently in the Register Tract Series, and may be had at any time.

Single copy, 2 cts.; per hundred, 50 cts.

Address Christian Register Association, 141 Franklin Street, Boston.

THE UNITARIAN

The "Unitarian" unites many opinions, many suggestions, many individual methods in one spirit, the spirit of Jesus, love to God and love to man.

CONTENTS FOR AUGUST.

The Gift of a Day. Rev. Charles E. St. John. Adaptation. Hattie Tyng Griswold. Spencer's Ethics. Frederic W. Sanders. A Confessional. II. Ursula Tannenforst. Vanity and its Cure. Along the Way. Rachel B. MacMullin. Col. Ingersoll's Latest Views about the Bible. I. Howard MacQuary. Causes of the Reformation. S. Fletcher Williams. To G. L. C. W. I. L. Intuition. G. B. Stebbins. As Others see us. A Suggested Doxology. Congregational Installation. Unitarianism in Transylvania. Joseph Ferencz. One Upward Look Each Day. Editorial. DEPARTMENTS: American Unitarian Association, George Batchelor; Sunday-schools, Edward A. Horton; Guilds; Temperance Work, C. R. Elliot; Literary Notes. Children's Corner. NEWS FROM THE FIELD.

*Terms, $1.00 a year. Sample copies free. Will be sent three months on trial for 10 cents.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher, 141 Franklin St., Boston.

Topics of To-day.

Essays and Lectures on Important Themes.

1. HERBERT SPENCER: His life and personal characteristics; his views on education; his religious opinions. By DANIEL GREENLEAF THOMPSON.
2. CHARLES ROBERT DARWIN: His ancestry, life, and personal characteristics. By REV. JOHN W. CHADWICK.
3. SOLAR AND PLANETARY EVOLUTION: How suns and worlds come into being. By GARRETT P. SERVISS.
4. EVOLUTION OF THE EARTH: The story of geology; how the world grew. By DR. LEWIS G. JONES.
5. EVOLUTION OF VEGETAL LIFE: How does life begin? By WILLIAM POTTS.
6. EVOLUTION OF ANIMAL LIFE: The evidences from geology, geographical distribution, and comparative zoology. By ROSSITER W. RAYMOND, Ph.D.
7. THE DESCENT OF MAN: Man and the brute creation; his ancestral line; duration of human life on the planet. By E. D. COPE, Ph.D.
8. EVOLUTION OF MIND: The mind and the nervous system; the nature of mind. By ROBERT G. ECOLES, M.D.
9. EVOLUTION OF SOCIETY: Primitive man; growth of the family, city, and State; development of the domestic relations; is society an organism? By JAMES A. SKILTON, Esq.
10. EVOLUTION OF THEOLOGY: Origin of religious beliefs; ancestor-worship; nature-worship; the Absolute. By Z. SIDNEY SAMPSON.
11. EVOLUTION OF MORALS: How altruism grows out of egoism; the proper balance. By DR. LEWIS G. JONES.
12. PROOFS OF EVOLUTION: From geology, morphology, embryology, metamorphosis, rudimentary organs, geographical distribution, etc. By NELSON C. PARSHALL.
13. EVOLUTION AS RELATED TO RELIGIOUS THOUGHT: The Unknowable; design; miracle. By REV. JOHN W. CHADWICK.
14. THE PHILOSOPHY OF EVOLUTION: Relation of the doctrine to prevailing philosophical systems. By STARR HOYT NICHOLS.
15. THE EFFECTS OF EVOLUTION ON THE COMING CIVILIZATION: Plans for social regeneration as tested by evolution. By REV. MINOT J. SAVAGE.
16. THE SCOPE AND PRINCIPLES OF THE EVOLUTION PHILOSOPHY: Agnosticism, materialism, idealism, practical problems. By DR. LEWIS G. JONES.

"Replete with facts and suggestions; not only interesting, but a substantial contribution to sociological literature."—Christian Register.

"The mode of presentation seems to me admirably adapted for popularizing Evolution views."—Herbert Spencer.

Pamphlets, 34 numbers, 16 to 32 pages each, some of them illustrated.

Ten Cents Each.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher, 141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

CHILDREN OF INEBRIATES.

A distinguished English specialist in children's diseases has carefully noted the difference between twelve families of drinkers and twelve temperate families during a period of twelve years, with the result that he found that the twelve drinking families produced in those years fifty-seven children, while the temperates were accountable for sixty-one. Of the drinkers' children twenty-five died in the first week of life as against six on the other side, the latter deaths being from weakness, while the former were attributable to weakness, convulsive attacks, or to oedema of the brain and membranes, to this record being also added five who were idiots; five so stunted in growth as to be really dwarfs; five who, when older, became epileptics; one, a boy, who had grave chorea, ending in idiocy; five more who were diseased and deformed; and two of the epileptics who became, by inheritance, drinkers. Ten, therefore, of this fifty-seven only showed during life normal disposition and development of body and mind. Of the temperates, as already stated, five died in the first week, of weakness; while four in the later years of childhood had curable diseases, and two only showed inherited defects of a nervous character. Thus the large proportion of fifty were normal in every way, sound in body and mind.—New York Tribune.

THE GREAT SPIRITUAL EPIDEMIOS.

The great spiritual epidemics of the Middle Ages were the product of a condition of the most profound insecurity on the part of the great multitude, who might at any moment be robbed, maimed, or cruelly murdered by their barons and princes, and were, moreover, exposed to the perpetual terror of all,—the everlasting hell-fire. A race of people that were forever trembling before the devil in the hereafter and the armed cut-throats in the present could not help suffering from delirium, the expression of which was the Crusades. As the immediate causes of the excesses of the Flagellants and the Beguins, the St. Vitus dance, etc., we find terrible epidemics, such as the "black death" in the middle of the fourteenth century, or local pestilence or famine. These causes produce effects similar to those of over-exertion. They weaken the body by privations, and by violent, depressing, and disorganizing emotions. It is also beyond dispute that over-exertion is not the sole possible cause of hysteria and degeneration; but it is, on the other hand, no less indisputable that over-exertion may be a cause of these conditions, and quite as potent a cause as war, pestilence, and famine, insecurity of life and property, and fear of the devil. I believe that I have by my statistical tables proved that it is the cause of the present universal hysteria and degeneration in no less a degree than the "black death" of 1348 was the cause, in Germany at least, of the madness of the Flagellants.—"A Reply to my Critics," by Max Nordau, in the August Century.

Personals.

The Princess Mercedes of Spain, now in her thirteenth year, is the only ex-queen of her age in the world. She was queen of Spain during the six months after the death of her father, Alfonso XII., and before the birth of her brother, the present king.

Ellen Terry was forty-seven on February 26. In Coventry, where she was born, a brass plate on one house bears the inscription, "This is the birthplace of Miss Ellen Terry," while on another house across the street is a similar plate marked, "This is the original birthplace of Miss Ellen Terry."

Charities and Reforms.

A small circulating loan collection of pictures has proved a satisfactory part of the attempt of Hull House to make art a means of education. The collection numbers, at present, not more than seventy pictures; and very little more than one hundred dollars have been expended upon it. The pictures are, for the most part, photographs selected with great care from choice things only, whether modern or old, and with a view to variety of appeal to the interest and taste of the borrowers. Some water-color sketches have been given and lent, and the collection contains an Arundel print and several colored prints of Fra Angelico's angels. The latter are so popular as to be engaged in advance. The loan and return of each picture is recorded, with the date and the name and address of the borrower, upon a card. It is expected that the picture will be either exchanged or renewed at the end of two weeks. The borrowers frequently become attached to them, and prefer to keep the old one longer rather than to have a new one. Within a short walk from Hull House a little parlor has been completely transformed by the Fra Angelico over the mantel and the Luca della Robbias on the walls. A few doors down the street a tiny bedroom has been changed from a place in which a fragile factory girl slept the sleep of the exhausted into one where she "just loves to lie in bed and look at my pictures: it's so like Art Class!"—The Forum.

Temperance.

The amount of New England rum sent from the port of Boston to Africa has decreased in two years from 1,025,226 gallons to 561,265.

Michigan has passed a law fixing a heavy penalty upon railroad companies for the employment of persons addicted to the use of intoxicants.

Count Goetzen, who led a German expedition in 1893 across Equatorial Africa, testifies that, "owing to strict temperance and a regular mode of living, and especially to the precaution to drink only boiled water, the health of all Europeans who took part in the expedition was from beginning to end excellent."

The following is the result of an analysis of a cigarette made recently by a physician: "The tobacco was found to be strongly impregnated with opium, while the wrapper, which was warranted to be rice paper, was proved to be the most ordinary quality of paper whitened with arsenic. The two poisons combined were present in sufficient quantities to create in the smoker a habit of using opium without his being aware of it, his craving for which can only be satisfied by an incessant consumption of cigarettes."—Christian at Work.

Here and There.

A buried city, like that of Pompeii, is being excavated in Central America, at the foot of the volcano Agua. Pottery, fine glassware, jewels, flint instruments, and skeletons over six feet long have been taken out at depths of fourteen to eighteen feet.

Emeralds have been discovered in Arizona and, it is said, in North Carolina. Diamonds have been found in North Carolina, Virginia, California, and Alaska. Sapphires of small size but great brilliancy have been found in North Carolina.

Twenty towns in Minnesota have already adopted the curfew ordinance. It provides that young people under sixteen years of age who are found on the streets after the ringing of the curfew are subject to arrest. The first offence is punished with a fine, the second with imprisonment, and the third with both.

A comparison of the maximum temperature in different parts of the world shows that the great desert of Africa is by far the hottest. This vast plain, which extends two thousand miles from east to west and one thousand miles from north to south, is said to have a temperature of 150 degrees Fahrenheit in the hottest days of summer.

It is estimated that London has twenty-five daily newspapers,—seventeen morning papers, and eight afternoon; Paris has forty-nine dailies, of which almost, if not quite all, are published in the morning; New York has forty-nine, of which eleven are evening papers; and Chicago has twenty six, of which eleven are evening papers.

The chief justice of Wyoming has established the precedent of summoning women as jurors, and is much satisfied with the result. He says, "I have never in my twenty-five years' experience in the courts of the country seen more faithful, intelligent, and resolutely honest jurors than the women who have served in that capacity in my court."—Standard.

NONE SUCH MINCE MEAT

is particularly valuable in the summer because it is always fresh and sweet.

It is unexcelled for the home, the camp, seaside
or mountains.

Sold everywhere.
Merrell-Soule Co.,
Syracuse, N. Y.

GLENWOOD

RANGES

AND HEATERS

MAKE HOUSEKEEPING EASY.

TWO GOLD MEDALS.

Made by WEIR STOVE CO., Taunton, Mass.

Mozoomdar's BOOKS.

The Spirit of God. By PROTAP CHUNDER MOZOOMDAR. 323 pages. Cloth, $1.50.

An idea of the work may be gained from the titles of the chapters: The Spirit, The Hindu Doctrine of the Spirit, Doctrine of the Spirit in Christianity, Sense of the Unseen, The Spirit in Nature, The Kinship in Nature, The Spiritual Power of the Senses, The Spirit in Life, The Spirit in the Spirit, The Spirit in Immortal Life, The Spirit in Reason, The Spirit in Love, The Spirit in Conscience, The Spirit in Christ, The Spirit in History, The Spirit in all Religions, Live in the Spirit.

Heart-Beats. A Book of Meditations. By PROTAP CHUNDER MOZOOMDAR. With Portrait and Biographical Sketch of the Author. Cloth, red edges, $1.50; white, full gilt, $2.00.

Its poetic title is suggestive of its contents. It is a collection of brief paragraphs, which are not so much the scintillations of the intellect as poems of the imagination and pulsations of the heart. It is an illustration of the lofty heights to which devotional sentiment may rise, free from all tinge of superstition.—Christian Register.

The Oriental Christ. By PROTAP CHUNDER MOZOOMDAR. New Edition. 193 pages. Cloth, $1.25.

The existence of this book is a phenomenon;—more than a curiosity; and rich as a new, fresh, and very suggestive study of the character and person of Christ.—Christian Union.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Important Works.

Jesus and the Men about Him. By CHARLES F. DOLE. 81 pages. Cloth, 50 cents; paper, 25 cents.

No one can read Mr. Dole's little book without counting him a friend who makes us personally acquainted with the long apprehended but never before closely seen people of the gospel story.

CONTENTS: I. John the Baptist, the Ascetic; II. Nicodemus, the Pharisee; III. Nathanael, the Pure in Heart; IV. Peter and John, the Disciples; V. Jesus, the Master.

One of the freshest, strongest and highest treatments of the subject it has been our pleasure to peruse. Original, attractive, and helpful.—Madison Courier.

Pleasing and suggestive character-sketches, written from the humanitarian point of view with much appreciation and reverent feeling.—Independent.

The New Bible and its New Uses. By JOSEPH HENRY CROOKER. 286 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

CONTENTS: Introduction: The New Bible; I. Errors in the Bible; II. What the Bible claims for itself; III. The Bible as Authority; Appendix, Contradictions in the Gospels.

Multitudes of people to-day, both outside and inside the churches, are aware that the New Criticism, arisen in our age, has revealed a New Bible; and what they want to know, and in the simplest, most straightforward way, is this: What changes in our attitude toward the Bible are involved; and what new and wiser uses of it are made possible and necessary by these discoveries? Mr. Crooker's present work succinctly answers this query.

Belief in God. By M. J. SAVAGE.

An Examination of some Fundamental Theistic Problems, to which is added an Address on the "Intellectual Basis of Faith," by Rev. W. H. SAVAGE. 176 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

CONTENTS: Origin and Development of the Idea of God; Does God Exist? Can we Know God? Is God Conscious, Personal, and Good? Why Does not God Reveal Himself? Shall we Worship God? Shall we Pray to God? The Glory and the Shame of Atheism.

Seeing and Being, and Other Sermons. By JOHN W. CHADWICK. 234 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

CONTENTS: Great Hopes for Great Souls: "A Mere Man"; The Constructive Achievements of the Higher Criticism; Templed of God; The Price of Moral Freedom; Orthodoxy, what is it? Morality and Religion; The Conversion of Energy; Two Meanings of Religion; The Undiscovered Country; Samuel Longfellow; The Old, Old Story; The Fullness of Time; The Unbridled Tongue; Immortality; Seeing and Being.

Discourses. By EDWARD H. HALL, Pastor of the First Parish, Cambridge. 244 pages. Cloth, $1.50.

The whole volume is marked by that high style of thought and feeling which has always characterized the best spiritual products of New England, and which has done so much to keep religion from stagnation and to hold public and private conduct amenable to the highest standards.—The Nation.

For sale by all Booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

FRANCES POWER COBBE

The Peak in Darien: With Some Other Inquiries touching Concerns of the Soul and Body. An Octave of Essays. 266 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

"Vigorous in thought and style. We have read the volume through from preface to 'the end,' and enjoyed it."—Watchman.

Darwinism in Morals, and Other Essays. 422 pages. Cloth, $2.00.

Some of the chapters: Darwinism in Morals; Hereditary Piety; The Religion of Childhood; Prehistoric Religion; The Religions of the World; The Religions of the East; The Religion and Literature of India; Unconscious Cerebration; Dreams; The Evolution of Morals and Religion.

The Duties of Women. A Course of Lectures. 193 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

"The profoundest, wisest, purest, noblest book in principle, aim, and tone yet written upon the true position of woman in society."

The Scientific Spirit of the Age, and Other Pleas and Discussions. 243 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

Religious Duty. 311 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

A Faithless World. Cloth, $1.00.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Register Tract Series.

- No. 1. MY NEW NEIGHBOR. By Rev. W. H. Lyon. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 2. THE CONGREGATIONAL METHOD: How it is worked and how it ought to be worked. By Rev. Charles F. Dole. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 3. BEHOLD THE MAN. By Rev. W. P. Tilden. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 4. PRACTICAL CHRISTIANITY. By Rev. Charles A. Allen. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 5. AMERICAN UNITARIANISM: Its History and Development. By Rev. Edward Everett Hale. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 6. CHURCH ORGANIZATION. By Rev. William I. Lawrence. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 7. OF MAKING ONE'S SELF BEAUTIFUL. By Rev. William C. Gannett. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 8. THE JUDGMENT: The True Doctrine of the Judgment Individual and Universal. By Rev. William R. Alger. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 9. THE BREATH OF LIFE. By Rev. H. M. Simmons. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 10. WHAT DOES THE UNITARIANISM OF TO-DAY STAND FOR? By Rev. W. P. Tilden. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 11. LIBERAL CHRISTIANITY AS MOTIVE-POWER. By Rev. E. A. Horton. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 12. MORALITY IN THE SCHOOLS. By William T. Harris, LL.D. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 13. JOSEPH PRIESTLEY: The Old Unitarianism and the New. By Rev. C. C. Everett, D.D. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 14. WHAT O'CLOCK IS IT IN RELIGION? By Rev. M. J. Savage. $2.00 per hundred.
- No. 15. A SOUL WITH FOUR WINDOWS OPEN. By Rev. James Leonard Corning. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 16. SCIENTIFIC THEOLOGY THE GROUND OF ALL RELIGION. By Francis E. Abbot, Ph.D. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 17. REPORTS ABOUT WHICH GOOD MEN MIGHT AGREE. By William M. Salter. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 18. HOW WE HELPED OUR MINISTER TO WRITE GOOD SERMONS. By Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D. 50 cents per hundred.
- No. 19. FOUR SERMONS ON REVIVALS. By Rev. S. M. Crothers. $3.00 per hundred. Single copies, 6 cents.
- No. 20. THEODORE PARKER'S LETTER TO A YOUNG MAN. 50 cents per hundred.
- No. 21. THE THEOLOGY OF THE FUTURE. By Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D. 50 cents per hundred.
- No. 22. THE RESTRICTION OF VIVISECTION. By Albert Leffingwell, M.D. 50 cents per hundred.
- No. 23. A WORKING THEORY IN ETHICS. By Rev. J. H. Crooker. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 24. THE CHRISTIAN UNITARIAN POSITION, DOCTRINAL. By John Hamilton Thom. 60 cents per hundred.
- No. 25. THE NEW BIRTH AND THE NEW TYPE OF MAN. By Rev. Charles F. Dole. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 26. THE RESURRECTION OF JESUS. By Rev. W. H. Furness. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 27. SHORT AND LONG VIEWS. By Rev. Charles F. Dole. $1.00 per hundred.

Sent post paid on receipt of price by

CHRISTIAN REGISTER ASSOCIATION.
141 Franklin Street, Boston.

Christian Registers WANTED.

Copies of The Christian Register for Feb. 15 and March 29, 1894, are wanted to complete files. Any one having copies of the paper for above dates which they do not care to preserve will confer a favor by sending them to the office of the Christian Register, 141 Franklin St., Boston.

Pleasantries.

"Woof, are we wick?" asked Charlie. "No," answered Ruth, "not rich." "Are we poor, ven?" "No, just middle-sized."—Selected.

A little Philadelphia girl, while watching the rain, turned to her mother, and said, "Ma, I guess the weather is so warm it's melting the clouds."—Exchange.

An exchange calls attention, apropos of the pompadour sleeve, to Ezekiel, chapter xiii. verses 17, 18, where a woe is pronounced upon the women "that sew pillows to all armholes."

Young Lady (on the grand stand): "The umpire calls a foul, but I don't even see a feather." Her Escort: "But you must remember that this is a picked nine."—Sacred Heart Review.

Doctor: "The bicycle gives people the best exercise in the world." Patient: "But I can't afford to ride a bicycle." Doctor: "Oh, you don't need to ride one: just dodge them."—Sacred Heart Review.

"Uncle," said Harry, "please buy me a goat." "Harry," said his uncle, "I can't afford it." "But, uncle," argued the youngster, "the more littler goat you buy, the more money it won't cost."—Exchange.

Jones: "This chicken is fourteen years old." Smith: "How can you tell the age of a chicken?" Jones: "By the teeth." Smith: "By the teeth! Chickens don't have any teeth." Jones: "But I have!"—Exchange.

A little girl whose parents recently moved to another city, and who is now enjoying her first experience in living in a block, thus described it in a letter to another child: "This is a very queer place. Next door is fastened on our house."—The Evangelist.

A correspondent of an English paper writes: "You refer this week to the title 'Jan Maclaren' as an amusing error committed by Le Chrétien Evangélique. In a country newspaper, published within twenty miles of London, the name appeared as 'Jane Maclaren' not many weeks ago."—Exchange.

Is this a joke? Scene: A Sunday-school. Johnnie: "I say, Miss Jones, I know now why you didn't want me to rob birds' nests last spring." Miss Jones (with an oriole in her hat): "Why was it, Johnnie?" Johnnie (gazing with admiring eyes at the hat): "Cause you wanted the birds to grow big enough to wear 'em."—Kate Field's Washington.

A story is told of Mr. Balfour's recent golf-starring tour. He had made an iron shot in which he had sent the soil almost half as far as the ball. "What did I hit?" he asked his caddie, as he looked round to discover a hidden boulder or a decapitated stump. The only reply was about as crushing as could have been compressed into a single word,—"Scotland."—Exchange.

School children are proverbially original in many of their utterances. In the grammar department of the West Middle School the teacher was examining her young charges in history. Pennsylvania and its founder, William Penn, were under discussion. She told the little ones that Penn was a disciple of peace, and finally asked, "Can any of you tell me what 'peace' means?" "I can, teacher," breathlessly exclaimed a little fellow. "Well, and what does 'peace' mean?" "It means 'no scrappin,'" responded the boy.—Harper Post.

FROM RECENT EXAMINATIONS.

Since wit has been defined by Noah Webster as "the felicitous association of objects not usually connected, so as to produce a pleasant surprise," may not the pupils of some of our public schools, who gave the following answers to their examination questions, lay claim to it? The record as here given is bona fide, having been read during the past week at the graduation exercises of one of the leading grammar schools of this city.

Who were the Pilgrims? A dirty, filthy set who lived under the ground.

Name a domestic animal useful for clothing, and describe its habits. The ox. He don't have any habits, because he lives in a stable.

If you were travelling across the desert, where would you choose to rest? I would rest on a stool.

Mention five races of men. Men, women, children, and babies.

Describe the white race, and show that it is superior to the other races. A white man will nod at you when he meets you on the street.

Of what is the surface of the earth composed? Dirt and people.

Name a fruit that has its seeds on the outside. A seed cake.—The Budget.

Highest of all in Leavening Power.—Latest U. S. Gov't Report

Royal Baking Powder
ABSOLUTELY PURE

BROWN BROTHERS & CO.

50 State Street, Boston.

Travellers' Letters of Credit.

Sterling, French and German Exchange.

Brown, Shipley & Co., London.

NEW ENGLAND MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY.

POST-OFFICE SQUARE, BOSTON, MASS.
ASSETS, Dec. 31, 1894.....$24,252,828.71
LIABILITIES.....22,217,399.94
$2,035,428.77
BENJ. F. STEVENS, President.
ALFRED D. FOSTER, Vice-Pres.
S. F. TRULL, Secretary.
WM. B. TURNER, Asst. Sec'y.

LIFE RATE ENDOWMENT policies are issued at the old life rate premium.—Annual Cash distributions are paid upon all policies.—Every policy has insured thereon the cash surrender and paid-up insurance values to which the insured is entitled by the Massachusetts Statute.—Pamphlets, rates, and values for any age sent on application to the Company's Office.

Ladies Travelling Alone to Boston

WILL FIND THE

HOTEL BELLEVUE

A quiet hotel, with a café of rare excellence. Located on Beacon Hill, near the State House, and convenient to all the large stores and places of amusement. Adjoining American Unitarian Association Building, BEACON STREET, BOSTON, EUROPEAN PLAN, J. W. SMITH, Proprietor.

THE JACKSON SANATORIUM

DANVILLE, New York

Established in 1858.

A delightful home for health and rest seekers. Personal care of experienced physicians. Main building fire-proof. For illustrated pamphlet address J. ARTHUR JACKSON, Sec., P.O. Box 1873

The merits of the Palmer Woven Patent Hammocks have never been equalled. Their superiority of material, construction, and design has made them the standard since first introduced. While there is a continual effort by imitators and infringers to produce something similar, it has all been without success, and the "Palmer Patent Hammocks" still stand pre-eminently superior to any of the imitations. They are produced in larger quantities and infinitely more varieties than the combined production of all others.

Before purchasing, insist upon seeing the "Palmer Patent Hammocks." Remember, the name "Palmer" is a synonym for all that is best in Hammocks. If your dealer does not have them in stock, he can get them for you, but be sure that he does. I. E. Palmer, Middletown, Conn.

In connection with our wholesale business, we are accustomed to sell

CHURCH CARPETS

at manufacturers' prices.

John H. Pray, Sons & Co.,

Wholesale and Retail CARPETS and UPHOLSTERY, 658 Washington St. (opp. Boylston), Boston. Correspondence Solicited.

Foundry established in 1790 by PAUL REVERE.

BELLS and CHIMES
of Copper and Tin.
BLAKE BELL CO., Boston, Mass.

JOSEPH GILLOTT'S
STEEL PENS.

GOLD MEDAL, PARIS EXPOSITION, 1889, AND THE CHICAGO EXPOSITION AWARD.

THE MOST PERFECT OF PENS.

Education.

The oldest high-class educational magazine in the country ($3 per year) is read by thoughtful people of all classes, as well as educators. It ought to be in every library and reading-room in the land. Is it in yours? From a new subscriber we will accept $2 for the first year. Send 12 cents (in stamps) for a sample copy.

Nova Scotia Tours. The associate editor of Education offers again this year several delightful personally conducted tours to Evangeline's land. Select companies of cultured people. No heat, romantic scenery. An ideal vacation. First party, June 25. Shad, salmon, and strawberries in their prime. Expenses low. Write for particulars.

KASSON & PALMER,

50 Bromfield Street, Boston, Mass.

SCHOOL OF DOMESTIC SCIENCE AND CHRISTIAN WORKERS.

Courses for Teachers, Matrons, Home-makers, City Missionaries, Pastors' Assistants, Y. W. C. A. Secretaries, etc. Eighth year. Address for Circulars,

Miss L. L. SHERMAN, Principal (Formerly Principal D. L. Moody's Training School), 52 Berkeley St., Boston, Mass. (B. Y. W. C. A.)

Mr. HALE'S SCHOOL 86 BEACON ST., BOSTON.

The 13th year will begin September 25. Preparation for Harvard College and the Institute of Technology. Full Classical and Scientific Courses. Primary department for young boys nine or ten years of age. Fine situation, directly opposite the Public Garden. Large, sunny, high-studded rooms, open fireplaces, gymnasium, extensive laboratories, covered fire-escape, lunch-room. Teachers: ALBERT HALE (Harv.), E. D. MARSH (Harv.), E. K. STEVENS (Harv.), C. S. STREET, Amherst. Address ALBERT HALE.

Mr. Knapp's Home School for Boys, PLYMOUTH, MASS.

Powder Point School (DUXBURY, MASS.). These schools have always had the same interests, and will now be united at Duxbury, the Plymouth school closing with the present term.

Rev. and Mrs. John A. Bellows'

BOARDING AND DAY SCHOOL FOR GIRLS will begin its seventh year Sept. 18, 1895. Number of boarding pupils limited to eight. Address 91 DANFORTH STREET, PORTLAND, ME.

West Newton English and Classical School.

ALLEN BROTHERS. Family School. Both Sexes. Unsectarian. Prepares for College, Scientific Schools, Business, and for a useful life. Forty-third year begins Wednesday, September 18. Catalogue of ALLEN BROTHERS, WEST NEWTON, MASS.

THE MORGAN SCHOOL, PORTSMOUTH, N.H.

This Home and Day School for Girls will reopen September 25 for its second year under the new management. College, Preparatory, and Finishing Courses. Address for circular Miss GEORGINA S. WOODBURY, Principal.

PROSPECT HILL SCHOOL

FOR YOUNG LADIES, GREENFIELD, MASS. Twenty-fifth Year. Reference, Rev. E. E. Hale, D.D. REV. JAMES C. PARSONS, Principal.

THE HIGHLAND MILITARY ACADEMY,

WORCESTER, MASS., begins 40th year September 11. Classical, Scientific, Business, Preparatory Departments. Gymnasium. Athletics encouraged. Careful training. Home influences. JOSEPH ALDEN SHAW, A.M., Head Master.

PROCTOR ACADEMY, Andover, N.H.

Coeducational. Prepares for College and Scientific Schools. For information address JAMES F. MORTON, A.M., Principal.

MISS KIMBALL'S SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,

Worcester, Mass. Thorough preparation for College. Intermediate, Academic, and Special Courses. Send for Illustrated Circular.

Miss Gibbons' School for Girls.

Preparation for all colleges. 55 West 47th St., N.Y. MRS. SARAH H. EMERSON, Principal. October 2. A few boarding pupils taken.

HOME SCHOOL FOR BOYS

in the family of Rev. Eugene De Normandie, Danvers, Mass. Address HENRY N. DE NORMANDIE.

MAGNOLIA TERRACE

Springfield, Mass. Home and Day School for Girls. JOHN MCDUFFIE, Ph.D.

NEWTON CENTRE, MASS.

SCHOOL FOR THE CORRECTION OF ALL SPEECH DEFECTS. For circular address E. J. K. THORPE, Principal.

Boston, 10 Ashburton Place.

BOSTON UNIVERSITY

Law School. Fall term opens Wednesday, October 2. For circular address EDMUND H. BENNETT, Dean.

TWO OR THREE CHILDREN

given home and personal instruction in a private family in the suburbs; modern methods; large house and grounds; permanent or summer arrangement. Address M. R. W., Christian Register.

TO LET. The desirable house, 118 Highland Street, Roxbury; 11,000 feet of land; beautiful location; Norfolk House cars now run near. Two furnished cottages, West Falmouth. S. G. DAVIS, 113 Devonshire Street.

GEO. H. ELLIS,
Printer,

141 FRANKLIN ST.

BOSTON.

CHANNING BUILDING.

WITH extensive, light, and commodious rooms, large and fast Presses, embracing all the latest improvements, Type-setting Machines, new and modern material throughout, the Establishment ranks with the best in the City for the execution of Letterpress or Plate Printing.

BOOKS

PAMPHLETS

NEWSPAPERS

MAGAZINES

SERMONS

CATALOGUES

REPORTS

LAW WORK

AND EVERY VARIETY OF

Mercantile and Job Printing.

Excellence in Workmanship.

Promptness in Delivery.

The Pamphlet Bindery, included in the office, is furnished with every facility for rapid and good work.

The Christian Register

Liberty, Holiness, Love.

VOLUME LXXIV.

BOSTON, THURSDAY, AUGUST 8, 1895.

NUMBER 32.

The Christian Register.

TERMS: $3.00 per year. Single copies, 6 cents.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY THE
CHRISTIAN REGISTER ASSOCIATION,
141 Franklin Street, Boston, Mass.

Entered as second-class mail matter.

Contents.

EDITORIAL.	PAGE
Notes; Jews and Unitarians,	497
Liberal Organization; The True Church; A Feminine Code of Honor,	498
MUSINGS,	499
BREVITIES,	499
PRO AND CON.
Collections and Appropriations; Free Church System,	499
ORIGINAL AND SELECTED.
The Columbian Catholic Summer School, by Mrs. Aubertine Woodward Moore; From London,	500
Temperance and Politics in England, by Will- iam H. Lyon; Report of the Superintendent of the New England States,	501
Christian and Religious Unity, by A. Judson Rich; The Unitarian Church at the Atlanta Exposition,	502
A Fable,	503
Women's Alliance Leaflets,	510
Orthodoxy at Oxford; The Service of Birds, . .	511
RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE,	503
THE PULPIT.
Why should we imitate Jesus? by Howard Mac- Queary,	504
SPIRITUAL LIFE,	505
SPIRIT OF THE PRESS,	506
LITERATURE.
"Selected Essays of James Darmesteter"; Other Book Notices,	506
Miscellaneous; Literary Notes,	507
THE HOME.
Solving the Rain Problem; Sweet Peas, . . .	508
How Mac Duff went to Sleep; Priest and Wood- man,	509
POETRY.
Ebenezer Rockwood Hoar,	500
God's Ages,	504
Prisoners,	508
Motto, by Henrietta R. Eliot,	509
CHARITIES AND REFORMS,	510
EDUCATION,	510
HERE AND THERE,	510
TEMPERANCE,	511
PERSONALS,	511
SCIENCE,	511
PLEASANTRIES,	512

SPECIMEN COPIES of the Christian Register will be sent free for four weeks to any one wishing to examine it. Application should be made with address in full to

CHRISTIAN REGISTER ASSOCIATION,
141 Franklin Street, Boston.

Editorial.

CARDINAL GIBBONS's visit to Rome has given rise to many rumors. He is highly esteemed by his associates, and the pope and the high officials have discussed important questions bearing on the course of the Romish Church in this country. Among other questions treated is the one which the pope has at heart, as declared in his recent encyclical in relation to a broader union. A correspondent of the New York Sun, writing on the presence of Cardinal Gibbons at the Vatican, adds: "What has given a capital interest to this visit of the Cardinal to Leo XIII. is the question of the relation of Anglicanism to the Roman Church. The holy Father has repeated to the son of the United States, where these questions arouse curiosity, all his plans, all his hopes, all his desires. Without being indiscreet, I think I can say with certainty that the Archbishop of Baltimore did not hold back his sympathy nor his thoughts. With his open heart, his broad and lofty mind, he has encouraged Leo XIII., and brought out clearly the points of contact on which the two churches can meet, deliberate, and perhaps draw nearer. This visit ad limina will not have been without results."

THE farewell services of Dr. Farrar on a recent Sunday at St. Margaret's were very impressive. The sermons preached on that day were such as few ministers in London could preach. But behind the preacher, with his eloquent discourse, stood the pastor and the man. The noble ideal which the sermon held up finds few, if any, better illustrations than in the life and work of the former incumbent of St. Margaret's. He represents alike the cultivated scholar, the broad-minded lover of truth, and the devoted friend of the humble as well as the cultured. Bold and free in his utterance, he illustrates the noblest type of the Christian religion as seen in the English Church,—indeed, it may be said the noblest type now existing anywhere. A crowd gathered on the occasion of the farewell services, and it was evident from the expression of feeling how dear he was to his hearers. He enters, as dean of Canterbury, into another sphere of labor; and he will carry with him the same devotedness of purpose, lofty aim, high scholarship, and breadth of thought which have made his ministry so memorable at St. Margaret's. It is such examples as this which enrich the Anglican Church, and raise our common Christianity into a higher level of truth, righteousness, and love.

THE bicyclists have their race prejudices, and close their club doors against the colored man. Rev. Bradley Gilman of Springfield, Mass., has been a bicyclist for a number of years; and, in consequence of the benefits to be received from the efforts of the American League of Wheelmen, it was urged that he should join the league. Soon he received a circular in which it was said, "Our rules require a member to be an amateur, to be white, and to be eighteen years of age." Mr. Gilman, as soon as he read the rule, we are told, rubbed his eyes, asked if he were living in Massachusetts, and sat down and penned a scathing letter to the Springfield Republican, expressing the indignation which he and every other right-minded bicyclist must feel at the intrusion of race prejudice into the arena of healthful sport. The Massachusetts members maintain that they have fought against this rule, but, as yet, they have not been able to have it changed. We trust those who are opposed to this distinction of color will keep up the fight until they succeed in wiping out this odious rule.

THE Catholic Total Abstinence Union of America, which will celebrate its silver jubilee this week in New York City, will be a very important gathering. This association already is one of wide-spread influence, but is only in the beginning of its career. It already numbers three thousand separate societies, with a membership of sixty-five thousand. It is a compact organized body, and is under the direction of the Roman Catholic Church. There are three questions of special interest to be considered,—the best substitute for the saloon, the elimination of the insurance feature from the societies connected with the Union, and the effort to make temperance in the Romish Church an entirely religious movement. Able papers will be read by distinguished ecclesiastics; and it is proposed to adopt a plan for the organization in each parish of a total abstinence society, of which the rector shall be the head and ruling spirit. Another matter of present interest and importance will be the decision on the subject of the Benedictine monks' breweries at Latrobe, Pa. It seems that a special license was granted these monks to brew beer for their own consumption. But gradually they extended their business, until the product of the breweries was sold in all parts of the world. It is expected that the apostolic delegate will indorse the protest against this liquor business, and that the Union will urge its abolition. Several of the most eminent church officials will be present, and the result will be a more wide-spread temperance organization within the Romish Church. When we consider how large a proportion of its members are engaged in the liquor trade and the amount of intemperance among the people, this effort to use the influence of the Church for temperance is one of the most encouraging features in this great reform.

THE civilized world has been shocked at the recent report of the massacre of Christians in China. It seems to have had its origin in a fanatical hatred, and to have been very atrocious in some of its features. Full and reliable details have not reached us at the time of this writing, but it is very clear that the treatment of men and women has been both brutal and cruel. According to the early despatches received the victims were butchered after having suffered terrible abuse. At the State Department it is believed that the massacre is simply the result of another outbreak of fanaticism such as raged during the Chinese-Japanese war. Kucheng, where this massacre took place, is a city ninety miles south-west of the province of Fuh-kien. There are several missions at this place. A London despatch to the New York Sun says: "The missionaries are in no way to blame for this outbreak. These outrages will be brought at once to the notice of the Chinese government, but the action of Chinese officials is notoriously slow. But prompt measures will be taken by the British and American governments to ascertain the exact truth of these reports and a stern demand made for a reparation."

It is an encouraging sign to note the increasing disposition on the part of high State officials to carry out the laws against gambling and prize-fighting. One of the latest instances of this is that of Gov. Culberson of Texas. He has, we are told, taken active measures to prevent the holding of the proposed prize-fight between Corbett and Fitzsimmons. The attorney-general has ruled that both prize-fighting and aiding and abetting a prize-fight are forbidden by law and punishable by prescribed penalties; and now the governor has issued a proclamation forbidding any one from violating the law against such fights, calling on all law-abiding citizens to aid him in enforcing the law, and promising that he will use all the authority and power of the State to prevent the proposed violation of the law, and bring its violators to punishment. If, in spite of all these efforts, the fight should come off, it is to be hoped that the governor will bring the offenders to punishment. This is the only way effectually to put a stop to these brutal and disgraceful scenes.

THE secretaries of the boards of health of the six New England States have published a brief summary of vital statistics which are of interest and value, even if not complete. The movement of the centre of population southward may be explained from the fact that the manufacturing interests are largely in Massachusetts, Connecticut, and Rhode Island. The female death-rate is lower than the male. In New England in 1892 it averaged 19.9, while in Europe for that year it ranged from 17.7 in Norway to 35 in Hungary. The statement that the death-rate in New Hampshire is higher than the birth-rate must be received with a hesitation which demands more accurate evidence. The marriage-rate for all New England in 1892 was 18.5, which is higher than the rate reported for any foreign country in that year, Hungary coming nearest, with a rate of 18.4. The marriage-rate in Ireland in 1892 was only 9.3. But in the matter of births France (22.1) and Ireland (22.4) are the only foreign countries reporting a rate below that of New England, which was 24.9. England and Scotland had a rate of 30 and a fraction, Italy and Austria 36, and Hungary 40. The death-rate varies less than either of the others for the civilized world. In divorces New Hampshire and Maine take the lead, while Massachusetts has the lowest rate. Many other facts are given in this report which throw light on the actual condition of society.

AMONG the many good results from the late Chicago Exposition may be mentioned the influence upon Jewish women which has led to an important organization. Woman's sphere among the Israelites of old was very limited. She had no voice in the organization of the Church. It is only recently that the bars which separated them in the house of worship have been broken down, and even among the orthodox Jews the separation still exists. But the power of the time spirit is too strong for the most bigoted traditionalist. Recently women have planned and formed various associations for charitable and philanthropic objects. Among the chief of these is the sisterhood of American Jewesses known as the National Council of Jewish Women. This has existed only about two years, but it has the promise of a very great usefulness and growth in the future. In most of the large cities sisterhoods have been established. In Chicago they have charitable societies, Bible readings, and courses of lectures. In Pittsburg they have founded a kindergarten. In Baltimore the council inaugurated the project of erecting a central building which shall contain offices of all of the charitable organizations of the city. A model tenement house is also being managed by the Baltimore Council. In Cincinnati the women have started an employment bureau for the poor. The Philadelphia Council has succeeded in interesting the philanthropic societies of that city in joining it in the project of solving the child labor problem. These facts we glean from the reports of the First National Convention of the National Council of Jewish Women held in Washington last May. The leaders in this movement are women of note. The National Council has an official organ in the monthly magazine, the American Jewish, which is published in Chicago, and has won a decided popularity. From all this it will be seen that even our Jewish sisters are coming to the front, and in the future will find their place in the Jewish society and church.

JEWES AND UNITARIANS.

We have long known that Unitarianism is made to serve as a kind of "bogey," by means of which the governing authorities of Christendom are wont to scare their rebellious subjects into submission. As mothers of a certain class threaten their fractious children that the "bad man" will get them, so Orthodoxy says to a young minister who shows signs of thinking for himself, "You are drifting into Unitarianism." To Unitarians themselves it is not a little amusing at times to note how this threat is received. While some pay no attention to it, others are put into quite a nervous panic, and either promise at once never to be naughty any more, or explain with eager haste that they never could by any possibility ally their fortunes with that heretical sect.

All this as an incident of the changes now being effected in other Christian denominations is familiar to our observation. We learn, however, with some surprise, that among Jews the Unitarian name is invoked for the same purpose. The more orthodox members of that faith also hurl it as a reproach against those of their brethren who have departed somewhat from the ancient standards. So, at all events, we are informed by Rabbi Hirsch, of Chicago, in an address on "Moses and Jesus," lately published in the Reform Advocate; and he evidently feels under some necessity to make it plain that he and his friends are not guilty of the accusation.

Acknowledging some likeness between Jews of the reformed faith and Unitarians, Rabbi Hirsch nevertheless finds what he regards as a vital distinction in ethics that keeps them apart. Moses is the true type of Judaism, he thinks; and that great name stands for an active, aggressive righteousness, for a virtue that is capable of scorn and indignation in its hostility to evil. On the other hand, while he reverences Jesus as one who sometimes rises to the height of the Judaic ideal, it appears to him that Unitarians slight this aggressive note in the character of their chosen leader, and follow him mainly because of his doctrines of non-resistance to evil. "Sweetness and light," as he understands it, are the great words of the Unitarian gospel; and sweetness and light are terms that indicate to him a very sad degeneracy of spirit.

This distinction strikes us as being too much in the air,—a kind of theoretical discrimination which does not reckon very accurately with the facts in the case. Any one in the least familiar with Unitarian biography must know that, in active hostility to injustice and wrong and in passionate resistance to their encroachments, the men and women who have most given character to the name were by no means deficient. Again, Shakspeare had good reason to make Shylock say, "For sufferance is the badge of all our tribe." In other words, there have been enough meek Jews and enough fiery Unitarians to upset this classification entirely, so far as existing types of character are concerned.

If the distinction is to be based on a difference of ideals, it is necessary to remember that any exalted ideal is a very complex thing. A great number of contradictory traits enter into it and help to shape it. More emphasis may be placed on this or that quality, but it must not be assumed that therefore other qualities are put out of sight. Exactly what the Jewish ideal of the perfect human life may be we are not qualified to say, and we shall not quickly grant the right of an outsider to expound the Unitarian ideal. We may say, however, that from our point of view any conception of the higher life which fails to recognize its supreme law in the law of love and any creed which does not add to the idea of God-likeness that of God in man are both deficient as judged by the best spiritual standards we know.

One criticism of Unitarianism made in this address is undoubtedly only too well deserved. It has been at certain periods of its history too exclusively an intellectual movement, and has suffered, as all one-sided culture must suffer, from lack of robust vitality. This is nothing that can be charged upon its ideals or its beliefs, but is what we repeatedly see in human life,—that fineness of perception and feeling are often won at too great sacrifice of strength. We believe, however, that this criticism is now made without full knowledge of the best Unitarian life of the present time, and that it does not apply with so much force as it did some ten or twenty years ago.

The rabbi is known to be a strong friend of the Liberal Congress; and he implies that Unitarians lack courage or are too selfishly intent upon their own missionary work to interest themselves in the plans of the new organization. That charge may go for what it is worth. Every man judges for himself what place in the vineyard holds out to him the largest promise of accomplishing something worth while by means of his labor; and, when one says to another that he must work with him in order to do anything for God and humanity, silence is perhaps as good an answer as can be given.

We must, however, call attention to these closing words from the rabbi's address: "On, then, in this spirit to reclaim the world,—hand in hand with all liberal forces, still not forgetting that these liberal elements brought us nothing, have nothing to bring. What they possess was ours before they owned it." We do not wish to be captious; but, really, this profession of having everything to contribute and nothing to gain from the rest of mankind seems to us dangerously near that sectarian spirit which the Congress holds so great a sin. Men do not commonly band themselves together unless they feel that they have some need of each other. We doubt if Unitarians are often found claiming that they alone have all that is needed to save and regenerate the world; and, if they are not too eager to flock to the standard of every one who is sure that he has much to teach them, we trust they commonly have grace to seek help at any source whence there is reason to think they may have something to learn.

LIBERAL ORGANIZATION.

Sitting here within two hundred feet of the sea, and with the passionately loved music of the surf in one's ears, how can one care what becomes of the civilized world from which he has escaped? But the editorial order reaches far; and, after all, one must return to civilization again some time, and so one must keep on living terms with things as they are. Perhaps, also, during the lazy season a little thinking may be done which will issue in action when the days of activity return.

The writer is one who watched with eager interest the recent meeting of the Societies for Christian Endeavor in Boston, as well as the work of the Young People's Christian Union. With no love for the narrowness which prevented the fusion of these great organizations, one must still remember that this narrowness is natural and logical. The Endeavorers could not unite with the Universalists without sharing the "bigotry," as the old lady expressed it, of hoping that "everybody is going to be saved." And that, of course, would take away the reason for their peculiar methods and aims. It was not this, however, that I was troubled about. This "bigotry" is rapidly spreading, and may be left to take care of itself. As one interested observer, I was chiefly anxious to know the practical results of the great organization.

No engine has yet been devised which does not waste a large part of the force in the working of the machine itself, and yet the machine accomplishes vastly more than could be done without it. So, though much thought, enthusiasm, and labor ended in banners and marching and shouting and singing, still it seems clear that "great good"—from their point of view—must result from such unanimity of interest and purpose. It seems clear, then, that liberals, with their grander interests and nobler purposes, might well seek a closer and more wide-spread organization for the more effective doing of their work. We were the first to organize the young people for practical work within the limits of our local churches, and now we only need to weld our companies into regiments and our regiments into armies. It would be well if some crystallizing word could be spoken or action taken at the meeting of our National Conference in Washington in October.

But there is another phase of liberal organization that is just now of special and pressing importance. It goes without saying that the "evangelical" bodies are more closely organized than we are, for despotism is always more compact than liberty. It is of the essence of liberty that this should be so. And yet a little clear thinking will show that, though people may decline to be committed to a statement of theological belief, there need be no loss of liberty in practical organization on the basis of a common purpose and for the attainment of certain ends. I have never been able to see why the liberals should not have a practical organization as effective as that of the Roman Catholics, and yet leave personal beliefs utterly free. Indeed, the maintenance and perpetuation of liberty demand organization.

Every little while religious liberty, in some part of the country, is not only threatened, but seriously invaded. Some devout Seventh-day Baptist is persecuted for conscientiously refusing to keep a "Sabbath" for which there exists neither Biblical nor ecclesiastical authority. Concerning Bible reading or religious teaching in the public schools the liberals desire, for the sake of the schools, to maintain a position of equal justice toward all,—Catholic, Protestant, Christian, and Pagan alike; but lack of organization makes them weak in the face of any small but compact body of bigots. Over and over again we have been in danger of some action looking toward the always accursed union of Church and State. History shows that it has always been a calamity; and yet there are those who are always striving to afflict the country again with that which, at so great a cost of treasure and blood, we have fortunately escaped.

When the Liberal Congress met in Chicago two years ago, I was one of those who joined heartily in the movement; for I hoped that here, at last, was the beginning of what I had so long hoped for,—a union, for practical ends, of Universalists, Unitarians, Ethical Culturists, Liberal Jews, Independents, Liberal Orthodox, and others. A national union of all liberal religious bodies might be brought about after a plan analogous to the federal union of the States. Each body might maintain a complete autonomy, and be free and independent in the managing of its own affairs; and yet all together might maintain an organization, offensive and defensive, for the protection of liberty and the achievement of common ends.

As it is a scandal to have two or three orthodox churches antagonizing each other and struggling for existence in a town not large enough for the adequate maintenance of more than one, so it is equally a scandal to have an Independent, a Universalist, and a Unitarian church all trying to live in a place where one could better do the work. Under the guidance of the Congress, a union of all liberal forces in small places ought to be brought about, letting the majority decide as to method and name.

If these two ends—the general one of protecting liberal interests in the whole country and of helping on the practical union of fragments of societies in small towns—could only be reached, the existence of the Liberal Congress would be more than justified. If, however, the Congress is to degenerate into the unneeded position of another sect, a great hope will have been disappointed, the grand union that is really needed will have been postponed, and its final achievement will have been made greatly more difficult. Let me close by earnestly beseeching those having the Congress in their more immediate charge to guard the liberal forces of the country against a great danger, and to appreciate a great opportunity and help on a great success.

M. J. S.

THE TRUE CHURCH.

Rev. Leonard Woolsey Bacon makes a contribution to the subject of Christian fellowship in a brief paper printed in Christian Literature for August. He is not inclined to accept the idea that each Christian organization is the Church of Christ. According to the New Testament conception, he says, the Church is made up of Christian people, not of Christian parties. It is "the communion of saints," not the confederation of sects. As he looks abroad over the great scope of the world and of history, he finds the one Church the commonwealth of believers. "To the service of this, and not of any fraction of it, however pure in doctrine, however Scriptural in form of organization, however imposing by the magnificence of its extension to the service of the whole fellowship of believers in the town in which I serve, I am devoted by the consecration that makes me the minister of Christ":—

The one Church of Christ in the American town does not need to be created. It needs only to be recognized, and to be manifested to the world. It needs to be recognized by its own members and ministers. It does not now offer itself to observation in any corporate form. It has no chief officer, the visible centre of unity, no organized council or presbytery consulting for its united interest, no constitution or laws except the word of its Lord in the New Testament; but, men and brethren, you who believe in the Holy Ghost, do you doubt—can you doubt, so long as they who pass from death to life are known by this that they love the brethren—that in your own city, where you live and labor, the Church of Christ, one and indivisible, is a most solid reality?—the Church, with its cementing power of mutual love, so sadly hindered by ignorances and misconceptions, and by the miserable divisive spirit of sectarian allegiance, with its common zeal for its one Lord now wretchedly squandered in wasteful competitions, with its craving needs and duties, so often forgotten by its ministers in their exorbitant sense of duty to a narrow parish or congregation? Must you needs see this one Church of Christ before you can believe? Have you no sense of paramount loyalty and duty to the whole body of Christ's disciples, but only a little gush of sentiment, when you have given the devotion of your heart and the strength of your manhood to the supreme service of the party of Christians whose fortunes you are pushing with the spirit of a baseball game, as if the "emulations" which Paul condemns as works of the flesh were the very fruits of the Holy Spirit?

This is more fully unfolded by the following practical illustration:—

From year to year, as the midsummer returns, is renewed the annual reproach of the American Church. In city after city, town after town, as the season of discomfort, danger, and sickness comes on, the Christian ministers, with the honorable exception of one great communion, and with certain individual exceptions besides, will as a body simultaneously forsake their charge, and leave the city deserted of its resident pastors. And each man, speaking for himself, will say, and say truly, that he leaves with the consent of his congregation, and that, so far as his congregation is concerned, this is the best time for him to take his needful rest. And no man will consider that each man is member of a college of clergy having charge of the common interests of the Church of the whole town. If once the individual minister should learn to recognize in his own heart that the one Church of the one Lord in his town was a most solemn reality, and that he was not merely the one pastor of his little fold of the flock, but also one of the company of the pastors of the whole flock, this annual scandal would at once begin to be abated.

With this large idea of Christian fellowship the affections of the disciple fail to be satisfied with any one fragment of a church, and goes forth to recognize and love, through all ages, one holy catholic and apostolic Church,—the fellowship of all disciples.

A FEMININE CODE OF HONOR.

At a recent meeting of the Pioneer Club, a suffrage society of London, officered by ladies of title, it was proposed to frame a woman's code of honor. The idea has called forth at least one rather cynical newspaper article, in which the writer animadverts on the absence of esprit du corps and moral perception in women of the world. Such a meeting and its avowed object, he argues, show conclusively that up to this time women have not formulated rules by which they tacitly agree to be governed in many delicate junctures.

In fashionable life delinquencies such as cheating at cards, which would ostracize a man and banish him from his club and his set in society, are overlooked in women. It is conceded that these slips on the part of what is still known as the "fair and frail sex" in a certain section of society are to be treated with indulgence. Women are not so sternly held accountable by the mandates of a received code of opinion in their lapses from truth and honesty. They are treated with leniency, like children and undeveloped persons who commit like offences.

The writer perceives among women no unwritten law by which they would refuse to pay the bill of a poor tradesman in order to liquidate a gambling debt with promptness. The tradesman may fail in consequence of non-payment, his children may go barefoot or lack bread, but no dishonor falls on the head of the delinquent debtor; while, if he fails to meet promptly his gaming obligations, he is socially cashiered, and posted as a cheat and renegade. Men, it is more than intimated, conceal the vices of other men and tell lies about their own where the delicate and fragile fame of a woman is involved. This is supposed to be one of the immutable laws of honor. The easy tolerance of men is not always based on high moral sanctions. It is a species of self-protection. The man who condones his associate's vices would be included in the condemnation if the associate's character were known. It is therefore politic to say nothing. The conspiracy of silence pervades society, and to a certain extent it may be essential. Society could scarcely hold together if all were known concerning its members. This easy tolerance may lie at the foundations of stability and help to establish those compromises by which people manage to rub along in mixed and complicated relations.

This is not a high view of the moral order, but it is the world's way. When, therefore, we look into the secret motives of men's charity, we find it is not much higher or nobler than women's uncharity. High-minded women, it is safe to say, would not accept for themselves a code of honor drawn up on the lines of the code practised by the man of the world. Their moral point of view differs, and ought to differ. They bear the obloquy of being hard and unmerciful toward their own sex, but they can now in refutation point with just pride to what women have done for themselves and each other. The writer referred to makes mention of a picture by a Russian artist, where the woman taken in adultery is stoned by women alone. This is a bitter reproach, not altogether undeserved. But the fact that women see morally at a different angle from the man of the world is the salt of the world. Their very uncharity toward moral delinquents of the sex, cruel as it has been in special instances, has arisen from the instinct of self-preservation, the need of safeguarding the family and preserving the marriage tie. The high-minded, thoughtful woman of our day would not screen offenders from the consequences of their acts. She calls for justice, not for the woman alone, but for both the man and the woman. She would abolish that part of the code of dishonor that condemns the woman and screens the man. It is true that this great reformation lies potentially in the hands of women. Until it is accomplished, the condemnation of wrong and cruelty toward her own sex is upon her head. She formulates the laws that govern social intercourse. She approves or rejects members of the so-called best society. Her smile is the passport for the erring man, her frown is the condemnation of the erring woman. No code of honor for women that does not include perfect equality of condemnation of the sexes where the sin and shame are equal can be effective either for her own moral advance or the advance of the race.

Let the delinquent man stand on the same plane as the delinquent woman. Let him share her punishment and be rehabilitated with her through penitence and purification. The wise guides and advocates would not withhold punishment. Nature enforces the penalty for trespass, but punishment which leads to self-recovery is alone consistent with the scheme of nature.

The so-called venial trespasses of women, such as falsehood, cheating in small sums, breach of contract, irresponsibility on the plea of feminine weakness, may be excused in the fashionable woman by those of her own kind, but would meet with no condonation in the wage-earner. The stern laws of business are teaching women morality along with addition and multiplication. Small cheating, lying, and unfaithfulness may be tolerated in circles where men look upon women as inferiors and incapable of a high standard of moral attainment. Such tolerance may be a part of that manly code of honor of which we hear. It remains for women themselves to teach men better and give them nobler social laws. The developed and thoughtful and right-minded woman asks no complaisance toward her moral lapses, however small. The mere suggestion awakes her indignation. High probity, not low tolerance, is the rule of her being.

Did not the moral nature grow at even pace with every other part of the expanding powers of woman, it were of little moment that she be trained in colleges or skilled in the sciences. If she is not to raise the tone and elevate the standards of political life, it were better the ballot were withheld; for her great superiority lies in her moral intuitions and spiritual insight. These are the forces most needed by the world, and what she has to give cannot always lie under a bushel. It is a matter of supply and demand.

The uncharity and hardness of which she is accused spring partly from her cramped and narrow life, the sense of fear, the instability of her position. With education and poise, the power of self-protection and support, an esprit du corps is growing up among women of a different sort than the conspiracy of silence practised by so-called men of honor. It is a sense of loyalty to the highest interests of womanhood, a raising of the moral and intellectual plane, not excluding the gentle impulses of the heart,—an indissoluble bond of mutual helpfulness and appreciation.

Musings.

It is of no use: I give up the task. Without proper reflection I assumed a great responsibility. It is wearing upon me. I am not equal to it. It is clear that I must pack up my trunk and go home. Before leaving Boston, I had decided to come to Europe without a trunk, using a dress-coat case and a large bag which had served me before in Europe. But a lady friend very kindly offered me the use of her steamer trunk, and I was gratefully weak enough to accept it. It enclosed a convenient amount of space, and promised to be very useful. If it had been a new trunk, one without a reputation, there would have been little danger in accepting it; but, on the contrary, it was a trunk that had travelled in England and all over Europe. Some of the old labels were still clinging to it, but more decisive than these was the full name of the owner painted on the end. I knew that these labels and that name would give this trunk a certain amount of character, but I had no idea of the amount of character it would mean. When I arrived in England, my eyes soon began to be opened,—not to the weight of the trunk, but to the weight of importance attached to it. When the porters caught sight of it, they recognized it as an old friend. They took it tenderly out of the luggage-van, and then there was a hot competition as to who should receive the lovely owner as she stepped from the carriage. Imagine their grief and disappointment in finding that they had been imposed upon, and that instead of this incarnation of first-class feminine loveliness there was nothing but a prosaic third-class male traveller. When I discovered the state of affairs, I tried to mitigate this disappointment by a lavish distribution of fees; but I could not counterfeit the smile with which they were bestowed. When I got to France, the expectation heightened. Some porter, I suspect, had telegraphed that the trunk was coming. I braced myself up for the new responsibility, and made new drafts upon my banker; but it is all a failure. I should like to be as lovely as the owner of this trunk for a single day, just for the sake of having this unusual experience and exerting its influence upon the hotel and railroad porters of France. But it is of no use. I might climb the Matterhorn, I might scale Mont Blanc; but I could not attain the inaccessible heights of loveliness which the name on that trunk demands. And so in a few days I shall pack it up and go home.

Brevities.

Princess Nazle of Egypt, who is regarded as the most enlightened and progressive of Egyptian women, has interested herself in a project to exhibit work of the women of Egypt at the coming Atlanta Exposition.

Gov. Morrill is carrying on a vigorous fight in Kansas against the liquor-dealers. He is reported as saying that he will make "Kansas dry" if it takes every dollar in the treasury and all the militia to do it. This spirit on the part of officials will do much to enforce the laws.

When the late Rev. Dr. Henry A. Miles was in Europe, he was said to resemble the then reigning Pope Pius Nono; and often in the streets his companions would hear a passer-by exclaim, "Il papa!" Dr. Miles was also said to resemble Victor Hugo with his head covered, but the moment he took off his hat the resemblance ceased.

Dr. Parkhurst, though now taking a vacation in Switzerland, keeps up his interest in the reform going on in New York City. Thus he writes to the secretary of the City Vigilance League a good word for the president of the Police Commission. He says he recognizes the fact that, while men of equal intelligence and conscientiousness may hold different opinions in regard to the excise laws, "no man will question the intelligence or conscientiousness of Mr. Roosevelt."

The Armenian question moves slowly. The latest phase is the proposition from the European powers to appoint Christian assessors to assist the provisional governors; but this, it is said, the Porte will not assent to. Meantime the speech of Mr. Gladstone this week in London has added to the excitement in England. The question, he said, was not one of party or simply one of religion. We have reached a critical position, "and the honor of the powers is pledged to the institution of reform in Armenia." He made three proposals: first, that the demands of the powers should be moderate; second, that no promises of the Turkish authorities should be accepted; and, third, that the powers should not fear the word "coercion." A resolution was adopted, pledging the powers to a reform.

The American Presbyterian pilgrims, according to the New York Tribune, have fallen into the hands of the Philistines in Calvinistic Switzerland: "The singers had gone on in advance with some of the saints, and had escaped tribulation; but sixty-two pilgrims, after visiting more deliberately the shrines of the Reformation in Geneva, set out for a five hours' journey to Interlaken. Their baggage was weighed, and a billet rendered for 2,260 francs. The manager of the party protested against the extortionate charge; but the officials were obstinate, and insisted upon having the money paid to the last sou under threat of leaving the baggage behind. The pilgrims went on their way in a state of indignation, denouncing the railway officials as brigands and highway robbers in language different from what is ordinarily heard from Presbyterian pulpits. When they had been a few hours in Interlaken, the Jura & Simplon Company sent a despatch stating that there had been a slight mistake, and that the charge should have been 223 francs instead of the larger amount. Ninety per cent. of the money was subsequently returned."

Pro and Con.

COLLECTIONS AND APPROPRIATIONS.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

The appropriations of the American Unitarian Association for the year ending April 30, 1895, in aid of new and old societies, as shown by the last official report, was $37,056. The number of societies that received pecuniary assistance was ninety-nine. The cost of superintendence and missionary work in the entire home field is reported to have been $17,550. The two sums given show what it has cost, in money and service, mostly to maintain societies that have had a considerable period in which to become self-supporting, and so justify the managers of the beneficiary fund for having afforded temporary aid. It is a difficult as it is a delicate task for any board, in management of funds contributed for the planting of new and the assistance of enfeebled societies, to decide on prospects and actual results, so that no expenditures will go to waste. There is a time to die, as well for religious organizations as for individuals who succumb to physical exhaustion. The total annual contributions to the American Unitarian Association are absurdly and reproachfully meagre; but, such as they are, the officers who distribute them must find their work extremely embarrassing, as very fine lines need to be drawn in their appropriation. There is no margin for squandering. The demands far exceed the supply. Many appeals must be refused. Strict business principles hold in religious enterprises in which money is a factor. Real necessity, fair expectations, and actual results should be decisive as to when and where to give or to withhold.

A partial analysis of the report referred to furnishes the following data. The total contribution of the Association the last year to societies, including the cost of mission service, was $54,606. The number of societies receiving the benefit of this expenditure was 99. Some interest naturally centres in the inquiries, How many of these societies made any return gift in response to the urgent call for a liberal annual collection in aid of the Association, and what was the sum of the collection received? It appears that 58 societies, in sums varying from $5 to $50, gave tangible evidence of interest in general denominational work. The total amount of their return gifts was $1,166. 41 societies gave no portion of the gratuity received. So much more was the seed than the harvest.

In view of the foregoing statements, it might not seem gracious or politic to point any sharp moral; yet there are obligations on the part of both the dispensers and recipients of the funds of the Association which are too manifest to be mentioned. The query may be raised whether an organized religious society discharges reasonable obligations that year after year receives its principal financial support from a denominational fund and makes no return contribution. Limited means may be suggested as the reason; but would it burden its members to refund as much as they expend for a picnic or a summer excursion? We speak of planting and nurturing churches; but, in a plain business view, is it not for results,—for growth, activity, generosity, and devotion, such as will warrant the outlay? Beneficiaries are on probation, and may be expected to justify themselves by their good stewardship.

The judgment and executive ability of the new treasurer of the Association awaken the expectation that the annual collections from all sources will be considerably increased. Through the columns of the Register he invites suggestions from those concerned in his undertaking. It may seem early to intrude an individual opinion; but, having in view larger annual contributions to the general objects of the Association, the writer has little doubt that a method almost too simple to be mentioned will accomplish the purpose. It is for a concise official circular to be sent to every minister of the denomination, stating definitely what money is solicited for, the same to be read from the pulpit and re-enforced by the preacher's explanation and exhortation. So far there is little innovation on previous methods. But, instead of passing the contribution-box, which practically means giving on a minute scale of generosity, let every member of every congregation be presented with a printed slip, a promise to pay, on which he or she has only to enter an amount and subscribe a name. Self-respect will at once come to the rescue, and resources for enlarged operations will not be wanting. This method of individual appeal, with a definite personal response, will swell the treasury of the Association beyond any previous record.

A LIFE MEMBER OF THE A. U. A.

FREE CHURCH SYSTEM.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

In your issue of August 1 I noticed a criticism by "Layman" of the free pew system. If every one who might be drawn to our liberal churches because of the "broader faith" were amply able to pay, say, $50 a year for pew rent, then "Layman's" position could be maintained. But every one is not able. There are some within the limits of every parish who are absolutely unable to pay a single dollar. Under the free pew system, provided it is free in spirit as well as letter, these people are not deprived of the helps which our gospel can give. Then, second, under the free pew system, it is not the one who pays the largest amount of money who gets the best pew. The one who applies first, whatever be his social or financial standing, takes his choice of whatever pews remain unoccupied.

Those who have had to deal with the very poor will understand what this means. The ones who need the benefits of our church most are those who cannot pay anything, or, at most, very little, if they be true first of all, as they should be, to the needs of their families.

Hence the great importance of this point. People will not attend nor take any interest in the church unless they have a place to sit,—a place that they can call their own. This being true, we can never get the occupants of the "highways and hedges," if, when they reach the doors, we say, "No money, no place," or "The more money, the higher place."

If the church is to be anything more than "an utter failure to the point of absurdity," then money must not be held as necessary to its privileges. It is true, I admit, we cannot yet have "free preachers or music or insurance or coal-dealers or sextons." Men like "Layman," who are both able and willing, must pay them. When, through the helpfulness of the church, an institution made possible by the generosity of the many "laymen" with whom we are blessed, the material prosperity of the poor has been secured, then they will willingly, gladly, help in doing for others what has been done for them. Experience has proven this to be neither "sentiment" nor "theory."

W.
Brookfield, Mass.

EBENEZER ROCKWOOD HOAR.

On conscience, as on rock New England's hills,
His life was built. With reason's inward sight,
He saw as though from a cold mountain height,
When the white day pure winter's radiance fills.
Hot with the wrath of justice, against ill
Wrought out of wrong he waged a fearless fight,
And stood unflinching for imperilled right,
Freedom and country,—one who greatly wills.
Sparkling his wit as beads of foaming wine,
But keen to pierce as pointed rapier blade;
Tender in heart, wise, cheerful to the end,
To Concord's soil as native as its vine,
There with most precious dust New England laid
The statesman, jurist, judge, and steadfast friend.
—Darwin E. Ware, Atlantic Monthly for August.

THE COLUMBIAN CATHOLIC SUMMER SCHOOL.

BY AUBERTINE WOODWARD MOORE.

The Church of Rome has evidently decided that the exigencies of the time require her to gratify the craving of her American people in all walks of life for instruction on the burning questions agitating the religious, social, and literary world. This is emphasized in the Catholic Summer School movement inaugurated in 1892, and called by the president of the Eastern branch, Rev. Thomas J. Conaty, "the crystallization of the idea of higher education among the masses." The Columbian Catholic Summer School now holding its first session in Madison, Wis., is the Western and, in many respects, the most important branch of this movement. Like the parent effort, it has been organized through the combined energies and deliberations of eminent clergy and laymen of the Church. It has been blessed by high ecclesiastical dignitaries,—indeed, by the Holy Father himself. A university town has been chosen for its home; and, as frankly announced in the circular, it has been resolved to build the church policy in America on as solid a foundation as that of university or college. The impartial observer who has been led by a spirit of inquiry to attend the lectures of the Columbian School at the Fuller Opera House cannot fail to have been surprised at some of the statements he has heard. "Holy Mother Church," the audience has been told, is the "Mother of Progress"; and, conscious of her "supernal mission to guide all knowledge into properly authorized channels," she stands calmly by, in her magnificent dignity, while men blunder through the mazes of so-called modern science, until the time is ripe for the world to receive some new truth careful investigation has brought to light. She then graciously invests that truth with the authority she alone can give.

Rev. J. A. Zahm, in his learned lectures on "Science and Dogma," aroused much interest by the liberality of his views and by his sweeping claims for his Church. She had never been opposed to true science, he said,—only to what was false. Whatever is uncertain she examines, and what proves to conflict with religious truth she rejects. Theistic evolution, he said, admitting the existence of God and development under his providence, was accepted by some of the most learned Fathers of the Church fifteen centuries ago. He did not think of maintaining, however, he continued, that the doctors of the early Church taught evolution in the sense in which it is now understood, for the reason that its formulation in a theory in its present form was impossible before men of science had in their possession the accumulated results of the research of these present times. Having thoroughly examined into it, the Church had fully indorsed the theory of to-day; and, under her wise guidance, the people would find that belief in evolution was not incompatible with belief in her own divine truth.

The impartial visitor to the school, who was brought up under Quaker influence, has found it difficult, in listening to these and other lectures at the Columbian School, to resist the inner voice that bade him inquire why the Church has usually waited for this valuable research to be made by those who do not live beneath the shadow of her wing, and why she delays spreading new truth broadcast until there is danger of this being sought elsewhere by her aspiring children, if she will not vouchsafe it to them.

In the lectures on science, literature, history, ethics, and dogma, alike, it has been made clear how fully the Church realizes that the world moves, and that she must be on the alert if she would not lose her vantage-ground. Various speakers have made the most remarkable claims; but they have all manifested a desire to prove how broad and liberal the Catholic Church is, and how wide-spread her influence. Prof. Maurice F. Egan of the Notre Dame University, Indiana, in his literary lectures maintained that all that was noble and good in the literature of the Christian era was due to Catholic influence; and he calmly claimed for the Catholic Church even Tennyson and our own Longfellow, because at their best they gave evidence of Catholic beauty. He took pains to have it understood that he meant the Catholic Church whose seat is at Rome.

Another lecturer reminded his audience how that "friend of education, Holy Mother Church," was the founder of vast institutions of learning in the great European centres, and described the tender relations that existed between these early seats of knowledge and the Holy Father at Rome. A touching account was given of how quickly all perplexities were ended in the days when papal authority guided science, because God's viceregent on earth alone had authority to settle mooted questions.

Here the outsider cannot help thinking how much simpler it would have been for his holiness to promulgate the truth before the dispute arose. It is certainly remarkable how gracefully this infallible Church places the stamp of approval on the intellectual achievements of those who are not numbered among her children. It seems almost equal to a confession on her part that, however great may have been the learning of her own children, the subjection under which they have been held has cramped their originality and all those powers that go to make progress.

That the Church believes in teaching her children submission the learned lecturers of the Columbian Catholic Summer School have not attempted to conceal. One eloquent divine declared that the conscience could alone be "secured against coercion, as well as against its own possible errors," by placing it in the hands of the pope. The prime demand in our land, and in all other lands, he said, was obedience to law and established authority; and no law, no authority, should be allowed to conflict with the supremacy of the Church.

It has been plainly stated at the school that all our modern universities are tainted with infidelity. It has also been plainly stated that "Holy Mother Church" threw her mantle with that "gentle firmness she so well knows how to use" over those institutions of learning that during the Renaissance became tainted with infidelity, and drew them back into the fold.

Does she wish to throw her mantle over our American institutions of learning? Apparently so. Will she be able to do this? We think not. Nor is it likely she can ever gain control of our institutions of State. Let us be free from any such fear, and be glad that she is increasing the facilities for higher education in her own institutions of learning. It is a splendid sign of the times that she feels the need of endeavoring to keep pace with the higher education of the day. The Church that can embrace the doctrine of evolution when necessary can accept other decrees of progress when the time is ripe.

The Columbian Catholic Summer School has come to Madison to stay. Its session this year lasts from July 14 to August 4. The attendance is large, and represents citizens of this State and several other States. Bishop Messmer of Green Bay, the genial, scholarly, and enthusiastic president of the school, has engaged the Fuller Opera House for a six weeks' session next summer. It is said that before long grounds will be purchased for a permanent location.

FROM LONDON.

The political situation is purely partisan. It is good for nothing, bad for much, flat, timid, and colorless. The main endeavor is not to find a right way for all people living upon these little islands, but how to secure for our party the majority vote. The right way is quite evident, but how to try all the others first is the game. So the constant political seesaw. Somebody said, "Political reform does no more than knock a few rascals down, that another set of scamps may step up." But such a saying is not polite. No gentleman would think of saying it,—any more than he would of declaring the most pious a "generation of vipers." The followers of Jesus must be more discreet than their Lord, and instead of the single eye must see how too close an adherence to the Golden Rule is likely to affect ballots. Englishmen in large numbers cared more for their Grand Old Man than for Home Rule for Ireland; and, now that he is party inspirer and leader no more, Home Rule is laid upon the shelf. It cannot win English suffrages or be a rallying cry. The recent action of the Irish themselves in regard to a statue for Cromwell has decidedly injured the prospects of a free hand for Ireland. It is quite clear that the Irishman is not a politician. This may be to his praise. He speaks as he is moved, and not always cautiously or advisedly. To himself his speech is pure because passionate. This Oliver was a somewhat savage surgeon over there in Ireland, certainly. But, then, he was a man with the manners of his century. For that the Irishman cannot forgive him. He had the additional misfortune of being English. No favor can be shown him! The thoroughbred Irishman forgets the result upon himself of this temper. He forgets, or does not care, that with what measure he metes it will be measured to him again. Home Rule has received a blow from its chief representatives. And now the Liberal government has gone. The Tory is at the helm. Before this reaches you we shall know by what majority the country approves of his crew. Most likely Liberalism, in its official capacity, is about to have an enforced rest,—a rest sure to be full of restlessness. The Grand Old Man's voice is still heard in the land, urging his old request for Ireland; and there are those who heed him. But the recognized new man of the party rallies around another cry,—"Down with the Lords!" The prospects for both old man and new are remote.

The death of Mr. Huxley leaves a great void. So much bravery, fidelity to the spirit of truth, so much virility and single-mindedness of purpose, are not common in any time or nation. His work will live, but all England will miss him. Yet how little has been said of him! With the pious world he was not popular, and ecclesiastics do not praise him. Even the English press takes off its hat chiefly to the men of the traditions. Are they not its patrons? A much less notable man might have received from it more appreciation and more outward praise,—not that these have been lacking, save when we compare the volume and the style in which much inferior men are written up. A friend who attended Huxley's funeral was surprised at the fewness of those who attended, and distressed at the perfunctoriness of the whole service. But, then, our friend did not realize that a funeral is a very unimportant thing in England,—that it seldom is an expression of the same feelings it calls forth in America. An Englishman gets himself into his quiet place as simply and unobservedly as he may. Nothing of a display is consonant with his post-mortem desire. He would rather not die than have a showy and demonstrative American funeral. It is a mere matter of taste, and the perfunctoriness of the service is a safeguard against a flood of gushing appreciation and sentimentality. Englishmen often ask us Americans, "What becomes of all the sinners in America?" Judging from American obituaries, they conclude that only the good die over there. So cold, perfunctory, and matter of every day was the service at Huxley's funeral that my friend thought it read by the clerk of the cemetery, who perhaps runs through it officially a dozen times a day. But the next morning I noticed that the reader was no less distinguished a clergyman than Lewell Davies. Huxley was no enemy to religion, but to religious lies insisted upon as foundations of faith.

The Cornell crew did not cover themselves with glory, to say the least, in the eyes of Englishmen at Henley the other day. They seem to have succeeded in turning what may have been their misfortune into their fault. They heard the word "Go!" and they went. Though none followed, they continued to go, and of course came to the goal. There was no contest, no victory. The opportunity was offered them for a fair trial of speed with the crew of the "Leander"; but their wind was probably spent, and they declined. Whether the crew of the "Leander" blundered or bungled, or was deaf or panic-stricken in presence of so much American briskness and dash, is not very clear. The only thing clear is that it did not start. For the repute of Cornell it is greatly to be regretted that, seeing this, they did not go back, and insist upon a fair start and a real contest. When they were beaten out and out the next day, great was the rejoicing over their worsting. Not to win anyhow, but to win honorably in a real contest, Englishmen will, and rightly, insist upon.

At this point my letter switches off from London to the English lakes. Last Sunday, July 14, I preached in the well-endowed Unitarian house of worship in Kendal. One must record that the house is very good, that the one singer of the morning service was very good, but that the number of worshippers was such as one would not care to see in print. Tell it not in Gath! True, the shepherd of these Kendal sheep is off upon his holiday; and the story goes that there the question was put, "If our minister has a holiday, why shouldn't we have one, too?" This question is more significant than at first it seems. The nominal Unitarians do not, as a rule, enjoy worship. They do not lean upon it, do not feel its worth to themselves, do not cultivate or care for it. It is a proper thing, of course, and has to be kept up to still the orthodox and the avenger. But it is something of a burden and a bore. We want a holiday from the house of worship, and have the habit of taking one upon the slightest pretext. It is humiliating to reflect upon the fewness of the worshippers in our London places of worship, with just two or three exceptions. What will the end of this state of things be? Probably no branch of the Christian vine is more likely to be "withered," or is in such sore need of severe pruning, of spiritual revival, discipline, and reform, as this which calls itself Unitarian. The right side of critical and theological argument is something satisfactory, and so is the financial spurt that puts an extra sum at the disposal of our central associations. But the church that builds chiefly upon these may puff up; it cannot edify. It neither serves nor saves; and the sooner we all become aware of this, the better for us, our offspring, and the communities wherein we ought to be eminent, not for the least possible amount of spiritual life, but for a larger, fuller, more joyous abandon to it. Who shall deliver us from the body of this death? We can be redeemed from our present estate,—the curse of the law" of our own denominational conventions, narrownesses, and conceits.

But let me escape from this pestilent heresy to the charm of Windermere, Rydal Water, Grasmere, and all these lovely hills. Let me jot down a few lines about the Home Colony at Browhead and Starnthwaite Mill, concerning which I wrote last year from this same region. The idea of the Home Colonization Society is to put men who will work, but who, for some cause, are out of the usual grooves of labor, upon land that needs working, and to doing things that need to be done,—sawing logs, grinding grain, raising stock, etc. It believes that such men can earn their own livelihood, and not lean upon either private or public charity. Thus far, despite lack of money and the initial cost of every start, the experiment seems to me a most gratifying and promising success. Both upon the farm and at the mill all goes well. At the farm the men seem happy, industrious, and interested in what they have to do. In a tramp of some miles with three of them I elicited ample evidence of their belief that this, for them, was the happiest providence of life. They were full of hope, good cheer, and self-respect. At the mill I found ten men, ages ranging from nineteen to sixty, perhaps. One of them interested me beyond all telling. I have known many literary and even moral admirers of Tolstoi. Never before had I met with an ardent and consistent disciple, a spiritual child of Tolstoi. Here he was,—an educated, gentlemanly fellow, of some thirty years or a little more, belonging to a family of some wealth, and once a captain in the army; a quiet, thoughtful, pleasant, but firm countenance. You feel that here is a man not likely to trifle with himself, and one who has himself perfectly in hand. He has renounced the world, not in bitterness, but in the sweet and strong conviction that renunciation alone is right. He has entirely given up his claim to his share in the family inheritance. He believes "Blessed are the poor," and that we are not to creep out of that beatitude by adding "in spirit." He believes that one ought to work with his own hands for whatever he has. He thinks of the whole social organism as Tolstoi thinks. And he is consistent with what he thinks and believes. He is not communicative, has no vestige of spiritual vanity in word or action. I left him with a reverence such as the true man, once called saint, compels. If there are many of that make in these times, there are glad tidings for our old earth and its peoples yet. The Home Colony, under such spirits to tone and guide it, would, it seems to me, become an eminent centre of light and leading; a refuge for many an earnest spirit reacting from the unsatisfactoriness and cruelty of the Mammon-driven world. It would also say to honest but outwitted and disheartened men as the Master is reported to have said, "Come unto me." Here for your labor ye shall have bread, for your treatment you shall have whatever true brotherliness can do or give. In that "ye shall find rest for your souls." As I sat at the Colony's common table, where all partook of the same food and where all were baptized into the human spirit, I realized that it was a communion service more touching far, and more genuinely Christian, than the ceremonial one of the churches. Here was no posturing and fleeting sentimentality. Consciously or not, this meal was in memory of our common Master; and he was very present in that midst. My anxiety for the Home Colonization Society is almost entirely the financial one. If only its founder were as faithful to the art of begging as Gen. Booth, he would accomplish more for the true spiritual riches. So good an undertaking ought not to be allowed to suffer for lack of unrighteous Mammon in a land of such enormous wealth. S. F.

TEMPERANCE AND POLITICS IN ENGLAND.

BY WILLIAM H. LYON.

The Liberal party in England, the party of Gladstone, is undergoing a very severe disaster. Every day brings tidings of fresh defeats in the new elections. Sir William Harcourt himself, the Liberal leader in the last House of Commons, though representing Derby, one of the chief strongholds of the party, has been unseated; and three others of the late cabinet have met the same fate. Of the 58 members from London, only 8 will be Liberal; and even Manchester, so often the leader in reforms, is no longer faithful to her old love. When I write, the party which had a majority, though a small and uncertain one, in the late Parliament, has only 101 (even including Parnellites) out of 371.

Several hopeful causes suffer with the defeat of the party which was their champion. Home Rule for Ireland has received a serious, perhaps a fatal blow. The disestablishment of the Welsh Church must at least wait. Armenia is discouraged, knowing the coolness of Lord Salisbury toward her; and already the sultan has stiffened his back against the intervening Powers. The House of Lords is freed from fear of a hostile majority in the popular body, which had threatened to take away its very life. But most decisive of all is the blow at the "Local Veto Bill." This provides for what we should call "local option" as to the means of dealing with the liquor traffic. It proposes to enact no general law, but only to give each town or city the power to take what attitude it chooses toward the public-house, license, prohibition, or inaction. It was brought forward by Sir William Harcourt himself, and adopted as a party issue, not only by the temperance organizations, but by the Liberals as a whole. Unfortunately, little or no discussion was possible before the ministry felt obliged to resign; and the Conservatives have persuaded the populace that it means practical prohibition everywhere, depriving the publican of his business without compensation and the workingman of his beer and gin. There is little doubt that on this point, mainly, the Liberal party was wrecked.

Many interests were roused against the bill. First, there is the great power of the brewers and distillers. The business of the latter is decreasing. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in his last budget, or financial scheme for the ensuing year, stated that the use of brandy had declined 31 per cent. in fifteen years, though the population had increased 13 per cent.; and that the tax on rum had been for the last year unexpectedly small, though, "owing to the extraordinary severity of the weather in February, the receipts (for taxes only) rose suddenly to an excess of $500,000. But," added the Chancellor, "whatever other interests and manufactures may be suffering from depression, the brewing trade is not among the number." On the contrary, the tax of sixpence a barrel upon beer had brought into the national treasury $2,825,000 more than on the previous year. This is a business worth defending against the possibilities of local option; and great has been the activity of the brewer and of his agent, the publican. The Conservative journals are not proud of these allies, however, and barely mention them in their comments upon the victory. But the Derby correspondent of the Standard, the organ of the Conservative party, thus frankly explains how that Liberal stronghold was carried: "Local veto was the main issue. Neither Home Rule nor the House of Lords was heard much of in the contest. There are about five hundred licensed victuallers and beerhouse-keepers in the town, and the whole of their influence was thrown upon the side of the Conservative candidate."

The second interest arrayed against the bill is the agricultural,—the farmer that raises the barley, that makes the malt, that makes the beer, that flows in the house where Jack drinks. The agricultural regions have suffered too much already to give up any more business without a struggle.

Then, of course, there is the class that drinks the beer and means to keep on drinking it. This includes the majority of Englishmen, and a very thirsty majority it is. It includes multitudes of women also, and not a few children. As I went down Hampstead Street (and Hampstead is one of the best of the London suburbs), I caught a glimpse, through the swinging bar-room door, of a striking domestic picture,—the father holding a little girl by one hand and offering with the other a glass of ale to his wife, who held in her arm a nursing baby. I was on my way to a drug-store to get some alcohol to heat milk for my baby, but I found that I could not have it without the prescription of a known physician.

The right of an Englishman to his beer is as inalienable as any right claimed in our Declaration of Independence. It is food and drink to him. Far back in mediæval history Prof. Ashley has lately showed us the peasant farmer with his bread and beer equally dear to him. In the chapter of old St. Paul's Cathedral one of the canons was distinctly charged with the duty of brewing the ale for his brethren, and all the old houses had great set kettles in which the clothes were boiled and the family ale prepared,—not at the same time, however; for that would have hurt the ale. All through the cities and towns the best-lighted and most attractive places along the streets are the public houses, where ale flows in a perpetual stream, except perhaps on Sunday forenoons. The very paupers in the work-houses are supplied with $250,000 worth of beer every year. The average annual expenditure for drink in the kingdom is about $625,000,000, of which $150,000,000 goes to the government in duties. Evidently, then, a great army of drinkers re-enforce the brewers; and the Veto Bill touched also the tax-payer in a tender spot.

Mr. Chamberlain appealed to all three of these interests in his speech at Stratford-on-Avon last evening. "That measure," he said of the Local Veto Bill, "would affect one of the industries on the success of which agriculture largely depended; for, undoubtedly, whatever else the public house might be, it was, indirectly, one of the very best customers of the farmer. To close the public houses would be an injustice, in the first place, to the publicans, who would be deprived of their livelihood through no fault of their own. It would be a gross injustice to the workingmen of the parish, to whom a moderate indulgence in drink was a pleasure, a comfort, and might be a necessity, but who would be deprived because there was in the community a small minority that could not take care of itself. . . . Let them treat him [the drunkard], undoubtedly, with penal discipline; but, for Heaven's sake, let them not interfere with the vast majority of decent, honest, sober, respectable working people, who had just as much right to a glass of beer when they wanted it in a public house as he had to a glass of wine when he wanted it out of his own cellar." [Cheers and "Hear, hear!"]

This speech of Mr. Chamberlain represents, probably, the thoughts of a majority of the English people, and has a great deal of truth in it,—especially in the closing sentence. The English people are a far more temperate nation to-day than ever before, though they drink more beer. I was on Hampstead Heath Whit-Monday, a "bank holiday," when a crowd estimated to number from fifty to seventy thousand of the lower classes were having their outing; and I saw not a single person drunk. On a previous holiday there I was told not a single arrest had been made. I sat with the members of one of the great city guilds at their magnificent monthly dinner (the guild spends annually $35,000 on its dinners,—mainly upon wines), and saw no man conspicuously the worse for what he drank. At both ends of the social scale, and all the way up or down, there has been a great widening of the gulf between drinking and drunken.

Yet it is manifestly unfair in the Conservative orators to represent the Local Veto Bill as an attempt to deprive the workingman of his beer, and thus to interfere with his liberty. It restores him his liberty. It releases the country town or village from the tyranny of the cities, and gives it the power to deal with the traffic according as its own needs require, and not according to the different conditions of city life. Total prohibition may find little favor, but the different modes of license, including the Gothenburg system, which in essence is advocated by the Bishop of Chester and others of earnest purpose, admit of a wide choice, according to the wishes or the necessities of each parish or county. It is a sad sight to see a great party, with all its plans of reform, washed out of office by this flood of beer, and sadder still to see, as the Daily News has well put it, "parson and publican" walking arm in arm to the polls, the defender of the Church and the defender of unlimited beer, the champions of the spirit and of spirits, passing the loving-cup at the feast of triumph. Truly, "politics makes strange bedfellows." But every good cause which is defeated to-day may say with Crispi, "My name is to-morrow."

REPORT OF THE SUPERINTENDENT OF THE NEW ENGLAND STATES.

To the Directors of the American Unitarian Association:—

Of the four hundred and fifty-four churches which constitute the Unitarian denomination in America, two hundred and sixty are in New England. This fact makes applicable to me in an especial manner your counsel, frequently given the past two years, first to strengthen the churches already in existence. And it is with pleasure I report that efforts in this direction have met with good success. Most of the churches are in excellent condition, their members in increasing numbers meeting together for worship, and everywhere organizing more efficiently for practical work and missionary enterprise. Indeed, there is now in all New England but one society having a meeting-house which has not held religious services this past year. The ancient church in Sudbury has this unenviable distinction. We have reason for thinking, however, that the quiescence of the society covers, but hardly conceals, a growing determination and effort to open the meeting-house for services the year round.

There are in the Year Book the names of several societies which are annually set down as without pastors. Some of these are mere preaching stations of the past, with no society or meeting-house or present hope of actuality. Hanover, N.H., and Middlebury, Vt., are types. A few others have a house of worship and the remnant of a society. The extent of their activity is to hold services throughout the summer. One society of this class has fallen upon evil days, and is likely to be ended summarily. Many of the pew-holders of the meeting-house occupied by the First Unitarian Society of Newport, N.H., successfully petitioned for the sale of the building. Over $6,000 was realized. Your superintendent is striving to get this amount converted into a fund for the erection in Newport of a church for liberal Christian worship, if within a reasonable time there shall be a demand for it. Much hope of such demand is cherished, as the town is growing; but difficulty is experienced in inducing some pew-holders to relinquish their share of the spoils.

The society in Farmington, Me., a year ago was hardly more than a name: to-day it is one of the most active and promising societies in the State. Encouragement to open the doors of the church once more was given in the increase of liberal sentiment in the town, and in the children of the older Unitarians coming to years of responsibility and to a desire for their own faith. Rev. W. H. Ramsay followed the superintendent to keep up the interest till a minister could be found who would settle in Farmington and carry on the work successfully. But Mr. Ramsay so took the hearts of the people that they would consider no other person for pastor; and, in response to their appeal, the Association joined with them to secure him for a period of at least two years. The wisdom of placing such a man as Mr. Ramsay in an outpost like Farmington is shown in increasing interest in religion in that and neighboring communities. Already Mr. Ramsay has held services in a union church near by, and "let in more light than they have witnessed for many years."

Similar work is being done by Rev. J. A. Bevington in Barnstable and in other towns and villages on "the Cape." He has fairly doubled the strength of his own church, holds regular services in Barnstable jail, and has established a new preaching station in Wareham. What better use of its means can the Association make than to aid in keeping such able and earnest men as these in the old and decreasing rural communities of New England? The better traditions of the towns are thus preserved; and the disintegrating elements, so much dreaded in our day, are resisted.

Rochester, N.H., seemed at one time to present no other claim to your consideration than its need of rational religion. There were many in the town who would attend none of the evangelical churches, but there was no encouraging nucleus of loyal Unitarians. Indeed, after several years of missionary effort, the total strength exhibited twelve months ago was about twelve families and an income of $200. All that the minister received came from the Association. During the year, however, a neat church has been built and the twelve families have increased to seventy. Rev. W. H. Walbridge is greeted at both services by congregations numbering over one hundred, and the prospect is that the church will continue to prosper and soon become independent.

Although, on account of the financial depression, you were constrained not to encourage new movements, several have sprung up almost of their own accord. The Unitarians and Universalists of Melrose Highlands united in a Liberal Christian Union, and sought the advice of your superintendent. He commended to them the services of Mr. James H. Haworth of the Meadville Theological School, whose able teaching and tact have led the society on to a condition which promises much for the ensuing year. At Newton Highlands a little society, started by Rev. C. A. Allen, has been carried forward by students from the Cambridge Divinity School. Rev. L. D. Cochrane of Ellsworth, Me., has continued services at Bar Harbor during the winter with such success that the society is eager to settle and support a minister of its own. But it is in Willimantic, Conn., that the strongest movement for the establishment of a Unitarian church has manifested itself. A few months ago Rev. S. R. Free, a former pastor of the Trinitarian Congregational church in that city, was summoned to it from Chattanooga to attend a funeral service. Before he went away, he preached in the opera house; and the people came in such numbers to hear him, and so much interest was shown in liberal religion that the superintendent immediately encouraged preaching every Sunday. With the assistance of Rev. Alfred Free, services were held regularly in the opera house; and the request was made to the Southern superintendent to release Rev. S. R. Free for work in the new field. Mr. Free has already arrived in Willimantic, and has been welcomed by large numbers of his former townsmen. In spite of the depressing effect of two bank failures, the movement is growing; and steps are being taken to secure a house of worship.

The addition of New Brunswick to the department of New England, just at the time when the church in St. John was passing through the perplexities connected with the building of its edifice, increased in no slight degree the responsibility and expense for this field. But the worst has been experienced; and it now seems clear that, when a successor to Dr. MacDougall is secured, a strong society will be gathered in the new building.

It is a curious comment upon the present state of religion that the only church we have lost in these recent years in New England should be lost through the triumph of our principles and spirit. The Unitarian society in Brunswick, Me., has closed its doors for an indefinite time, persuaded that it has no special mission in comparison with the work done by the Trinitarian Congregational church "on the hill." In that church the preaching is as rational and sweet as it was in our own. Unitarians are satisfied with it; and now, although our own beautiful little church is closed, our ideas continue to be promulgated, and with no expense to the Association.

Of the forty-four churches in New England aided by the Association last year, fifteen are old churches and twenty-nine are new. The policy of gradually reducing the amounts appropriated is pursued, and the expectation is that five new and two old churches will be brought the coming year to a state of independence.

The Boston Benevolent Fraternity of Churches under its extended charter is enabled to take charge of churches heretofore cared for by the Association, and to develop missionary fields heretofore considered by your superintendent. The church in Chelsea in its need applied to the Fraternity successfully for aid; and in behalf of the Fraternity its president, Rev. E. A. Horton, has assumed responsibility for church extension in Brookline. It is understood to be the aim of the Fraternity to have supervision of all the churches and territory included in the Suffolk Conference. This is an important extension of the scope of its activities, and calls for such action on the part of the Fraternity and the Association as shall secure, in season to prevent overlapping of energies, a plain delimitation of the missionary fields of each. It may not be out of place to state here that Christ Church in Longwood, Brookline, independent both of the Association and Fraternity, is growing in strength under the devoted and patient ministry of Rev. C. D. Bradlee, D.D. Lately a number of helpful families have connected themselves with the church, and the prospects for the coming year are more hopeful than at any time since the church was opened for services.

A word or two remains to be said regarding the supply of vacant pulpits, a work carried on by the superintendent and the "Committee on Vacant Pastorates and Ministerial Settlement," appointed by the Ministerial Union and the Ministers' League for Practical Work. All the churches in New England make use of this instrumentality for securing a new pastor, but some of the ministers can hardly restrain their individuality enough to come into line with the great majority of their brother ministers. They are impelled to commend themselves or friends to church committees. As the church committees almost invariably refer all letters back to the superintendent, it does not seem as though, for the good of all, it would be hard to surrender the glorious privilege of acting independently. In spite of the friction incident to the establishment of new methods, the bureau has served churches and ministers well. It has brought order out of the chaos of candidating, and prevented unworthy persons forcing themselves into our ministry through the doors of the churches. Since it began operations, it has aided in the settlement of over eighty ministers, with an average of something under seven persons heard in a pulpit. The wearisome procession of candidates, many of them unsuited to the churches through which they were passing, is being shortened to the few men fit for the place.

CHRISTIAN AND RELIGIOUS UNITY.

"BROTHERHOOD DAY" AT THE WEIRS.

BY A. JUDSON RICH.

This was a red-letter day in the history of the Grove Meeting enterprise, the annual Unitarian Mecca. For two hours and a half the pentecostal season lasted. Just such a meeting of all sects and denominations had never been in grove or temple on this planet, save once at the late World's Fair; and yet the only feeling was why could this not have taken place earlier and oftener. The presence of a Catholic priest, armed with authority from his vicar-general to stand before assembled clerical representatives of Protestant churches and offer his contribution, made the occasion a marked event in New England ecclesiastical matters. The spirit of love and fraternity ruled all hearts, and the tide of feeling and fellowship swelled and throbbed with tender and prophetic glow. These sects and churches were present by able representatives,—Catholic, Protestant, Baptist, Congregationalist, Shaker, Unitarian, Methodist, Free Baptist; and each spoke on the one subject of "Unity" and the things which unite, while each yielded not the special name or creed, but clasped hands and blended hearts to help fulfil the prayer of the "Man of men," that they all might be one.

Who were the speakers, and what was the subject? The subject was "Christian and Religious Unity." The speakers were Rev. E. Isidor Lindh (Baptist), Rev. Peter A. McKenna, D.D. (Catholic), Rev. William J. Batt (Orthodox Congregationalist), Rev. A. P. Putnam, D.D. (Unitarian), Sister Wilson (Shakeress), Rev. D. E. Little (Methodist), Rev. Lewis Malvern (Free Baptist),—the two latter conducting the devotional services,—and Rev. A. J. Rich (Unitarian), who had arranged the programme, and who presided at the meeting, making the opening address.

First, hymn, Scripture, and prayer, all in the spirit of the occasion, and preparing the minds of the eager audience to hear the earnest and prophetic words of faith, hope, and love break from lips unaccustomed to the mingling of so many hearts and tongues in a common chorus, as in Peter's pentecostal day. Mr. Lindh led off with a fine paper on "Interdenominationalism and its Benefits." He has just left his Baptist pastorate in West Acton, Mass., and taken up his residence in Cambridge, where he is to pursue his studies in the Semitic languages and in Assyriology and Egyptology, with a view to a professorship in the university. His paper was a scholarly production, and a broad treatment of a subject which seemed to fill his heart. It lifted all lines among the sects, and welcomed all religions, churches, and creeds to united work and friendly co-operation in the work of Christian endeavor. While not believing that the time for church unity had come as yet, but might and should some day, he would have all band themselves together in bringing in the kingdom of God. The paper had been prepared for and read at the late Ayer Conference, before the United Religious Association, which made it the true word for the Brotherhood Weirs meeting. He spoke of the effect of the first Ayer meeting in January, and how it touched him, even to tears, after returning to his home.

Then was introduced Father McKenna, pastor at Marlboro, Mass., for a quarter of a century. He had been invited to speak at the Ayer meeting by the president of this meeting; and he yielded, after long correspondence and consulting the vicar-general of his Church. He also came to this meeting, and was the particular star of the occasion. A large man, of impressive presence and of manifest intellectual power and religious instinct, before uttering a word he was met with applause, and listened to with unmeasured delight by an audience composed of United States senators, Congressmen, governors, and other high officials, and choice people from all over New England. He spoke without a written word; and for just thirty minutes, the time assigned him, he held his hearers by a spell which made every one enthusiastic at the speaker's outbursts of eloquence, wit, wisdom, and sound Americanism. And, when he sat down, a storm of applause followed; for every sentence was packed with truth and adorned with the beauty of a fine and finished rhetoric, which showed him to be a most delightful and persuasive orator.

Among other things Rev. Father McKenna said: "It is the age of reform. Why not have religious reform in the sense in which the United Religious Association propose to have it,—reform in methods of work? Now we are seeking for social reform on Christian lines. Hence the need of union. What are the Christian lines of social reform? They can be stated in three propositions: first, all men are created equal; second, social inequality, nevertheless, is sure to arise from the very nature of things; third, Christian charity, love of fellow-men, must then display its power in manifold ways to bridge the gulf which social inequality creates.

"I am convinced that the United Religious Association has a great work before it, and work that is needed. This union already at Ayer, through the attitude of the able, learned, thoughtful men of the clergy there assembled, gave a glimpse of the possibilities for good which it holds within itself, and that 'its ways are ways of pleasantness, and all its paths are peace.' The Christian Church of New England has a message to deliver to the people, and it has not yet for various causes been able to deliver it with all the pentecostal power which it possesses. The outlines of the grand work have unfortunately been lost sight of in the miserable, petty details and unfortunate misunderstandings begotten of doctrinal division, and consequent loss of power. Division always means weakness. When the American people won independence and liberty, they wished to win it for all mankind; and all mankind owes a debt to the American republic. Therefore, all should hasten to repay the debt and return the gift, whatever be the form of one's religious belief. New England is not as profoundly religious as it was fifty years ago. We wish to come to her rescue by our United Religious Association. The real American heart is of a strong religious nature, and recoils with horror from unbelief. Every man who is a man holds certain truths to be incontestable, believes in some higher and better state than the present. He hopes to enjoy that state. This is not the day of political problems. The American people have solved this problem of the day. The era of social questions demands a solution. The evident want of interest among thousands concerning the eternal problems of human life and religious destiny shows but too plainly the need of the united religious efforts of men standing on some common platform, and, in their eagerness to save the masses of men, willing to forget doctrinal difference. American citizenship, in its highest, finest, noblest sense, is the need of the hour. The development of political corruption in our cities proves the statement.

"Principles are needed, grounded on Christian belief, to rightly solve the social, legislative, political problems that are constantly confronting the citizens for solution. Otherwise, government, like the Founder of the Christian religion, is in constant danger of being sacrificed on the altar of expediency. May the United Association ring out with a clarion call for this new crusade!"

Even more pronounced and emphatic was the speaker on the subject of the American school system, the palladium of the American government, and the fortress no right-minded citizen could have the heart or the unwisdom to storm or assail. He declared that he never antagonized the public schools in all his quarter-century of pastoral work in the heart of Massachusetts. Such utterances by a Catholic priest of influence, authorized to speak by highest church authority, are significant in these times of attempts at sectarian strife by even a few who mean to be patriotic, even though through contention, but whose over-zeal, untempered by knowledge and soberness, have made a patient public suspect that they are—perhaps unconsciously—un-American. Christian unity, religious unity, mean brotherhood, unity in all possible relations of life. If we cannot yet have church unity,—Catholic, Anglican, and Greek Church brought back into one fold,—we can have the next best thing,—these three branches co-operating for righteousness, working for human welfare and the highest good of man.

Rev. Mr. Batt, the efficient and great-hearted chaplain of the Concord (Mass.) Reformatory for the past ten years, followed the silver-tongued Catholic, in a long and excellent address, depicting the two Ayer gatherings and organization, the United Religious Association, and telling the story of the evangelical minister (presumably himself) calling upon a Catholic priest, and in a friendly way talking over the pros and cons touching a closer affiliation between them, as the resident clergy of the town, in all fellowship and work, and in every interest affecting society and the well-being of the people, the result of which was that ever afterward hand in hand they wrought and heart to heart they toiled and lived in the community,—a high example, surely, for other clergymen to follow. He commended the energy of that society which, while honestly contending for American protection, sometimes fell into the mistake of antagonizing the religion of a certain class, and thought that all whose aim is to walk and work in love together with all denominations and sects should be equally in earnest and devoted. He pleaded for the united action of all denominations to do more to create and encourage good citizenship, and to inspire men with manliness, breadth, and the spirit of co-operation with all good people and good organizations and institutions. He also sets an example of how this can be done, and does not hesitate, where he knows his man, to exchange with so-called liberals, or to co-operate with good people in any work or aim for the elevation of humanity or the good of the community or the happiness of the people.

The Shakeress followed the Congregationalist. Sister Wilson, who represented this sect, gave a most beautiful address, full of spiritual fervor, clear in thought, earnest in manner, and thoroughly consecrated to her religion, which includes the graces of patience, self-sacrifice, the subduing of the senses, and purity of life. Her face, looking out of her plain straw bonnet, trimmed with black lace, had the glow and sparkle of a soul behind it illuminated by the Spirit, and chastened with hard ways of material life. She was in perfect harmony with the spirit of the meeting, and wished her sect to be considered members of the United Religious Association.

Rev. Dr. A. P. Putnam of Concord, Mass., made the closing address, which burned and glowed with the pure flame of religious thought and spiritual illumination, which in turn kindled all our hearts, and seemed to fill the room with the aroma of goodness and our eyes with the moisture of a tenderness most touching; and we were lifted in our feelings, and all hearts seemed to flow into each other, and the pentecostal hour had come, rich with the dew of Hermon and glad with the experience and satisfaction of a faith that made the prayer of Jesus, "that all may be one," just a little nearer fulfilment.

THE UNITARIAN CHURCH AT THE ATLANTA EXPOSITION.

Here is an opportunity, such as may not occur again for thirty years, for us to introduce our Church to the Southern people and their receptive guests. The directors of the Exposition have shown their respect for our church by allotting to it a very eligible space in their Building of Liberal Arts for the purpose of displaying its publications, its apparatus for religious education, and its historic and present position as illustrated by pictures of its churches and their ministers. All this is offered us free of charge, and we owe to such generosity a worthy and attractive addition to the great Exposition. That it will be great and successful nobody who knows Atlanta and the scale on which she has laid out this International Exhibit can doubt.

At its last session in Baltimore the Southern Conference appointed a committee to secure a proper presentation of our Church at this fair. Rev. Messrs. George L. Chaney, J. M. Seaton, R. R. Shippen, George A. Thayer, and C. J. K. Jones are that committee. The Church of Our Father in Atlanta will render all the aid in its power. It has appointed a committee to co-operate with the Conference Committee. Mr. H. M. Currier, 39 Woodward Avenue, Atlanta, Ga., will superintend the erection of the stand and the reception of the contributions sent to the Exhibit. Exposition labels and tags may be obtained from him by those wishing to take advantage of the half-rates offered by the Southern railroad and the express companies. Everything should be sent on or before September 1, as the Exposition opens September 18. The American Unitarian Association, the Sunday School Societies, the theological schools, the National Conference, the Women's Alliance, the Western Conference, are all expected to take active part in this enterprise. Our English brethren have also been invited to send their publications, and the publishers who have printed the books of our leading writers will send select copies.

It is the purpose of the committee to exhibit not only works technically religious,—such as sermons, commentaries, and manuals of devotion and education,—but books of history, philanthropy, poetry, education, fiction, and art, written by Unitarian rian writers. These books will be placed on shelves surmounted by busts of leading Unitarian thinkers and speakers. Pictures of historic churches and ministers will adorn the walls. On tables and counters will be spread the manuals and other aids of religious education, also the photographs of all the living Unitarian ministers who will send them to Mrs. George L. Chaney, Leominster, Mass., on or before August 20. Miss Florence Everett, chairman of the Post-office Mission Committee, is expected to have charge of the exhibit. She will be assisted by members of the Atlanta church.

All persons willing to help in this important enterprise are requested to send word to Rev. George L. Chaney, Leominster, Mass., in August, or Box 643, Atlanta, Ga., in September, what they can do.

Busts of the following-named persons are desired: W. E. Channing, H. W. Bellows, Dr. James Walker, Horace Mann, H. W. Longfellow, and other leading men of our Church.

Pictures of Dr. Freeman, Priestley, J. F. Clarke, Hedge, Martineau, Dewey, Noyes, Parker, Norton, Longfellow, Emerson, Holmes, Lowell, Bryant, Hawthorne, Prescott, Edward Everett, the Adamses, Parkman, Palfrey, Bancroft, Starr King, Furness, the Wares, E. S. Gannett, George William Curtis, S. J. May, W. G. Eliot, the Alcotts, Dorothea Dix, Florence Nightingale, Elizabeth Peabody, and others are especially desired. To prevent duplication, word should be sent to Mr. Chaney before articles are sent in. Everything loaned will be carefully guarded and returned, or disposed of as the lender desires. People not wishing to pack and send separately can send their contributions to the Association Building, 25 Beacon Street, Boston, and they will be forwarded from there. What is done must be done quickly; for the time is short, and the pressure of traffic over the lines to Atlanta will be very great.

Mr. and Mrs. Chaney will be in Atlanta during the Exposition, and will give their personal attention to the Unitarian exhibit. Nowhere else is such a presentation of our Church needed, for nowhere else is that Church so little known as at the South. This Exposition is the providential candlestick in which we must place our candle. It has been under the bushel long enough.

G. L. C.

A FABLE.

A certain man determined to engage in the business of selling merchandise. He rented a spacious and convenient building on the principal street of a busy city, selected his merchandise with care,—some of it good, some less good, and some bad; but he displayed them altogether. He organized a force of skilful salesmen and clerks, hung out some artistic signs, prepared some attractive advertisements for the newspapers, then opened his doors. Buyers came in large numbers. He sold his goods, he increased in wealth, and won for himself the title of "Prosperous Merchant."

MORAL.—Success comes to those that observe the laws that govern the enterprises in which they engage.

ANOTHER FABLE.

A certain man determined to engage in the business of selling merchandise. He rented a small and secure building on a very respectable side street of a busy city. He selected his merchandise with great—yes, even extraordinary—care, choosing only the very best in the market. He laid his goods carefully away in drawers in the inner room of his secure building. He did not organize any force of salesmen or clerks, because he was not sure his goods would be called for. He nailed a small tin sign, with the words "Merchandise for sale within" painted neatly thereon, on the door-post. He did not think it prudent to anticipate his profits by expending his capital or any part of it in advertising, lest it should not prove to be effective. He therefore saved the money that he would have used for that purpose to pay his rent. When he had carefully packed away his excellent stock, he opened his door (he had but one door), and sat down upon the step and waited for customers. Occasionally, some man, who was a stranger in the city and had lost his way, stopped to ask directions about the streets; but his place of business was unknown to the buyers of the class of goods he had in his building. He was unknown to the public generally. Only those in his immediate vicinity knew him at all. He was treated with respect, but not with cordiality, by all in the neighborhood; but the adolescent youth who passed his door daily always referred to him as "the man who was not in it."

MORAL.—No matter how good your wares may be, it will not benefit you unless you organize your business and let people know that you are ready to supply their wants.

The above fables are respectfully dedicated to those who "can't understand why the magnificent truths of Unitarianism do not capture the world."

The Treasurer recognizes the fact that it will be impossible for him to succeed in his work unless he can enlist the sympathy and co-operation of the churches in his work. This sympathy and co-operation can only be obtained through the help of the ministers. It is no doubt true that the main work, in detail, can be done by the laymen, and especially by the laywomen, but not as against the indifference or want of sympathy on the part of the minister. The minister is the head of the church, as he ought to be; and our work as an Association, as the executive missionary and business arm of the denomination, can never be developed to its full capacity until the ministers give it their hearty support among the people in their congregations.

An excellent plan for carrying the above suggestion into practical execution would be for the churches to choose, in any way they might prefer, a person connected with the church—man or woman—to act as the representative of the American Unitarian Association in all matters relating to our missionary work, publications, contributions, and such work as it would not be right to ask the minister to do. This would promote active and cordial relations between this Association and each individual church, with the result that we should have a channel of communication always open and easily and quickly used, without disturbing the minister unnecessarily. For this responsible position the most active, energetic, and zealous worker in the society and in its various activities should be selected,—one that commands the confidence of all, and one whose selection would be heartily approved by the minister. It would be well if this could be done very soon, so that we might have the list ready for use as soon after the churches open as possible.

There are two important fields for missionary work that are open to Unitarians. The first is among those within the Unitarian fold, and the second among those without the Unitarian fold. Unless the work is thoroughly done in the first, it is not likely to succeed in the second. The true missionary spirit among the ministers, among the laymen and laywomen in the churches, will solve our problems for us quicker than any plans that can be devised, no matter how ingenious they may be. There can be no substitute for this spirit. G. W. S.

Religious Intelligence.

REV. DR. MAYO began last Sunday evening a series of vesper services at the Young Men's Christian Union under the general topic, "Our New Teachers." The one last Sunday was on "The Orator," and was a very able address. The rest of the course will be as follows: August 11, "The Journalist"; August 18, "The Teacher"; August 25, "The Preacher"; September 1, "The Novelist"; September 8, "The Scientist"; September 15, "The Social Reformer"; September 22, "The Historian"; September 29, "The Statesman."

THE First Unitarian Church of Manchester, Mass., was organized on Thursday of last week, August 1, at a fully attended meeting held at the house of Mr. Henry S. Drew. By-laws were adopted, and the following officers were elected: Prudential Committee, George Wigglesworth, chairman, Mrs. Stephen N. Bullard, Mrs. Henry S. Drew, Miss Mary F. Bartlett, clerk, George Peirce; trustees of the property, which consists of a handsome little church and a lot of land, Nelson S. Bartlett, Arthur Lincoln, and Dr. Walter Channing. We learn that great interest is manifested in this new society, and good-sized audiences are already attending the service. It is expected that Rev. Dr. Brooke Herford will preach there in September.

BOSTON COMMON.—At 5 P.M., next Sunday, Rev. F. B. Mott of Dorchester and Rev. E. C. Butler of Quincy will be the speakers in the service near the band stand. The help of good singers, scattered through the audience, would be welcomed.

BATH, N.H.—The ladies of the Lend a Hand of All Souls' Church at Bath, N.H., will hold their annual sale for the benefit of the church at the church parlors, August 22, and will give a dinner and supper at the dining-room of All Souls'. The ladies will be grateful for any donations of money or articles from their many kind friends of the past. A large debt makes a heavy burden upon the church, and the ladies are striving to liquidate it. Contributions can be sent to Mrs. Gen. Bedel or Mrs. Sophia Orne Johnson.

LINCOLN, MASS.—During Rev. W. H. Pulsford's vacation it is expected the supplies will be as follows: August 11, Rev. B. R. Bulkeley; August 18, Rev. F. B. Hornbrooke; August 25, Rev. O. J. Fairfield.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE OF UNITARIAN AND OTHER CHRISTIAN CHURCHES.—In order that delegates and others desiring to attend the meetings of the National Conference of Unitarian and Other Christian Churches to be held in Washington, D.C., Oct. 21-24, 1895, may have all the information necessary to guide them in making their plans, the following early announcements are made:—

Arrangements have been made with the hotels in Washington to give the following reduced rates to those attending the Conference: Arlington Hotel, $3.50 per day; Shoreham, $4 per day, $7 for two in one room; Ebbitt House, $3 per day, $2.50 per day on sixth floor; Riggs House, $3 per day; Arno, $3 per day; Willard's Hotel, $3 per day, $2.50 above fourth floor; National Hotel, $2.50 per day; Hotel Raleigh (European plan), rooms $1 per day and upwards; Hotel Normandie, $4 per day, or two persons in one room, $3 per day each. Persons who prefer a boarding-house can obtain good accommodations at prices ranging from $2 per day upward.

By vote of the Council, the headquarters of the Conference will be established at the Arlington Hotel, which, with its fine and spacious parlors, offers exceptionally good accommodations for all the large social gatherings in connection with the meeting of the Conference. Engagements for board and rooms can be made with any of the above-named hotels by writing at any time previous to the meeting of the Conference. It is desirable that these engagements should be made as early as possible, in order that the assignment of rooms may be made in advance, and delay and confusion on the arrival of the guests be thus avoided.

By arrangement with the several passenger committees of the Trunk Line Associations, reduced fares to Washington and return have been secured over all the principal lines of railway. This reduction is on what is called the "certificate plan." For the guidance of those who, in purchasing tickets, desire to avail themselves of the reduction on their return tickets, the following information, from the circular of instructions issued by the Trunk Line Passenger Committee, is given here:—

1. The reduction is fare and a third on the Railroad Committee's certificate.

2. Each person availing of it will pay full first-class fare going to Washington, and get a certificate filled in on one side by the agent of whom the ticket is purchased. Agents at all important stations and coupon-ticket offices are supplied with certificates.

3. Certificates are not kept at all stations. If, however, the ticket agent at a local station is not supplied with certificates and through tickets to Washington, he can inform the delegate of the nearest important station where they can be obtained. In such a case the delegate should purchase a local ticket to such station, and there take up his certificate and through ticket to Washington.

4. Going tickets, in connection with which certificates are issued for return, may be sold only within three days (Sunday excepted) prior to and during the continuance of the Conference meeting, except that, when meetings are held at distant points to which the authorized limit is greater than three days, tickets may be sold before the meeting in accordance with the limits shown in regular tariffs.

5. Deposit your certificate, on the day of your arrival, with the Secretary of the Conference, or the person designated by him to receive certificates, for necessary indorsement and visé of special agent.

6. Certificates are not transferable, and return tickets secured upon certificates are not transferable.

7. On presentation of the certificate, duly filled in on both sides, within three days (Sundays excepted) after the adjournment of the Conference, the ticket agent at Washington will return the holder to starting-point, by the route over which the going journey was made, at one-third the highest limited fare by such route. The return tickets will in all cases be closely limited to continuous passage to destination.

8. No refund of fare will be made on account of any person failing to obtain a certificate.

9. Delegates and others availing of the reduction in fare should present themselves at the offices for certificates and tickets at least thirty minutes before departure of trains.

For any further information please address D. W. MOREHOUSE, Gen'l Sec'y.
104 East 20th Street, New York.

—A MISSION TO JAPAN.—The Salvation Army is preparing for an attack on Japan; and great was the enthusiasm when, at the City Temple on Monday night, the valiant little band of invaders were presented with their colors by Gen. Booth. Looking still more worn and weary than his wont, the general's declaration that he was now quite convalescent and ready for any duty raised a perfect tempest of applause. His picturesque figure was seen to great advantage in the beautiful marble pulpit against a background of scarlet-coated bandmen; and his voice was never more tender than when, holding the flag in his right hand, he waved it over the audience and recalled all the memories of pain and joy that clustered about "this emblem of the Army's triumphs." "I charge you," said he, "to remember that our onward march is over the bloody body of Christ. Let its red remind you of that blood, let its blue speak to you of that perfect righteousness which comes by faith in him, and its yellow be emblematic of the fire of the Holy Ghost. Go, and love the people, love the people; and, if you can't love them, ask for a recall. Take it," he said to Col. Wright; and then, himself retaking it, the general passed it along from one member of the band to another, saying: "Touch it, touch it. If you be unfaithful, it will be a witness against you on earth and in heaven. If you are faithful, I hope you will be buried under it. Be true to God. The eyes of Salvationists are on you. We will all pray for them, won't we?" Then, turning to the audience, he continued, "Those who mean to pray fix bayonets, and say, 'Amen.'" And they said "Amen" in a way that only Salvationists can say it, with right hand upraised, and the first finger pointing upward. The missionaries meanwhile looked over the sea of faces with moistened eyes, and, standing round their new colors, made in their Japanese costumes a singularly attractive group. The women's dresses were of drab alpaca, and the men's of black, with dark red sashes and jerseys; and very becoming they were. The party consists among others of Col. and Mrs. Wright, Capt. Newcombe, a lady from the Church Missionary Society, who goes at her own expense; and others who will join the party from India. The mission had, the general explained, been contemplated a long time; but many things had stood in the way, one of which was money. Now, however, a Californian gentleman had sent £200, Mr. Rich. Cory had given £250, and Mr. T. A. Denny £100. So they were getting along better. It would cost about £500 or £1,000 to start the mission; for they were sending out some of their best officers, and it would never do to go into the back streets.—London Christian World.

Business Notices.

At such a time as this, when there is a demand for office furniture, the announcement in another column of Paine Furniture Company is especially interesting. The patented desk chair which they advertise is the acme of comfort and not at all expensive.

Dr. Lyon's Perfect Tooth Powder
Gives the most perfect satisfaction. It has a world wide reputation. Recommended by dentists.

LADIES' Bicycle Underwear

STERLING UNION SUITS, made of selected Egyptian Cotton, soft, porous, and absorbent. Always perfect fitting, easy and comfortable. Price $2.50 per suit.

STERLING EQUESTRIENNE TIGHTS made with new patent back lap and perfect fitting hips, BALBRIGGAN, $1.38.

BLACK LISLE, $1.50.
SUMMER SILK, $3.50.

Ladies' & Misses' Bathing Suits, Caps, Shoes, and Hose.

at lower prices than ever before.

CHANDLER & CO.,
Winter St., Boston.

GOD'S AGES.

Here in the broad fields of the busy West
A generous harvest waits the tireless hand;
With peaceful trust the palmy days are blest,
And sweet, unbroken rest the nights command;
Amid brave toil and hope and courage strong,
God's ages roll along.

In other lands the calm expanse of heaven
Is oft-times rent by clash and cloud of wars,
To seething strife humanity is given,
Till pitying earth the ebbing life-tide draws;
Yet who can doubt, serene above the wrong,
God's ages roll along?

Whether the glad earth blossom, teem with fruit,
Or her fond bosom bear the load of death,
Whether the soul in dark distrust be mute
Or from its woe give forth melodious breath,
Whether defeat or victor's joyful song,
God's ages roll along!

—From "A Bank of Violets," by Fanny H. Runnells Poole.

The Pulpit.

WHY SHOULD WE IMITATE JESUS?

BY HOWARD MACQUEARY.

"Christ also suffered for us, leaving us an example that we should follow his steps."—1 PETER ii. 21.

The character of Jesus, and why we should imitate it, is the subject of this sermon. And this is the most important question which can engage the attention of Christians of all names and sects, because, on the one hand, Orthodoxy has unduly exalted Jesus, and, on the other hand, Heterodoxy is disposed to unduly depreciate him. In no other case is the character of the founder so completely identified with his religion as in the case of Jesus. Moses, Isaiah, Paul, Buddha, Confucius, Zoroaster, Socrates, may all be distinguished from the systems of religion they taught; and we may accept their teachings without imitating their characters. But Jesus not only practised what he preached: he especially commanded his disciples to follow in his steps, to do as he did.

Moreover, it is a notable fact that, the more men become sceptical as to the dogmas of Christianity, the more do they appeal to the character of its Founder as that which is most beautiful and most attractive in this system. Even the most radical sceptics vie with the most earnest believers in eulogizing the human character of Jesus, and yet it is probable that most people have vague ideas of Jesus' character. They think of him as a good man, but could hardly point out special traits of character which were commendable and admirable. It is the object of this sermon to do this. I should be glad to think that henceforth those who hear this sermon would always not only cherish profound respect for Jesus, but would try to imitate his example.

Of course, I shall speak of Jesus as a mere man, and discuss his characteristics as I would those of any other man. Orthodoxy, as I have just said, has deified Jesus; but we cannot reasonably be asked to imitate the example of a God. If Jesus were God, then his example is useless to us. And, while Orthodoxy recognizes and asserts the humanity of Jesus, yet at the same time it allies the man Jesus so closely with the God Jesus, it attributes so much superhuman power to Jesus, that it makes his example, even as a man, utterly inimitable and unapproachable by us. This is equally true of all those views of Jesus held by moderate liberals, such as conservative Universalists and Unitarians, who, while denying the Deity of Jesus, assert that he was a superhuman being. You have only to read Channing's sermon on "The Imitableness of Christ's Character" to see how impossible it is to assert that Jesus was a superhuman being, and yet maintain successfully that this superhuman character may and should be imitated by human beings. If a Channing could not prove such a proposition, certainly weaker men may well despair of doing so. It ought to be as clear as day that Jesus must be considered as a mere man of like passions with ourselves, who had to struggle against sin and temptation as we have to struggle against it before he can be held up as an example for us to imitate.

But, while we fully admit that Orthodoxy and semi-Orthodoxy have unduly exalted Jesus, we must also insist that radicalism is disposed to unduly depreciate Jesus. It is one of the most deplorable features of modern scepticism that it cannot see much beauty in the character of Jesus. It is true that the radical sceptics profess great respect for Jesus, but they never think of imitating his example. On the contrary, they are more disposed to treat him as "a child of his age," whom "our progressive age" has outgrown. His character was indeed a pure one, his courage in dying for truth and righteousness was admirable, he said many true and beautiful things; but, after all, he was an optimist, a dreamer, an impracticable sort of person, whose teachings and example cannot be followed by this generation. This is about the way the radical sceptics of our age feel toward Jesus, and it is to combat such views that I have written this sermon.

Having thus stated my object and point of view, I proceed to discuss the most important characteristics of Jesus.

I. And the first characteristic that strikes us is, of course, his sympathy with humanity in all its phases. It is said of him that "he went about doing good"; and his life, from his first appearance as a public teacher till he died on the cross, was filled with kindly deeds to suffering humanity. He seems to have been a veritable magnet for sufferers of all sorts. Here he would heal a woman of a fever (Matt. viii. 14-17); there he would cure a paralytic (Matt. ix. 1-8); over yonder he would soothe to rest the raving maniacs, whom the people thought possessed of devils, so terrible and violent were these unfortunate sufferers (Matt. viii. 28-34); out there in the deserted fields he causes the hungry multitude to be fed before they start home, lest they faint by the way (Matt. xiv. 13-21). Here comes a poor stricken father with an epileptic child, kneeling to him and saying, "Lord, have mercy on my son"; and Jesus rebukes the "devil" of epilepsy, and it departs from the boy (Matt. xvii. 14-21; Mark ix. 14-29). There by the wayside sit two blind men, crying for light and sight; and Jesus touches them and restores their eyesight (Matt. xx. 29-34). Here comes poor Jairus with the sad news that his little daughter lies at the point of death. And Jesus hastens to his house, and finds the family and friends weeping over her apparent death; but he puts them forth, and by his wonderful powers arouses the girl from her deathlike trance, and in due time she recovers (Mark v. 21-43,—especially verse 39; and Luke viii. 40-56). Here at the gate of the little town of Nain comes forth a funeral procession, with the body of a poor widow's son stretched out in apparent death. He stops it, and restores this young man to consciousness and to his bereaved mother (Luke vii. 11-17). Even those poor outcasts, the lepers, found in him a friend and helper (Mark viii. 1-4, etc.). No matter if these deeds may be easily paralleled from the history of other great and good men, no matter whether they were "miracles" or not: the real value and beauty of these stories is found in their testimony to the sympathy of Jesus with suffering humanity. Even if it be said that these stories are mere legends (I do not believe they are), yet legends must have some basis to rest upon; and Jesus would never have been given the noble title of the "Great Physician" if he had not done great things for suffering humanity. But he sympathized not only with the sadder side of human life, he also took part in the joys of the people. The story of the marriage at Cana of Galilee may be a legend; but it is true in essence, in that it brings out vividly the social side of Jesus' nature. It is said in another place that "the Son of man came eating and drinking"; and he ate and drank so freely with the people that he was—unjustly, of course—accused of being a glutton and a wine-bibber (Matt. xi. 19, etc.). While he never chose a home for himself, he could take little children up in his arms and bless them, and declare that "of such is the kingdom of heaven" (Matt. xix. 13-15, etc.). The artists have done well in seizing upon this scene as one of the most beautiful in all history. Many great men are devoid of the softer sentiments, and are too absorbed in great thoughts and schemes to think about the little ones. But, if Jesus had not shown a deep love of children, his character would have been deprived of one of its strongest points. He would have failed to touch the mother's heart, and would justly have cut himself off from the sympathy of a large section of mankind,—nay, indeed, of all true men and women. Nowhere in his history is the charm of Jesus' character so finely and forcibly brought out as in those passages which record his attitude toward the little children. The sympathetic side of Jesus' nature is still more clearly brought out in his dealings with the poor. He deliberately chose for himself a life of poverty, in order that he might get nearer to the hearts of the mass of the people. For it cannot be doubted that Jesus might have become a rich and popular rabbi of his time, had he chosen to have accepted the traditional teachings of Judaism, and have fallen in with the popular customs. But he preferred truth to position and poverty to riches, in order that he might give the bread of life to the people. The story of his temptation shows how he was tempted to adopt riches and worldly honors, and how he resisted the temptation. In adopting a life of poverty, he necessarily deprived himself of the means of relieving the physical needs of his fellow-men. But, after all, the need of sympathy is often greater than the need of bread; and Jesus, as a poor man, could identify himself with poor people, could get close to them, could live with them and in their hearts, and help them to higher and nobler views of life than he could have done as a rich man. A great deal has been and is being said about Jesus' ideas of poverty. But, if some of these critics were as anxious and as ready to cultivate his self-sacrificing spirit, and to put in practice his grand humanitarianism, as they are to point out the evils of almsgiving, the problems of poverty and pauperism would soon be solved. Grant that the rich people of our time should not "sell all they have and give to the poor," yet it by no means follows that they should amass millions by the iniquitous methods notoriously employed to-day in every line of business. Grant that much evil results from injudicious almsgiving: it by no means follows that rich men should "shut up their bowels of compassion" when solicited for funds to carry out the great philanthropic projects of the age. Grant that many unworthy tramps call at our doors for bread: it does not become Christians to turn a deaf ear to all appeals for help from the poor. Grant that much, very much, is being done in hundreds of ways to relieve poverty and root out pauperism: it remains a fact that there are myriads of Christians who do not live up to the teachings and example of their Master in their dealings with the poor. They do not believe in the doctrine of "Christian Stewardship"; they flout the idea that they should use their wealth for the benefit of others; they laugh at the notion that great wealth carries with it corresponding obligations to spend it for the intellectual, social, moral, and religious betterment of mankind. No part of Jesus' teaching, therefore, no feature of his character, is more important than his sympathy with the poor. If only his professed disciples would even partially imitate his example and manifest his spirit in this matter, how soon would the millennium be ushered in! Nowhere else can there be found such wide divergence between the example and teachings of Jesus and the actions of modern Christians as here. Instead of imitating him and practising his precepts, many Christians are busy giving reasons why he should not be followed in this matter. But, not to dwell longer on this phase of our subject, let it be noted that Jesus' sympathy with humanity came out in still another way; namely, in his treatment of fallen women. Read the story of the woman taken in adultery in John's Gospel (viii. 1-11), and contrast the Master's treatment of that woman with that of modern Christians in such cases. The critics tell us that this beautiful story is not found in the oldest manuscripts of the Gospel. No matter! It is truer than history. This is not the only case of this kind recorded in the Gospels. In Luke's Gospel (viii. 36-50) another woman "who was a sinner" received the same sort of treatment from Jesus. And such stories would not have been told of the great Teacher if they had not been true. Modern Christians would dislike to hear of their minister's coming in contact with such women, even to do them good. It would give ground for gossip! But Jesus was evidently not afraid of such gossip. "The whole need not a physician, but they that are sick"; and he came not to call the self-righteous, but sinners, to repentance. And so he had kind words for every one, and aimed to relieve the sick, to help the needy, to raise the fallen, and to elevate the whole human family.

II. A second characteristic of Jesus, which is not as commonly noted as his humanitarianism, was his practical good sense,—what we may call his manliness. It is to be feared that most men consider Jesus an effeminate person, a saintly man who spent his life teaching impracticable theories to women. He was, they fancy, a typical preacher,—one who spent his evenings with the ladies and his days in dreaming on the hillsides or in the fields of how men might be made angels and heaven established on earth. But he did not take part in the stern realities of life; and, therefore, he could not sympathize very much with the practical business man, or tell him how to overcome his special difficulties. Let it be remembered, then, that Jesus spent the first thirty years of his life in his father's carpenter-shop. A tradition says that he used to make yokes, and this is not at all improbable. I should like to have one of those yokes; for I am quite sure it was well made, and it would be far more valuable than a piece of "the true cross." It is not at all probable that a poor carpenter, who had to earn his living by the sweat of his brow, entertained very impracticable theories of social regeneration. And this opinion is confirmed by the records of Jesus' life. Thus, recall the story of the young man who came to Jesus and asked him what he must do to inherit eternal life. "Keep the commandments," replied the Master; and, when the young man said he had kept all these from his youth up, Jesus answered, "One thing thou lackest: go sell what thou hast, and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven" (Matt. xix. 16-30, Mark x. 17-31, Luke xviii. 18-30). This reply showed Jesus' profound insight into human nature. He saw at a glance that this young man was self-righteous, that he was disposed to glory in having kept all the commandments from his youth up; and yet he lacked the very essential of all religion,—namely, love of his fellow-men, which would lead him to sacrifice what he had and give to their necessities. None but a man of shrewd common sense, of fine discernment, could have made this discovery. A man who had been shut up in a cloister, a man who had lived among women and did not know men, would not have cut to the root of this young man's self-righteousness and weakness; and the fact that he went away sorrowful, and did not do what Jesus bade him do, showed that the discernment of hearts had judged him correctly.

Again, when the Pharisees came to him

COTTOLENE

—IS SOLD LIKE THIS—

The manner in which Cottolene is sold is but another guarantee of its purity and cleanliness. Carefully put up in tight tins (one, three and five pounds) it is proof against the numerous odors and impurities naturally prevalent in a modern grocery store and which are readily absorbed by lard. Consider with this the question of healthfulness, the question of economy, the question of taste and you have the reason why so many thousand discriminating women have turned from lard to COTTOLENE. Get the genuine with trade mark—steer's head in cotton-plant wreath.

LARD IS USUALLY SOLD LIKE THIS.

THE N. K. FAIRBANK COMPANY,
CHICAGO.

224 State Street, BOSTON. PORTLAND, ME.

and tried to entrap him into a treasonable utterance against the Roman government by asking him if it was lawful to give tribute unto Cæsar, he cleverly parried their attack by taking a penny, and asking, "Whose is this image and superscription?" They answered, "Cæsar's." Then said he, "Render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and unto God the things that are God's" (Matt. xxii. 15-22). In this reply he not only laid bare the hypocrisy of the Pharisees, but he recognized the lawfulness of government, and gave them a wholesome lesson in true religion. A visionary would not have done that. If, for instance, Jesus had been a sentimental socialist or anarchist, as some modern writers claim he was, he would have allowed himself to be entrapped into advocating a revolution. But he believed in government: he felt that even a bad government was better than no government and better than an unwise revolution; and, above all, he felt that hypocrites should be rebuked, and not be allowed to ensnare others for their purpose. Only a shrewd, practical man could have made that reply.

Once more, when a lawyer (or scribe) tried to puzzle and confound Jesus by asking him which was the greatest commandment, he gave him a reply equal to anything the wisest of the sages have said, and one whose force even a lawyer had to admit. "The first of the commandments," he said, "is this: Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart and soul and strength; and the second is like unto it, Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." No wonder the scribe exclaimed in astonishment, "Well, Master, thou hast said the truth!" (Mark xii. 28-34, Matt. xxii. 34-40). No matter if this reply was not original with Jesus: his use of it on this occasion showed both his strength of mind and fine practical sense. He proved himself more than a match for the lawyer by quoting his own law against him; and, if lawyers are considered "practical men," Jesus should be so considered.

On another occasion a man came to Jesus and asked him to speak to his brother, that "he divide the inheritance with him." But he refused to do so,—first, because he would not interfere with the rights of property; and second, because he saw that covetousness lay at the root of this request. Jesus did not propose to violate the law of the land, and yet he did not let this opportunity of teaching a great religious principle pass by unimproved (Luke xii. 13-15). And, in like manner, when his enemies tried to entrap him into a violation of the Mosaic law by bringing to him the woman taken in adultery, he silenced them by the masterly reply, "Let him that is without sin among you cast the first stone." He knew that the woman's accusers had themselves been guilty of the sin they charged against her, he knew that they were simply aiming to ensnare him; and, therefore, he cleverly avoided sanctioning adultery, and at the same time did a deed which is of itself enough to immortalize him. How any one with such facts before him can think that Jesus was not a man of fine practical sense I am unable to understand. He was as gentle and tender as a woman, and at the same time as stern and shrewd as the wisest men of his day and of ours. His example is worthy not only of the imitation of women, but also of the imitation of the business man. His gospel was intended not for the cloister, the pulpit, the parlor alone, but for the busy haunts of men,—for the law courts, the marts of trade, and the dark places of the earth. In a word, Jesus was a man,—the manliest of men, who lived among men, who knew men, who taught men, and who expected men to follow his example seven days in the week, and not merely on Sunday or under special conditions.

III. The third characteristic of Jesus that strikes us most forcibly was his intellectual independence. This is seen in his treatment of the Mosaic law in his Sermon on the Mount (Matt. v.). It must indeed, have seemed the height of presumption for an obscure Nazarene carpenter and peasant to venture to correct and supplement the teachings of the great lawgiver of his people. "It hath been said by them of old time, Thou shalt not kill, thou shalt not commit adultery, etc.; but I say unto you" thus and so. No wonder it was said "he taught as one having authority, and not as the scribes." He felt that Moses had not gone far enough and deep enough, and that he could add to the old legislator's precepts; and we are forced to admit that he did pour the richest new wine into the old wine-skins. The scribes taught the utmost reverence for every jot and tittle of the law; but he did not hesitate to reject this when necessary, and to infuse into it a new and better spirit. He was rebuked by the Pharisees for rejecting the "traditions of the elders,"—the traditionary laws and customs, which were hardly inferior in popular esteem to the Decalogue itself. But he fearlessly retorted that they had "made void the word of God by their traditions" (Mark vii. 1-13 and Matt. xv. 1-9).

He repeatedly violated the customs concerning the Sabbath, and justified that violation by the grand declaration that "the Sabbath was made for man, not man for the Sabbath," and "the Son of man was lord even of the Sabbath" (Mark ii. 23-28, Matt. xii. 1-8, Luke vi. 1-5). Such a statement must have astounded the formalists of his time, and it needs to be more deeply pondered by the Sabbatharians of our day.

Jesus was the boldest thinker and the greatest heretic of the ages. He did not hesitate to reject the most approved precepts which he considered erroneous and the most venerable traditions which he considered false and superstitious.

Now, a good many modern writers, as, for instance, Rev. M. J. Savage, (in his "Jesus and Modern Life," chap. iii.), tell us that Jesus' knowledge of the universe was decidedly meagre and limited. Instead of knowing all about the universe (which Orthodoxy holds he created), these writers claim that he had very erroneous ideas of the origin, constitution, and destiny of the world. Astronomy, geology, and biology are modern sciences; and Jesus held the popular opinions of his time upon such subjects. From all this we might be disposed to think lightly of Jesus' intellectual power. And, of course, if Jesus were, as Orthodoxy affirms, the Creator of the universe, then he ought to have known its real nature and constitution. But we who hold that Jesus was not God, but only a great Prophet of God, are not disturbed by the intellectual limitations which the critics predicate of Jesus. He was pre-eminently a great religious genius, and was not inspired on all other subjects. A man cannot be expected to transcend all others in more than one line. As Saint Paul says: "There are diversities of gifts, but the same Spirit. For to one is given by the spirit the word of wisdom; to another the word of knowledge by the same Spirit; to another faith by the same Spirit; to another the gifts of healing; to another, prophecy; to another, divers kinds of tongues; and to another the interpretation of tongues" (1 Cor. xii. 4, 8, 9, 10). In short, there are born scientific geniuses, poetical geniuses, military geniuses, and religious geniuses. A Darwin could never be a Napoleon, nor a Shakspeare a Newton. Hence it is sufficient that Jesus outranks all the religious sages of history. It is not the extent of his knowledge on scientific or historical subjects that we emphasize, but his intellectual independence. I am quite sure that, if Jesus lived to-day, he would gladly accept the results of scientific research, and would see in the discoveries of modern science grander revelations of God than the old seers saw in nature. What is needed above all things in scientific investigations or religious matters is intellectual independence; and, therefore, Jesus' example may well be imitated by the most advanced thinkers of our day. The Church and the world are still suffering from a dearth of bold and independent thinkers and workers; and, if we could only get more men to reject "the traditions of the elders," as fearlessly as Jesus did, there would soon be a decided clearing of the political, educational, social, and religious atmosphere. Let not, then, educated men fancy that Jesus has nothing of importance to teach them; for all their knowledge will amount to nothing if it be not courageously used.

IV. The last and most important characteristic of Jesus that I shall note is his moral courage. This is seen in every word and act of his from the time he emerges from the obscurity of his Nazarene home until he vanishes from earth. He faced rabbles, he denounced the political and religious rulers of his time, and he finally died a martyr to his cause.

It is held by some that Jesus did not clearly foresee the result of his work from the beginning, and that it was only as time went on that the necessity of dying for his cause became apparent. Then it was too late for him to retreat, and so he was forced by circumstances to die the martyr's death. But this attempt to detract from the courage of Jesus is untenable,—first, because the contention is improbable in itself; and, second, because it is contradicted by the most reliable parts of the Gospels. It must have been plain to so great a mind as that of Jesus that any one who should have the boldness to attack the popular religion of his time would win the martyr's crown. The history of all the great prophets, with which he was perfectly familiar, as well as the experience of the more recent reformers, made this perfectly certain. Hence, when he adopted the rôle of a religious reformer, he must have known that suffering and death awaited him. If, however, he had been so simple as not to foresee this result, his experience as a public teacher would soon convince him of the fact. Thus it is said that soon after opening his ministry he visited his Nazarene home and preached in the synagogue there. His sermon so exasperated the people that they led him to the brow of the hill whereon the town was built, and were about to cast him down headlong. "But he, passing through their midst, went his way" (Luke iv. 14-32). On more than one occasion he displayed such marvellous courage in the presence of a mob that they let him escape unharmed (John vii. 30, etc.). In his various conflicts with the Pharisees and Sadducees, also, he manifested great boldness; and in no other man's biography can be found a severer denunciation of hypocrisy than in the twenty-third chapter of Matthew's Gospel, where Jesus' eightfold woe against the Pharisees is reported.

On a certain occasion, when he was passing through Herod Antipas' province, some Pharisees came and tried to frighten him by saying, "Get thee out and depart hence, for Herod will kill thee." But Jesus, in reply, sent a positively defiant message to the king,—"Go ye," he said, "and tell that fox, Behold, I cast out devils, and I do cures to-day and to-morrow; and the third day I shall be perfected. Nevertheless, I must walk to-day, and to-morrow, and the day following; for it cannot be that a prophet perish out of Jerusalem" (Luke xiii. 31-33). This means simply that he would do his appointed work, regardless of the king's threats; and then, having finished his work, he would suffer the consequences.

A man who could thus face angry mobs thirsting for his blood, who could denounce the religious and political rulers of his time for their hypocrisy and oppression, and could finally submit to crucifixion, was certainly a hero of the highest type. Some men speak lightly of the death of the martyrs, as if it required but little courage to die for one's convictions. But, usually, those who thus aim to detract from the glory of a Jesus or a Socrates would not suffer a moment for their convictions. They would not sacrifice a dollar for the sake of truth. Certainly, the vast majority of men honor him who is willing to seal his testimony to truth and righteousness with his blood. The story of the death of Jesus, robbed of all its superstitions and legends, will ever be read with the deepest emotions by all who can admire moral and physical courage.

From all this it appears that Jesus' example is worthy of our imitation because of his deep human sympathies, because of his practical good sense, because of his intellectual independence, and because of his moral courage. The philanthropist who would relieve suffering and root out poverty can gather inspiration from him who went about doing good; the business man can learn practical wisdom from the carpenter's son who proved himself more than a match for lawyers, Pharisees, and his other opponents; the educated man can learn intellectual independence from the bold rejecter of the traditions of the elders; and the prophet and reformer may be nerved for the conflict by the splendid courage of the Crucified One. The force of example is far greater than that of mere precept; and, as Jesus not only taught the noblest religious and ethical truths, but put them in practice, and left us an example that we should follow in his steps, we shall do well to imbibe his spirit and imitate his character.

And what was the secret of the marvellous courage of Jesus? It may be found in his God-consciousness. "The fulness of the Godhead did not dwell in him bodily," but he dwelt in God. "In God he lived, moved, and had his being." He felt deeply and sincerely that God was his Father, that he was surrounded by the awful presence, that the divine Spirit was ever whispering his commands in his ear, and that he dared not disobey those commands. Therefore, he could sacrifice ease and comfort, home, friends, family, and fortune, and live a life of pain and die an ignominious death, knowing full well that a higher reward awaited him in the ushering in of a new and better era of holiness and happiness among men. It is such faith that makes heroes and martyrs; it is such faith that removes mountains of difficulty, sin, and misery; and it is such faith which we as Christians must seek and cultivate. All hail, then, thou great Nazarene! From thy rest in the bosom of God mayest thou look down upon thy fellow-men! and may a blessed influence issue from thy spirit, that shall lead us on through the trials and troubles of life to that rest that remaineth for the people of God!

Spiritual Life.

There is nothing that so becomes a man as the brave surrender of himself to the truth.—John Page Hopps.

Cultivate the habit of always seeing the best in people, and, more than that, of drawing forth whatever is the best in them. Cuyler.

What the scientists teach cannot in the nature of things harm religion. They may put to death a thousand theologies, if they will: they are only schemes, devices of the human mind. Religion centres in the eter-

PRATT INSTITUTE, Brooklyn, N.Y.

NORMAL, professional, and special training in the various branches of Applied Art, Literature, Science, and Mechanics, and carried on under the following departments: Fine Arts, Domestic Art, Domestic Science, Science and Technology, Kindergarten, Library, and Museum. The Manual Training High School offers a Four Years' Course for both sexes, in preparation for College or for the advanced work of the other departments. FREDERIC B. PRATT, Secretary.

A Back Bracer.

Here is a chair which looks as uncomfortable as a hump-backed camel. Yet it is the most comfortable office or piano chair ever devised.

The chair consists simply of five things: (a) a crowning leather seat, heavily upholstered; (b) a cushioned back-rest, large enough to cover the full width of the shoulders and lower back; (c) a 12-inch adjustable rack for raising or lowering the back cushion to the right height; (d) a set-screw for adjusting the degree of forward pressure of the back cushion; (e) a swivel and tilting mechanism under the seat.

Here is the operation: For active work set the cushion high and tighten the screw. If resting or conversing, relax the screw and rock easily backward. If tired, lower the cushion to fit the lower back, and tighten the screw, and the result is luxury itself.

It is a wonder that such a chair was not discovered before. It is the most perfect office chair for all needs, and is equally good for a piano chair.

PAINE FURNITURE CO.,
48 CANAL STREET.

nal relation between the human heart and the infinite life of our Father.—M. J. Savage.

If we, having freedom, fail to live the moments as they come to us, fail to seize them as they pass, and take from them blessings with which they are laden, disorder enters into the divine laws, delay and hindrance of harmony and perfection is experienced in the world of men.—John C. Learned.

He that is honest and earnest and speaks and pleads honestly and earnestly needs no novelty to attract and to keep the people. Sincerity is the magnet that draws them. Truth is the chain that keeps them. Reverence is the light that shines them home better citizens, and brings them back again better men and better women.—Joseph Krauskopf, D.D.

The most we can do with the present moment is what? Simply to give it the right tendency and upward inclination, a movement toward the ideal. Achieve! Achieve! The genius of life strikes no other chord; and we improve our fleeting opportunities as they are borne to us and from us on the wings of the hours by trying to achieve.—Frederic A. Hinckley.

We do not admire this mutual criticism of each other's temperature, and strongly suspect the reality of that earnestness which prides itself on its own intensity. We must not propose to assume any artificial heats, in order to spite and disprove this frequent accusation, but be resolved, in an age diseased with pretence, to remain realities,—to profess nothing which we do not believe, to withhold nothing whereon we doubt, to affect nothing which we do not feel, to promise nothing which we will not do, holding, with Paul, that simplicity and sincerity are truly the godliest of things.—James Martineau.

Spirit of the Press.

The Christian at Work in an article, "After the Christian Endeavor Convention," utters this warning suggestion:—

The Endeavor Society should be kept within the proper bounds prescribed by its constitution. These comprise the reclaiming of the indifferent, the maintenance of a prayer-meeting, the promotion of the social interests of the church, the promotion of personal consecration, and the furtherance of the mission, and other beneficent work of the church; and this is all. And it is enough. So full is this list that there is no room for politics, or even the cause of good government, further than that individually members should sustain it by their votes. But Christian Endeavor is not a good government club, much less an anti-Tammany organization. Therefore, Christian Endeavor, as an organization, has no more place in the political field than it becomes a Board of Foreign Missions to concern itself over a town system of drainage. The tendencies of such organizations is to branch out so as to include other departments of activity: this Christian Endeavor will wisely avoid.

The Congregationalist says:—

Religious enthusiasm finds its real test in the appeal to the pocket-book. When the Hindus cease to give their millions every year for the support of old temples and the building of new ones, we shall begin to believe that the power of Brahmanism is broken in India. A form of religion which calls forth no response of gratitude in gifts of what most men value need not be feared and cannot be much extended. It is this test which Christianity is called upon to meet, and just now in our own churches it is become a very searching one. The debts of the Boards are burdens which must be lifted, but they cannot be lifted without wide-spread self-denial. It is a test of our real belief in the work which we have undertaken to do for Christ. Is it so much worth while that we can deny ourselves this pleasure, postpone that purchase, lessen the amount which might have gone into the account of our savings? Evangelical Christianity gives out of all proportion to so-called liberal Christianity. It grows by giving. But the work does not stop in years of drought; and, when the streams are full again, the empty cistern must be filled. It is both a call to faith and a test of faith which the emergency of the debt brings upon us. The fiscal year of the American Board is about ending. One month remains.

The New York Observer, in an article on "Rottenness No Remedy," thus concludes:

It is fortunate for society that all evil impulses do not find expression in deed or even in word, that many murderous thoughts and many lewd ones are kept in abeyance, no matter what influence may serve to keep them so. But to suggest that degenerate literature so feeds the evil trend of man's fleshly nature as to satisfy it and keep it in subjection is absurd. Evil tastes and passions grow upon one. They are never more than temporarily satiated. There is the cry of the horse leech, Give, give. They are fed only to become the stronger antagonisms of all that is good in the soul. The mental powers of numberless men and women are undermined, and noble impulses are shackled and deadened; and in the case of Christians spiritual life declines under the influence of much of the abominable literature on which polite society is feeding to-day. Dr. Nordau believes that the present epidemic of degeneracy and hysteria will end at a given time, humanity either forming some adaptation to the new conditions of existence or subordinating these conditions to the power of its organic control. He has faith in the power of human-kind to self-cure, since he is convinced that its vitality is not yet exhausted. "But," he continues, "it must not be prematurely concluded, therefore, that nothing remains to be accomplished, or that the matter may be left to itself. The degenerates as well as their imitators, open admirers, and such as profess the ideas of this class, are, I fear, quite inaccessible to healing influences." He believes that on the day when newspapers no longer consider it a duty to advertise the cripples and clowns of art and literature the influence of degenerate productions will be greatly arrested. But, unless the Paris doctor has more to say as to the cure, we shall have to look elsewhere for it. The evil is deep, and it is spreading. Perhaps one of the worst features is the distaste it creates for solid and profitable reading.

Literature.

"SELECTED ESSAYS OF JAMES DARMESTER."*

Seldom does one get within the compass of a volume of three hundred pages so much food for thought as we have here. Prof. Jastrow's introduction is a tribute of glowing admiration to the great scholar on whom the mantle of Renan fell in such liberal folds, and who was cut off untimely midmost in a career whose large performance was but the promise of yet greater things to come. Born in 1849, Prof. Darmesteter was at the time of his death only forty-five years old. His father was a poor Jewish bookbinder at Château-Salins in Lorraine, who moved to Paris with his family in 1852. "After the most strictest manner of the sect," he was reared a Jew; and the bias of his birth and early training was powerful in determining his course of life, when, after some years of various study following his academic preparation, he settled down to Oriental philology as the main region of his intellectual activity. He soon acquired a high rank among Persian scholars, and before his death was their acknowledged head. A French translation of the Avesta, with a commentary, completed only a few months before his death, remains the most enduring monument of his erudition. For this work the French Academy gave him a prize of 20,000 francs. Its main effect was to bring down the Avesta from the hoar antiquity to which it had been assigned,—an effect in perfect sympathy with that resulting from the higher criticism of the Old Testament.

"That man is terrible who does one thing"; but Prof. Darmesteter had no ambition to be terrible, and he did many things. In Sanskrit literature and Latin philology he did notable work. And he was no dryasdust either as a student or as a writer. He was ever quick to find the human at the red-ripe of the heart of any literary or religious manifestation; and he was, like Renan, the master of a noble style, remarkable for its virility, as Renan's was not. He was at home in English literature, an earnest student of Shakespeare, but also of our latest poets, one of whom, Miss Mary Robinson, he translated, first her poems, then herself, making her Mrs. Darmesteter. True to his idea that the modern Jew must find his life by losing it in the nationality with which he chooses to connect himself, he was a Frenchman, heart and soul, in his patriotism and his political enthusiasm, and threw himself with ardor into the questions of a troublous, changing time.

The essays and papers selected by Prof. Jastrow are but seven, and none of them reveals Prof. Darmesteter in the more recondite aspects of his mind. Two of them, "The Prophets of Israel" and "An Essay on the History of the Jews," are closely allied, and mutually support each other. Each is remarkable as a piece of compact and effective generalization. The former is ostensibly a review of Renan's "Histoire du Peuple d'Israël." But, while Prof. Darmesteter claims for Renan a profound morality, his own is much more in evidence; and his moral appreciation of the Hebrew prophets is much better than Renan's, who dearly loved "the seat of the scorpion." Indeed, Prof. Darmesteter writes of the prophets with so much enthusiasm that the reader is in danger of forgetting that his sympathy with them is far from being complete, less so than Matthew Arnold's; for, while Arnold found in their Yahweh "a Power not ourselves that makes for righteousness," Darmesteter finds in him only the reflection of a moral ideal. And here, where some would find defect, Prof. Darmesteter finds the promise and the potency of Judaism at the present time. Handicapped neither by theism nor immortality, he believes that it can run the race set before it with triumphant patience and success. The comparison of Judaism with Christianity, with respect to their supernatural elements, is one of the most suggestive pages which the book contains.

*SELECTED ESSAYS OF JAMES DARMESTER. The Translations from the French by Helen B. Jastrow. Edited with an Introductory Memoir by Morris Jastrow, Jr., Professor in the University of Pennsylvania. Boston and New York: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.

The chapter on Renan is reprinted from the pages of the New World. It is an interesting, but not by any means complete, account of him. Another very interesting chapter is that on "Race and Tradition," which argues that race, so called, is a fiction to a very great extent, and especially that the purity of the Jewish race is a fiction of portentous magnitude, that the peculiarities of the race have been produced by its traditional experience, by the Ghetto,—i.e., by its isolation and its disabilities. That a mixture of races is good for the creation of a vigorous nationality is shown by various examples, and the doctrine is one which ought to be peculiarly comforting to the people of America. The chapter on "Afghan Life in Afghan Songs" must not be passed over in silence; for it is one of the most interesting in the book.

THE STORY OF THE NATIONS. Venice. By Alethea Wiel. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. London: T. Fisher Unwin.—We have in this volume an outline of the history of Venice divided into three periods,—the first from 697 to 1172, which comprises the dawn of the ducal power. The second, from 1172 to 1437, is the period of Venice when she reached her greatest glory. The third period includes the decline, in which we see the occasional flashes of the old spirit of greatness through the gloom of decay, until at last Venice in these modern times becomes a part of United Italy. In many ways Venice takes a unique place in the history of nations. The author has told the story with fairness and candor, and has not let the brilliant features which light up the history warp or mislead her judgment. She deals very largely with the structure of the government and the successive changes which have taken place from time to time. On her historic canvas we have the general features of the nation's life and deeds represented. This would have been improved if we had portrayed more of the private and social life of the people, as seen in their homes and streets, in their daily walks, business, and amusements; for it is here that we have the hidden yet real sources of national power. But probably the author did not have in mind so comprehensive a plan, as she begins her preface with the remark that "the story of Venice in its entirety and completeness has yet to be written." It is but just to add that what she has undertaken has been well done. The volume is enriched by illustrations which add to its value.

CHILDREN OF THE SOIL. By Henryk Sienkiewicz, author of "With Fire and Sword," "The Deluge," etc. Translated from the Polish by Jeremiah Curtin. Boston: Little, Brown & Co.—His great trilogy of war stories easily placed Sienkiewicz among the first novelists of the time. The history of Poland gave him an opportunity of which he availed himself. Among the writers of romantic history from Victor Hugo to Tolstoi not one has excelled him in ability to fire the reader's imagination, and to make the old times live again. When, however, he passes from the old time to the new, something is wanting. The characters are as numerous, as well drawn, as clearly distinguished from each other; but they lack the passion and power which made their ancestors so interesting. A love story, of which the background is the awful scenery of war, and of which the hero is a warrior whose mustache curls with his wrath, and whose sword is a lightning stroke, gains something by contrast, such as are not furnished by the scenes of peaceful modern life. A lover whose greatest cares are laid upon him by contracts, mortgages, and land speculations, cannot be an heroic figure. The moral problems worked out by the "Children of the Soil" are the ancient problems of love and duty which come out of the tension between the affections of the soul and the passions of the senses. What a good woman can do to make the moral fortunes of a man, and what a bad woman can do to mar them, is plainly set forth in the lives of certain modern Poles, who are not particularly good or wise or interesting.

DR. GRAY'S QUEST. By Francis H. Underwood, LL.D. Boston: Lee & Shepard, Publishers.—We have here a posthumous novel; and one would like to know if it was the crowning work of Mr. Underwood's useful and busy life or the product of an earlier period which he withheld from publication on account of some dissatisfaction with its quality. There is likelihood in this surmise, for the novel is not one which is likely to increase the author's honorable fame. There is a good local color and some happy characterization, but a certain lack of clearness in the development of the plot which turns upon an unjust accusation and the endeavor of Dr. Gray to relieve the gentleman who is suffering from this from the injurious burden. The doctor's quest is a journey to Europe, when such an incident meant much more than at present, in search of the real criminal. The interest of these matters is much enhanced by Dr. Gray's attachment to the daughter of the man who is unjustly used and imprisoned. The web is further tangled by a designing woman who endeavors to captivate the hero's fancy, but does not succeed. Mr. Underwood's ability and training come out in a good many places, and give a value to the book apart from his particular aim. At one point Daniel Webster is introduced, and in a manner suggestive of some actual occurrence.

HISTORIC DOUBTS RELATIVE TO NAPOLEON BUONAPARTE. By Richard Whately, D.D. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 27 West Twenty-third Street.—For the republication of this book we are probably indebted to the Napoleon revival that is now in full career. If all those who are making Napoleon collections buy a copy, a considerable edition will go off. It is often referred to as a refutation of the mythical theory of Strauss. It could hardly be that, seeing that Strauss never doubted the existence of Jesus; and the attempt of Whately is to make the existence of Napoleon appear doubtful. In fact, this clever jeu d'esprit was written in 1819, sixteen years before the appearance of Strauss's Life of Jesus. It was directed against the more destructive German criticism of that time. It passed through many editions, and many who have never read Strauss have considered it a complete demolition of his theory. Its point is very blunt indeed, when turned against the Biblical criticism of the present time.

BILLY BELLEW. By W. E. Norris. New York: Harper's.—Considering the good points of this book, such as effective situations and interesting characters, it is a pity that one cannot read it with more satisfaction. The hero is a friendly, well-meaning fellow, in whose fortunes the reader becomes interested; but he is tied by most ridiculous notions of loyalty to a married woman whom he does not love, and by whom he is continually compromised. He loves a charming girl, who returns his

LESS LABOR, SUNLIGHT
SOAP
GREATER COMFORT.
FOR LAUNDRY AND HOUSEHOLD PURPOSES.

affection; but a series of unimportant events keeps them apart until she, misunderstanding the situation, marries an old lover, and he breaks his neck by falling from his horse. So the misunderstandings are never explained, and the story itself is not of the kind that makes one willing to endure the ending for the reason that such things probably happen in real life.

THE JUDGMENT BOOKS. By E. F. Benson. New York: Harper & Brothers. 75 cents.—The ghosts of a mistaken past are cruel when they appear to vex an honest and peaceful present. The artist hero of Mr. Benson's clever little story not only dreads his ghosts, but he is impelled to fix them before him in actual form by painting his own portrait with all that unhappy past looking at him through its eyes. There is the Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde story in the outcome; and the portrait seems about to master the artist, when he is saved by the loving faith and courage of his wife. The morbidity of the story does not prevent certain scenes from being fresh and natural; and they incline one to believe that the author will next give us a bright, wholesome story, more like this than like "Dodo," but better in all respects than either.

EVERY DAY'S NEWS. By R. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. 50 cents.—The latest issue in the "Incognito Library" is another attempt to depict the woman whom hysterical novel-writers and hard-pushed paragraphers announce to us as the coming type. Boldness, superficiality, and self-assertion are her characteristics, scorn of man and distrust of marriage is her credo, to write erotic novels is her crowning ambition; and she stalks through the pages of a book, scattering unhappiness for others right and left with serene self-satisfaction. It is a relief to remember that at least we have met her nowhere else; and we may refresh ourselves with the thought of the real women whom we know. For the rest, this individual book is well done; and the tension is relieved by a more natural character than that of the heroine.

FOUR AMERICAN UNIVERSITIES: HARVARD, YALE, PRINCETON, AND COLUMBIA. Harper & Brothers. $3.50.—These four papers have been written by Prof. Charles Eliot Norton, Prof. Arthur T. Hadley, Prof. William M. Sloane, and Prof. Brander Matthews respectively. They are exceptionally qualified to treat of their subjects, and the interest of the book is by no means confined to the students and alumni. It is good for us all to understand and appreciate, not only the past history and the immediate work done at these institutions, but also the greater work which awaits them, and to which their aims are directed. These descriptions are graphic and complete, helped out by many illustrations; and the book offers harmonious comparison of the differing ideals and methods.

LITERARY LANDMARKS OF JERUSALEM. By Laurence Hutton. New York: Harper & Brothers.—Mr. Hutton writes of the landmarks which survive the crash of empires and the march of time, and which made Jerusalem the most imposing and memorable place he ever visited. He tried to put together all the information which the traveller wants to know without compelling him to take a heavy volume along. If the only use of the book were to serve as a guide-book, however, it might easily spare the many illustrations; and the text itself could have been put into compass so small as to fit it even for a woman's pocket. It is an interesting half-hour's talk about the people and places made familiar through the Bible records.

HOW TOMMY SAVED THE BARN. By James Otis. New York: Thomas Y. Crowell & Co.—Mr. Otis is one of the most popular of those writers for children who select their characters from among the little waifs and strays in a great city, and show how generosity, regard for others, and simple honesty may blossom in the most unpromising surroundings. Mothers differ about the influence of such books, but there is no doubt that they find ready sale to editors and publishers. This story tells the adventures of three city children, sent by the Fresh Air Fund for a country outing. One of them is adopted, and the others find lifelong friends by the experiment. Some of the happenings are quite amusing.

IN DEACON'S ORDERS. By Walter Besant. New York: Harper & Brothers.—The "Library Edition" of Mr. Besant's books has reached its tenth volume with this collection of short stories. The first of these is a most disagreeable study of a man who made religious pretension the cloak for his utter hypocrisy and meanness of soul. The sordidness of this central character finds no relief or let-up from the time we first see him, a candidate for ordination, until his death in a State's prison. Fortunately, other stories help redeem this one. "One and Two" and "Peer and Heiress" are two of the best, though none of them do justice to the author.

THE MAYOR OF CASTERBRIDGE: A Story of a Man of Character. By Thomas Hardy.—This new edition of a favorite novel may well find many new readers, since the popularity of Thomas Hardy has steadily increased since the time when the book was first written. The incidents narrated arose mainly from three actual events; namely, the sale of a wife by her husband, the uncertain harvests which immediately preceded the repeal of the corn laws, and the visit of a royal personage to this part of England. This book may not be so well known as others by Hardy, but it has the same absorbing interest of character study and nature drawing.

A BANK OF VIOLETS. By Fanny H. Runnells Poole. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons.—Mrs. Poole's verses are graceful and light, showing a fondness for nature and enjoyment of things pure and good. One of the poems, "Looking unto Spring," first appeared in the Christian Register; and some lines in it are among the best in the book. From the personal poems we discover the writer's enjoyment of Keats, Bryant, Stevenson, and De Amicis. The eight lines to "A Maréchal Niel Rose" are especially pretty.

Miscellaneous.

"Poems of Coleridge and Campbell" are put together for No. 80 of the "Riverside Literature Series," and their clear print and convenient form make this an attractive little book. Happy the child who rejoices over each of these numbers as it is issued, and who adds it with pride to his own collection of books. They are within reach of every one who aspires to own books at all.

The "housekeeping conscience" burdens many a woman who would like to be comfortable rather than conventional. To these troubled souls Miss Ethel Davis's little book, "Dishonesty and Caste," ought to be especially welcome. It is a bright, sensible little talk about house furnishing, entertaining, domestic service, and kindred topics of interest to home-makers. It is published by the Home Science Publishing Company.

D. Appleton & Co. publish a new cook-book by Gesine K. Lemcke, the principal and owner of the Brooklyn Cooking College, entitled "European and American Cuisine." It is quite full in directions as regards the proper preparation of meats, soups, fish, vegetables, etc.; but it needs to be supplemented by the author's book on "Desserts and Salads." There are hundreds of recipes, including many not familiar to Americans, and not a few of them elaborate and complicated.

Literary Notes.

Thousands of cyclists all over the country will read attentively, "What to avoid in Cycling," by Sir Benjamin Ward Richardson, M.D., in the North American Review for August. The value of such a contribution from so eminent a source is apparent.

The leading article in the Monthly Illustrator for August is, as usual, upon the work of a prominent American artist. In this case it is Frederick Dielman, more than a dozen of whose paintings and sketches serve as illustrations to an appreciative paper by Alfred Trumble upon the work of this "painter of the beautiful."

American interest in "Ian Maclaren" will be heightened by a new view of the man himself as seen among the people of his own parish, by Dr. Robert Ellis Thompson, one of the editors of the Sunday School Times. Dr. Thompson writes appreciatively of the famous author as preacher and pastor. The sketch will appear in an early issue of his paper.

Messrs. D. C. Heath & Co. will shortly add to their list of literary publications an edition of Shakspeare's plays for high school and college classes; and an attempt will be made to present the greater plays in their literary aspect, and not merely as material for the study of philology or grammar.

Criticism purely verbal and textual is included, but to such an extent only as may help to the appreciation of the essential poetry.

Marion Harland,

an authority recognized by all housekeepers, says:

SILVER

ELECTRO-SILICON

POLISH

imparts a brilliancy, without abrasion, heretofore unknown."

Send for trial quantity.
Box post-paid, 15 cents.
It's sold everywhere.

THE ELECTRO SILICON CO., 72 John St., New York.

ARMSTRONG & McKELVY
Pittsburgh
ANCHOR, Cincinnati.
ATLANTIC, New York.
BEYMER-BAUMAN, Pittsburgh.
BRADLEY, New York.
BROOKLYN, New York.
COLLIER, St. Louis.
CORNELL, Buffalo.
DAVIS-CHAMBERS, Pittsburgh.
ECKSTEIN, Cincinnati.
FAHNESTOCK, Pittsburgh.
JEWETT, New York.
KENTUCKY, Louisville.
JOHN T. LEWIS & BROS. CO. Philadelphia.
MORLEY, Cleveland.
MISSOURI, St. Louis.
RED SEAL, St. Louis.
SALEM, Salem, Mass.
SHIPMAN, Chicago.
SOUTHERN, St. Louis and Chicago.
ULSTER, New York.
UNION, New York.

From foundation

stone to tip of spire, from priming to finishing coat, for inside or outside painting use only Pure White Lead. Don't mistake the brand (see list genuine brands). It is the only way to be sure.

Pure White Lead is easily tinted to any shade of color desired by using the National Lead Co.'s Pure White Lead tinting colors, prepared expressly for this purpose. For further information send for pamphlet and color-card—sent free.

NATIONAL LEAD CO.,
1 Broadway, New York

The House Beautiful.

By WILLIAM C. GANNETT,

Author of "A Year of Miracle," "Blessed be Drudgery," etc. Paper, ornamental, choice edition, price 15 cents. (In "Life-Studies" form, 6 cents; 10 copies for 30 cents.)

CONTENTS: The Building of the House; House-Furnishing; The Ideal of Beauty; Flower Furniture; Book Furniture; Our Guests; The "Dear Togetherness."

In the cheaper form the edition is neat and serviceable. The special edition, on rich, tinted paper, silk-stitched, with neat, illuminated cover, serves admirably as a dainty remembrance for a friend, and especially to "tuck in with wedding-gifts."

[From The New Unity, May 2, 1895.]

The selection we give in another column from "The House Beautiful"—one of Mr. Gannett's uplifting studies which James H. West has just published—was not made because it was the most inspiring word the pamphlet contains. Where all is so good perhaps there is no best, though to our mind the section on "The dear Togetherness" is fullest of strength, sweetness, and light. But this extract was selected simply because it was the shortest that could be made to stand by itself. By sending its publisher fifteen cents our readers can procure the little book for themselves; and if they want to be strengthened and lifted up, they will do so.

 Sent postpaid on receipt of price by

JAMES H. WEST, Publisher,
174 High Street, - - - Boston.

The Deeper Meanings.

BY

FREDERIC A. HINCKLEY.

CONTENTS:

The Cost of the Divine Spark; The Poet-vision; Looking at Life through New Eyes; Rejoice, we Conquer!

Price 50 Cents.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

A College Town Pulpit.

MR. SUNDERLAND'S MONTHLY SERMONS.

50 Cents a Year. 5 Cents a Number. Reduced rates in quantities.

Series for 1894-95.

1. The Soul's Cry for God.
2. Jesus as Humanity's Ideal.
3. Sectarianism: Its Evils, Causes, and Cures.
4. The True Cross of Christ.
5. Was Jesus God? How he came to be worshipped.
6. Loyalty to Conviction.
7. Is Life a Blessing?
8. Robert Ingersoll's Treatment of the Bible.
9. A Religion for a Republic.
10. The Surest Way of Doing Good.

Order from Rev. J. T. SUNDERLAND, Ann Arbor, Mich.

OLD AND NEW UNITARIAN BELIEF.

BY
JOHN WHITE CHADWICK.

Price, $1.50.

CONTENTS.—Historical Introduction, The Doctrine of Man, Concerning God, The Bible, Christianity, Concerning Jesus, The Future Life, The Great Salvation, Loss and Gain.

"A valuable as well as very readable treatise. . . . The best popular history of Unitarian doctrine that has come to our notice. . . . Mr. Chadwick has most interestingly set forth the rapid transformations of Unitarian belief."—The Nation.

"The best summary of Unitarian history and doctrinal development, and the most radical and optimistic outlook on the future which has yet been produced among us."—Pacific Unitarian.

"A weighty testimony to a notable religious movement from the religion of the letter to the religion of the spirit. . . . His attitude not always that of the contemplative philosopher; . . . his pulse throbs strongly, and quickens that of the reader. There are some passages that belong to the anthology of prophetic literature."—CHAS. G. AMES, in the New World.

"We can here trace the growth of the New Unitarian gospel, see something of the great moulding influences that have shaped and changed it, note the dangers it has encountered, thrill with the warm light of its newly discovered hope, feel ourselves taken into comradeship with its noble army of workers and saints. . . . Decidedly marking a clearer point of vision in the development of Unitarian thought."—The Unitarian.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Spiritual Life.

A Year of Miracle: A Poem in Four Sermons. By Rev. WM. C. GANNETT. 106 pages. Cloth, limp, red edges, 50 cents. Fine edition, bevelled edges, full gilt, heavy paper, $1.00.

"A dainty little book, full of delicate fragrance. Love of nature is in it, and a longing to interpret that secret of nature's power over the soul which no man has yet understood. There is devotion in it, too, and neither clashes with the other."—Critic.

In Spirit and in Truth. Essays by Younger Ministers of the Unitarian Church. 163 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

CONTENTS: Introduction, by Rev. JAMES DE NORMAN; The Philosophy of Religion, by Rev. GEORGE CROSWELL CRESSEY; The Revelation of God in Nature, by Rev. L. D. COCHRANE; The Bible as Literature and as Revelation, by Rev. W. W. FENN; The Thought of God in the Bible, by Rev. FRANCIS B. HORN BROOKE; The Revelation of God in Man, by Rev. S. M. CROTHERS; The Christ, by Rev. ALBERT WALKLEY; The Use of a Liturgy in Worship, by Rev. JOHN TUNIS.

The Insight of Faith. Brief Selected Paragraphs from the Writings of Rev. HENRY W. FOOTE. 115 pages. Flexible cloth, 50 cents. Morocco, full gilt, $1.50.

"Rarely does one find a little volume so full of helpful and precious words. Devotional in spirit and uplifting in aim."—Christian Inquirer.

Ecce Spiritus. A Statement of the Spiritual Principle of Jesus as the Law of Life. 238 pages. Cloth, $1.25.

"Nothing more remarkable has appeared since 'Ecce Homo.' It is as ingenious and original as that famous book, and far more subtle, inward, and spiritual."—St. Louis Spectator.

Light on the Cloud; or, Hints of Comfort for Hours of Sorrow. By M. J. SAVAGE. 176 pages. Cloth, gilt edges, $1.25.

The Religious Life. By M. J. SAVAGE. 212 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

A Living Faith. By GEO. S. MERRIAM. 300 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

The Home.

PRISONERS.

Everywhere the sculptor hears
A voice unheard by other ears;
It half commands and half entreates,
As this burden it repeats:
"Hasten, master! quickly come!
Countless ages, dark and dumb,
Frozen in this prison white
Has my beauty longed for light.
Hasten! with thy chisel keen
Cut away my marble screen,
And before your gladdened eyes
See a perfect statue rise!"

So at times I strangely hear Messages distinctly near.
"Tarry not: I would be free,"
Whisper lips well known to me.
"Silence deeper than the tomb,
Darkness raven as the gloom
Wrapping the decrees of Fate,
Here surround me as I wait.
Hasten, hasten to set free
Thy perfect self that is to be."

—William Roscoe Thayer.

SOLVING THE RAIN PROBLEM.

"It's one o' the longest droughts we've ever had in this country," remarked huckster Perrin to farmer Tomkins. "My garden's almost burned to a crisp, an' I'm afraid it'll catch a-fire if we don't soon have rain."

"Yes, an' jest look at the corn," the farmer replied. "The blades are all curled up into long tubes. Never saw it so dry in my life."

A colony of fairies who dwelt in Cloud-land thought that all the people of the drought-stricken district would agree to have rain at once; and so they held a council, and decided to ask the Rain Father to unlock the fountains of the sky. But at that point the queen suggested:—

"Wouldn't it be a wise plan to consult the people first, to see on what day the rain would be most welcome?"

"A splendid idea!" chimed the fairies.

"Who will go on that errand?"

"I will," replied Westwind.

"And I," sang Mistmaid.

"And I," echoed Sunbeam.

And so said Moonglint, Rosedawn, Twilight, Stellar Ray, Cloudburst, and all the rest of the fairy assembly. So the queen assigned to each swift-winged messenger a portion of the parched district, and then all sallied forth on their errand of blessing.

Westwind made her way to a community of farmers and gardeners. It was early on Monday morning; and thrifty Farmer Tomkins was busy making hay in his meadow, so Westwind flew lightly to him and fanned his cheek and brushed his grizzly beard.

"Ah, that wind feels as if it might bring rain before long," the farmer said, stopping to whet his scythe.

"Will it suit you to have rain to-day?" whispered Westwind in his ear.

"Well, we need rain powerful bad,—powerful," he replied; "but, if it would only hold up until to-morrow, I could get all my hay in the barn. We can wait one day longer for rain, seein' we've stood it this long."

"It won't do to ask for rain to-day," said Westwind to herself, bounding across the fields to consult old Farmer Gruffman, whom she found grumbling in the barnyard while attending to his stock; and, when she asked softly, "Will it suit you to have rain to-morrow?" he replied shortly:—

"Nup! To-morrow I want to thresh my grain. The machine's engaged, and the women are busy baking for the hands. Rain wouldn't suit me at all to-morrow or next day. Better let it rain to-day, so's to cool off the air for our threshin'."

"I must wait till Thursday," mused Westwind, bidding Mr. Gruffman good by. She next visited Farmer Soonaway. He was sitting at his breakfast-table; and so she darted into the dining-room through the open window, drawing a draught of fresh air in after her.

"Ah, how good that pleasant breeze feels!" said the farmer to his wife. "It seems a little as if it might bring rain."

"I do hope it will," responded Mrs. Soonaway.

"It would suit me to a dot just now," added the jolly farmer. "My hay's all in the barn, an' the threshing's all done. I wish it would begin right away, an' keep on for several days."

"How would Thursday suit you?" suggested Westwind.

"Thursday? Why, almost any day this week would suit me better than Thursday. You see I've promised to haul a load of wheat to mill on that day, because the miller needs it then and can pay me spot cash for it. I'm a little short o' money just now."

"Yes, and you promised to get my little steam-engine," chimed in Jimmie, from the other end of the table; "and, if it rains, you can't go to town!" and he puckered up his face ready for a cry.

The puzzled fairy flashed out of the window and hurried as fast as her wings could carry her to the next farm-house. When she made known her errand to Mr. Airs, he replied:—

"Friday wouldn't suit me,—not at all. Let it rain on any other day this week. We need rain bad enough, I know; but I'm going to have a sale here on Friday. You see, I've been a little unfortunate; and so I've got to sell off."

"No, Friday won't do, either," murmured the fairy, springing away before the farmer could finish his tale of disaster. "Where shall I go next? I'm beginning to feel discouraged. Those people are hard to please. Huckster Perrin lives over yonder, I believe. I'll call on him next."

"Yes, yes: we ought to have rain," he assented, in answer to Westwind's gentle inquiry. "My beans an' corn an' tomatoes are all drying up,—fairly cooking in this broiling sun. Yes, send us rain,—the sooner, the better."

"How would Saturday?"

"Oh, don't wait till Saturday! Send it to-day. Everything is suffering, and the cabbage will be ruined by Saturday. Besides, Saturday is market day; and you couldn't choose a worse day for the hucksters."

As Westwind bounded away from Mr. Perrin's garden, a happy thought struck her. Sunday would be the day for rain: on Sunday nobody would be at work. But, as she went from house to house, many of the girls and boys demurred against having Sunday turned into a "rain-day."

"Anything but a rainy Sunday!" broke out Susie Brighteyes, a little impatiently. "All the boys and girls want to go to Sunday-school on that day, to recite their verses and get their reward cards. Oh, no! Let it rain on any day except Sunday."

"No day seems to suit these selfish people," moaned the fairy; "and so I can't ask for rain at all without vexing some one. Oh, dear! What shall I do?" She rose wearily in the air; and, when she reached the cloud where the fairy queen sat on her throne in the "mackerel sky," she sank almost exhausted on the vapory floor. And it was some minutes before she could tell her story. Just as she had finished the recital, Mistmaid alighted on the cloud by her side, looking very tired, and even a little angry.

"I tell you, queen," she burst out, "you can't suit such fastidious folk. I went all over Springdale, and I couldn't find a single day that would suit all the people of that town."

"Why, I'm sorry you have failed in your errand," quoth the queen.

"It was too trying," pursued Mistmaid. "Monday didn't suit the washerwomen, who are poor, and make their living by washing other people's clothes. Tuesday didn't suit a large party of excursionists. Wednesday didn't suit poor Mrs. Dennis, who sells vegetables on that day. Wherever I went somebody objected to having rain on Thursday, Friday, and Saturday. And at last, in my desperation, I called on the parsons of the place; and—would you believe it?—every one of 'em begged me not to send the rain on Sunday, for it always kept people away from church, and it was so disheartening to preach to small audiences."

"And how did you succeed?" the queen said to Moonglint, who had just returned, looking jaded and spent.

"Not at all," declared that fairy. "I went among the lovers, you know, and found that some one had an engagement for every day in the week."

When the other fairies brought in their reports, it was found that they, too, had failed to set aside any special time for the rain.

"What shall we do for those people?" they all moaned together. "How can we help people who are so selfish?"

"There is only one way out of this dilemma," said the queen, presently; "and that is to go to the Rain Father and tell him of the people's needs, and beg him to send them rain whenever he thinks best. He is all-wise, and knows best how and when to water the earth."

"You are right, good queen," said Rose-dawn; "for, if we leave it to those people to agree on a day for the rain, their land will become a desert, and they will all die of want."

"Go, fairies," the queen commanded, "and bear my message to the Rain Father."

Swiftly they sped through the air to the home of the Rain Father, who gave them kindly audience, listened to their recital, and then announced, with much dignity:—

"I have heard your request. Before the evening twilight cometh, I shall send the Storm King with all his cohorts across that parched district. Fare ye well, good fairies."

The Storm King obeyed the mandate of the Rain Father, and for three days poured his aqueous batteries upon the arid land; and, although many people grumbled because their plans had been thwarted, the earth was bountifully refreshed.—Leander S. Keyser.

SWEET PEAS.

"Billy!"

"Yes'm."

"Come here. I want you," called Billy's mother.

"I'm awful busy."

"But I want to see you."

Billy gave an impatient grunt, as he rested one end of the stick of pine wood he was whittling on the ground and sighted it to see if it was straight and level.

"I guess there's no hurry," he said. Billy was not given to hurrying to oblige other people, even his mother.

Presently he heard her voice at the door of the barn in which he was at work, or rather at play.

"What are you so busy about, Billy?"

"I'm making a cross-gun."

"It's going to be a nice one, isn't it?" said mother, passing her hand along the stick. "You always do nice work with tools, Billy."

"Yes," said Billy: "I like to make nice things."

"I came to get you to put something up for my sweet-pea vines to run on. They're just nicely out of the ground."

"But I want to finish my gun," grumbled Billy.

"You can do that 'most any time, so rny," said mother, coaxingly. "But the peas are growing, and can't wait long."

"Why didn't you plant 'em against the fence, so they could run on that instead of planting 'em out in the middle of the yard?"

"Because it's too shady by the fence. They'll blow beautifully there in the sun; and you know we don't get many beautiful things, Billy."

"What do you want put for them? Brush, like the peas out in the field?"

"Well, that wouldn't look very nice for the front yard, would it? I thought maybe you could whittle out some sticks. You're so clever with your knife, you know."

"Lots of work," growled Billy.

"Well, good-by, Aunt Maria. I'm off. Good-by, Billy."

A nice-looking, well-grown boy had been coming slowly toward the barn door, and, in doing so, had heard a little of the conversation between Billy and his mother.

"You really are going to take the next train?" said mother.

"Yes, I might as well as break into another day."

"I must get you a lunch, dear," said mother, hurrying toward the house. Hugh, Billy's cousin, lingered a moment to admire the smoothness of the cross-gun stock.

"But I've got to quit work on it," said Billy. "Mother wants me to fuss with her sweet-peas."

"You're a lucky fellow," said Hugh.

"Not half so lucky as you are," said Billy, looking with admiring envy at his cousin. Hugh was a high-school boy in the city some distance away, for which reason, and for his good clothing and his superior age, he was held in great respect by Billy.

"If I was a chap that had as good clothes as you, and could live in a city, and go to high school, and play foot-ball, I'd think myself the luckiest fellow in the world."

"You wouldn't if you had to do without what's far better than everything else in the world put together," said Hugh, soberly,— "something you have and I haven't, and never can have again."

"What's that?" asked Billy.

"You have your mother."

"Oh!" There was a little pause.

"Time was," went on Hugh, "when I didn't think it made much difference whether I pleased mother or not. I thought it a bother sometimes, when she wanted me to do things for her. Now I shall never in all my life hear her voice asking anything of me,—no matter how I long, long for it. Good-by. I'll come again in the summer vacation."

Billy followed Hugh out of the barn to watch while he, with graceful thanks, took the offered lunch, seized his small valise, and struck out in the direction of the station.

"He's a dear boy," said mother, shading her eyes, as she also looked after him. Then she crossed the bit of grass in the front yard to take a look at the sweet-peas just showing above the ground; and Billy could see her smoothing the earth about them and pulling up a stray weed.

He saw the smile which came upon her patient face as she bent lovingly over the tender shoots.

Somehow his high-school cousin's words seemed to have opened Billy's eyes, for he noticed things which he had never before thought of noticing. There were few pretty things, sure enough; and how mother did love pretty things! She was fond of flowers, but could have so few because of fences being carelessly kept and gates liable to be left open. The little gate leading into the front yard was always out of repair, and Billy had more than once seen tears in her eyes when Carlo had gotten in and amused himself by scraping up her freshly planted seeds.

"Yes, I'm always sorry to have him go, he's so kind and thoughtful."

Mother said it as she went into the house; and the sound of her gentle voice had scarcely died away before its place was filled by the noise of the sewing-machine, at which Billy knew she was working for him.

PILLSBURY'S BEST IS TODAY, AS FOR TWENTY-FIVE YEARS PAST, THE STANDARD FLOUR OF THE WORLD.

PILLSBURY'S
BEST

Makes

FAULTLESS Bread;

sweet as the wheat; light and fine and white; honest bread that may be honestly called the staff of life. No bread-maker, no bread-lover, will take any other kind after one trial of PILLSBURY'S BEST.

NOW, while the price is low, is your time to buy it.

PILLSBURY'S BEST IS TODAY, AS FOR TWENTY-FIVE YEARS PAST, THE STANDARD FLOUR OF THE WORLD.

He went back to the barn and began hunting over some sticks which might do for the sweet-pea vines. He could not find any he liked; but his eyes fell on a thin, smoothly planed strip of wood which stood in a corner. He had found it at a house which was being built some distance up the road, and had instantly longed for it to turn into slats for some sloping shelves in what he called his museum. He had swept out shavings for an hour to pay for it, and thought it a great prize.

It was true that Billy was handy with tools. He had done wonders in the way of building sleds, carts, bird-houses, wind-mills, and water-wheels. And just now, with the new thoughts which had come into his head with his cousin's parting words, it occurred to him that he had never made anything to please his mother. And with the thought came a remembrance of something he had seen in the little country town nearest the farm.

"That thing Mrs. Allen's got her morning-glories up onto. What'd mother think to have such! Mrs. Allen's got lots o' nice things," remorsefully, "and mother ain't got any. But that's a bought thing, and we don't never buy that kind o' things. But, if I had some more o' them smooth sticks, p'raps I could fix up something."

With one half-regretful look at his cross-gun, Billy started for the place where the strip came from. There were more of them, and—oh, delight!—a number of short pieces which the workman said he could have for nothing. Again Billy put in some sturdy chore work to pay for the longer piece.

He went around by the back of the barn in order to get his treasures in without observation, and, on going to bed that evening, spent at least a half-hour of wakefulness in thinking over his great plan.

"I'll make it awful pretty. And I won't let her know till it's done and stuck in. Like enough she'll think I've forgot all about it." And Billy chuckled himself to sleep at the thought.

For two or three days he worked at his flower frame every spare hour, often stopping to give a jump and a whoop at seeing how the delicate things shaped themselves under his hands, almost of themselves it seemed sometimes, as if knowing of the love which belonged with the offering, and glad of having a share in its sweetness. Short bars at the bottom, then a bit of dainty lattice, then more cross-pieces, and, with a final triumphant inspiration, some wire twined deftly between, for the better holding of the delicate tendrils.

Billy sat and gazed with delight as the last nail went carefully in. Then came a new and bolder idea.

"It ought to be painted."

In the twilight he carried it down to the unfinished house, and, going again early in the morning, made another exchange of work, this time for paint.

"White or green?" asked the painter. "Folks mostly has green for garden things, lately."

But Billy said white. His mother liked white things, and white seemed somehow more like her. White it was, dainty and delicate, as it finally stood in the back porch of the new house to dry.

In going out the next morning, Billy's eyes shone at perceiving that mother, evidently discouraged in waiting the support for her rapidly growing treasures, had stuck in a few laths.

"Poor mother! She's give up on me," he said with a smile.

"I wish some of them was out," said his sister Hetty, following him, and standing near the peas.

"Why?" asked Billy.

"'Cause it's mother's birthday; and I wanted to put some of 'em on the dinner-table,—just to show her I remembered it, you know. There's a few other flowers, but she does love sweet-peas so."

"Whoop!" cried Billy, with a jump over the laths, Hetty giving a little scream for fear the sweet-pea vines would be ruined.

Two hours later Hetty began the carrying out of a deeply laid scheme of Billy's by calling out:—

"Mother, Billy's took away all the laths you had your sweet-peas on. Pulled the vines off 'em!"

"Dear me!" said mother, in a troubled voice. "How could he! What could he have wanted 'em for?"

"Come out and see," went on Hetty.

Mother came. Billy was standing at one side of the yard, near enough to see the flush of surprise and delight taking the place of the troubled look, near enough to mark the smile and the glow through a little mist of tears as before her arose the graceful mingling of shining white and daintiest green.

They took but a little time,—her steps over the grass plat and those which brought Billy to her side. But plenty long enough for a crowd of resolutions to surge up in the boy's heart that often and often, in many ways, would he taste the sweetness of bringing joy to his mother's face.

He put his arms close about her.

"Happy birthday, mother! Many, many happy birthdays!"—Sidney Dayre, in Sunday School Times.

For the Christian Register.

MOTTO.*

BY HENRIETTA R. ELIOT.

Who can tell the mother's meaning,
When, above the cradle leaning
Where her baby lies,
She with it holds sweet communing?
Broken words or wordless crooning
For her need suffice.

But a heaven-lit joy is glowing
In her eyes; for God is showing
Her the wondrous worth
Of a life! And hers is given
That the pattern set in heaven
Be not marred on earth!

HOW MAC DUFF WENT TO SLEEP.

The tall bouquet stood solitary above the relics of the dessert. Mac Duff, in sleepy satiety, leaned back in his high chair, his fluff of golden curls hanging about a round face rosy from valiant exertions as a trencher-man, his large blue eyes, dreamy and sweet, giving no hint of the infinite imaginations lying perdu in that yellow head.

"Come," said grandmamma.

That "come" electrized Mac Duff into exceeding wakefulness. He knew that it included his afternoon nap. At once he slipped under the mahogany which but now had concealed his fat legs.

"Let's p'ay I was a litta dog, grandmamma. Bow! wow! wow! Isn't I a cunning litta dog?"

"You will be a much cunninger little dog going upstairs," says the arbiter of the small boy's destinies, inexcusably holding open the door. Grandmamma was thankful that there were but sixteen steps, as each step marked a new phase in Mac Duff's imaginations. At every step he paused to bark, to "fluff his hair like a litta pity dog," "to be a dog walking on one leg, on two legs, on three legs, on four legs." He was seized with a consuming interest in zoology:—

"Is zere any dogs without tails?"

"What made 'em has four legs?" "Why did zere hair grow all over zere body?"

"Was zey all heads?"

At the top of the stairs a vigorous dash was made for the bath-room and liberty. This was skilfully intercepted by grandmamma, who turned the tide of war toward the bedroom.

Here life became very amusing to Mac Duff. He shouted with laughter at seeing a fly walk up a window-pane, and he introduced a small ravelling from the carpet as "a litta jack wabbit." His apron came off while he was enacting the part of a very funny Indian named "Danceengleg." This hilarious savage stood on his head while his kilt and shirt-waist were being removed, and walked around on one foot and one hand while his flannel petticoat was unbuttoned.

Reduced to his hose and cotton under-suit, this antic infant "played he was an effelant" while grandmamma put the pillow-shams out of harm's way and folded back the counterpane. Detecting out the corner of his eye that these preparations were nearly completed, Mac Duff bolted for under the bed; but all the effelant was not under cover, when grandmamma caught him by one leg.

"Grandmamma," in a very wheedling tone, "I'd be so happy if we just had one nice little dance before I go to bed."

The strictly Presbyterian relative is subdued into a lively waltz about the bedroom, and the small boy ends in a pink and laughing heap in the middle of the bed.

"You don't want to tell me 'bout de poor

*Free translation of Motto for Third Mother Song in Froebel's "Mutter- und Kose-Lieder."

litta frog zat didn't mind his mamma, does you," insinuates Mac Duff, gently, "while you does up my knobs?"

Grandmamma rolls the yellow locks out of harm's way, and tells the tale of little froggy. At the close of the story Mac Duff, foreseeing the inevitable nap at hand, weeps one little tear, but states that "it is for poor litta froggy."

"Now, grandmamma, you reads to me out of my mamma's Biba, zat my grandmamma that is up in heaven gived to her."

"Very well. What shall I read?"

"Oh, 'bout 'Lijah an' de cake; and 'bout Moses, an' Samuel, an' Joseph, an' ze bad boy zat wasted his papa's money in a far country, an' fed ze pigs, an'—an'—"

"There, there, Mac Duff! Only one. Which one?"

"Only one!" as surprised as if this were not a daily announcement. "Well, David. But don't read me ze songs he made. We'll save zem for Sunday. Read me how he killed a great big norful high giant. How do giants eat dere dinner, grandmamma? Wis dere fingers?"

Peace and alert wakefulness while 1 Samuel viii. is read. Then:—

"Dat is a mos' beautiful story, grandmamma. Now I wish you'd sing me a whole lot of hymns. Sing 'Robes of White,' an' 'Glory, Glory,' an' 'Sweet Story,' an' 'Hush, my Dear,' an'—"

"Only two, Mac Duff."

"Only two!" much amazed. "Only two! Well, sing 'Glory, Glory,' an' 'Peter's Garden.' Only two? I'se sure you don't love me, grandmamma."

"No more talking, Mac Duff! Lie down in the middle of the bed and shut your eyes."

"My eyes don't stay shut. Zey hops open all ze time. Why don't eyes has buttons on zem? Can't I put my feet on ze wall?"

"No."

The two hymns are sung, and then:—

"Now no more. Go to sleep at once."

Retired behind the footboard, grandmamma reads.

Mac Duff's black stockings rise into the air and wave like piratical banners to and fro. This growing wearisome, a pair of fat hands describe circles in the air.

"Grandmamma, I'm done enough sleep."

No reply.

"Oh, dear," very softly. "Las' night a fearful great muskito came and bit me right on my nelbow. Grandmamma, I do wish you'd come kiss ze place zat wicked muskito bited."

"Hush, Mac Duff!"

Silence. Grandmamma is reckless enough to hope that her descendant is asleep; but, lo! a round pink face rises above the footboard.

"How are you, my dear grandmamma? I hope I see you well to-day."

"Mac Duff, I am surprised at you! Lie down."

Mac Duff disappears.

"I hope a nice big dragon fy ate up ze wickid muskito zat bited my nelbow. Grandmamma, why don't litta boys say prayers when dey goes to s'leep jus' before after dinner?"

"Their grandmammass say the prayers for patience."

"Once ze doctar said I was a berry nice patient, 'cause noffin was ze matter wis me."

"Don't talk, Mac Duff."

"Grandmamma, what makes grandpapa go to sleep jus' before after dinner, when nobody don't make him?"

"Mac Duff, you are a very naughty little boy to talk after you are put to bed."

"Grandmamma, why does you call some f'owers wild f'owers? Do dey kick, dey is so wild? Grandmamma, papa's wild horse kicks. Grandmamma, I guess my grandpapa wants me to come down an' hear 'bout de sauce-box. Grandmamma, when I went out to-day ze f'owers holded down zere heads and winkled at me."

Profound silence. Grandmamma looks over the footboard. Yellow head, roses, dimples, white gown, black stockings, fast asleep. Grandmamma thinks it a beautiful sight.—St. Louis Presbyterian.

PRIEST AND WOODMAN.

Abbé Torlin, who has just died, at the age of eighty-five, at a village near Lyons, where he was pastor, was the hero of a very remarkable exploit for the honor and glory of God. When a young vicar, he had taken the place of his pastor, who was temporarily incapacitated by illness. It was decided to decorate the choir of the church with wood carvings, but he had no money. The Abbé Torlin, having called upon a rich peasant proprietor, hoping to obtain from him some pecuniary assistance, met with a very cold and uncivil reception. While being shown the way out, the young priest said,—

"If you cannot give me money, you can give me that oak which is standing there. It will just do for our carvings."

"You shall have it," replied the peasant, "if you can fell it yourself in a day. But, if it is still standing at sunset, you must pay me 200 francs."

The abbé, although he could not have had the example of Mr. Gladstone to encourage him, resolved to show what he could do as a woodman, and to accept the risk of failure. The next morning he said his mass before daybreak, and just as the sun began to rise he delivered his first blow with his axe upon the tree. The whole day he worked as if his life depended upon his success, and before sunset the tree fell; but by that time the amateur woodman was completely exhausted by his exertions, which were the marvel of the district.—Sacred Heart Review.

A watch for the blind is among the newest inventions. A small peg is set in the middle of each figure. When the hour hand reaches a given hour, the peg for that hour drops. The sightless owner, when he wants to know the time, finds which peg is down, and then counts back to twelve.

Nursing

* Mothers

who are run down, and whose appetites have failed, and milk diminished in both quantity and quality, will find

Bovinine

of the greatest service. It restores the mother's strength, produces new, rich milk. For years the best physicians of the country have prescribed BOVININE in all such cases. It never fails them.

A. P. BUSH, 149 Pearl St.

Church Organ for Sale.

Built by Thomas Appleton for the Mt. Vernon Church, Ashburton Place, Boston. Dimensions, 15 feet, 3 inches wide, plus blowhandle, 1 foot, 8 inches. Total width, 16 feet, 11 inches. Height, 19 feet, 11½ inches. For terms, etc., apply to

T. Y. CROWELL,
100 PURCHASE STREET, BOSTON.

Situation Wanted

By a young man 18 years old (graduate of Bryant & Stratton's) in some business where faithfulness and application will count for future advancement. Address H. A. E., Office Christian Register.

A LADY with a pleasant home near Boston, and having the care of a young girl of thirteen, desires to communicate with parents or guardians who may be seeking a temporary or permanent home for one or more children. References exchanged. Address GUARDIAN, care Christian Register.

TO LET. The desirable house, 118 Highland Street, Roxbury; 11,000 feet of land; beautiful location; Norfolk House cars now run near. Two furnished cottages, West Falmouth. S. G. DAVIS, 113 Devonshire Street.

YOUNG LADY, Unitarian, well educated in England and France, desires situation as Companion or Governess. Address E. C., Box 646, Guelph, Ontario, Canada.

"THE MORE YOU SAY THE LESS PEOPLE REMEMBER." ONE WORD WITH YOU

SAPOLIO

WOMEN'S ALLIANCE LEAFLETS.

The Study Class Committee of the Women's Alliance has prepared a leaflet with a course of reading and study on "Unitarian Belief." Copies of this leaflet will be ready for distribution soon. They will be sent free to any branch or circle of students connected with any Unitarian society. Another notice will soon be given in the Register, with information as to where applications for this leaflet may be made. The committee now ask, as a favor, of all Alliances or churches who have printed sermons or tracts on the following subjects, and who are able to give these to students interested, to kindly send a specimen of each one to Miss Clarke, whose address is given below, so that these may be offered, in addition to those already on our list. The tracts of the Unitarian Association, of the Western Conference, and of the Church of the Disciples in Boston have already been included. The subjects chosen are "A Brief Statement of the Central Idea of Unitarian Belief," "Unitarian Belief in regard to God," "Jesus Christ," "Man," "The Holy Ghost," "The Bible and Inspiration," "The Trinity," "The Future Life," "Heaven and Hell," "Church-going and Ordinances" (including baptism and the Lord's Supper), "Miracles," "The Christian Church." Address Miss L. Freeman Clarke, Magnolia, Mass., Chairman of Study Class Committee.

Charities and Reforms.

The movement in favor of summer outings for poor children in London and other large cities of England is stronger this year than ever. Philadelphia was the first big city to move in this matter many years ago.

The New York City Indian Association has succeeded in accomplishing its special work of the year in having raised the one thousand dollars required for the salary of Dr. Hallowell at Agua Caliente.

The nine-o'clock curfew ordinance, so popular in other Minnesota towns, will soon be adopted in Duluth. The proposed ordinance prohibits all persons under fifteen years old from appearing on the street after nine o'clock, and provides a penalty of $100 fine, or ninety days in jail, for violating the law.

The National Association of Elocutionists is making a special effort to have every city of twenty-five thousand and more inhabitants provide a separate school for the instruction of stammerers, where they will not merely receive the proper vocal training, but be constantly under the supervision, during school hours, of teachers familiar with the treatment of such deficiencies and able to check every tendency to fall back into the old habit. Such schools have been eminently successful in Germany.

An interesting experiment in turning large farms into small holdings, which may help to solve the agricultural problem in England, was recently completed in Dorsetshire. Sir Robert Edgecombe seven years ago bought a farm of three hundred and forty-three acres, spent money in building roads and wells, divided it up into twenty-five holdings of from two to thirty-three acres, and offered them for sale, payment to be made in ten equal annual instalments. Purchasers were readily found of all trades and classes, eight only being agricultural laborers; and all the instalments, with slight exceptions, have already been paid off. Instead of a farmer and three laborers, there are now twenty-five families of seventy-five persons on the land, which has increased in value from £170 to £313 a year. —The American.

Education.

The forty-second session of Roanoke College has been a most successful one, not only in the large increase in the enrolment, —twenty-three per cent.,—but also in the faithful work done by the students.

President Dreher of Roanoke will give an address on "Education in the South: Its Difficulties and Encouragements" before the American Social Science Association at Saratoga Springs the first week in September.

Ninety-five per cent. of the population of Massachusetts live in towns having good high schools. The children of the other towns may go to the most available high school, and the town must pay the tuition. This is the only State in which every child may have free high school privileges. —Journal of Education.

In New England colleges were organized before there was an efficient public-school system; but, if New England was the first to make the error, she was also the first to rectify it. In the West, owing to the wise provisions of the ordinance of 1787, the educational system "was built from the bottom." In the South the case has too often been the reverse.

ANDOVER, N.H.—The fall term of Proctor Academy will begin September 2, with improved facilities for the coming year. The principal, Rev. James F. Morton, A.M., will receive the young men in his new house built during the summer, leaving the Boarding Hall for a young ladies' dormitory. The Unitarian Educational Society has recently received $3,000 from the executors of the estate of the late Mrs. Mary A. Hunt of Nashua, who made a bequest of that amount to the permanent funds of the academy.

A kindergarten settlement similar to the plan of the college settlements is proposed for Boston, and will in all probability be opened in the autumn. It will be called the Elizabeth Peabody House. The plan is to lease or buy a suitable dwelling in some quarter of the city where the population is crowded, and have a group of eight or ten kindergartners, normal students, and teachers in residence. The undertaking is to be a memorial to Elizabeth Peabody, to whose efforts the growth of kindergartening is largely due. The settlement will be supported by the Elizabeth Peabody House Association. Each member of the association will be asked to contribute $3 or more per year. The success of the house will necessarily depend upon having a large number of members in the association.

Here and There.

The famous Spitzer collection of arms and armor was sold at Paris last week for nearly $320,000.

The straw plait used for hats and bonnets is chiefly made in the counties of Bedford, Bucks, and Hertford. A large quantity is made by young girls at their own homes. Luton, in Bedfordshire, is the centre of the straw bonnet manufacture.

Engravers in Germany harden their tools in sealing-wax. The tool is heated to whiteness, and plunged into the wax, withdrawn in an instant, and plunged in again, the process being repeated until the steel is too cold to enter the wax. The steel is said to become after this process almost as hard as the diamond.

The largest extent of marsh land in the world is to be found in the lowlands which form part of the steppe of Baraba, between the rivers Irtysh and Obi, in Asiatic Russia. The region is flat and far from salubrious. It is covered with impenetrable forests, salt lakes, and quivering marshes, extending over an area which is not less than, and probably exceeds, one hundred thousand square miles.

Every pope has his motto, and selected by himself, but taken from a list believed to be prophetic, and long attributed to Saint Malachi, a friend of Saint Patrick, but now proved to belong to the sixteenth century. Sometimes they are appropriate. That of Pius IX. was "Crux in Cruce," Leo XIII.'s is "Lumen in Coelo," his successor's will be "Ignis Ardens"; and then follow "Religio Depopulata," "Fides Intrepida," and "Pastor Angelicus."

The Chinese millers make flours out of wheat, oats, rye, barley, buckwheat, millet, potato, sweet potato, chestnuts, peanuts, beans, peas, lentils, pulse, rice, almonds, and fifty other vegetable substances. This offers a variety unknown to our own civilization, which often enables the physician to nourish a patient who does not care for food. It also enables him to give different qualities to teas, broths, and stews. —Dietetic and Hygienic Gazette.

The deposits of nitrate of soda in the north of Chili are found in the rainless districts of Atacama and Tarapaca in layers of varying thickness, which are supposed to have once been the beds of long dried-up lagoons. The nitrate of soda is extracted by being first dissolved in water, which removes the dirt and other components. The nitrate is then allowed to crystallize; and from this raw material are obtained nitrate of soda, sulphate of soda, and magnesia, iodine, and common salt. —Christian Work.

Knotty, and Not Nice

—the hands cleaning ioned, tire-them better, treat ine. It saves not but the rub, rub, the arms and all the harm from it. Think and tear that's strong, healthy wash board—to death" after it. Then think how much better, and cheaper, and easier it is to use Pearl.

ing and old-fash-way. Treat them to Pearl-only the hands, rub, that tells on the back, and that comes of the wear made by a woman with a though she's "tired

Beware
you an imitation, be honest—send it back.

Peddlers and some unscrupulous grocers will tell you, "this is as good as" or "the same as Pearl." IT'S FALSE—Pearline is never peddled, if your grocer sends 367 JAMES PYLE, New York.

The Essential Man.

A Monograph on Personal Immortality in the Light of Reason.

BY

George Crosswell Cressey, Ph.D.

CONTENTS: Preface; I. The Conditions of the Problem; II. The Nature of Man; III. The Persistence of Mind or Soul; IV. The Nature of the Universe; V. Personal Belief; VI. Conditional Immortality; VII. Conclusion.

Price 75 Cents.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

MESSAGES OF

Faith, Hope and Love.

Selections for Every Day in the Year from the Writings of

JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE.

PRICE $1.00.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Lectures and Sermons

BY

WILLIAM J. POTTER.

With a Biographical Sketch

BY

Francis Ellingwood Abbot, Ph.D.

This book is published in style of Mr. Potter's previous volume, "Twenty-five Sermons in Twenty-five Years." Gilt top, bevelled boards.

Price $2.00.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Scraps of Travel.

BY

MINOT J. SAVAGE.

Under this title Mr. Savage's letters written to the Commonwealth during his last trip abroad have been printed. Although not regularly published, copies in pamphlet form, at 50 cents, may be obtained of

GEO. H. ELLIS, 141 Franklin St., Boston.

THE UNITARIAN

The "Unitarian" unites many opinions, many suggestions, many individual methods in one spirit, the spirit of Jesus, love to God and love to man.

CONTENTS FOR AUGUST.

The Gift of a Day. Rev. Charles E. St. John.
Adaptation. Hattie Tyng Griswold.
Spencer's Ethics. Frederic W. Sanders.
A Confessional. H. Ursula Tannenforst.
Vanity and its Cure.
Along the Way. Rachel B. MacMullin.
Col. Ingersoll's Latest Views about the Bible. L. Howard MacQueary.
Causes of the Reformation. S. Fletcher Williams.
To G. L. C. W. I. L.
Intuition. G. B. Stebbins.
As Others see us.
A Suggested Doxology.
Congregational Installation.
Unitarianism in Transylvania. Joseph Ferencz.
One Upward Look Each Day.
Editorial.
DEPARTMENTS:
American Unitarian Association, George Batchelor;
Sunday-schools, Edward A. Horton; Guilds;
Temperance Work, C. R. Elliot; Literary Notes
Children's Corner.
NEWS FROM THE FIELD.

*Terms, $1.00 a year. Sample copies free. Will be sent three months on trial for 10 cents.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher, 141 Franklin St., Boston.

Topics of To-day.

Essays and Lectures on Important Themes.

17. THE MORAL AND RELIGIOUS ASPECTS OF HERBERT SPENCER'S PHILOSOPHY: The relation of religion to morality. By SYLVAN DREY.
18. THE RELATIVITY OF KNOWLEDGE: The nature of sense-perception; sight, sound, taste, smell, feeling; the doctrine of the Unknowable. By ROBERT G. ECCLES, M.D.
19. A STUDY OF MATTER AND MOTION: An excellent digest of a much vexed question, with quotations from many authorities. By Hon. A. N. ADAMS.
20. PRIMITIVE MAN: Pliocene, paleolithic and neolithic races; the ages of bronze and iron, cave-men and lake-dwellers; mound builders; primitive tools. By Z. SIDNEY SAMPSON.
21. GROWTH OF THE MARRIAGE RELATION: Its earlier forms; polygamy; polyandry; marriage by capture; monogamy; divorce and divorce laws. By C. STANLAND WAKE.
22. EVOLUTION OF THE STATE: The growth of political institutions; family tribe, clan, city; the State's final form. By JOHN A. TAYLOR.
23. EVOLUTION OF LAW: How law begins; statute law and judge-made law; the conversion of customs into law. By PROF. RUFUS SHELTON.
24. EVOLUTION OF MEDICAL SCIENCE: Super-natural ideas of disease; the beginnings of medical science; modern sanitary science. By ROBERT G. ECCLES, M.D.
25. EVOLUTION OF ARMS AND ARMOR: The struggle for existence; Nature's methods; individualism and co-operation; final universal peace. By JOHN C. KIMBALL.
26. EVOLUTION OF THE MECHANIC ARTS: Development of the human hand; earliest use of implements and tools; inventions; the laboring classes. By JAMES A. SKILTON.
27. EVOLUTION OF THE WAGES SYSTEM: The definition of wages; economic characteristics of the wages system; wages the outgrowth of slavery; development of the system. By PROF. GEORGE GUNTON.

Pamphlets, 34 numbers, 16 to 32 pages each, some of them illustrated.

Ten Cents Each.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

ORTHODOXY AT OXFORD.

The centre and fortress of this vast system, and of the reaction against the philosophy of the eighteenth century, was the University of Oxford. Orthodoxy was its vaunt; and a special exponent of its spirit and object of its admiration was its member of Parliament, Mr. William Ewart Gladstone, who, having begun his political career by a labored plea for the union of Church and State, ended it by giving that union what is likely to be a death-blow. The mob at the circus of Constantinople in the days of the Byzantine emperors was not more wildly orthodox than the mob of students at this foremost seat of learning of the Anglo-Saxon race during the middle decades of the nineteenth century. A curious proof of this had been displayed just before the end of that period. The minister of the United States at the Court of St. James was then Edward Everett. He was undoubtedly the most accomplished scholar and one of the foremost statesmen that America had produced. His eloquence in early life had made him perhaps the most admired of American preachers; his classical learning had, at a later period, made him Professor of Greek at Harvard; he had successfully edited the leading American review, and had taken a high place in American literature; he had been ten years a member of Congress; he had been again and again elected governor of Massachusetts. And in all these posts he had shown among those qualities which afterward made him president of Harvard, Secretary of State of the United States, and a United States senator. His character and attainments were of the highest; and, as he was then occupying the foremost place in the diplomatic service of his country, he was invited to receive an appropriate honorary degree at Oxford. But, on his presentation for it in the Sheldonian Theatre, there came a revelation to the people he represented, and indeed to all Christendom. A riot having been carefully prepared beforehand by sundry zealots, he was most grossly and ingeniously insulted by the mob of undergraduates and bachelors of arts in the galleries and masters of arts on the floor; and the reason for this was that, though by no means radical in his religious opinions, he was thought to have been in his early life, and to be possibly at that time, below what was then the Oxford fashion in belief, or rather feeling, regarding the mystery of the Trinity.—From “The Continued Growth of Scientific Interpretation,” by Andrew D. White, in the Popular Science Monthly for August.

THE SERVICE OF BIRDS.

The birds do an immense amount of drudgery for man, though they sometimes reward themselves for this hard work by dainty tidbits of ripening fruit. A pair of common American robins, or thrushes, have been watched while they carried three thousand earth-worms to one brood. Woodpeckers destroy eggs and larvæ which would literally develop millions of destructive creatures, both in forests and orchards; and one of the most inveterate foes of the canker-worm is the beautiful oriole, were it but allowed to live and hang its swinging cradle in the elm. For every wing of black and gold on a young girl's hat an apple-tree is stripped of leaves and young fruit, and left brown and ugly in the summer sun, or an elm is denuded of its graceful foliage by the loathsome canker-worm.—The Presbyterian.

Temperance.

The Earl of Carlisle is a very stanch teetotaler,—so much so, in fact, that wine is not allowed upon his table; and, when he came into his title and estates, the wine cellar at Castle Howard was done away. Some splendid old ale, worth a large sum of money, was run away, the taps being turned, and the casks allowed to empty themselves.

The maharajah of Baroda, India, recently manifested his interest in the progress of temperance work by issuing a mandate to the effect that no new liquor-saloons should be opened in future without the sanction of the presiding official. He also provided that, if five-sixths of the house-owners and inhabitants should present a plea that all the liquor-shops should be closed, the official might give the necessary order.—Ram's Horn.

The way that the authorities treat open drunkenness in Denmark seems to us in America somewhat unique, because in this country the burden of the expense and the odium is borne by the drunkard's poor wife and family. In Denmark any inebriate found in the street is hustled into a cab, taken to the police station, and locked up until he has grown sober. Then he is taken to his home in a cab by the police. Next a bill is made out for the repeated transportation of the tippler, and presented to the saloon-keeper who sold the offending drunkard the last glass of beer, wine, or liquor. This bill is sometimes quite considerable. Of course, all saloon-keepers are very careful in consequence of this responsibility.

Personals.

Rev. Dr. B. S. Whitman of Colby University, Maine, has accepted the presidency of Columbian University, Washington, D.C.

Kaiser Wilhelm is the most extensively dressed man in Europe. He has one hundred and twenty-eight naval and military uniforms alone, besides his gold uniforms, royal togger, and an extensive wardrobe of all kinds.

Science.

Mr. David Flannery reminds the readers of the Electrical Age that we would not be able to see at all but for the dust always present in the atmosphere to scatter the rays of light. Perhaps no discovery of the century is more beautiful than this, unless it be that of the reproduction of flowers by means of butterflies and other insects.

Some interesting discoveries have recently been made about animal life on the Hawaiian Islands. It appears that all the land and fresh water shells are peculiar to the locality. Nor is this all. Fifty-seven out of the seventy-eight species of birds and seven hundred out of the one thousand species of insects do not exist in any other portion of the globe.

Another “handicraft” is threatened by the progress of science. Wood-engraving bids fair to become a lost art—and more's the pity!—through the perfecting of mechanical processes; and now Invention announces that the gold-beater's art is likely to be extinguished by electrolysis, by means of which gold-leaf of any thickness, down to one-four millionth of an inch, can be made.

A vibrating helmet for the cure of nervous headaches has been devised by a French physician. It is constructed of strips of steel put in vibration by a small electro-motor which makes six hundred turns a minute. The sensation, which is described as not unpleasant, produces drowsiness. The patient falls asleep under its influence, and awakes to find that the pain has ceased.

It is not so surprising that the American carpet-makers should send their manufacturers to England as that they should find any trade at all in the Levant, which is the great market for the beautiful products of Oriental looms. A good grade of Oriental rugs is not relatively much dearer here than domestic carpets, and in Turkey they must be at least as cheap as the imported article.

Plants kept in the light from an electric arc not only grow as in the sunlight, but some grow faster and larger. They produce chlorophyll in abundance; they reach out toward the source of the light and twist this way or that; they assimilate more potash, produce more albuminoids, and yield a larger amount of ash. These phenomena show that the physiological quality of the electric arc light is the same as that of the sun.—Cosmopolitan.

Salt is that nothing, which, if put on anything, makes it good for something. Of course we mean Bradley's which is the only salt free from lime and dirt, and that won't harden. Your grocer can supply you—see that he does. Write to us for a free sample bag.

“Yorkshire”

Salt

We make all kinds and grades of salt. Whatever price you pay, see that you get Bradley's—it will be the best salt made for the money.

BRADLEY SALT CO.,

49 Jay St., New York. 4 Commercial St., Boston.

BUFFALO LITHIA WATER

Spring No. 2

In the Preparation of Artificial Food for Infants.

Value of this Water in Diseases Incident to Teething.

Hunter McGuire, M. D., LL. D., President and Professor of Clinical Surgery, University College of Medicine, Richmond, Va., says:

“For some time I have been using BUFFALO LITHIA WATER in the preparation of artificial food for infants. Cow's milk is the substitute usually resorted to when the mother is not able to suckle her child and it is impossible to get a wet nurse. One serious objection, along with many others, to cow's milk, is its acidity. Human milk is always alkaline, but cow's milk, except when the animal is fed entirely upon grass, is almost always acid. This is the principal reason why the milk of cows disagrees with many babies, and lime water is often added to this milk to correct the acidity. I believe the long-continued use of lime water is hurtful to digestion, and last summer, when I was feeding two of my own children on cow's milk, and found the nurse adding lime water to prevent colic and intestinal derangement, which the food otherwise produced, I directed her to use BUFFALO LITHIA WATER in preparing the food, with immediate and continued good results. The water was added until the milk lost its acidity and was neutral or alkaline.”

Dr. John H. Tucker, Henderson, N. C., President of the State Medical Society of North Carolina, referring to Spring No. 1:

“I have observed marked beneficial results from BUFFALO LITHIA WATER in the disorders of Teething Infants. I have sent many patients of this class to the Springs for the use of this water and, without exception, they have returned to me cured or greatly benefited.”

This water is for sale by druggists generally, or in cases of one dozen half gallon bottles $5.00 f.o.b. at the Springs. Descriptive pamphlets sent to any address.

Thomas F. Goode, Proprietor, Buffalo Lithia Springs, Va.

Important Works.

Jesus and the Men about Him. By CHARLES F. DOLE. 81 pages. Cloth, 50 cents; paper, 25 cents.

No one can read Mr. Dole's little book without counting him a friend who makes us personally acquainted with the long apprehended but never before closely seen people of the gospel story.

CONTENTS: I. John the Baptist, the Ascetic; II. Nicodemus, the Pharisee; III. Nathanael, the Pure in Heart; IV. Peter and John, the Disciples; V. Jesus, the Master.

One of the freshest, strongest and highest treatments of the subject it has been our pleasure to peruse. Original, attractive, and helpful.—Madison Courier.

